TO HIS MOST SACRED MAIESTIE, CHARLES, BY THE GRACE OF GOD, KING OF GREAT BRITAINE, FRANCE AND IRELAND, Defender of the Faith, &c.

Most dread and gracious Soveraigne,

IN this rumor of VVarre I am bold to present to your sacred Majestie the fruits of Peace, first planted by the hand of your most Royal Father, then ripened by the same gracious influence, and since no lesse cherisht and protected by your Majesties especiall favour vouchsafed to the Author in so many indulgent testimonies of your good acceptance of his service: VVhich grace from your Majestie, as he was known to acknowledge with much comfort whilst he lived, so will it give now some excuse to the presumption of this Dedication, since those friends of his, who think any thing of his worthy to out-live him, could not preserve their piety to him, without taking leave to inscribe the same with your Majesties sacred Name, that so they may at once give so faire a hope of a long continuance both to these VVorks of his, and to his gratitude, of which they humbly desire this Book may last to be some Monument.

I shall not presume in this place to say much of these Sermons; only this, They who have been conversant in the Works of the holiest men of all times, cannot but acknowledge in these the same spirit with which they writ; reasonable Demonstrations every where in the subjects comprehensible by reason: as for those things which cannot be comprehended by our reason alone, they are no where made easier to faith then here; and for the other part of our nature, which consists in our Passions, and in our Affections, they are here raised, and laid, and governed, and disposed, in a manner, according to the Will of the Author. The Doctrine it selfe which is taught here, is Primitively Christian; The Fathers are every where here consulted, with reverence, but Apostolicall Writings onely appealed to as the last Rule of Faith. Lastly, such is the conjuncture here of zeal and discretion, that whilst it is the main scope of the Author in these Discourses, that Glory be given to God, this is accompanied every where with a scrupulous care and endeavour, that Peace be likewise setled amongst men.

The leave and encouragement I have had for the publishing these Sermons from the Person most intrusted by your Majestie in the government of the Church, and most highly dignified in it, I think I ought in this place to mention for his honour, that they who receive any benefit from hence, may know in part to whom to acknowledge it; and that this, what ever it is, is owing to him to whom they stand otherwise so deeply engaged for his providence and care (next under your Majestie) over the Truth, and Peace, and Dignity of the Church of England, for which he will not want lasting acknowledgments amongst Wise and Good Men.

And now having with all humblenesse commended these Sermons to your sacred Majestie, from the memory of the Author, your Servant, from the nature and piety of the Work it self, and lastly, from the encouragement I have had to give it this light, did I not feare to adde to my presumption, I should in this place take leave to expresse the propriety betwixt your Majesties royall Vertues, and the tribute of such an Offering and acknowledgement as this; A Work of Devotion to the most exemplarily pious Prince; a Work of moderated, and discreet zeale, to the Person of the most governed affections, in the midst of the greatest power; a Work of deep-sighted knowledge, ledge, to the moſt diſcerning ſpirit; a VVork of a ſtrict doctrine, to the moſt ſevere impoſer upon himſelfe; and a VVork of a charitable doctrine, to the moſt indulgent Maſter of others: But I dare not enter into this Argument, theſe excellencies requiring rather tacite veneration, then admitting any poſsible equall expreſsion; and therefore with my prayer for your Majeſties long and happy raigne over us, I humbly aske pardon for this preſumption of

Your Majeſties

moſt humble and

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF Dr DONNE, LATE DEANE OF St Pauls LONDON.

IF that great Maſter of Language and Art, Sir Henry Wootton, Provoſt of Eaton Colledge, (lately deceaſed) had lived to ſee the publication of theſe Sermons, he had preſented the world with the Authors life exactly written. It was a Work worthy his undertaking, and he fit to undertake it; betwixt whom and our Author, there was ſuch a friendſhip contracted in their youths, that nothing but death could force the ſeparation. And though their bodies were divided, that learned Knights love followed his friends fame beyond the forgetfull grave, which he teſtified by intreating me (whom he acquainted with his deſigne) to inquire of certaine particulars that concerned it: Not doubting but my knowledge of the Author, and love to his memory, would make my diligence uſefull. I did prepare them in a readineſs to be augmented, and rectified by his powerfull pen; but then death prevented his intentions.

When I heard that ſad newes, and likewiſe that theſe Sermons were to be publiſht without the Authors life, (which I thought was rare) indignation or griefe (I know not whether) tranſported me ſo far, that I re-viewed my forſaken Collections, and reſolved the world ſhould ſee the beſt picture of the Author that my artleſſe Penſil (guided by the hand of Truth) could preſent to it.

If I be demanded, as once Pompeys poore Bondman was, (whileſt he was alone on the Sea ſhore gathering the pieces of an old Boat to burne the body of his dead Maſter) What art thou that preparеſt the funeralls of Pompey the great? Who I am that ſo officiouſly ſet the Authors memorie on fire? I hope the queſtion hath in it more of wonder then diſdaine. Plutarch.

Wonder indeed the Reader may, that I (who profeſſe my ſelfe artleſſe) ſhould preſume with my faint light to ſhew forth his life, whoſe very name makes it illuſtrious; but be this to the diſadvantage of the perſon repreſented, certaine I am, it is much to the advantage of the beholder; who ſhall ſee the Authors picture in a naturall dreſſe, which ought to beget faith in what is ſpoken, for he that wants skill to deceive, may ſafely be truſted.

And though it may be my fortune to fall under ſome cenſures for this undertaking, yet I am pleaſed in a beliefe I have, that if the Authors glorious

ſpirit (which is now in heaven) can have the leaſure to look downe, and ſee his meaneſt friend in the midſt of his officious duty, he will not diſdaine my well meaning ſacrifice to his memory. For whilſt his converſation made me (and many others) happy below, I know his humility and gentleneſs was eminent: And I have heard Divines ſay, thoſe vertues that are but ſparks on earth, become great and glorious flames in heaven.

He was borne in LONDON, of good and vertuous Parents; And though his own learning and other multiplied merits, may juſtly ſeeme ſufficient to dignifie both himſelfe and poſteritie; yet Reader be pleaſed to know, that his Father was maſculinely and lineally deſcended from a very ancient Family in Wales, where many of his name now live, that have and deſerve great reputation in that Countrey.

By his Mother he was deſcended from the Family of the famous Sir Thomas More, ſometimes Lord Chancellor of England; and alſo from that worthy and laborious Judge Raſtall, who left behind him the vaſt Statutes of the Lawes of this Kingdome, moſt exactly abridged.

He had his firſt breeding in his Fathers houſe, where a private Tutor had the care of him, till he was nine yeares of age; he was then ſent to the Univerſitie of Oxford, having at that time a command of the French and Latine Tongues, when others can ſcarce ſpeak their owne.

There he remained in Hart Hall, (having for the advancement of his ſtudies, Tutors in ſeverall Sciences to inſtruct him) till time made him capable, and his learning expreſt in many publique Exerciſes, declared him fit to receive his firſt Degree in the Schooles, which he forbore by adviſe from his friends, who being of the Romiſh perſwaſion, were conſcionably averſe to ſome parts of the Oath, alwayes tendred and taken at thoſe times.

About the fourteenth yeare of his age, he was tranſplanted from Oxford to Cambridge, where (that he might receive nouriſhment from both ſoiles) he ſtaid till his ſeventeenth yeare. All which time he was a moſt laborious Student, often changing his ſtudies, but endeavouring to take no Degree for the reaſons formerly mentioned.

About his ſeventeenth yeare he was removed to London, and entred into Lincolnes Inne, with an intent to ſtudy the Law, where he gave great teſtimonies of wit, learning, and improvement in that profeſsion, which never ſerved him for any uſe, but onely for ornament.

His Father died before his admiſsion into that Society, and (being a Merchant) left him his Portion in money (which was 3000.li.) His Mother, and thoſe to whoſe care he was committed, were watchful to improve his knowledge, and to that end appointed him there alſo Tutors in ſeverall Sciences, as the Mathematicks and others, to attend and inſtruct him. But with theſe Arts they were adviſed to inſtill certaine particular principles of the Romiſh Church, of which thoſe Tutors (though ſecretly) profeſt themſelves to be members.

They had almoſt obliged him to their faith, having for their advantage, beſides their opportunity, the example of his moſt deare and pious Parents, which was a powerfull perſwaſion, and did work upon him, as he profeſ-

seth in his PREFACE to his Pseudo-Martyr.

He was now entred into the nineteenth yeare of his age, and being unresolved in his Religion, (though his youth and strength promised him a long life) yet he thought it necessary to rectifie all scruples which concerned that: And therefore waving the Law, and betrothing himselfe to no art or profession, that might justly denominate him, he began to survey the body of Divinity, controverted between the Reformed and Roman Church. And as Gods blessed Spirit did then awaken him to the search, and in that industry did never forsake him, (they be his owne words) So he calls the same Spirit to witness to his Protestation, that in that search and disquisition he proceeded with humility and diffidence in himselfe, by the safest way of frequent Prayers, and indifferent affection to both parties. And indeed, Truth had too much light about her, to be hid from so sharp an Inquirer, and he had too much ingenuity, not to acknowledge he had seen her. Preface to Pseudo-Martyr.

Being to undertake this search, he beleeved the learned Cardinal Bellarmine to be the best defender of the Roman cause: and therefore undertook the examination of his reasons. The cause was waighty, and wilfull delaies had been inexcusable towards God and his own conscience; he therfore proceeded with all moderate haste; And before he entred into the twentieth yeare of his age, did shew the Deane of Glocester all the Cardinalls Works marked with many waighty Observations under his own hand, which Works were bequeathed by him at his death as a Legacy to a most deare friend.

About the twentieth yeare of his age, he resolved to travell; And the Earle of Essex going to Cales, and after the Iland voyages, he took the advantage of those opportunities, waited upon his Lordship, and saw the expeditions of those happy and unhappy imployments.

But he returned not into England, till he had staid a convenient time, first in Italy, and then in Spaine, where he made many usefull Observations of those Countries, their Lawes, and Government, and returned into England perfect in their Languages.

Not long after his returne, that exemplary pattern of gravity and wisdome, the Lord Elsmore, Lord Keeper of the great Seale, and after Chancellor of England, taking notice of his Learning, Languages, and other abilities, and much affecting both his person and condition, received him to be his chiefe Secretarie, supposing it might be an Introduction to some more waighty imployment in the State, for which his Lordship often protested he thought him very fit.

Nor did his Lordship account him so much to be his servant, as to forget hee had beene his friend; and to testifie it, hee used him alwayes with much curtesie, appointing him a place at his owne Table, unto which he esteemed his company and discourse a great ornament.

He continued that employment with much love and approbation, being daily usefull (and not mercenary) to his friends, for the space of five yeares: In which time, he (I dare not say unfortunately) fell into such a liking, as (with her approbation) increased into a love with a young Gentlewoman, who lived in that Family, Neece to the Lady Elsmore, Daughter to Sir George More, Chancellor of the Garter, and Lieutenant of the Tower.

Sir

Sir George had ſome intimation of their increaſing love; and the better to prevent it, did remove his Daughter to his owne houſe, but too late, by reaſon of ſome faithfull promiſes interchangeably paſt, and inviolably to be kept between them.

Their love (a paſsion, which of all other Mankind is leaſt able to command, and wherein moſt errors are committed) was in them ſo powerfull, that they reſolved, and did marry without the approbation of thoſe friends that might juſtly claime an intereſt in the adviſing and diſpoſing of them.

Being married, the newes was (in favour to M. Donne, and with his allowance) by the Right Honourable Henry then Earle of Northumberland, ſecretly and certainly intimated to Sir George More, to whom it was ſo immeaſurably unwelcome, that (as though his paſsion of anger and inconſideration ſhould exceed theirs of love and error) he ingaged his ſiſter the Lady Elſmere to joyn with him to procure her Lord to diſcharge M. Donne the place he held under his Lordſhip. And although Sir George were remembred that Errors might be over-puniſht, and therefore was deſired to forbeare, till ſecond conſiderations had cleered ſome ſcruples, yet he was reſtleſſe untill his ſuit was granted, and the puniſhment executed; The Lord Chancellor then (at M. Donnes diſmiſsion) proteſting, he thought him a Secretary fitter for a King then a Subject.

But this phyſick of M. Donnes diſmiſsion was not ſtrong enough to purge out all Sir George his choler, who was not ſatisfied, till M. Donne, and his Compupill in Cambridge that married him, M. Samuel Brooke, (who was after D. in D. and Maſter of Trinity Colledge in that Univerſity) and his brother M. Chriſtopher Brook of Lincolns Inne, (who gave M. Donne his Wife, and witneſſed the Mariage) were all committed to ſeverall Priſons.

M. Donne was firſt inlarged, who neither gave reſt to his body, his braine, nor any friend, in whom he might hope to have any intereſt, untill he had procured the inlargement of his two impriſoned friends.

He was now at liberty, but his dayes were ſtill cloudie, and being paſt this trouble, others did ſtill multiply, for his Wife (to her extreame ſorrow) was Geneſ. 29. detained from him. And though with Iacob, he endured not a hard ſervice for her, yet he loſt a good one, and was forced to get poſſeſsion of her by a long ſuit in Law, which proved very chargeable, and more troubleſome.

It was not long, but that Time and M. Donnes behaviour (which when it would intice, had a ſtrange kind of irreſiſtible art) had ſo diſpaſsioned his Father in Law, That as the world had approved his Daughters choice, ſo he alſo could not chooſe but ſee a more then ordinary merit in his new Sonne, which melted him into ſo much remorſe, that he ſecretly laboured his ſons reſtauration into his place, uſing his owne, and his ſiſters power, but with no ſucceſſe; The Lord Chancellor replying, That although he was unfainedly ſorry for what he had done, yet it ſtood not with his credit to diſcharge and re-admit ſervants, at the requeſt of paſsionate Petitioners.

Within a ſhort time, Sir George appeared to be ſo far reconciled, as to wiſh their happineſſe, (or ſay ſo) And being asked for his paternal bleſsing, did not deny it; but refuſed to contribute any meanes that might conduce to their livelyhood.

M.

M. Donnes Portion was the greateſt part ſpent in many and chargeable travels, the reſt diſburſt in ſome few Books, and deare bought experience; he out of all imployment, that might yeeld a ſupport for himſelfe and Wife, who had been curiouſly and plentifully educated; his nature generous, and he accuſtomed to confer, not to receive curteſies. Theſe and other conſiderations, but chiefly that his deare Wife was to bear a part in his ſufferings, ſurrounded him with many and ſad thoughts, and ſome apparent apprehenſions of want.

But his ſorrow was leſſened, and his wants prevented by the ſeaſonable curteſies of their noble Kinſman Sir Francis Wally of Pirford, who intreated them to a co-habitation with him; where they remained with very much freedome to themſelves, and equall content to him for many yeares. And as their charge increaſed, (ſhe had yearly a child) ſo did his love and bounty.

With him they continued till his death: a little before which time Sir Francis was ſo happy as to make a perfect reconciliation betwixt that good man Sir George More and his forſaken ſonne and daughter, Sir George then giving Bond to pay M. Donne 800 l. at a certain day as a Portion with his wife, and to pay him for their maintenance 20 l. quarterly, (as the Intereſt of it) untill the ſaid Portion were paid.

Moſt of thoſe yeares that he lived with Sir Francis, he ſtudied the Civil and Canon Lawes: In which he acquired ſuch a perfection as was judged to hold ſome proportion with many, who had made that ſtudy the imployment of their whole life.

Sir Francis being dead, and that happy family diſſolved, M. Donne tooke a houſe at Micham (neere unto Croydon in Surrey) where his wife and family remained conſtantly: and for himſelfe (having occaſions to be often in London) he tooke lodgings neere unto White-hall, where he was frequently viſited by men of greateſt learning and judgement in this Kingdome; his company being loved, and much deſired by many of the Nobility of this Nation, who uſed him in their counſels of greateſt conſiderations.

Nor did our owne Nobility onely favour him, but his acquaintance and friendſhip was uſually ſought for by moſt Ambaſſadors of forraigne Nations, and by many other ſtrangers, whoſe learning or employment occaſioned their ſtay in this Kingdome.

He was much importuned by friends to make his reſidence in London, which he could not doe, having ſetled his dear wife and children at Micham, whither he often retired himſelfe, and then ſtudied inceſſantly ſome Points of Controverſie. But at laſt the perſwaſion of friends was ſo powerfull, as to cauſe the removall of himſelfe and family to London; where that honourable Gentleman Sir Robert Drury aſsigned him a very convenient houſe rent-free, next his own in Drury-lane, and was alſo a daily cheriſher of his ſtudies, and ſuch a friend as ſympathiz'd with him and his, in their joy and ſorrow.

Divers of the Nobility were watchfull and ſolicitous to the King for ſome preferment for him. His Majeſty had formerly both knowne, and much valued him, and had given him ſome hopes of a State employment, being much pleaſed that M. Donne attended him, eſpecially at his meales, where there was

uſually

uſually many deep diſcourſes of Learning, and often friendly diſputes of Religion betwixt the King and thoſe Divines whoſe places required their attendance on his Majeſtie: Particularly, the Right Reverend Biſhop Montague, then Deane of the Chappel, (who was the publiſher of the eloquent and learned Works of his Majeſtie) and the moſt learned Doctor Andrewes, then his Majeſties Almoner, and at his death Biſhop of Wincheſter.

About this time grew many diſputes in England, that concerned the Oath of Supremacy and Allegeance, in which the King had appeared and ingaged himſelfe by his publique writings now extant. And his Majeſtie occaſionally talking with M. Donne concerning many of thoſe Arguments urged by the Romaniſts, apprehended ſuch a validity and cleereneſſe in his anſwers, that he commanded him to ſtate the Points, and bring his Reaſons to him in writing; to which he preſently applyed himſelfe, and within ſixe weeks brought them to his Majeſtie fairely written under his owne hand, as they be now printed in his Pſeudo-Martyr.

When the King had read and conſidered that Book, he perſwaded M. Donne to enter into the Miniſtery, to which he appeared (and was) un-inclinable, apprehending it (ſuch was his miſtaking modeſty) too weighty for his abilities. But from that time, though many friends mediated with his Majeſtie to prefer him to ſome civil employment, (to which his education had apted him) yet the King denied their requeſts, and (having a diſcerning ſpirit) replyed, I know M. Donne is a learned man, an excellent Divine, and will prove a powerfull Preacher. After that, as he profeſſeth *, the King deſcended almoſt to a ſolicitation of him to enter into ſacred Orders, which though he denied not, he deferred for the ſpace of three yeares: All which time he applyed himſelfe to an inceſſant ſtudy of Textuall Divinity, and attained a greater perfection in the learned Languages, Greek and Hebrew.

In his Devotions, Expoſt. 8.

Forwardneſſe and inconſideration could not in him (as in many others) argue an inſufficiencie; for he conſidered long, and had many ſtrifes within himſelfe concerning the ſtrictneſſe of life, and competencie of learning required in ſuch as enter into ſacred Orders: And doubtleſſe (conſidering his owne demerits) did with meek Moſes humbly aske God, Who am I? And if he had conſulted with fleſh and bloud, he had not put his hand to that holy plough: But God who is able to prevaile, wraſtled with him, as the Angel did with Iacob, and marked him for his owne, marked him with a bleſsing, a bleſsing of obedience to the motions of his bleſſed Spirit; And then as he had formerly asked God humbly with Moſes, Who am I? So now (being inſpired with the apprehenſion of Gods mercies) he did ask King Davids thankfull queſtion, Lord who am I that thou art ſo mindfull of me? So mindfull of me as to lead me for more then forty years through a wilderneſſe of the many temptations and various turnings of a dangerous life? So mindfull as to move the learneſt of Kings to deſcend to move me to ſerve at thine Altar? So merciful to me as to move my heart to embrace this holy motion? Thy motions I will embrace, take the cup of ſalvation, call upon thy Name, and preach thy Goſpell.

Gen. 32.

Such ſtrifes as theſe S. Auguſtine had when S. Ambroſe indeavoured his converſion verſion to Chriſtianity, with which he confeſſeth he acquainted his deare friend Alippius. Our learned Author (a man fit to write after no meane Copy) did the like; and declaring his intentions to his deare friend D. King the then worthy Biſhop of London, (who was Chaplaine to the Lord Chancellor in the time of his being his Lordſhips Secretary) That Reverend Biſhop moſt gladly received the newes, and with all convenient ſpeed ordained him Deacon and Prieſt.

Now the Engliſh Church had gained a ſecond S. Auguſtine, for I think none was ſo like him before his converſion, none ſo like S. Ambroſe after it. And if his youth had the infirmities of the one Father, his age had the excellencies of the other, the learning and holineſſe of both.

Now all his ſtudies (which were occaſionally diffuſed) were concentred in Divinity; Now he had a new calling, new thoughts, new imployment for his wit and eloquence. Now all his earthly affections were changed into divine love, and all the faculties of his ſoule were ingaged in the converſion of others, in preaching glad tidings, remiſsion to repenting ſinners, and peace to each troubled ſoule: To this he applyed himſelfe with all care and diligence; and ſuch a change was wrought in him, that he was gladder to be a doore-keeper in the houſe of God, then to enjoy any temporall employment. Pſal. 84.

Preſently after he entred into his holy Profeſsion, the King made him his Chaplaine in Ordinary, and gave him other incouragements, promiſing to take a particular care of him.

And though his long familiarity with perſons of greateſt quality was ſuch as might have given ſome men boldneſſe enough to have preached to any eminent Auditory; yet his modeſty was ſuch, that he could not be perſwaded to it, but went uſually to preach in ſome private Churches, in Villages neere London, till his Majeſtie appointed him a day to preach to him. And though his Majeſtie and others expected much from him, yet he was ſo happy (which few are) as to ſatisfie and exceed their expectations: preaching the Word ſo, as ſhewed he was poſſeſt with thoſe joyes that he laboured to diſtill into others: A Preacher in earneſt, weeping ſometimes for his Auditory, ſometimes with them, alwayes preaching to himſelfe, like an Angel from a cloud, though in none: carrying ſome (as S. Paul was) to heaven, in holy raptures; enticing others, by a ſacred art and courtſhip, to amend their lives; and all this with a moſt particular grace, and un-imitable faſhion of ſpeaking.

That Summer, the ſame month in which he was ordained Prieſt, (and made the Kings Chaplaine) his Majeſtie (going his Progreſſe) was intreated to receive an entertainment in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and M. Donne attending his Majeſtie there, his Majeſtie was pleaſed to recommend him to be made Doctor in Divinity, Doctor Harſnet (after Archbiſhop of York) being then their Vice-Chancellour, who knowing him to be the Author of the Pſeudo-Martyr, did propoſe it to the Univerſity, and they preſently granted it, expreſsing a gladneſſe they had an occaſion to entitle and write him Theirs.

His abilities and induſtry in his profeſsion were ſo eminent, and he ſo much loved by many perſons of quality, that within one yeare after his entrance into Sacred Orders, he had fourteen Advowſons of ſeverall Benefices ſent unto him; but they (being in the Countrey) could not draw him from his long loved friends and London, to which he had a naturall inclination, having received his birth and breeding in it: deſiring rather ſome preferment that might fixe him to an employment in that place.

Immediately after his returne from Cambridge, his wife died, leaving him a man of an unſetled eſtate: And (having buried five) the carefull father of ſeven children then living, to whom he made a voluntary promiſe (being then but forty two years of age) never to bring them under the ſubjection of a Step-mother: which promiſe he moſt faithfully kept, burying with his teares all his ſublunary joyes in his moſt deare and deſerving Wives grave, living a moſt retired and ſolitary life.

In this retiredneſſe, he was importuned by the grave Benchers of Lincolns Inne, (once the friends of his youth) to accept of their Lecture, which (by reaſon of M. Gatakers removall) was then void; of which he accepted, being glad to renew his intermitted friendſhip with them, whom he ſo much loved, and where he had been a Saul, (not ſo far as to perſecute Chriſtianity, yet in his irregular youth to neglect the practiſe of it) to become a Paul, and preach ſalvation to his brethren.

Nor did he preach onely, but as S. Paul adviſed his Corinthians to be followers of him as he was of Chriſt; ſo he alſo was an ocular direction to them by a holy and harmleſſe converſation.

Their love to him was expreſt many wayes; for (beſides the faire lodgings that were provided and furniſht for him) other curteſies were daily accumulated, ſo many, and ſo freely, as though they meant their gratitude (if poſsible) ſhould exceed, or at leaſt equall his merit. In this love-ſtrife of deſert and liberality, they continued for the ſpace of three yeares; he conſtantly and faithfully preaching, they liberally requiting him. About which time the Emperour of Germany died, and the Palſgrave was elected and crowned King of Bohemia, the unhappy beginning of much trouble in thoſe Kingdomes.

King Iames, whoſe Motto, Beati Pacifici, did truly characterize his diſpoſition, endeavoured to compoſe the differences of that diſcompoſed State, and to that end ſent the Earle of Carlile, (then Vicount Doncaſter) his Ambaſſadour to thoſe unſetled Princes, and (by a ſpeciall command from his Majeſtie) D. Donne was appointed to attend the Embaſſage of the ſaid Earle to the Prince of the Union: For which the Earle (that had long knowne and loved him) was moſt glad: So were many of the Doctors friends, who feared his ſtudies, and ſadneſſe for his wives death, would as Iacob ſayes, make his
Gen. 47. dayes few, and (reſpecting his bodily health) evill too.

At his going, he left his friends of Lincolnes Inne, and they him with many reluctations; For though he could not ſay, as S. Paul to his Epheſians, Behold, you to whom I have preacht the kingdome of God, ſhall henceforth ſee my face no more; yet he (being in a Conſumption) queſtioned it, and they feared it, conſidering his troubled minde, which, with the helpe of his un-intermitted ſtudies, haſtned the decayes of his weake body; But God turned it to the beſt, for this imployment did not onely divert him from thoſe ſerious ſtudies and

ſad thoughts, but gave him a new and true occaſion of joy, to be an eye-witneſſe of the health of his honoured Miſtris, the Queene of Bohemia, in a forraigne Land, (who having formerly knowne him a Courtier) was moſt glad to ſee him in a Canonicall habit, and more glad to be an eare-witneſſe of his moſt excellent and powerfull preaching.

Within fourteen moneths he returned to his friends of Lincolnes Inne, with his ſorrowes much moderated, and his health improved.

About a yeare after his returne from Germany, Dr Donne was made Biſhop of Exeter, and by his removall, the Deanry of S. Pauls being vacant, the King appointed Doctor Donne to waite on him at dinner the next day; And his Majeſty (being ſet downe) before he eat any meat, ſaid (after his pleaſant manner) Doctor Donne, I have invited you to dinner, and though you ſit not downe with me, yet I will carve to you of a diſh that I know you love; You love London well, I doe therefore make you Deane of Pauls: take your meate home to your ſtudy, ſay grace, and much good may it doe you.

Immediately after he came to his Deanry, he imployed workmen to repaire the Chappel belonging to his houſe; Suffering (as holy David once vowed) his eyes and temples to take no reſt, untill he had firſt beautified the houſe of God. Pſal. 132.

The next quarter following, when his Father in Law Sir George More, who now admired and dearly loved him, came to pay him the conditioned ſum of twenty pound, he denied to receive it, And ſaid to his Father, (as good Iacob ſaid when he heard Joſeph his ſonne lived) It is enough, you have been kinde to me, and carefull of mine, I am, I thanke my God, provided for, and will receive this money no longer; And not long after freely gave up his bond of eight hundred pound. Gen. 45.

Preſently after he was ſetled in his Deanry, the Vicarage of S. Dunſtans in London fell to him by the death of Doctor White, The advowſon being formerly given to him by the right Honorable Richard Earle of Dorſet a little before his death, And confirmed to him by his Brother the right Honorable Edward Earle of Dorſet that now lives.

By theſe and another Eccleſiaſticall Endowment (which fell to him about the ſame time) he was inabled to be charitable to the poore, and to make ſuch proviſion for his Children, that at his death they were not left ſcandalous to his profeſſion and quality.

The next Parliament following he was choſen Prolocutor to the Convocation, and about that time, by the appointment of his Majeſty, (his gracious Maſter) did preach many occaſionall Sermons: All which he performed not onely with the approbation, but to the admiration of the repreſentative body of the Clergy of this Kingdome.

He was once (and but once) clouded with the Kings diſpleaſure; It was about this time, occaſioned by ſome malicious whiſperer, which aſſured the King Doctor Donne had preacht a Sermon that implied a diſlike of his government, particularly of his late Directions that the Evening Lectures on Sundaies, ſhould be turned into Catechizing, expounding the Commandements, Beliefe, and Lords Prayer. His Majeſty was the more inclinable to beleeve this, for that about the ſame time a perſon of the Nobility of great note in the Kingdome, and favour with the King (whom his Majesty knew Doctor Donne loved very much) was discarded the Court, and presently after committed to prison, which begot many rumors in the multitude.

The King suffered not the Sunne to set, till he had searcht out the truth of this report, but sent presently for Doctor Donne, and required his answer to the accusation: which was so satisfactory, That the King said he was glad he rested not under that suspition. Doctor Donne protested his answer was faithfull and free from all Collusion. And therefore begged of his Majesty, that he might not rise (being then kneeling) before he had (as in like cases he alwayes had from God) some assurance that he stood cleere and faire in his Majesties opinion. The King with his own hand, did, or offered to raise him from his knees, and protested he was truly satisfied, that he was an honest man, and loved him. Presently his Majesty called some Lords of his Councell into his Chamber, and said with much earnestnesse, My Doctor is an honest man; And my Lords, I was never more joyed in any thing that I have done, then in making him a Divine.

He was made Deane in the fiftieth yeare of his age; And in the fifty fourth yeare, a dangerous sickneſſe seised him, which turned to a spotted Feaver, and ended in a Cough, that inclined him to a Consumption. But God (as Iob thankfully acknowledgeth) preserved his spirit, keeping his intellectualls as cleere and perfect, as when that sickneſſe first seised his body. And as his health increased, so did his thankfulneſſe, testified in his booke of Devotions, A book that may not unfitly be called, A composition of holy Extasies, occasioned, and appliable to the Emergencies of that sickneſſe, which booke (being Meditations in his sickneſſe) he writ on his sicke bed; herein imitating the holy Patriarchs, who were wont in that place to build their Altars where they had received their blessing.

Gen. 12. 7. 8.
Gen. 28. 18.

This sickneſſe brought him to the gates of death, and he saw the grave so ready to devoure him, that he calls his recovery supernaturall. But God restored his health, and continued it untill the fifty-ninth yeare of his life. And then in August 1630. being with his daughter Mistris Harvy at Abrey-Hatch in Essex, he fell into a Feaver, which with the helpe of his constant infirmity, vapours from the spleene, hastened him into so visible a Consumption, that his beholders might say (as S. Paul of himselfe) he dyes daily, And he might say with Iob, My welfare passeth away as a cloud; The dayes of affliction have taken hold of me. And weary nights are appointed for me.

Job 30. 15.
Job. 7. 3.

This sickneſſe continued long, not onely weakning, but wearing him so much, that my desire is, he may now take some rest: And that thou judge it no impertinent digression (before I speake of his death) to looke backe with me upon some observations of his life, which (while a gentle slumber seises him) may (I hope fitly) exercise thy Consideration.

His marriage was the remarkable error of his life, which (though he had a wit apt enough, and very able to maintaine paradoxes; And though his wives competent yeares, and other reasons might be justly urged to moderate a severe censure, yet) he never seemed to justifie, and doubtlesse had repented it, if God had not blest them with a mutuall, and so cordiall an affection, as in the midſt of their ſufferings made their bread of ſorrow taſte more pleaſantly then the banquet of fooles.

The recreations of his youth were Poetry, in which he was ſo happy, as if nature with all her varieties had been made to exerciſe his great wit, and high fancy. And in thoſe pieces which were careleſly ſcattered in his younger daies (moſt of them being written before the twentieth yeare of his age) it may appeare by his choice Metaphors, that all the Arts joyned to aſsiſt him with their utmoſt skill.

It is a truth, that in his penitentiall yeares, viewing ſome of thoſe pieces looſely ſcattered in his youth, he wiſht they had been abortive, or ſo ſhort-liv'd, that he had witneſſed their funeralls: But though he was no friend to them, he was not ſo falne out with heavenly Poetry, as to forſake it, no not in his declining age, witneſſed then by many divine Sonnets, and other high, holy, and harmonious compoſures; yea even on his former ſick bed, he wrote this heavenly Hymne, expreſſing the great joy he then had in the aſſurance of Gods mercy to him.

A Hymne to God the Father.

WIlt thou forgive that ſin where I begun,
Which was my ſin, though it were done before?
Wilt thou forgive that ſin through which I run,
And doe run ſtill, though ſtill I doe deplore?
When thou haſt done, thou haſt not done,
For I have more.

Wilt thou forgive that ſin which I have won
Others to ſin, and made my ſin their doore?
Wilt thou forgive that ſin which I did ſhun
A yeare or two, but wallowed in, a ſcore?
When thou haſt done, thou haſt not done,
For I have more.

I have a ſin of feare, that when I have ſpun
My laſt thred, I ſhall periſh on the ſhore;
But ſweare by thy ſelfe, that at my death thy Sonne
Shall ſhine as he ſhines now, and heretofore;
And, having done that, thou haſt done,
I feare no more.

And on this (which was his Death-bed) writ another Hymne which bears this Title,

A Hymne to God my God in my ſickneſſe.

If theſe fall under the cenſure of a ſoule whoſe too much mixture with earth makes it unfit to judge of theſe high illuminations, let him know, that many devout and learned men have thought the ſoule of holy holy Prudentius was moſt refined, when not many dayes before his death, he charged it to preſent his God each morning with a new and ſpirituall Song; juſtified by the examples of King David, and the good King Hezekias, who upon the renovation of his yeares, payed his gratefull vowes to God, in a royall hymne, which he concludes in theſe words, The Lord was ready to ſave, therefore we will ſing my ſongs to the ſtringed inſtruments, all the dayes of our life, in the Temple of my God. Eſay 38.

The later part of his life was a continued ſtudie, Saturdaies onely excepted, which he uſually ſpent in viſiting friends, and reſting himſelfe under the weary burthen of his weeks Meditations; And he gave himſelfe this reſt, that thereby he might be refreſht and inabled to doe the work of the day following, not negligently, but with courage and cheerfulneſſe.

Nor was his age onely ſo induſtrious, but in his moſt unſetled youth he was (being in health) never knowne to be in bed after foure of the clock in the morning, nor uſually out of his chamber till ten; and imployed that time conſtantly (if not more) in his Studie. Which, if it ſeeme ſtrange, may gain beliefe by the viſible fruits of his labours: ſome of which remaine to teſtifie what is here written: for he left the reſultance of 1400. Authors, moſt of them analyzed with his owne hand; He left ſixſcore Sermons alſo, all writ with his owne hand; A large and laborious Treatiſe concerning Self-murther, called Biathanatoſe, wherein all the Lawes violated by that act, are diligently ſurvayed, and judiciouſly cenſured; A Treatiſe written in his youth, which alone might declare him then, not onely perfect in the Civil and Canon Law, but in many other ſuch ſtudies and arguments as enter not into the conſideration of many profeſt Scholars, that labour to be thought learned Clerks, and to know all things.

Nor were theſe onely found in his Studie, but all buſineſſes that paſt of any publique conſequence in this or any of our neighbour Kingdoms, he abbreviated either in Latine, or in the Language of the Nation, and kept them by him for a memoriall. So he did the Copies of divers Letters and Caſes of Conſcience that had concerned his friends, (with his ſolutions) and divers other buſineſſes of importance, all particularly and methodically digeſted by himſelfe.

He did prepare to leave the world before life left him, making his Will when no facultie of his ſoule was dampt or defective by ſickneſſe, or he ſurprized by ſudden apprehenſion of death; But with mature deliberation, expreſſing himſelfe an impartiall Father, by making his Childrens Portions equall; a conſtant lover of his friends, by particular Legacies, diſcreetly choſen, and fitly bequeathed them; And full of charity to the poore, and many others, who by his long continued bounty might entitle themſelves His almes-people. For all theſe he made proviſion, ſo largely, as having ſix children, might to ſome appeare more then proportionable to his eſtate. The Reader may think the particulars tedious, but I hope not impertinent, that I preſent him with the beginning and concluſion of his laſt Will.

In

IN the name of the blessed and glorious Trinitie, Amen. I Iohn Donne, by the mercy of Christ Iesus, and the calling of the Church of England, Priest, being at this time in good and perfect understanding, (praised be God therefore) doe hereby make my last Will and Testament in manner and forme following.

*First, I give my gracious God an intire sacrifice of body and soule, with my most humble thanks for that assurance which his blessed Spirit imprints in me now of the salvation of the one, and of the resurrection of the other; And for that constant and cheerfull resolution which the same Spirit established in me, to live and die in the Religion now professed in the Church of England: In expectation of that Resurrection I desire my body may be buried (in the most private manner that may be) in that place of S.*Pauls Church London, that the now Residentiaries have at my request assigned for that purpose, &c.

And this my last Will and Testament made in the feare of God, (whose merit I humbly beg, and constantly rely upon in Iesus Christ) and in perfect love and charity with all the world, whose pardon I aske from the lowest of my servants to the highest of my Superiours. Written all with mine owne hand, and my name subscribed to every Page, being five in number.

Nor was his charity expreſt onely at his death, but in his life, by a cheerfull and frequent viſitation of friends, whoſe minds were dejected, or fortunes neceſsitous. And he redeemed many out of Priſon that lay for ſmall debts, or for their fees; He was a continuall giver to poore Scholars, both of this, and forraigne Nations; (beſides what he gave with his owne hand) he uſually ſent a ſervant to all the Priſons in London, to diſtribute his charity, at all feſtivall times in the yeare. He gave 100.l. at one time to a Gentleman that he had formerly knowne live plentifully, and was then decayed in his eſtate. He was a happy Reconciler of of differences in many Families of his friends and kindred, who had ſuch faith in his judgement and impartiality, that he ſcarce ever adviſed them to any thing in vaine. He was (even to her death) a moſt dutifull ſon to his Mother, carefull to provide for her ſupportation, of which ſhe had been deſtitute, but that God raiſed him up to prevent her neceſsities; who having ſuckt in the Religion of the Romane Church with her mothers milk, (or preſently after it) ſpent her eſtate in forraigne Countries, to enjoy a liberty in it, and died in his houſe but three moneths before him.

And to the end it may appeare how juſt a Steward he was of his Lord and Maſters Revenue, I have thought fit to let the Reader know, that after his entrance into his Deanry, as he numbred his yeares, and (at the foot of a private account, to which God and Angels onely were witneſſes with him) computed firſt his Revenue, then his expences, then what was given to the poore and pious uſes, laſtly, what reſted for him and for his, he bleſt each yeares poore remainder with a thankfull Prayer; which for that they diſcover a more then common devotion, the Reader ſhall partake ſome of them in his owne words.

Amen.*

But I returne from my digression.

We left the Author sick in Essex, where he was forced to spend most of that Winter, by reason of his disability to remove from thence. And having never during almost twenty yeares, omitted his personall attendance on his Majestie, in his monthly service. Nor being ever left out of the number of Lent Preachers. And in January following, there being a generall report that he was dead, that report occasioned this Letter to a familiar friend.

SIR,

THis advantage you and my other friends have by my frequent feavers, that I am so much the oftner at the gates of heaven; And this advantage by the solitude and close imprisonment that they reduce me to after, that I am so much the oftner at my Prayers, in which I shall never leave out your happinesse; And I doubt not but amongst his other blessings, God will adde some one to you for my Prayers.

A man would be almost content to die, (if there were no other benefit in death) to heare of so much sorrow, and so much good testimony from good men, as I (God be blessed for it) did upon the report of my death: Yet I perceive it went not through all; For one writ to me, that some (and he said of my friends) conceived I was not so ill as I pretended, but withdrew my selfe to live at ease, discharged of preaching. It is an unfriendly, and (God knowes) an ungrounded interpretation; for I have alwayes been sorrier when I could not preach, then any could be they could not hear me. It hath been my desire (and God may be pleased to grant it) that I might die in the Pulpit; If not that, yet that I might take my death in the Pulpit, that is, die the sooner by occasion of those labours. Sir, I hope to see you presently after Candlemas, about which time will fall my Lent Sermon at Court, except my Lord Chamberlaine believe me to be dead, and leave me out: For as long as I live, and am not speechlesse, I would not willingly decline that service. I have better leasure to write, then you to reade, yet I would not willingly oppresse you with too much Letter: God blesse you and your son, as I wish

January 7. 1630. Your poore friend and servant in Christ Jesus,

John Donne.

Before that month ended, he was appointed to preach upon his old constant day, the first Friday in Lent, he had notice of it; and having in his sicknesse neſſe prepared for the employment as he had long thirſted for it. So reſolving his weakneſſe ſhould not hinder his journey, he came to London ſome few dayes before his day appointed. Being come, many of his friends (who with ſorrow ſaw his ſickneſſe had left him onely ſo much fleſh as did cover his bones) doubted his ſtrength to performe that taske: And therefore perſwaded him from undertaking it, aſſuring him however, it was like to ſhorten his dayes: But he paſsionately denyed their requeſts, ſaying, He would not doubt, that God who in many weakneſſes had aſsiſted him with an unexpected ſtrength, would now withdraw it in his laſt employment, profeſsing a holy ambition to performe that ſacred Work. And when (to the amazement of ſome beholders) he appeared in the Pulpit, many thought he preſented himſelfe, not to preach mortification by a living voice, but mortality by a decayed body, and dying face. And doubtleſſe many did ſecretly ask that que-

"ſtion in Ezekiel, Doe theſe bones live? Or can that ſoule organiſe that tongue to Ezek. 37.3.
"ſpeak ſo long time as the ſand in that glaſſe will move towards its center,
"and meaſure out an houre of this dying mans unſpent life? Doubtleſſe it cannot. Yet after ſome faint pauſes in his zealous Prayer, his ſtrong deſires inabled his weak body to diſcharge his memory of his pre-conceived Meditations which were of dying; The Text being, To God the Lord belong the iſſues from death. Many that ſaw his teares, and heard his hollow voice, profeſsing they thought the Text Prophetically choſen, and that D. Donne had preacht his owne Funerall Sermon.

Being full of joy that God had inabled him to performe this deſired duty, he haſtned to his houſe, out of which he never moved, untill like S. Stephen, Acts 8.
He was carried by devout men to his grave: And the next day after his Sermon, his ſpirits being much ſpent, and he indiſpoſed to diſcourſe, a friend asked him, Why are you ſad? To whom he replyed after this manner, "I am not ſad;
"I am in a ſerious contemplation of the mercies of my God to me; And now
"I plainly ſee, it was his hand that prevented me from all temporall employ"ment. And I ſee it was his will that I ſhould never ſettle nor thrive untill I
"entred into the Miniſtery, in which I have now lived almoſt twenty yeares,
"(I hope to his glory) and by which (I moſt humbly thank him) I have been "enabled to requite moſt of thoſe friends that ſhewed me kindneſſe when "my fortunes were low. And (as it hath occaſioned the expreſſion of my "gratitude) I thank God, moſt of them have ſtood in need of my requitall. I "have been uſefull and comfortable to my good Father in Law Sir George
"More, whoſe patience God hath been pleaſed to exerciſe by many temporall
"croſſes. I have maintained my owne Mother, whom it hath pleaſed God
"after a plentifull fortune in her former times, to bring to a great decay in her "very old age. I have quieted the conſciences of many that groaned under the "burthen of a wounded ſpirit, whoſe Prayers I hope are availeable for me.
"I cannot plead innocencie of life, (eſpecially of my youth) but I am to be "judged by a mercifull God, who hath given me (even at this time) ſome
"teſtimonies by his holy Spirit, that I am of the number of his Elect. I am ful "of joy, and ſhall die in peace.

Upon Munday following, he took his laſt leave of his beloved Studie, and being being hourely ſenſible of his decay, retired himſelfe into his bed-chamber: and that week ſent (at ſeverall times) for many of his moſt conſiderable friends, of whom he tooke a ſolemne and deliberate Farewell, commending to their conſiderations ſome ſentences particularly uſefull for the regulation of their lives, and diſmiſt them (as * Iacob did his ſons) with a ſpirituall benediction. The Sunday following, he appointed his ſervants, that if there were any worldly buſineſſe undone, that concerned them or himſelfe, it ſhould be prepared againſt Saturday next; for after that day he would not mixe his thoughts with any thing that concerned the world. Nor ever did.

* Gen. 49.

Now he had nothing to doe but die; To doe which, he ſtood in need of no more time, for he had long ſtudied it, and to ſuch a perfection, that in a former ſickneſſe he called God to witneſſe, he was that minute prepared to deliver his ſoule into his hands, if that minute God would accept of his diſſolution. In that ſickneſſe he begged of his God, (the God of conſtancy) to be preſerved in that eſtate for ever. And his patient expectation to have his immortall ſoule diſrobed from her garment of mortality, makes me confident he now had a modeſt aſſurance, that his prayers were then heard, and his petition granted. He lay fifteene dayes earneſtly expecting his houtely change; And in the laſt houre of his laſt day, (as his body melted away, and vapoured into ſpirit) his ſoule having (I verily beleeve) ſome revelation of the Beatifical Viſion, he ſaid, I were miſerable, if I might not die: And after thoſe words, cloſed many periods of his faint breath with theſe words, Thy kingdome come, Thy will be done. His ſpeech which had long been his faithfull ſervant, remained with him till his laſt minute; and then forſook him, not to ſerve another maſter, but died before him, for that it was uſeleſſe to him, who now converſed with God on earth, (as Angels are ſaid to doe in heaven) onely by thoughts and looks. Being ſpeechleſſe, he did (as S. Stephen) look ſtedfaſtly towards heaven, till he ſaw the Sonne of God ſtanding at the right hand of his Father; And being ſatisfied with this bleſſed ſight, (as his ſoule aſcended, and his laſt breath departed from him) he cloſed his owne eyes, and then diſpoſed his hands and body into ſuch a poſture, as required no alteration by thoſe that came to ſhroud him.

Devot. Prayer 23.

Thus variable, thus vertuous was the life, thus memorable, thus exemplary was the death of this moſt excellent man.

He was buried in S. Pauls Church, in that place which he had appointed for that uſe, ſome yeares before his death, and by which he paſſed daily to his devotions. But not buried privately, though he deſired it; For (beſides an unnumbred number of others) many perſons of Nobility and eminency, who did love and honour him in his life, did ſhew it at his Funerall, by a voluntary and very ſad attendance of his body to the grave.

To which (after his buriall) ſome mournfull friends repaired: And as Alexander the Great did to the grave of the famous Achilles, ſo they ſtrewed his with curious and coſtly flowers. Which courſe they (who were never yet knowne) continued each morning and evening for divers dayes, not ceaſing till the ſtones that were taken up in that Church to give his body admiſsion into the cold earth, (now his bed of reſt) were againe by the Maſons art levelled led and firmed, as they had been formerly, and his place of buriall undiſtinguiſhable to common view.

Nor was this (though not uſuall) all the honour done to his reverend aſhes, for by ſome good body, (who, tis like thought his memory ought to be perpetuated) there was 100. marks ſent to his two faithfull friends * and Executors, (the perſon that ſent it, not yet known, they look not for a reward on earth) towards the making of a Monument for him, which I think is as lively a repreſentation, as in dead marble, can be made of him.

* D. Henry King. D. Mountfort.

HE was of ſtature moderately tall; of a ſtraight and equally proportioned body, to which all his words and actions gave an inexpreſſible addition of comelineſſe.

His aſpect was cheerfull, and ſuch as gave a ſilent teſtimony of a cleere knowing ſoule, and of a conſcience at peace with it ſelfe.

His melting eye ſhewed he had a ſoft heart, full of noble pity, of too brave a ſpirit to offer injuries, and too much a Chriſtian, not to pardon them in others.

His fancie was un-imitable high, equalled by his great wit, both being made uſefull by a commanding judgement.

His mind was liberall, and unbearied in the ſearch of knowledge, with which his vigorous ſoule is now ſatisfied, and employed in a continuall praiſe of that God that firſt breathed it into his active body, which once was a Temple of the holy Ghoſt, and is now become a ſmall quantity of Chriſtian duſt. But I ſhall ſee it re-inanimated.

Coloss. 1. 19,20.

For, it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulnesse dwell; And, having made peace through the bloud of his Crosse, by Him, to reconcile all things to himselfe, by Him, whether they be things in Earth, or things in Heaven.

THE whole journey of a Christian is in these words; and therefore we were better set out early, then ride too fast; better enter presently into the parts, then be forced to passe thorow them too hastily. First then wee consider the Collation and Reference of the Text, and then the Illation, and Inference thereof. For, the Text looks back to all that was said from the twelfth verse. For, the first word of the text, [For] which is a particle of connexion, as well as of argumentation, is a seale of all that was said from that place. And then, the Text looks forward to the 23 ver. where all these blessings are sealed to us, with that Condition, If ye continue setled in the Gospell. This is the Collation, the Reference of the text; for the Illation, and Inference, the first clause thereof, [For, it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulnesse dwell] presents a double Instruction; First, that we are not bound to accept matters of Religion, meerely without all reason, and probable inducements; And secondly, with what modesty we are to proceed, and in what bounds we are to limit that inquisition, that search of Reason in matters of that nature. When the Apostle presents to us here, the great mystery of our reconciliation to God, he, in whose power it was not to infuse faith into every reader of his Epistle, proceeds by reason. He tels us, That the Father hath translated us into the Kingdome of his deare Son, the Son of his love. V. 13. That were well, if we were sure of it; If our consciences did not accuse us, and suggest to us our owne unworthinesse, and thereby an impossibility of being so translated. Why no, sayes the Apostle, there is no such impossibility now, For, Now we have Redemption, and forgivenesse of sinnes. V. 14. Who should procure us that? If a man sin against God, who shall plead for him? 1 Sam. 2. 25. What man is able to mediate, and stand in the gap between God and man? You say true, sayes the Apostle, no man is able to doe it; and therefore, He that is the Image of the invisible God, he by whom all things were created, and by whom all things consist, he hath done it. V. 15. Hath God reconciled me to God; And reconciled me by way of satisfaction? (for, that I know his justice requires) What could God pay for me? What could God suffer? God himselfe could not; and therefore God hath taken a body that could. And as he is the Head of that body, he is passible, so he may suffer; And, as he is the first born of the dead, he did suffer; so that he was V. 18.

defective in nothing; not in Power, as God, not in passibility, as man; for, Complacuit; It pleased the Father, that in him, All fulnesse (a full capacity to all purposes) should dwell. Thus farre we are to trace the reason of our redemption, intimated in that first word, For. And then, we are to limit and determine our reason in the next, Quia complacuit, because it was his will, his pleasure to proceed so, and no otherwise. Christ himselfe goes no farther then so, in a case of much strangenesse, Mat. 11. 25. That God had hid his mysteries from the wise, and revealed them unto babes; This was a strange course, but Ita est, quia, Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. I would faine be able to prove to my selfe that my redemption is accomplished; and therefore I search the Scriptures; and I grow sure that Christ hath redeemed the world; and I search the Scriptures again, to finde what marks are upon them, that are of the participation of that Redemption, and I grow to a religious, and modest assurance, that those marks are upon me. I finde reasons to prove to me, that God does love my soule; but why God should love men better then his own Son, or why God should love me better then other men, I must end in the reason of the text, Quia complacuit, and in the reason of Christ himself, Ita est, quia, It is so, O Father, because thy good pleasure was it should be so.

Divisio. To passe then from the Collation and Reference, by which, the text hath his Cohærence with the precedent, and subsequent passages, and the Illation and Inference, by which you have seene the generall doctrine, That reason is not to be excluded in religion, but yet to be tenderly and modestly pressed, we have here the Person that redeemed us, and his Qualification for that great office, (That all fulnesse should dwell in him.) And then we have the Pacification, and the Meanes thereof, (Peace was made through the bloud of his Crosse) And then, the Effect, the application of all this, to them, for whom it was wrought, (That all things in earth and heaven, might be reconciled to God by him.) In the qualification of the person, we finde plenitudinem, fulnesse, and omnem plenitudinem, all fulnesse; and omnem plenitudinem inhabitantem, all fulnesse dwelling, permanent. And yet, even this dwelling fulnesse, even in this person Christ Jesus, by no title of merit in himselfe, but onely quia complacuit, because it pleased the Father it should be so. In the pacification, (which is our second part) (Peace was made, by the bloud of his Crosse) we shall see first, quod bellum, what the warre was, and then qua pax, what the peace is, and lastly quis modus, how this peace was made, which was strange; per sanguinem, by bloud; to save bloud, and yet by bloud. And per sanguinem ejus, by his bloud, his, who was victoriously to triumph in this peace; and per sanguinem Crucis ejus, by the bloud of his Crosse, that is his death; the bloud of his Circumcision, the bloud of his Agony, the bloud of his scourging was not enough; It must be, and so it was the bloud of his Crosse; And these peeces constitute our second part, the Pacification: And then in the third, the Application, (That all things might be reconciled to God,) we shall see first, what this Reconciliation is, and then how it extends to all things on earth, (which we might thinke were not capable of it,) and all things in heaven, (which we might think stood in no need of it.) And in these three parts, The person and his qualification, The thing it selfe, The Pacification, The effect of this, The Reconciliation, the Application, wee shall determine all.

1. Part. Plenitudo. First, In the person that redeemes us we finde fulnesse. And there had need be so; for, he found our measure full of sin towards God, and Gods measure full of anger towards us; for our parts, as when a River swels, at first it will finde out all the channels, or lower parts of the bank, and enter there, but after a while it covers, and overflowes the whole field, and all is water without distinction; so, though we be naturally channels of concupiscencies, (for there sin begins, and as water runs naturally in the veines and bowels of the earth, so run concupiscencies naturally in our bowels) yet, Gen. 6. 5. when every imagination of the thoughts of our heart, is onely evill continually; Then, (as it did there) it induces a flood, a deluge, our concupiscence swells above all channels, and actually overflowes all; It hath found an issue at the eare, we delight in the defamation of others; and an issue at the eye, Psal. 50. 18. If we see a thiefe, we run with him; we concurre in the plots of supplanting and destroying other men; It hath found an issue in the tongue, Psal. 12. 4. Our lips are our owne, who is Lord over us? We speak freely; seditious speeches against superiours, obscene and scurrile speeches against one another, prophane and blasphemous speeches against God himselfe, are growne to be good jests, and marks of wit, and arguments of spirit. It findes an issue at our hands, they give way to oppression, by giving bribes; and an issue at our feet,

A feet, They are ſwift to ſhed bloud; and ſo by cuſtome, ſin overflowes all, Omnia pontus, all our wayes are ſea, all our works are ſin. This is our fulneſſe, originall ſin filled us, actuall ſin preſſes down the meaſure, and habituall ſins heap it up. And then Gods meaſure of anger was full too; from the beginning he was a jealous God, and that ſhould have made us carefull of our behaviour, that a jealous eye watched over us. But becauſe wee ſee in the world, that jealous perſons are oftneſt deceived, becauſe that diſtemper diſorders them, ſo as that they ſee nothing clearely, and it puts the greater deſire in the other, to deceive, becauſe it is ſome kinde of Victory, and Triumph to deceive a jealous, and watchfull perſon, therefore we have hoped to goe beyond God too, and his jealouſie. But he is jealous of his honour, jealous of his jealouſie, he will not have his jealouſie deſpiſed, nor forgotten, for therefore he viſits upon the children, to the third and fourth generation; when therefore the ſpirit of jealouſie was come upon him, and that he had Numb. 5. 14.

B prepared that water of bitterneſſe, which was to rot our bowels, that is, when God had bent all his bowes, drawne forth, and whetted all his ſwords, when he was juſtly provoked, to execute all the Judgements denounced in all the Prophets, upon all mankinde, when mans meaſure was full of ſin, and Gods meaſure full of wrath, then was the fulneſſe of time, and yet then Complacuit, It pleaſed the Father, that there ſhould be another fulneſſe to overflow all theſe, in Chriſt Jeſus.

But what fulneſſe is that? Omnis plenitudo, all fulneſſe. And this was onely in Chriſt. Omnis plenitudo.
Elias had a great portion of the ſpirit: but, but a portion. Elizæus ſees that that portion 2 Reg. 2. 9.
will not ſerve him, and therefore he asks a double portion of that ſpirit; but ſtill but portions. Stephen is full of faith; a bleſſed fulneſſe, where there is no corner for Infidelity, Acts 6. 5.
nor for doubt, for ſcruple, nor irreſolution. Dorcas is full of good works; a fulneſſe above Acts 9. 36.
faith; for there muſt be faith, before there can be good works; ſo that they are above

C faith, as the tree is above the roote, and as the fruit is above the tree. The Virgin Mary is full of Grace; and Grace is a fulneſſe above both; above faith and works too, for that is the meanes to preſerve both; That we fall not from our faith, and that dead flyes Eccleſ. 10. 1. corrupt not our ointment, that worldly mixtures doe not vitiate our beſt works, and the memory of paſt ſins, dead ſins, doe not beget new ſins in us, is the operation of Grace. The ſeaven Deacons were full of the Holy Ghoſt, and of Wiſedome; full of Religion Acts 6. 3.
towards God, and full of ſuch wiſedome as might advance it towards men; full of zeale, and full of knowledge; full of truth, and full of diſcretion too. And theſe were plenitudines, fulneſſes, but they were not all, Omnis plenitudo, all fulneſſe. I ſhall bee as full as St. Paul, in heaven; I ſhall have as full a veſſell, but not ſo full a Cellar; I ſhall be as full, but I ſhall not have ſo much to fill. Chriſt onely hath an infinite content, and capacity, an infinite roome and receipt, and then an infinite fulneſſe; omnem capacitatem, and omnem

D plenitudinem; He would receive as much as could be infuſed, and there was as much infuſed, as he could receive.

But what ſhall we ſay? Deus adimplendus; was Chriſt God before, and are theſe acceſſory, ſupplementary, additionall fulneſſes to be put to him? A fulneſſe to be added to God? To make him a competent perſon to redeeme man, ſomething was to be added to Chriſt, though he were God; wherein we ſee to our inexpreſſible confuſion of face, and conſternation of ſpirit, the incomprehenſibleneſſe of mans ſin, that even to God himſelfe, there was required ſomething elſe then God, before we could be redeemed; there was a fulneſſe to be added to God, for this work, to make it omnem plenitudinem, for Chriſt was God before; there was that fulneſſe; but God was not Chriſt before; there lacked that fulneſſe. Not diſputing therefore, what other wayes God might have taken for our redemption, but giving him all poſſible thanks for that way which his goodneſſe hath cho-

E ſen, by the way of ſatisfying his juſtice, (for, howſoever I would be glad to be diſcharged of my debts any way, yet certainly, I ſhould think my ſelfe more beholden to that man, who would be content to pay my debt for me, then to him that ſhould entreat my creditor to forgive me my debt) for this work, to make Chriſt able to pay this debt, there was ſomething to be added to him. Firſt, he muſt pay it in ſuch money as was lent; in the nature and fleſh of man; for man had ſinned, and man muſt pay. And then it was lent in ſuch money as was coyned even with the Image of God; man was made according to his Image: That Image being defaced, in a new Mint, in the wombe of the Bleſſed Virgin, there was new money coyned; The Image of the inviſible God, the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, was imprinted into the humane nature. And then, that there might bee

omnis plenitudo, all fulneſſe, as God, for the paiment of this debt, ſent downe the Bullion, and the ſtamp, that is, God to be conceived in man, and as he provided the Mint, the womb of the Bleſſed Virgin, ſo hath he provided an Exchequer, where this mony is iſſued; that is his Church, where his merits ſhould be applied to the diſcharge of particular Coloſſ. 2. 9. conſciences. So that here is one fulneſſe, that in this perſon dwelleth all the fulneſſe of the Godhead bodily. Here is another fulneſſe, that this perſon fulfilled all righteouſneſſe, Thren. 1. 12. and ſatisfied the Juſtice of God by his ſuffering; non eſt dolor ſicut, there was no ſorrow like
Eph. 1. 23. unto his ſorrow; It was ſo full that it exceeded all others. And then there is a third fulneſſe, the Church, (which is his body, the fulneſſe of him, that filleth all in all) perfit God, there is the fulneſſe of his dignity; perfit man, there is the fulneſſe of his paſſibility; and a perfit Church, there is the fulneſſe of the diſtribution of his mercies, and merits to us. And this is omnis plenitudo, all fulneſſe; which yet is farther extended in the next word, Inhabitavit, It pleaſed the Father, that all fulneſſe ſhould dwell in him.

Inhabitavit. The Holy Ghoſt appeared in the Dove, but he did not dwell in it. The Holy Ghoſt Remigius. hath dwelt in holy men, but not thus; So, as that ancient Biſhop expreſſes it, Habitavit in Salomone per ſapientiam, He dwelt in Salomon, in the ſpirit of wiſedome; in Ioſeph, in the ſpirit of chaſtity; in Moſes, in the ſpirit of meekneſſe; but in Chriſto, in plenitudine, in Chriſt, in all fulneſſe. Now this fulneſſe is not fully expreſſed in the Hypoſtaticall union of the two natures; God and Man in the perſon of Chriſt. For, (concerning the divine Nature) here was not a dram of glory in this union. This was a ſtrange fulneſſe, for it was a fulneſſe of emptineſſe; It was all Humiliation, all exinanition, all evacuation of himſelfe, by his obedience to the death of the Croſſe. But when it was done, Ne evacuaretur
1 Cor. 1. 17. Crux Chriſti, (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks in another caſe) leſt the Croſſe of Chriſt ſhould be Eſay 1. ult. evacuated, and made of none effect, he came to make this fulneſſe perfit, by inſtituting and eſtabliſhing a Church; The ſpirit of the Lord ſhall reſt upon him, ſaies the Prophet, of Chriſt. There is a fulneſſe in generall, for his qualification; The Spirit of the Lord; but what kinde of ſpirit? It followes, the ſpirit of wiſedome and underſtanding, the Spirit of Counſell, and Power, the Spirit of knowledge and of the feare of the Lord; we ſee, the ſpirit that muſt reſt upon Chriſt, is the Spirit in thoſe beames, in thoſe functions, in thoſe operations, as conduce to government, that is, Wiſedome, and Counſell, and Power. So that this is Chriſts fulneſſe, that he is in a continuall adminiſtration of his Church; in
Joh. 1. 16. which he flowes over upon us his Miniſters; (for, of his fulneſſe have all we received, and grace for grace: that is, power by his grace, to derive grace upon the Congregation;) And ſo, of his fulneſſe, all the Congregation receives too; and receives in that full meaſure, That they are filled with all the fulneſſe of God; that is, all the fulneſſe that was in both his natures, united in one perſon, when the fulneſſe of the Deity dwelt in him bodily, all the merits of that perſon, are derived upon us, in his Word, Sacraments, in his Church; which Church being to continue to the end, it is moſt properly ſaid habitavit, in him, (in him, as head of the Church) all fulneſſe, all meanes of ſalvation, dwell, and are to be had permanently, conſtantly, infallibly.

Complacuit. Now how came Chriſt by all this fulneſſe, this ſuperlative fulneſſe in himſelfe, this derivative fulneſſe upon us? That his merits ſhould be able to build, and furniſh ſuch a houſe, to raiſe and rectifie ſuch a Church, acceptable to God, in which all fulneſſe ſhould dwell to the worlds end? It was onely becauſe complacuit, it pleaſed God (for this perſonall name of the Father (It pleaſed the Father) is but added ſuppletorily by our Tranſlators, and is not in the Originall) It pleaſed God to give him wherewithall, to enable him ſo farre, for, this complacuit, is, (as we ſay in the Schoole,) vox beneplaciti, it expreſſes onely the good will and love of God, without contemplation or foreſight of any good-Catharin. neſſe in man; nam hac poſita plenitudine exorta ſunt merita: Firſt, we are to conſider this fulneſſe to have been in Chriſt, and then, from this fulneſſe aroſe his merits; we can conſider no merit in Chriſt himſelfe before, whereby he ſhould merit this fulneſſe; for, this fulneſſe was in him, before he merited any thing; and but for this fulneſſe, he had Auguſt. not ſo merited. Ille homo, ut in unitatem filii Dei aſſumeretur, unde meruit? How did that man, (ſayes St. Auguſtine ſpeaking of Chriſt, as of the ſon of man) how did that man merit to be united in one perſon, with the eternall Son of God? Quid egit ante? Quid credidit? What had he done? nay, what had he beleeved? Had he eyther faith, or works, before that union of both natures? If then in Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe, there were no præviſa merita, That Gods fore-ſight, that he would uſe this fulneſſe well, did not work in God,

A God, as a cause to give him this fulnesse, but because hee had it of the free gift of God, therefore he did use it well, and meritoriously, shall any of us be so frivolous, in so important a matter, as to think that God gave us our measure of grace, or our measure of Sanctification, because he fore-saw that we would heap up that measure, and employ that talent profitably? What canst thou imagine, he could fore-see in thee? A propensnesse, a disposition to goodnesse, when his grace should come? Eyther there is no such propensnesse, no such disposition in thee, or, if there be, even that propensnesse and disposition to the good use of grace, is grace, it is an effect of former grace, and his grace wrought, before he saw any such propensnesse, any such disposition; Grace was first, and his grace is his, it is none of thine. To end this point, and this part, non est discipulus supra magistrum; The fulnesse of Christ himselfe was rooted in the complacuit, It pleased the Father; (nothing else wrought in the nature of a Cause) and therefore that measure
B of that fulnesse, which is derived upon us, from him, (our vocation, our justification, our sanctification) are much more so; we have them, quia complacuit, because it hath pleased him freely to give them; God himselfe could see nothing in us, till he of his owne goodnesse, put it into us. And so we have gone as farre, as our first part carries us, in those two branches, and the fruits which we have gathered from thence; First, those generall doctrines, that reason is not to be excluded in matters of religion; and then, that reason in all those cases, is to be limited, with the quia complacuit, meerly in the good pleasure of God. In which first part, you have also had, the qualification of the person, that came this day, to establish Redemption for us, that in Him there was fulnesse, (infinite capacity, and infinite infusion,) and all fulnesse, defective in nothing, (impassible and yet passible, perfit God, and perfit man) and this fulnesse dwelling in Him, in Him as he is Head of the Church, that is, visible, sensible meanes of salvation to every soule in his Church; And
C so we passe to our second part, from this Qualification of the person, (It pleased the Father that in him all fulnesse should dwell) to the Pacification it selfe, for which it pleased the Father to doe all this, that Peace might be made through the bloud of his Crosse.

2 Part. In this Part, St. Chrysostome hath made our steps, our branches. It is much, sayes he, that God would admit any peace; magis, per sanguinem, more, that for peace he should require effusion of bloud; magis, quod per ejus, more, that it must be His bloud, his that was injured, his that was to triumph; Et adhuc magis, quod per sanguinem Crucis ejus; That it must be by the bloud of his Crosse, his heart bloud, his death; and yet this was the case; He made Peace through the bloud of his Crosse. There was then a warre before, and a heavy warre; for, the Lord of hosts was our enemy; and what can all our musters come to, if Bellum ante.
the Lord of Hosts, of all Hosts have raised his forces against us? There was a heavy war denounced in the Inimicitias ponam, when God raised a warre betweene the Devill, and Gen. 3. 15.
D us. For, if we could consider God to stand neuter all in that warre, and meddle with neither side, yet we were in a desperate case, to be put to fight against Powers and Principalities, against the Devill. How much more, when God, the Lord of Hosts, is the Lord even of that Host too? when God presses the Devill, and makes the Devill his Soldier, to fight his battles, and directs his arrowes, and his bullets, and makes his approaches, and his attempts effectuall upon us. That which is fallen upon the Jews now, for their sinne
Basil. against Christ, that there is not in all the world, a Soldier of their race, not a Jew in the world that beares armes, is true of all mankinde for their sin against God; there is not a Soldier amongst them, able to hurt his spirituall enemy or defend himselfe. It is a strange warre, where there are not two sides; and yet that is our case; for, God uses the Devill against us, and the Devill uses us against one another; nay, he uses every one of us, E against our selves; so that God, and the Devill, and we, are all in one Army, and all for our destruction; we have a warre, and yet there is but one Army, and we onely are the Countrey that is fed upon, and wasted; From God to the Devill we have not one friend, and yet, as though we lacked enemies, we fight with one another in inhumane Duels; Vbi morimur homicidæ, (as St. Bernard expresses it powerfully and elegantly) that in those Duels and Combats, he that is murdered dyes a murderer, because he would have beene one; Occisor lethaliter peccat, occisus æternaliter perit; He that comes alive out of the field comes a dead man, because he comes a deadly sinner, and he that remaines dead in the field, is gone into an everlasting death. So that by this inhumane effusion of one anothers bloud, we maintaine a warre against God himselfe, and we provoke him to that which he expresses in Esay, My sword shall be bathed in heaven; Inebriabitur sanguine, The Ad milites Templi Ser. 1. Esay 34. 5.
sword

ſword of the Lord ſhall be made drunk with bloud; Their land ſhall be ſoaked with bloud, and their duſt made fat with fatneſſe. The ſame quarrell, which God hath againſt particular men, and particular Nations, for particular ſinnes, God hath againſt all Mankinde, for Adams ſin. And there is the warre. But what is the peace, and how are we included in that? That is our ſecond and next diſquiſition, That peace might be made.

Pax. A man muſt not preſently think himſelfe included in this peace, becauſe he feeles no effects of this warre. If God draw none of his ſwords of warre, or famine, or peſtilence, upon thee, (no outward warre,) If God raiſe not a rebellion in thy ſelfe, nor fight againſt thee with thine owne affections, in colluctations betweene the fleſh, and the ſpirit; The warre may laſt, for all this. Gellius. Induciarum tempore, bellum manet, licet pugna ceſſet; Though there be no blow ſtriken, the warre remaines in the time of Truce. But thy caſe is not ſo good; here is no Truce, no ceſſation, but a continuall preparation to a fiercer warre. All this while that thou enjoyeſt this imaginary ſecurity, the Enemy digges inſenſibly under ground, all this while he undermines thee, and will blow thee up at laſt more irrecoverably, then if he had battered thee with outward calamities all that time. So any State may be abuſed with a falſe peace preſent, or with a fruitleſſe expectation of a future peace. But in this text, there is true peace, and peace already made; preſent peace, and ſafe peace. Bernard. Pax non promiſſa, ſed miſſa, (ſayes St. Bernard, in his muſicall and harmonious cadences,) not promiſed, but already ſent; non dilata, ſed data, not treated, but concluded; Non prophetata, ſed præſentata, not propheſied, but actually eſtabliſhed. There is the preſentneſſe thereof; And then, made by him, who lacked nothing for the making of a ſafe peace; For, after his Names of Counſellor, and of the Mighty God; he is called, for the conſummation of all, princeps pacis; A Counſellor, There is his wiſdome, A mighty God, There is his Power: and this Counſellor, This Mighty God, this wiſe, and this powerfull Prince, hath undertaken to make our peace; But how, that is next, per ſanguinem, Peace being made by bloud. Eſay 9.6.

Per ſanguinem. Is effuſion of bloud the way of peace? effuſion of bloud may make them from whom bloud is ſo abundantly drawne, glad of peace, becauſe they are thereby reduced to a weakneſſe. But in our warres, ſuch a weakneſſe puts us farther off from peace, and puts more fierceneſſe in the Enemy. But here, mercy and truth are met together; God would be true to his owne Juſtice, (bloud was forfeited, and he would have bloud) and God would be mercifull to us, he would make us the ſtronger by drawing bloud, and by drawing our beſt bloud, the bloud of Chriſt Jeſus. Gen. 34. Simeon and Levi, when they meditated their revenge for the rape committed upon their ſiſter, when they pretended peace, yet they required a little bloud: They would have the Sichemites circumciſed: but when they had opened a veyne, they made them bleed to death; when they were under the ſoreneſſe of Circumciſion, they ſlew them all. Gods juſtice required bloud, but that bloud is not ſpilt, but poured from that head to our hearts, into the veines, and wounds of our owne ſoules: There was bloud ſhed, but no bloud loſt. Before the Law was thorowly eſtabliſhed, when Moſes came downe from God, and deprehended the people, in that Idolatry to the Calfe, before he would preſent himſelfe as a Mediator betweene God and them, for that ſinne, he prepares a ſacrifice of bloud, in the execution of three thouſand of thoſe Idolaters, and after that he came to his vehement prayer, in their behalfe. Exod. 32 28. & 32. And in the ſtrength of the Law, all things were purged with bloud, and without bloud there is no remiſſion. Heb. 9 22. Whether we place the reaſon of this in Gods Juſtice, which required bloud, or whether we place it in the conveniency, that bloud being ordinarily received to be ſedes animæ, the ſeat and reſidence of the ſoule; The ſoule, for which, that expiation was to be, could not be better repreſented, nor purified, then in the ſtate, and ſeat of the ſoule, in bloud; or whether we ſhut up our ſelves in an humble ſobriety, to inquire into the reaſons of Gods actions, thus we ſee it was, no peace, no remiſſion, but in bloud. Nor is that ſo ſtrange, as that which followes in the next place, per ſanguinem ejus, by his bloud.

Per ſanguinem ejus. Before, under the Law, it was in ſanguine hircorum, & vitulorum; In the bloud of Goats, and Bullocks; here it is in ſanguine ejus, in his bloud. Not his, as he claims all the beaſts of the forreſt, all the cattle upon a thouſand hils, and all the fowles of the mountaines to be his; not his, as he ſayes of Gold and Silver, The Silver is mine, and the Gold is mine; not his, as he is Lord, and proprietary of all, by Creation; ſo all bloud is his; no nor his, as the bloud of all the Martyrs was his bloud, (which is a neare relation and conſanguinity) Pſal. 50. 10. Hag. 2. 8.

A sanguinity) but his ſo, as it was the precious bloud of his body, the ſeat of his ſoule, the matter of his ſpirits, the knot of his life, This bloud he ſhed for me; and I have bloud to ſhed for him too, though he call me not to the tryall, nor to the glory of Martyrdome. Sanguis animæ meæ voluntas mea, The bloud of my ſoule is my will; Scindatur vena ferro compunctionis, open a veine with that knife, remorce, compunction, ut ſi non ſenſus, certe conſenſus peccati effluat, That though thou canſt not bleed out all motions to ſinne, thou maiſt all conſent thereunto. Noli eſſe nimium juſtus; noli ſapere plus quam oportet; St. Bernard makes this uſe of thoſe Counſels, Be not righteous overmuch, nor be not overwiſe, Cui putas venæ parcendum, ſi juſtitia & ſapientia egent minutione, what veine maiſt thou ſpare, if thou muſt open thoſe two veines, righteouſneſſe, and wiſedome? If they may be ſuperfluouſly abundant, if thou muſt bleed out ſome of thy Righteouſneſſe, and ſome of thy wiſedome, cui venæ parcendum, at what veine muſt thou not bleed? Now in all ſacri-

B fices, where bloud was to be offerd, the fat was to be offerd to. If thou wilt ſacrifice the bloud of thy ſoule, (as St. Bernard cals the will) ſacrifice the fat too; If thou give over thy purpoſe of continuing in thy ſin, give over the memory of it, and give over all that thou poſſeſſeſt unjuſtly, and corruptly got by that ſinne; elſe thou keepeſt the fat from God, though thou give him the bloud. If God had given over at his ſecond daies work, we had had no ſunne, no ſeaſons; If at his fift, we had had no beeing; If at the ſixt, no Sabbath; but by proceeding to the ſeventh, we are all, and we have all. Naaman, who was out of the covenant, yet, by waſhing in Jordan ſeven times, was cured of his lepro-ſie; ſeaven times did it even in him, but leſſe did not. The Prieſt in the Law uſed a ſeven-fold ſprinkling of bloud upon the Altar; and we obſerve a ſeven-fold ſhedding of bloud in Chriſt; In his Circumciſion, and in his Agony, in his fulfilling of that Propheſie; genas vellicantibus, I gave my cheeks to them, that plucked off the haire, and in his ſcourging;

C in his crowning, and in his nayling, and laſtly, in the piercing of his ſide. Theſe ſeven channels hath the bloud of thy Saviour found. Poure out the bloud of thy ſoule, ſacri-fice thy ſtubborne and rebellious will ſeaven times too; ſeaven times, that is, every day; and ſeaven times every day; for ſo often a juſt man falleth; And then, how low muſt that man lie at laſt, if he fall ſo often, and never riſe upon any fall? and therefore raiſe thy ſelf as often, and as ſoone as thou falleſt. Iericho would not fall, but by being compaſſed ſea-ven dayes, and ſeaven times in one day. Compaſſe thy ſelfe, comprehend thy ſelfe, ſea-ven times, many times, and thou ſhalt have thy loſſe of bloud ſupplied with better bloud, with a true ſenſe of that peace, which he hath already made, and made by bloud, and by his owne bloud, and by the bloud of his Croſſe, which is the laſt branch of this ſecond part.

D Greater love hath no man, then to lay downe his life for his friend, yet he that ſaid ſo, did more then ſo, more then lay downe his life, (for he expoſed it to violences, and tor-ments) and all that for his enemies. But doth not the neceſſity diminiſh the love? where a teſtament is, there muſt alſo of neceſſity be the death of the teſtator: was there then a neceſſity in Chriſts dying? ſimply a neceſſity of coaction there was not; ſuch as is in the death of other men, naturall, or violent by the hand of Juſtice. There was nothing more arbitrary, more voluntary, more ſpontaneous then all that Chriſt did for man. And if you could conſider a time, before the contract between the Father, and him, had paſſed, for the redemption of man by his death, we might ſay, that then there was no neceſſity upon Chriſt, that he muſt dye; But becauſe that contract was from all eternity, ſuppo-ſing that contract, that this peace was to be made by his death, there entred the oportuit

E pati, That Chriſt ought to ſuffer all theſe things, and to enter into his glory. And ſo, as for his death, ſo for the manner of his death, (by the Croſſe) it was not of abſolute neceſ-ſity, and yet it was not by caſualty neither, not becauſe he was to ſuffer in that Nation, which did ordinarily puniſh ſuch Malefactors, (ſuch as he was accuſed to be) ſeditious perſons, with that manner of death, but all this proceeded ex pacto, thus the contract led it, to this he was obedient, obedient unto death, and unto the death of the Croſſe. By bloud, and not onely by comming into this world, and aſſuming our nature, (which hu-miliation was an act of infinite value) and not by the bloud of his Circumciſion or Ago-ny, but bloud to death, and by no gentler, nor nobler death, then the death of the Croſſe, was this peace to be made by him. Though then one drop of his bloud had beene enough to have redeemed infinite worlds, if it had beene ſo contracted, and ſo applyed, yet he gave us, a morning ſhowre of his bloud in his Circumciſion, and an evening ſhowre at his paſſion, and a ſhowre after Sunſet, in the piercing of his ſide. And though any death had beene an incomprehenſible ranſome, for the Lord of life to have given, for the children of death, yet he refuſed not the death of the Croſſe; The Croſſe, to which a bitter curſe was nayled by Moſes, from the beginning, he that is hanged, is, (not onely accurſed of God, as our Tranſlation hath it,) but he is the curſe of God, (as it is in the Originall) not accurſed, but a curſe; not a ſimple curſe, but the curſe of God. And by the Croſſe, which beſides the Infamy, was ſo painfull a death, as that many men languiſhed many dayes upon it, before they dyed: And by his bloud of this torture, and this ſhame, this painfull, and this ignominious death, was this peace made. In our great work of crucifying our ſelves to the world too, it is not enough to bleed the drops of a Circumciſion, that is, to cut off ſome exceſſive, and notorious practice of ſin; nor to bleed the drops of an Agony, to enter into a conflict and colluctation of the fleſh and the ſpirit, whether we were not better truſt in Gods mercy, for our continuance in that ſin, then loſe all that pleaſure and profit, which that ſin brings us; nor enough to bleed the drops of ſcourging, to be laſhed with viperous, and venemous tongues by contumelies, and ſlanders; nor to bleed the drops of Thornes, to have Thornes and ſcruples enter into our conſciences, with ſpirituall afflictions; but we muſt be content to bleed the ſtreames of naylings to thoſe Croſſes, to continue in them all our lives, if God ſee that neceſſary for our confirmation; and, if men will pierce and wound us after our deaths in our good name, yea, if they will ſlander our Reſurrection, (as they did Chriſts) if they will ſay, that it is impoſſible God ſhould have mercy upon ſuch a man, impoſſible that a man of ſo bad life, and ſo ſad and comfortleſſe a death, ſhould have a joyfull Reſurrection, here is our comfort, as that piercing of Chriſts ſide was after the Conſummatum eſt, after his paſſion ended, and therefore put him to no paine, as that ſlander of his Reſurrection, was after that glorious triumph; He was riſen and had ſhewed himſelfe before, and therefore it diminiſhed not his power: ſo all theſe poſthume wounds, and ſlanders after my death, after my God and my Soule ſhall have paſſed that Dialogue, Veni Domine Ieſu, and euge bone ſerve, That I ſhall have ſaid upon my death-bed, Come Lord Jeſu, come quickly, and he ſhall have ſaid, Well done good and faithfull ſervant, enter into thy Maſters joy, when I ſhall have ſaid to him, In manus tuas Domine, Into thy hands O Lord I commend my ſpirit, And he to me, Hodie mecum eris in paradiſo, This day, this minute thou ſhalt be, now thou art with me in Paradiſe, when this ſhall be my ſtate, God ſhall heare their ſlanders and maledictions, and write them all downe, but not in my booke, but in theirs, and there they ſhall meet them at Judgement, amongſt their owne ſinnes, to their everlaſting confuſion, and finde me in poſſeſſion of that peace, made by bloud, made by his bloud, made by the bloud of his Croſſe, which were all the peeces laid out for this ſecond part, with which we have done; and paſſe from the qualification of the perſon, (It pleaſed the Father that in him all fulneſſe ſhould dwell) which was our firſt part, and the Pacification, and the way thereof, (by the bloud of his Croſſe to make peace) which was our ſecond, to the Reconciliation it ſelfe, and the Application thereof to all to whom that Reconciliation appertaines, That all things, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven, might be reconciled unto him.

Deut. 21.23. — A — B — C — D

3. Part.

All this was done; He, in whom it pleaſed the Father, that this fulneſſe ſhould dwell, had made this peace by the bloud of his Croſſe, and yet, after all this, the Apoſtle comes upon that Ambaſſage, We pray ye, in Chriſts ſtead, that ye be reconciled to God; So that this Reconciliation in the Text, is a ſubſequent thing to this peace. The generall peace is made by Chriſts death, as a generall pardon is given at the Kings comming; The Application of this peace is in the Church, as the ſuing out of the pardon, is in the Office. Ioab made Abſaloms peace with his Father; Bring the young man againe, ſayes David to Ioab; but yet he was not reconciled to him, ſo as that he ſaw his face in two yeare. God hath ſounded a Retreat to the Battle, As I live, ſaith the Lord, I would not the death of a ſinner; He hath ſaid to the deſtroyer, It is enough, ſtay now thy hand; He is pacified in Chriſt; and he hath bound the enemy in chaines. Now let us labour for our Reconciliation; for all things are reconciled to him, in Chriſt, that is, offered a way of reconciliation. All things in heaven and earth, ſayes the Apoſtle. And that is ſo large, as that Origen needed not to have extended it to Hell too, and conceive out of this place, a poſſibility, that the Devils themſelves ſhall come to a Reconciliation with God. But to all in Heaven and Earth it appertaines. Conſider we how.

First,

A First then, there is a reconciliation of them in heaven to God, and then of them on earth to God, and then of them in heaven, and them in earth, to one another, by the blood of his Crosse. If we consider them in heaven, to be those who are gone up to heaven from this world by death, they had the same reconciliation as we; either by reaching the hand of faith forward, to lay hold upon Christ before he came, (which was the case of all under the Law;) or by reaching back that hand, to lay hold upon all that hee had done and suffered, when he was come, (which is the case of those that are dead before us in the profession of the Gospell.) All that are in heaven, and were upon earth, are reconciled one way, by application of Christ in the Church; so that, though they be now in heaven, yet they had their reconciliation here upon earth. But if we consider those who are in heaven, and have been so from the first minute of their creation, Angels, why have they, or how have they any reconciliation? How needed they any, and
B then, how is this of Christ applyed unto them? They needed a confirmation; for the Angels were created in blessednesse, but not in perfect blessednesse; They might fall,
* they did fall. To those that fell, can appertaine no reconciliation; no more then to those that die in their sins; for Quod homini mors, Angelis casus; The fall of the Angels wrought upon them, as the death of a man does upon him; They are both equally incapable of change to better. But to those Angels that stood, their standing being of grace, and their confirmation being not one transient act in God done at once, but a continuall succession, and emanation of daily grace, belongs this reconciliation by Christ, because all matter of grace, and where any deficiency is to be supplyed, whether by way of reparation, as in man, or by way of confirmation, as in Angels, proceeds from the Crosse, from the Merits of Christ. They are so reconciled then, as that they are extra lapsus periculum, out of the danger of falling; but yet this stability, this infallibility is not yet in-
C delibly imprinted in their natures; yet the Angels might fall, if this reconciler did not sustain them; for, if those words reperit in Angelis iniquitatem, that God found folly, (weaknesse, infirmity) in his Angels, be to be understood of the good Angels, that stand confirmed, (as procul dubio de diabolo intelligi non potest, without all doubt they cannot be understood of the ill Angels) the best service of the best Angels, devested of that successive grace, that supports them, if God should exact a rigorous account of it, could not be acceptable in the sight of God; So the Angels have a pacification, and a reconciliation, lest they should fall.

Thus things in heaven are reconciled to God by Christ; and things on earth too. First the creature, as S. Paul speakes; that is, other creatures then men. For, at the generall resurrection, (which is rooted in the resurrection of Christ, and so hath relation to him) the creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious
D liberty of the children of God; for which, the whole creation groanes, and travailes in paine yet. This deliverance then from this bondage, the whole creature hath by Christ, and that is their reconciliation. And then are we reconciled by the blood of his Crosse, when having crucified our selves by a true repentance, we receive the seale of reconciliation, in his blood in the Sacrament. But the most proper, and most litterall sense of these words, is, that all things in heaven and earth, be reconciled to God, (that is, to his glory, to a fitter disposition to glorifie him) by being reconciled to another, in Christ; that in him, as head of the Church, they in heaven, and we upon earth, be united together as one body in the Communion of Saints. For, this text hath a conformity, and a harmony with that to the Ephesians, and in sense, as well as in words, is the same, That God might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him; where the word which we translate (to gather) doth properly signifie recapitulare, to bring all things to their first head, to Gods first purpose; which was, that
E Angels, and men, united in Christ Jesus, might glorifie him eternally in the Kingdome of heaven. Then are things in heaven restored and reconciled, (sayes S. Augustine) Cum quod ex Angelis lapsum est, ex hominibus redditur, when good men have repaired the ruine of the bad Angels, and filled their places. And then are things on earth restored, and reconciled, Cum prædestinati à corruptionis vetustate renovantur, when Gods elect children are delivered from the corruptions of this world, to which, even they are subject here. Cum humiliati homines redeunt, unde Apostatæ superbiendo ceciderunt, when men by humility are exalted, to those places from which Angels fell by pride, then are all things in heaven and earth reconciled in Christ.

The

Toſtat. in Levit. 16.

The blood of the ſacrifices was brought by the high prieſt, in ſanctum ſanctorum, into the place of greateſt holineſſe; but it was brought but once, in feſto expiationis, in the feaſt of expiation; but, in the other parts of the Temple, it was ſprinkled every day. The blood of the Croſſe of Chriſt Jeſus hath had his effect in ſancto ſanctorum, even in the higheſt heavens, in ſupplying their places that fell, in confirming them that ſtood, and in uniting us and them, in himſelfe, as Head of all. In the other parts of the Temple it is to be ſprinkled daily. Here, in the militant Church upon earth, there is ſtill a reconciliation to be made; not only toward one another, in the band of charity, but in our ſelves. In our ſelves we may finde things in heaven, and things on earth to reconcile. There is a heavenly zeale, but if it be not reconciled to diſcretion, there is a heavenly purity, but if it be not reconciled to the bearing of one anothers infirmities, there is a heavenly liberty, but if it be not reconciled to a care, for the prevention of ſcandall, All things in our heaven, and our earth are not reconciled in Chriſt. In a word, till the fleſh and the ſpirit be reconciled, this reconciliation is not accompliſhed. For, neither ſpirit, nor fleſh muſt be deſtroyed in us; a ſpirituall man is not all ſpirit, he is a man ſtill. But then is fleſh and ſpirit reconciled in Chriſt, when in all the faculties of the ſoule, and all the organs of the body we glorifie him in this world; for then, in the next world wee ſhall be glorified by him, and with him, in ſoule, and in body too, where we ſhall bee thoroughly reconciled to one another, no ſuits, no controverſies; and thoroughly to the Angels; when we ſhall not only be ſicut Angeli, as the Angels in ſome one property, but æquales Angelis, equall to the Angels in all, for, Non erunt duæ ſocietates Angelorum & hominum, Men and Angels ſhall not make two companies, ſed omnium beatitudo erit, uni adhærere Deo, this ſhall be the bleſſedneſſe of them both, to be united in one head, Chriſt Jeſus.

Mat. 22. 30. Luc. 20. 36. Auguſt.

And theſe reconcilings are reconcilings enow; for theſe are all that are in heaven and earth. If you will reconcile things in heaven, and earth, with things in hell, that is a reconciling out of this Text. If you will mingle the ſervice of God, and the ſervice of this world, there is no reconciling of God and Mammon in this Text. If you will mingle a true religion, and a falſe religion, there is no reconciling of God and Belial in this Text. For the adhering of perſons born within the Church of Rome, to the Church of Rome, our law ſayes nothing to them if they come; But for reconciling to the Church of Rome, by perſons born within the Allegeance of the King, or for perſwading of men to be ſo reconciled, our law hath called by an infamous and Capitall name of Treaſon, and yet every Tavern, and Ordinary is full of ſuch Traitors. Every place from jeſt to earneſt is filled with them; from the very ſtage to the death-bed; At a Comedy they will perſwade you, as you ſit, as you laugh, And in your ſickneſſe they will perſwade you, as you lye, as you dye. And not only in the bed of ſickneſſe, but in the bed of wantonneſſe they perſwade too; and there may be examples of women, that have thought it a fit way to gain a ſoul, by proſtituting themſelves, and by entertaining unlawfull love, with a purpoſe to convert a ſervant, which is ſomewhat a ſtrange Topique, to draw arguments of religion from. Let me ſee a Dominican and a Jeſuit reconciled, in doctrinall papiſtry, for freewill and predeſtination, Let me ſee a French papiſt and an Italian papiſt reconciled in State-papiſtry, for the Popes juriſdiction, Let me ſee the Jeſuits, and the ſecular prieſts reconciled in England, and when they are reconciled to one another, let them preſſe reconciliation to their Church. To end all, Thoſe men have their bodies from the earth, and they have their ſoules from heaven; and ſo all things in earth and heaven are reconciled: but they have their Doctrine from the Devill; and for things in hell, there is no peace made, and with things in hell, there is no reconciliation to be had by the blood of his Croſſe, except we will tread that blood under our feet, and make a mock of Chriſt Jeſus, and crucifie the Lord of Life againe.

Preached at Pauls, upon Chriſtmas Day, in the Evening. 1624.

ESAIAH 7. 14.

Part of the firſt Leſſon, that Evening.

B Therefore the Lord ſhall give you a ſigne; Behold, a Virgin ſhall conceive, and beare a Son, and ſhall call his name Immanuel.

SAint Bernard ſpent his conſideration upon three remarkable conjunctions, this Day. First, a Conjunction of God, and Man in one perſon, Chriſt Jeſus; Then a conjunction of the incompatible Titles, Maid and Mother, in one bleſſed woman, the bleſſed Virgin Mary: And thirdly a conjunction of Faith, and the Reaſon of man, that ſo beleeves, and comprehends thoſe two conjunctions. Let us accompany theſe three with another ſtrange conjunction, in the firſt word of this Text, Propterea, Therefore; for that joynes the anger of God, and his mercy together. God chides and rebukes the King Achaz by the Prophet, he is angry with him, and Therefore, ſayes the Text, becauſe he is angry he will give him a ſigne, a C ſeale of mercy, Therefore the Lord ſhall give you a ſigne, Behold, a Virgin, &c. This Therefore, ſhall therefore be a firſt part of this Exerciſe, That God takes any occaſion to ſhew mercy; And a ſecond ſhall be, The particular way of his mercy, declared here, The Lord ſhall give you a ſigne; And then a third and laſt, what this ſigne was, Behold, a Virgin, &c. Diviſio.

In theſe three parts, we ſhall walk by theſe ſteps; Having made our entrance into the firſt, with that generall conſideration, that Gods mercy is alwaies in ſeaſon, upon that ſtation, upon that height we ſhall look into the particular occaſions of Gods mercy here, what this King Achaz had done to alien God, and to avert his mercy, and in thoſe two branches we ſhall determine that part. In the ſecond, we ſhall alſo firſt make this generall entrance, That God perſiſts in his own waies, goes forward with his own purpoſes, And then what his way, and his purpoſe here was, he would give them a ſigne: D and farther we ſhall not extend that ſecond part. In the third we have more ſteps to make; Firſt, what this ſign is in generall, it is, that there is a Redeemer given. And then how, thus; Firſt, Virgo concipiet, a Virgin ſhall conceive, ſhe ſhall be a Virgin then; And Virgo pariet, a Virgin ſhall bring forth, ſhe ſhall be a Virgin then; And Pariet filium, ſhe ſhall beare a Son, and therefore he is of her ſubſtance, not only man, but man of her; And this Virgin ſhall call this Son Immanuel, God with us, that is, God and Man in one perſon. Though the Angel at the Conception tell Ioſeph, That he ſhall call his name Jeſus, and tell Mary her ſelfe, that ſhe ſhall call his name Jeſus, yet the bleſſed Virgin her ſelfe ſhall have a further reach, a clearer illuſtration, She ſhall call his name Immanuel, God with us: Others were called Ieſus, Ioſuah was ſo, divers others were ſo; but, in the Scriptures there was never any but Chriſt called Immanuel. Though Ieſus ſignifie a Saviour, Ioſeph was able to call this childe Ieſus, upon a more peculiar reaſon, and way of E ſalvation then others who had that name, becauſe they had ſaved the people from preſent calamities, and imminent dangers; for, the Angel told Ioſeph, that he ſhould therefore be called Ieſus, becauſe he ſhould ſave the people from their ſins; and ſo, no Ioſuah, no other Ieſus was a Ieſus. But the bleſſed Virgin ſaw more then this; not only that he ſhould be ſuch a Ieſus as ſhould ſave them from their ſins, but ſhe ſaw the manner how, that he ſhould be Immanuel, God with us, God and man in one perſon; That ſo, being Man, he might ſuffer, and being God, that ſhould give an infinite value to his ſufferings, according to the contract paſſed between the Father and him; and ſo he ſhould be Ieſus, a Saviour, a Saviour from ſin, and this by this way and meanes. And then that all this ſhould be eſtabliſhed, and declared by an infallible ſigne, with this Ecce, Behold; That whoſoever

Mat. 1. 21. Luc. 1. 31.

whosoever can call upon God by that name Immanuel, that is, confesse Christ to bee come in the flesh, that Man shall have an Ecce, a light, a sign, a token, an assurance that this Immanuel, this Jesus, this Saviour belongs unto him, and he shall be able to say, Ecce, Behold, mine eyes have seen thy salvation. A

1 Part. Psal. 101. 1. We begin with that which is elder then our beginning, and shall over-live our end, The mercy of God. I will sing of thy mercy and judgement, sayes David; when we fixe our selves upon the meditation and modulation of the mercy of God, even his judgements cannot put us out of tune, but we shall sing, and be chearefull, even in them. As God made grasse for beasts, before he made beasts, and beasts for man, before he made man: As in that first generation, the Creation, so in the regeneration, our re-creating, he begins with that which was necessary for that which followes, Mercy before Judgement. Nay, to say that mercy was first, is but to post-date mercy; to preferre mercy but so, is to diminish mercy; The names of first or last derogate from it, for first and last are but ragges of time, and his mercy hath no relation to time, no limitation in time, it is not first, nor last, but eternall, everlasting; Let the Devill make me so far desperate as to conceive a time whē there was no mercy, and he hath made me so far an Atheist, as to conceive a time when there was no God; if I despoile him of his mercy, any one minute, and say, now God hath no mercy, for that minute I discontinue his very Godhead, and his beeing. Later Grammarians have wrung the name of mercy out of misery; Misericordia præsumit miseriam, say these, there could be no subsequent mercy, if there were no precedent misery; But the true roote of the word mercy, through all the Prophets, is Racham, and Racham is diligere, to love; as long as there hath been love (and God is love) there hath been mercy: And mercy considered externally, and in the practise and in the effect, began not at the helping of man, when man was fallen and become miserable, but at the making of man, when man was nothing. So then, here we consider not mercy as it is radically in God, and an essentiall attribute of his, but productively in us, as it is an action, a working upon us, and that more especially, as God takes all occasions to exercise that action, and to shed that mercy upon us: for particular mercies are feathers of his wings, and that prayer, Lord let thy mercy lighten upon us, as our trust is in thee, is our birdlime; particular mercies are that cloud of Quailes which hovered over the host of Israel, and that prayer, Lord let thy mercy lighten upon us, is our net to catch, our Gomer to fill of those Quailes. The aire is not so full of Moats, of Atomes, as the Church is of Mercies; and as we can suck in no part of aire, but we take in those Moats, those Atomes; so here in the Congregation we cannot suck in a word from the preacher, we cannot speak, we cannot sigh a prayer to God, but that that whole breath and aire is made of mercy. But we call not upon you from this Text, to consider Gods ordinary mercy, that which he exhibites to all in the ministery of his Church; nor his miraculous mercy, his extraordinary deliverances of States and Churches; but we call upon particular Consciences, by occasion of this Text, to call to minde Gods occasionall mercies to them; such mercies as a regenerate man will call mercies, though a naturall man would call them accidents, or occurrences, or contingencies; A man wakes at midnight full of unclean thoughts, and he heares a passing Bell; this is an occasionall mercy, if he call that his own knell, and consider how unfit he was to be called out of the world then, how unready to receive that voice, Foole, this night they shall fetch away thy soule. The adulterer, whose eye waites for the twy-light, goes forth, and casts his eyes upon forbidden houses, and would enter, and sees a Lord have mercy upon us upon the doore; this is an occasionall mercy, if this bring him to know that they who lie sick of the plague with..., passe through a furnace, but by Gods grace, to heaven; and hee without, carries his own furnace to hell, his lustfull loines to everlasting perdition. What an occasionall mercy had Balaam, when his Asse Catechized him? What an occasionall mercy had one Theefe, when the other catechized him so, Art not thou afraid being under the same condemnation? What an occasionall mercy had all they that saw that, when the Devil himself fought for the name of Jesus, and wounded the sons of Sceva for exorcising in the name of Jesus, with that indignation, with that increpation, Iesus we know, and Paul we know, but who are ye? If I should declare what God hath done (done occasionally) for my soule, where he instructed me for feare of falling, where he raised me when I was fallen, perchance you would rather fixe your thoughts upon my illnesse, and wonder at that, then at Gods goodnesse, and glorifie him in that; rather wonder at my sins, then B C D E

Act. 19. 14.

A then at his mercies, rather consider how ill a man I was, then how good a God he is. If I should inquire upon what occasion God elected me, and writ my name in the book of Life, I should sooner be afraid that it were not so, then finde a reason why it should be so. God made Sun and Moon to distinguish seasons, and day, and night, and we cannot have the fruits of the earth but in their seasons: But God hath made no decree to distinguish the seasons of his mercies; In paradise, the fruits were ripe, the first minute, and in heaven it is alwaies Autumne, his mercies are ever in their maturity. We ask panem quotidianum, our daily bread, and God never sayes you should have come yesterday, he never sayes you must againe to morrow, but to day if you will heare his voice, to day he will heare you. If some King of the earth have so large an extent of Dominion, in North, and South, as that he hath Winter and Summer together in his Dominions, so large an extent East and West, as that he hath day and night together in his Dominions, B much more hath God mercy and judgement together: He brought light out of darkenesse, not out of a lesser light; he can bring thy Summer out of Winter, though thou have no Spring; though in the wayes of fortune, or understanding, or conscience, thou have been benighted till now, wintred and frozen, clouded and eclypsed, damped and benummed, smothered and stupified till now, now God comes to thee, not as in the dawning of the day, not as in the bud of the spring, but as the Sun at noon to illustrate all shadowes, as the sheaves in harvest, to fill all penuries, all occasions invite his mercies, and all times are his seasons.

If it were not thus in generall, it would never have been so in this particular, in our case, in the Text, in King Achaz; If God did not seeke occasion to doe good to all, he would never have found occasion to doe good to King Achaz. Subjects are to look upon the faults of Princes, with the spectacles of obedience, and reverence, to their place, and C persons; little and dark spectacles, and so their faults, and errors are to appeare little, and excusable to them; Gods perspective glasse, his spectacle is the whole world; he looks not upon the Sun, in his spheare onely, but as he works upon the whole earth: And he looks upon Kings, not onely what harme they doe at home, but what harme they occasion abroad; & through that spectacle, the faults of Princes, in Gods eye, are multiplyed, farre above those of private men. Achaz had such faults, and yet God sought occasion of Mercy. Iotham, his Father, is called a good King, and yet all Idolatry was not removed in his time, and he was a good King, for all that. Achaz is called ill, both becaus he himselfe sacrificed Idolatrously, (And the King was a commanding person) And becaus he made the Priest Uriah to doe so, (And the Priest was an exemplar person) And becaus he made his Son commit the abominations of the heathen; (And the actions of the Kings Son pierce far in leading others.) Achaz had these faults, and yet D God sought occasion of mercy. If the evening skie be red, you promise your selves a faire day, sayes Christ; you would not doe so if the evening were black and cloudy: when you see the fields white with corne, you say harvest is ready; you would not doe so if they were white with frost. If ye consent, and obey, you shall eat the good things of the Land, sayes God in the Prophet; shall ye doe so if you refuse, and rebell? Achaz did, and yet God sought occasion of mercy. There arise diseases for which there is no probatum est, in all the bookes of Physitians; There is scarce any sin of which we have not had experiments of Gods mercies; He concludes with no sin, excludes no occasion, precludes no person: And so we have done with our first part, Gods generall disposition, for the Rule, declared in Achaz case for the example.

Achaz case.

Mat. 16. 2.

Joh. 4. 35.

Esay 1. 19.

Our second part consists of a Rule, and an Example too: The Rule, That God goes forward in his own wayes, proceeds, as he begun, in mercy; The Example, what his E proceeding, what his subsequent mercy to Achaz was. One of the most convenient Hieroglyphicks of God, is a Circle; and a Circle is endlesse; whom God loves, hee loves to the end: and not onely to their own end, to their death, but to his end, and his end is, that he might love them still. His hailestones, and his thunder-bolts, and his showres of bloud (emblemes and instruments of his Judgements) fall downe in a direct line, and affect and strike some one person, or place: His Sun, and Moone, and Starres, (Emblemes and Instruments of his Blessings) move circularly, and communicate themselves to all. His Church is his chariot; in that, he moves more gloriously, then in the Sun; as much more, as his begotten Son exceeds his created Sun, and his Son of glory, and of his right hand, the Sun of the firmament; and this Church, his chariot, moves in that

Note this for that communicable motion, circularly; It began in the East, it came to us, and is passing now, shining out now, in the farthest West. As the Sun does not set to any Nation, but withdraw it selfe, and returne againe; God, in the exercise of his mercy, does not set to thy soule, though he benight it with an affliction. Remember that our Saviour Christ himselfe, in many actions and passions of our humane nature, and infirmities, smothered that Divinity, and suffered it not to worke, but yet it was alwayes in him, and wrought most powerfully in the deepest danger; when he was absolutely dead, it raised him again: If Christ slumbred the God-head in himselfe, The mercy of God may be slumbred, it may be hidden from his servants, but it cannot be taken away, and in the greatest necessities, it shall break out. The Blessed Virgin was overshadowed, but it was with the Holy Ghost that overshadowed her: Thine understanding, thy conscience may be so too, and yet it may be the work of the Holy Ghost, who moves in thy darkenesse, and will bring light even out of that, knowledge out of thine ignorance, clearnesse out of thy scruples, and consolation out of thy Dejection of Spirit. God is thy portion, sayes David; David does not speak so narrowly, so penuriously, as to say, God hath given thee thy portion, and thou must look for no more; but, God is thy portion, and as long as he is God, he hath more to give, and as long as thou art his, thou hast more to receive. Thou canst not have so good a Title, to a subsequent blessing, as a former blessing; where thou art an ancient tenant, thou wilt look to be preferred before a stranger; and that is thy title to Gods future mercies, if thou have been formerly accustomed to them. The Sun is not weary with sixe thousand yeares shining; God cannot be weary of doing good; And therefore never say, God hath given me these and these temporall things, and I have scattered them wastfully, surely he will give me no more; These and these spirituall graces, and I have neglected them, abused them, surely he will give me no more; For, for things created, we have instruments to measure them; we know the compasse of a Meridian, and the depth of a Diameter of the Earth, and we know this, even of the uppermost spheare in the heavens: But when we come to the Throne of God himselfe, the Orbe of the Saints, and Angels that see his face, and the vertues, and powers that flow from thence, we have no balance to weigh them, no instruments to measure them, no hearts to conceive them: So, for temporall things, we know the most that man can have; for we know all the world; but for Gods mercy, and his spirituall graces, as that language in which God spake, the Hebrew, hath no superlative, so, that which he promises, in all that he hath spoken, his mercy hath no superlative; he shewes no mercy, which you can call his Greatest Mercy, his Mercy is never at the highest; whatsoever he hath done for thy soule, or for any other, in applying himselfe to it, he can exceed that. Onely he can raise a Tower, whose top shall reach to heaven: The Basis of the highest building is but the Earth; But though thou be but a Tabernacle of Earth, God shall raise thee peece by peece, into a spirituall building; And after one Story of Creation, and another of Vocation, and another of Sanctification, he shall bring thee up, to meet thy selfe, in the bosome of thy God, where thou wast at first, in an eternall election: God is a circle himselfe, and he will make thee one; Goe not thou about to square eyther circle, to bring that which is equall in it selfe, to Angles, and Corners, into dark and sad suspicions of God, or of thy selfe, that God can give, or that thou canst receive no more Mercy, then thou hast had already.

Signum. This then is the course of Gods mercy, He proceeds as he begun, which was the first branch of this second part; It is alwayes in motion, and alwayes moving towards All, alwaies perpendicular, right over every one of us, and alwayes circular, alwayes communicable to all; And then the particular beame of this Mercy, shed upon Achaz here in our Text, is, Dabit signum, The Lord shall give you a signe. It is a great Degree of Mercy, that he affords us signes. A naturall man is not made of Reason alone, but of Reason, and Sense: A Regenerate man is not made of Faith alone, but of Faith and Reason; and Signes, externall things, assist us all.

In the Creation, it was part of the office of the Sunne and Moone, to be significative; he created them for signes, as well as for seasons: hee directed the Jews to Christ, by signes, by sacrifices, and Sacraments, and ceremonies; and he entertaines us with Christ, by the same meanes to; we know where to finde Christ; In his House, in his Church; And we know at what signe he dwels; where the Word is rightly Preached, and the Sacraments duly administred. It is truly, and wisely said, Sic habenda fides verbo Dei, ut

A ſubſidia minimè contemnamus; We muſt ſo farre ſatisfie our ſelves, with the word of God, as that we deſpiſe not thoſe other ſubſidiary helps, which God in his Church hath afforded us: which is true (as of Sacraments eſpecially) ſo of other Sacramentall, and Rituall, and Ceremoniall things, which aſſiſt the working of the Sacraments, though they infuſe no power into the Sacraments. For, therefore does the Prophet ſay, when Achaz refuſed a ſigne, Is it a ſmall thing to weary (or diſobey) men, but that you will weary (diſobey) God himſelfe? He diſobeyes God, in the way of contumacy, who refuſes his ſignes, his outward aſſiſtances, his ceremonies which are induced by his authority, derived from him, upon men, in his Church, and ſo made a part, or a help, of his ordinary ſervice, as Sacraments, and Sacramentall things are. V. 13.

B There are ſignes of another ſort, not fixed by Gods Ordinance, but ſignes which particular men, have ſometimes deſired at Gods hand, for a farther manifeſtation of Gods will, in which, it is not, otherwiſe, already fully manifeſted, and revealed. For, to ſeeke ſuch ſignes, in things which are ſufficiently declared by God, or to ſeeke them, with a reſolution, That I will leave a duty undone, except I receive a ſigne, this is to tempt God, and to ſeeke a way to excuſe my ſelfe, for not doing that, which I was bound to doe, by the ſtrength of an old commandement, and ought not to look for a new ſigne. But the greateſt fault in this kinde, is, that if God, of his abundant goodneſſe, doe give me a ſigne, for my clearer directions, and I reſiſt that ſigne, I diſpute againſt that ſigne, I turne it another way, upon nature, upon fortune, upon miſtaking, that ſo I may goe mine owne way, and not be bound, by beleeving that ſigne to be from God, to goe that way, to which God by that ſigne calls me. And this was Achaz caſe; God ſpoke unto him, and ſaid, Aske a ſigne (that he would deliver him, from the ehemy, that beſieged Jeruſalem) and he ſaid, I will not aske a ſigne, nor tempt God; For, though St. Auguſtine, and ſome with him, V. 11.

C aſcribe this refuſall of Achaz, to a religious modeſty, yet St. Hierome, and with him, the greateſt party, juſtly impute this, for a fault to Achaz: both becauſe the ſigne was offered him from God, and not ſought by himſelfe, (which is the caſe that is moſt ſubject to errour) And becauſe the Prophet, who underſtood Gods minde, and the Kings minde to, takes knowledge of it, as of a great fault, In this, thou haſt contemned, and wearyed, not Man but God. For, though there be but a few caſes, in which we may put God to give a ſigne, (for Chriſt calls the Phariſees an evill, and an adulterous generation, therefore, becauſe they ſought a ſigne) yet God gave Moſes a ſigne, of a Rod changed into a Serpent, and a ſigne of good fleſh changed into leprous, and leprous into good, unasked: And after, Abraham askes a ſigne, whereby ſhall I know, that I ſhall inherit the land? and God gave him a ſigne. So Gideon, in a modeſt timorouſneſſe askes a ſigne, and preſſes God to a ſecond ſigne: Firſt, he would have all the dew upon the fleece, and then, none Mat. 12. 39. Exod. 4. Gen. 15. 8. Jud. 6. 36.

D of the dew upon the fleece. God does give ſignes, and when he does ſo, he gives alſo irradiations, illuſtrations of the underſtanding, that they may be diſcerned to be his ſignes; and when they are ſo, it is but a pretended modeſty, to ſay, we will not tempt God to ask a ſign, we will not trouble God to tell us whether this be a ſign or no, but againſt all ſignifications from God, goe on, as though all were but naturall accidents.

God gives ſignes rectè petentibus, to them that aske them upon due grounds, (ſo to Abraham, ſo to Gideon) And it is too long for this time, to put caſes, when a man may or may not put God to a ſigne; He gives ſignes alſo Non petentibus, without being asked, to illuſtrate the caſe, and to confirme the perſon, and ſo he did to Moſes. Both theſe are high expreſſions of his mercy; for what binds God, to begin with man, and give him a ſigne before he aske; or to waite upon man, and give it him, when he askes? But the higheſt of all, is, to perſever in his mercy ſo far, as to give a ſigne, though upon the offer

E thereof, it be refuſed; And that is Achaz caſe: Aske ye, ſays God, And, I will not, ſays Achaz, and then, It is not Quamvis, for all that, though thou refuſe, but it is Propterea, Therefore, becauſe thou refuſeſt, The Lord himſelfe ſhall give thee a ſigne. His fault is carried thus high: Becauſe he had treaſure to pay an army, becauſe he had contracted with the Aſſyrians to aſſiſt him with men, therefore he refuſes the aſſiſtance offerd by the Prophet from God, and would faine goe his owne wayes, and yet would have a religious pretext, He will not tempt God. Nay his fault is carried thus much higher, That which we read, Non tentabo, I will not tempt, is in the Originall, Naſas; and Naſas is non Extollam, non glorificabo, I will not glorifie God ſo much, that is, I will not be beholden to God for this victory, I will not take him into the league for this action, I will do it of my ſelfe:

And yet, (and then, who ſhall doubt of the largeneſſe of Gods mercy?) God proceeds in his purpoſe: Aske a ſigne, will ye not? Therefore the Lord ſhall give you a ſigne: Becauſe you will doe nothing for your ſelfe, the Lord ſhall doe all; which is ſo tranſcendent a mercy, as that, howſoever God afforded it to Achaz here, we can promiſe it to no man hereafter. A

3. Part. We are come to our third part, which is more peculiar to this Day: It is, firſt, what the ſigne is in generall, And then, ſome more particular circumſtances, Behold a Virgin ſhall conceive, &c. In generall then, the ſigne that God gives Achaz and his company, is, That there ſhall bee a Meſſias, a Redeemer given. Now, how is this future thing, (There ſhall be a Meſſias) a ſigne of their preſent deliverance from that ſiege? Firſt, In the notion of the Prophet, it was not a future thing; for, as in Gods owne ſight, ſo in their

Eſay 3.6. ſight, to whom he opens himſelfe, future things are preſent. So this Prophet ſays, Puer datus, filius natus, unto us a child is borne, unto us a Son is given: He was not given, he was B not borne in ſix hundred yeares after that; but ſuch is the cleareneſſe of a Prophets ſight, ſuch is the infallibility of Gods declared purpoſe. So then, if the Prophet could have made the King beleeve, with ſuch an aſſuredneſſe, as if he had ſeene it done, that God would give a deliverance, to all mankinde, by a Meſſias, that had beene ſigne enough, evidence enough to have argued thereupon, That God who had done ſo much a greater worke, would alſo give him a deliverance from that enemy, that preſſed him then: If I can fixe my ſelfe, with the ſtrength of faith, upon that which God hath done for man; I cannot doubt of his mercy, in any diſtreſſe: If I lacke a ſigne, I ſeeke no other but this, That God was made man for me; which the Church and Church-writers, have well expreſſed by the word Incarnation, for that acknowledges, and denotes, that God was made my fleſh: It were not ſo ſtrange, that he who is ſpirit, ſhould be made my ſpirit, my ſoule, but he was made my fleſh: Therefore have the Fathers delighted themſelves, in the C variation of that word; ſo far, as that Hilarie cals it Corporationem, That God aſſumed my Body; And Damaſcen cals it Inhumanationem, That God became this man, ſoule and body; And Irenæus cals it Adunationem, and Nyſen Contemperationem, A mingling, ſays one, an uniting, ſaies the other, of two, of God and man, in one perſon. Shall I aske, what needs all this? what needed God to have put himſelfe to this? I may ſay with S. Auguſtine, Alio modo poterat Deus nos liberare, ſed ſi aliter faceret, ſimiliter veſtræ ſtultitiæ diſpliceret: What other way ſoever God had taken for our ſalvation, our curioſity would no more have beene ſatisfied in that way, than in this: But God having choſen the way of Redemption, which was the way of Juſtice, God could do no otherwiſe: Si homo non viciſſet inimicum hominis, non juſtè victus eſſet inimicus, ſaies Irenæus; As, if a man ſhould get a battaile by the power of the Devill, without fighting, this were not a juſt victory; ſo, if God, in mans behalfe, had conquered the devill, without man, without D dying, it had not beene a juſt conqueſt. I muſt not aske why God tooke this way, to Incarnate his Son; And ſhall I aske how this was done? I doe not aske how Rheubarb, or how Aloes came by this, or this vertue, to purge this, or this humour in my body: In

Auguſt. talibus rebus, tota ratio facti, eſt potentia facientis: Even in naturall things, all the reaſon of all that is done, is the power, and the will of him, who infuſed that vertue into that creature. And therefore much more, when we come to theſe ſupernaturall points, ſuch as this birth of Chriſt, we embrace S. Baſils modeſty, and abſtinence, Nativitas iſta ſilentio honoretur, This myſterie is not ſo well celebrated, with our words, and diſcourſe, as with a holy ſilence, and meditation: Immo potius ne cogitationibus permittatur, Nay, (ſaies that Father) there may be danger in giving our ſelves leave, to thinke or ſtudy too much of it. Ne dixeris quando, ſaies he, præteri hanc interrogationem: Aske not thy ſelfe overcurioufly, when this myſtery was accompliſhed; be not over-vehement, over-peremptory, (ſo far, E as to the perplexing of thine owne reaſon and underſtanding, or ſo far, as to the deſpiſing of the reaſons of other men) in calculating the time, the day or houre of this nativity: Præteri hanc interrogationem, paſſe over this queſtion, in good time, and with convenient ſatisfaction, Quando, when Chriſt was borne; But noli inquirere Quomodo, (ſaies S. Baſil ſtill) never come to that queſtion, how it was done, cum ad hoc nihil ſit quod reſponderi poſſit, for God hath given us no faculties to comprehend it, no way to anſwer it. That's

1 Ioh. 4.2. enough, which we have in S. Iohn, Every ſpirit, that confeſſes, that Ieſus is come in the fleſh, is of God: for, ſince it was a comming of Ieſus, Ieſus was before; ſo he was God; and ſince he came in the fleſh, hee is now made man; And, that God and Man, are ſo met, is a

ſigne

A signe to mee, that God, and I, shall never bee parted.

This is the signe in generall; That God hath had such a care of all men, is a signe to me, That he hath a care of me: But then there are signes of this signe; Divers; All these; A Virgin shall conceive, A Virgin shall bring forth, Bring forth a Son, And (whatsoever have been prophesied before) she shall call his name Immanuel. Virgo.

First, a Virgin shall be a mother, which is a very particular signe, and was seene but once. That which Gellius, and Plinie say, that a Virgin had a child, almost 200. yeares before Christ, that which Genebrard saies, that the like fell out in France, in his time, are not within our faith, and they are without our reason; our faith stoopes not downe to them, and our Reason reaches not up to them; of this Virgin in our text, If that be true, which Aquinas cites out of the Roman story, that in the times of Constantine and Irene, upon a dead body found in a sepulchre, there was found this inscription, in a plate of
B gold, Christus nascetur ex Virgine, & ego credo in eum, Christ shall be borne of a Virgin, and I beleeve in that Christ, with this addition, in that inscription, O Sol, sub Irene, & Constantini temporibus, iterum me videbis, Though I be now buried from the sight of the sun, yet in Constantines time, the sun shall see me againe; If this be true, yet our ground is not upon such testimonie; If God had not said it, I would never have beleeved it. And therefore I must have leave to doubt of that which some of the Roman Casuists have delivered, That a Virgin may continue a virgin upon earth, and receive the particular dignity of a Virgin in Heaven, and yet have a child, by the insinuation and practise of the Devill; so that there shall be a father, and a mother, and yet both they Virgins. That this Mother, in our text, was a Virgin, is a peculiar, a singular signe, given, as such, by God; never done but then; and it is a singular testimony, how acceptable to God, that state of virginity is; Hee does not dishonour physick, that magnifies health; nor does hee dishonour
C marriage, that praises Virginity; let them embrace that state, that can, and certainly, many more might doe it, then do, if they would try whether they could, or no; and if they would follow S. Cyprians way, Virgo non tantum esse, sed & intelligi esse debet, & credi: It is not enough for a virgin to bee a virgin in her owne knowledge, but she must governe her selfe so, as that others may see, that she is one, and see, that shee hath a desire, and a disposition, to continue so still; Ita, ut nemo, cum virginem viderit, dubitet an sit virgo, saies that Father, She must appeare in such garments, in such language, and in such motions, (for, as a wife may weare other clothes, so she may speake other words, then a virgin may do) as they that see her, may not question, nor dispute, whether she be a maid or no. The word in the Text, is derived à latendo, from retiring, from privateneese: And Tertullian, who makes the note, notes withall, that Ipsa concupiscentia non latendi, non est pudica, The very concupiscence of conversation, and visits, is not chaste: Studium placendi, pub-
D licatione sui, periclitatur, saies the same Author: Curious dressings are for publique eyes; and the Virgin that desires to publish her selfe, is weary of that state: It is usefully added by him, Dum percutitur oculis alienis, frons duratur, & pudor teritur, the eyes of others, that strike upon her, (if she be willing to stand out that battery) dry up that blood, that should blush, and weare out that chastity, which should be preserved. So precious is virginity in Gods eye, as that hee lookes upon that, with a more jealous eye, than upon other states.

This blessed Mother of God, in our text, was a Virgin: when? Virgo concipiet, saies our Text, A Virgin shall conceive, when she conceived, she was a Virgin. There are three Heresies; all noted by S. Augustine that impeach the virginity of this most blessed Woman: The Cerinthians said she conceived by ordinary generation; Iovinian said, she was delivered by ordinary meanes; And Helvidius said, she had children after: All against all
E the world besides themselves, and against one another. For the first, that is enough which S. Basil sayes, that if the word Virgin in our text signified no more but adolescentulam, a yong woman (as they pretend) it had been an impertinent, an absurd thing for the Prophet to have made that a sign, and a wonder, that a yong woman should have a childe. This is enough, but that is abundantly enough, that S. Matthew, who spoke with the same spirit that Esay did, sayes in a word, which can admit no mis-interpretation, That that was fulfilled which Esay had said, A Virgin shall conceive; S. Matthews word without question, is a Virgin, and not a yong woman, and S. Matthew took Esaies word to be so too; and S. Matthew (at least he that spake in S. Matthew) did not, could not mistake, and mistake himself, for it was one and the same Holy Ghost that spake both. Concepit. Mat. 1. 23.

Ps. 21. both. Christ sayes therefore of himself, vermis sum, I am a worm, but sayes S. Ambrose, vermis de Manna, a worm out of a pure substance, a holy Man, from a blessed Virgin; Virgo concepit, she was a Virgin then, then when she had conceived. A

In partu. She was so to, In partu, then when she was delivered; Iovinian denied that: A better then he (Tertullian) denied it: Virgo quantum à viro, non quantum à partu, sayes he, she was such a Virgin as knew no man, not such a Virgin as needed no midwife: Virgo concepit, sayes he, in partu nupsit, a Virgin in her conception, but a wife in the deliverance of her Son. Let that be wrapped up amongst Tertullians errors, he had many; The text cleares it, A virgin shall conceive, a virgin shall beare a Son: The Apostles Creed cleares it, sayes S. August: when it sayes, Born of the Virgin Mary; and S. Ambrose cleares it, when hee sayes, with such indignation, De via iniquitatis produntur dicere, virgo cõcepit, sed non virgo generavit, It is said, that there are some men so impious, as to deny that she remained a Virgin at the birth of her Son: S. Ambrose wondred there should be, scarce beleeved it to be any other then a rumour, or a slander, that there could be any so impious, as to deny B

Cramerus. that: And yet there have beene some so impious, as to charge Calvin, with that impiety, with denying her to be a Virgin then; It is true, he makes it not a matter of faith, to defend her perpetuall virginity; but that's not this case, of her Virginity in her Deliverance: And even of that, (of her perpetuall virginity) he saies thus, Nemo unquam quæstionem movebit, nisi curiosus, nemo pertinaciter insistet, nisi contentiosus rixator; He is over-curious, that will make any doubt of it; but no man will persist in the denyall of it, but a contentious wrangler; And in that very point, S. Basil saies fully as much, as Calvin. But, at his birth, and after his birth, there is evidence enough in this text, A Virgin shall conceive, A Virgin shall bring forth, A Virgin shall call him Immanuel, In all those future, and subsequent Acts, still it is the same person, and in the same condition.

Filium. Pariet, & pariet filium, She shall bring forth a Son; If a Son, then of the substance of his C
Mother; that the Anabaptists deny; But had it not beene so, Christ had not beene true Man, and then, man were yet unredeemed. He is her Son, but not her ward; his Father cannot dye: Her Son, but yet he asked her no leave, to stay at Jerusalem, nor to dispute with the Doctors, nor to goe about his Fathers worke: His setling of Religion, his governing the Church, his dispensing of his graces, is not by warrant from her: They that call upon the Bishop of Rome, in that voyce, Impera Regibus, command Kings and Emperors, admit of that voyce, Impera filio, to her, that she should command her Sonne. The naturall obedience of children to Parents, holds not in such civill things, as are publique; A woman may be a Queen-Dowager, and yet a subject; The blessed Virgin Mary

Luk. 1. 28. may be in a high ranke, and yet no Soveraigne; Blessed art thou amongst women, saies the Angell to her; Amongst women, above women; but not above any person of the Trinity, that she should command her Son. Luther was awake, and risen, but he was not ready; Hee had seene light, and looked toward it, but yet saw not so clearely by it, then, D when he said, That the blessed Virgin was of a middle condition, betweene Christ, and man; that man hath his conception, and his quickning (by the infusion of the soule) in originall sin; that Christ had it in neither, no sin in his conception, none in his inanimation, in the infusion of his soule; But, saies Luther, howsoever it were at the conception, certainly at the inanimation, at the quickning, she was preserved from originall sin. Now, what needs this? may I not say, that I had rather be redeemed by Christ Jesus then bee innocent? rather be beholden to Christs death, for my salvation, then to Adams standing in his innocencie. Epiphanius said enough, Par detrimentum afferunt religioni, they hurt Religion as much, that ascribe too little, to the blessed Virgin, as they who ascribe too much; much is due to her, and this amongst the rest, That she had so cleare notions, above all others, what kind of person, her Son was, that as Adam gave names, according to E natures, so the Prophet here leaves it to her, to name her Son, according to his office, She shall call his name Immanuel.

Immanuel. Wee told you at first, that both Ioseph and Mary, were told by the Angel, that his name was to be Jesus, and we told you also, that others, besides him, had beene called by that name of Jesus: but, as, though others were called Jesus, (for Iosuah is called so, Heb. 4. 8. If Iesus had given them rest; that is, If Iosuah had &c. And the son of Iosedech is called so, throughout the Prophet Aggai) yet there is observed a difference in the pointing, and sounding of those names, from this our Jesus: so though other women were called Mary, as well as the blessed Virgin, yet the Evangelists, evermore make a difference, betweene her

A her name, and the other Maries; for Her they call Mariam, and the reſt Maria. Now this Jeſus, in this perſon, is a reall, an actuall Saviour, he that hath already really, and actually accompliſhed our ſalvation; But the bleſſed Virgin had a clearer illuſtration, then all that; for ſhe onely knew, or ſhe knew beſt, the capacity, in which he could be a Saviour, that is, as he is Immanuel, God with us; for ſhe, and ſhe onely knew, that he was the Sonne of God, and not of naturall generation by man. How much is enwrapped in this name Immanuel, and how little time to unfold it? I am afraid none at all; A minute will ſerve to repeate that which S. Bernard ſaies, and a day, a life will not ſerve to comprehend it; (for to comprehend is not to know a thing, as far as I can know it, but to know it as far, as that thing can be knowne; and ſo onely God, can comprehend God.) Immanuel eſt verbum infans, ſaies the Father; He is the ancient of daies, and yet in minority; he is the Word it ſelfe, and yet ſpeechleſſe; he that is All, that all the Prophets ſpoke of, cannot
B ſpeake: He addes more, He is Puer ſapiens, but a child, and yet wiſer then the elders, wiſer in the Cradle, then they in the Chaire: Hee is more, Deus lactens, God, at whoſe breaſts all creatures ſuck, ſucking at his Mothers breaſt, and ſuch a Mother, as is a maid. Immanuel is God with us; it is not we with God: God ſeeks us, comes to us, before wee to him: And it is God with us, in that notion, in that termination, El, which is Deus fortis, The powerfull God; not onely in infirmity, as when hee died in our nature, but as he is Deus fortis, able and ready to aſſiſt, and deliver us, in all encumbrances; ſo he is with us; And with us, uſque ad conſummationem, till the end of the world, in his Word, and in the Sacraments: for, though I may not ſay, as ſome have ſaid, That by the word of Conſecration, in the adminiſtration of the Sacrament, Chriſt is ſo infallibly produced, as that, if Chriſt had never been incarnate before, yet, at the pronouncing of thoſe words of conſecration, he muſt neceſſarily be incarnate then, yet I may ſay, that God is as effectually
C preſent, with every worthy receiver, as that hee is not more effectually preſent with the Saints in Heaven. Cornelius.

And this is that, which is intimated in that word, which we ſepoſed at firſt, for the laſt of all, Ecce, Behold; Behold, a Virgin ſhall conceive &c. God does not furniſh a roome, and leave it darke; he ſets up lights in it; his firſt care was, that his benefits ſhould be ſeene; he made light firſt, and then creatures, to be ſeene by that light: He ſheds himſelfe from my mouth, upon the whole auditory here; he powres himſelfe from my hand, to all the Communicants at the table; I can ſay to you all here, The grace of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt be with you, and remaine with you all; I can ſay to them all there, The Body of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt which was given for you, preſerve you to everlaſting life: I can bring it ſo neare; but onely the worthy hearer, and the worthy receiver, can call this Lord, this Jeſus, this
D Chriſt, Immanuel, God with us; onely that Virgin ſoule, devirginated in the blood of Adam, but reſtored in the blood of the Lambe, hath this Ecce, this teſtimony, this aſſurance, that God is with him; they that have this Ecce, this teſtimony, in a rectified conſcience, are Godfathers to this child Jeſus, and may call him Immanuel, God with us; for, as no man can deceive God, ſo God can deceive no man; God cannot live in the darke himſelfe, neither can he leave thoſe, who are his, in the darke: If he be with thee, he will make thee ſee, that he is with thee; and never goe out of thy ſight, till he have brought thee, where thou canſt never goe out of his. Ecce.

GALAT. 4. 4. & 5.

But when the fulneſſe of time was come, God ſent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the Law, to redeem them that were under the Law, that we might receive the adoption of Sonnes.

B

Eſay 53. 8. WEE are met here to celebrate the generation of Chriſt Jeſus; but Generationem ejus quis enarrabit, ſayes the Prophet, who ſhall declare his generation, his age? For, for his eſſentiall generation, by which he is the Son of God, the Angels, who are almoſt 6000. yeares elder then we, are no nearer to that generation of his, then if they had been made but yeſterday: Eternity hath no ſuch diſtinctions, no limits, no periods, no ſeaſons, no moneths, no yeares, no dayes; Methuſalem, who was ſo long lived, was no elder in reſpect of eternity, then Davids ſon by Berſeba, that dyed the firſt week. The firſt Fiat in the Creation of Adam, and the laſt note of the blowing of the Trumpets to judgement, (though there be between theſe (as it is ordinarily received) 2000. yeares of nature, between the Creation, and the giving of the Law by Moſes, and 2000. yeares of the Law between that, and the comming of Chriſt, and 2000. yeares of Grace and Goſpell between Chriſt firſt, and his ſecond comming) yet this Creation and this Judgement are not a minute aſunder in reſpect of eternity, which hath no minutes. Whence then ariſes all our vexation and labour, all our anxieties and anguiſhes, all our ſuits and pleadings, for long leaſes, for many lives, for many yeares purchaſe in this world, when, if we be in our way to the eternall King of the eternall kingdome, Chriſt Jeſus, all we are not yet, all the world ſhall never be a minute old; Generationem ejus quis enarrabit, what tongue can declare, what heart can conceive his generation which was ſo long before any heart or tongue was made? But we come not now to conſider that eternall generation, not Chriſt meerly as the Son of God, but the Son of Mary too: And that generation the Holy Ghoſt hath told us, was in the fulneſſe of time: When the fulneſſe of time was come, God ſent forth, &c.

Diviſio. In which words, we have theſe three conſiderations; Firſt, the time of Chriſts comming, and that was the fulneſſe of time; And then, the maner of his comming, which is expreſſed in two degrees of humiliation, one, that he was made of a woman, the other, that he was made under the Law; And then, the third part is the purpoſe of his comming, which alſo was twofold; for firſt, he came to redeem them who were under the Law, All; And ſecondly he came, that we (we the elect of God in him) might receive adoption; When the fulneſſe of time was come, &c.

1 Part. For the full conſideration of this fulneſſe of time, we ſhall firſt conſider this fulneſſe in reſpect of the Jews, and then in reſpect of all Nations, and laſtly in reſpect of our ſelves: The Jews might have ſeen the fulneſſe of time, the Gentiles did (in ſome meaſure) ſee it, and we muſt (if we will have any benefit by it) ſee it too. It is an obſervation of S. Cyril, That none of the Saints of God, nor ſuch as were noted to be exemplarily religious, and ſanctified men did ever celebrate with any feſtivall ſolemnity, their own birth-day.

Gen. 40. 22. Pharaoh celebrated his own Nativity, but who would make Pharaoh his example? and beſides, he polluted that feſtivall with the bloud of one of his ſervants. Herod celebrated his Nativity, but who would think it an honor to be like Herod? and beſides, he polluted that feſtivall with the blood of John Baptiſt. But the juſt contemplation of the miſeries and calamities of this life, into which our birth-day is the doore, and the entrance, is ſo far from giving any juſt occaſion of a feſtivall, as it hath often tranſported the beſt diſpoſed Saints and ſervants of God to a diſtemper, to a malediction, and curſing of their

Jer. 20. birth-day. Curſed be the day wherein I was born, and let not that day wherein my mother bare

me

A me be bleſſed. Let the day periſh wherein I was born, let that day be darkneſſe, and let not God regard it from above. How much miſery is preſaged to us, when we come ſo generally weeping into the world, that, perchance, in the whole body of hiſtory we reade but of one childe, Zoroaſter, that laughed at his birth: What miſerable revolutions and changes, what downfals, what break-necks, and precipitations may we juſtly think our ſelves ordained to, if we conſider, that in our comming into this world out of our mothers womb, we doe not make account that a childe comes right, except it come with the head forward, and thereby prefigure that headlong falling into calamities which it muſt ſuffer after? Though therefore the dayes of the Martyrs, which are for our example celebrated in the Chriſtian Church, be ordinarily called natalitia Martyrum, the birth-day of the Martyrs, yet that is not intended of their birth in this world, but of their birth in the next; when, by death their ſoules were new delivered of their priſons here, and they B newly born into the kingdome of heaven; that day, upon that reaſon, the day of their death was called their birth-day, and celebrated in the Church by that name. Onely to Chriſt Jeſus, the fulneſſe of time was at his birth; not becauſe he alſo had not a painfull life to paſſe through, but becauſe the work of our redemption was an intire work, and all that Chriſt ſaid, or did, or ſuffered, concurred to our ſalvation, as well his mothers ſwathing him in little clouts, as Ioſephs ſhrowding him in a funerall ſheete; as well his cold lying in the Manger, as his cold dying upon the Croſſe; as well the puer natus, as the conſummatum eſt; as well his birth, as his death is ſaid to have been the fulneſſe of time.

Job 3.

First we conſider it to have been ſo to the Jews; for this was that fulneſſe, in which Indeis. all the prophecies concerning the Meſſias, were exactly fulfilled; That he muſt come Dan. 2. whileſt the Monarchy of Rome flouriſhed; And before the Temple of Jeruſalem was Hagg. 2. deſtroyed; That he muſt be born in Bethlem; That he muſt be born of a Virgin; His Mich. 5. C perſon, his actions, his paſſion ſo diſtinctly propheeyed, ſo exactly accompliſhed, as no Eſay 7. word being left unfulfilled, this muſt neceſſarily be a fulneſſe of time. So fully was the time of the Meſſias comming, come, that though ſome of the Jews ſay now, that there is no certain time revealed in the Scriptures when the Meſſias ſhall come, and others of them ſay, that there was a time determined, and revealed, and that this time was the time, but by reaſon of their great ſins he did not come at his time, yet when they examine their own ſupputations, they are ſo convinced with that evidence, that this was that fulneſſe of time, that now they expreſſe a kinde of conditionall acknowledgement of it, by this barbarous and inhumane cuſtome of theirs, that they alwayes keep in readineſſe the blood of ſome Chriſtian, with which they anoint the body of any that dyes amongſt them, with theſe words, if Jeſus Chriſt were the Meſſias, then may the blood of this Chriſtian availe thee to ſalvation: So that by their doubt, and their implyed conſent, in this action, this was the fulneſſe of time, when Chriſt Jeſus did come, that the Meſ- D ſias ſhould come.

It was ſo to the Jews, and it was ſo to the Gentiles too; It filled thoſe wiſe men which Gentibus. dwelt ſo far in the Eaſt, that they followed the ſtar from thence to Jeruſalem. Herod was ſo full of it, that he filled the Countrey with ſtreames of innocent bloud, and leſt he ſhould ſpare that one innocent childe, killed all. The two Emperours of Rome, Veſpaſian and Domitian were ſo full of it, that in jealouſie of a Meſſias to come then, from that race, they took ſpeciall care for the deſtruction of all, of the poſterity of David. All the whole people were ſo full of it, that divers falſe-Meſſiahs, Barcocab, and Moſes of Crete, and others roſe up, and drew, and deceived the people, as if they had been the Meſſiah, becauſe that was ordinarily knowne, and received to be the time of his comming. And the Devill himſelf was ſo full of it, as that in his Oracles he gave that an- E ſwer, That an Hebrew childe ſhould be God over all gods, and brought the Emperour to erect an Altar, to this Meſſiah Chriſt Jeſus, though he knew not what he did. This was the fulneſſe that filled Jew and Gentile, Kings and Philoſophers, ſtrangers and inhabitants, counterfaits and devils to the expectation of a Meſſiah; and when comes this fulneſſe of time to us, that we feele this Meſſiah born in our ſelves?

In this fulneſſe, in this comming of our Saviour into us, we ſhould finde a threefold Nobis. fullneſſe in our ſelves; we ſhould finde a fulneſſe of nature (becauſe not only of ſpirituall, but of naturall and temporall things, all the right which we have in this world, is in, and for, and by Chriſt, for ſo we end all our prayers of all ſorts, with that clauſe, per Dominum noſtrum Ieſum Chriſtum, Grant this O Lord, for our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Ieſus ſus ſake.) And we ſhould finde a fulneſſe of grace, a daily ſenſe of improvement, growth in grace, a filling of all former vacuities, a ſupplying of all emptineſſes in our ſoules, till we came to Stephens fulneſſe, Full of the holy Ghoſt and wiſdome, and full of the holy Ghoſt and Faith, and full of faith and power: And ſo we ſhould come to finde a fulneſſe of glory, that is an apprehenſion and inchoation of heaven in this life; for the glory of the next world, is not in the meaſure of that glory, but in the meaſure of my capacity; it is not that I ſhall have as much as any ſoule hath, but that I ſhall have as much as my ſoul can receive; it is not in an equality with the reſt, but in a fulneſſe in my ſelf; And ſo, as I ſhall have a fulneſſe of nature, that is, ſuch an ability and ſuch a uſe of naturall faculties, and ſuch a portion of the naturall things of this world as ſhall ſerve to fill up Gods purpoſe in me: And as I ſhall have a fulneſſe of grace, that is, ſuch a meaſure of grace as ſhall make me diſcern a tentation, and reſiſt a tentation, or at leaſt repent it, if I have not effectually reſiſted it, ſo even here, I ſhall have a fulneſſe of glory, that is, as much of that glory as a way-faring ſoul is capable of in this world; All theſe fulneſſes I ſhall have, if I can finde and feele in my ſelfe this birth of Chriſt. His eternall birth in heaven is unexpreſſible, where he was born without a mother; His birth on earth is unexpreſſible too, where he was born without a father; but thou ſhalt feele the joy of his third birth in thy ſoul, moſt inexpreſſible this day, where he is born this day (if thou wilt) without father or mother; that is, without any former, or any other reaſon then his own meere goodneſſe that ſhould beget that love in him towards thee, and without any matter or merit in thee which ſhould enable thee to conceive him. He had a heavenly birth, by which he was the eternall Son of God, and without that he had not been a perſon able to redeem thee; He had a humane birth, by which he was the Son of Mary, and without that he had not been ſenſible in himſelf of thine infirmities, and neceſſities; but, this day (if thou wilt) he hath a ſpirituall birth in thy ſoul, without which, both his divine, and his humane birth are utterly unprofitable to thee, and thou art no better then if there had never been Son of God in heaven, nor Son of Mary upon earth. Even the Stork in the aire knoweth her appointed time, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow obſerve the time of their comming, but my people knoweth not the judgements of the Lord. For, if you doe know your time, you know that now is your fulneſſe of time; This is your particular Chriſtmas-day; when, if you be but as carefull to cleanſe your ſoules, as you are your houſes, if you will but follow that counſell of S. Auguſtine, Quicquid non vis inveniri in domo tua, non inveniat Deus in anima tua, That uncleanneſſe which you would be loth your neighbour ſhould finde in your houſes, let not God nor his Angels finde in your ſoules, Chriſt Jeſus is certainly born, and will as certainly grow up in your ſoules.

Acts 6.3. ver. 5. & 8.

Jer. 8.

2 Part.

We paſſe from this, to our ſecond part, The manner of his comming; where we propoſed two degrees of Chriſts humiliation, That he was made of a woman, and made under the Law. In the firſt alone, are two degrees too, that he takes the name of the Son of a woman, and wanes the glorious name of the Son of God; And then, that he takes the name of the ſon of a woman, and wanes the miraculous name of the ſon of a Virgin. For the firſt; Chriſt ever refers himſelf to his Father; As he ſayes, The Father which ſent me, gave me a commandement what I ſhould ſay, and what I ſhould ſpeak, ſo, for all that which he did or ſuffered, he ſayes, My meate is to doe his will that ſent me, and to finiſh his work: And ſo, though he ſay, I am come out from the Father, and am come into the world; yet, be where he will, ſtill, Ego & pater unum ſumus, He and his Father were all one. But deveſting that glory, or ſlumbring it in his fleſh, till the Father glorifie him againe with that glory, which he had with him from the beginning, in his Aſcenſion, he humbles himſelfe here to that addition, The Son of a woman, made of a woman.

Joh. 16.

Non Virginis.

Chriſt waned the glorious Name of Son of God, and the miraculous Name of Son of a Virgin to; which is not omitted to draw into doubt, the perpetuall Virginity of the Bleſſed Virgin, the Mother of Chriſt; ſhe is not called a woman, as though ſhe were not a Maid; when it is ſaid, Joſeph knew her not, donec peperit, till ſhe brought forth her Son, this did not imply his knowledge of her after, no more, then when God ſayes to Chriſt, donec ponam, ſit at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footſtoole, that imports, that Chriſt ſhould remove from his right hand after: For, here is a perpetuall donec in both places; for evermore the ancient Expoſitors have underſtood that place of Ezekiel, to be intended of the perpetuall Virginitie of Mary, This gate ſhall be ſhut, and ſhall not be opened, and no man ſhall enter by it. Solomon hath an exclamation, Is there any

A thing whereof a man may say, Behold this is new? and he answers himselfe immediately before, There is no new thing under the Sun. But behold here is a greater then Solomon, and he sayes now in action, by being borne of a Virgin, as he had said, long before, in Propheſie, The Lord hath created a new thing upon earth, a woman ſhall compaſſe a man. If this had been ſpoken of ſuch a woman, as were no Maid, this had been no new thing: As it was, it was without example, and without naturall reaſon; ſi ratio reddi poſſet, (ſayes St. Bernard) non eſſet mirabile, ſi exempla haberemus, non eſſet ſingulare; If there were reaſon for it, it were no miracle, if there were precedents for it, it were not ſingular; and God intended both, that it ſhould be a miracle, and that it ſhould be done but once; we ſee in Nature, trees do bud out, and there is an emiſſion, and emanation of flowers, and fruits, without any help of man, or any act done by him, to that tree; we reade in Geneſis, That the earth had produced all plants and herbs, before eyther any raine fell upon it, or
B any man tilled it. And theſe are good helps, and illuſtrations to us, after we have beleeved that a Virgin brought forth a Son; but nothing deduced out of nature, could prove this at firſt, to any man, except he beleeved it before. And therefore bleſſed be God, that hath given us that ſtrength, which the Egyptian Mid-wives ſaid the women of Iſrael had, that they brought forth children, without the help of Mid-wives: That we can humbly beleeve theſe myſteries of our religion, by faith, without the hand, and help of Reaſon; Si nondum mens idonea, abſtruſa inveſtigare, ſine heſitatione credantur, ſayes St. Auguſtine, In things which are not ſubject to any faculty of ours, to be diſcerned by reaſon, there is a preſent exerciſe of our faith. As we know it to be true, that the buſh, in which God ſpake to Moſes, was full of fire, and did burne, but not conſume, becauſe God hath ſaid ſo, in his booke, but yet we doe not know, how that was done: ſo we know, (by the ſame evidence) that the Mother of our Saviour, was a Virgin; but for the manner of this
C Myſtery, we reſt upon Epiphanius Rule, Quæcunque dicit Deus, credamus quòd ſint; quomodo, Soli Deo cognitum: whatſoever God, in his word, ſayes, was done, let us beleeve it to be done; how it was done, as we know that God knowes, ſo we are content not to inquire more then it hath been his pleaſure to communicate to us.

She was then, and ſhe was alwaies a Virgin; but becauſe this Text is of his Humiliation, he leaves that Name that proceeds from miracle, and deſcends to that lower name of nature, Made of a woman. The Spirit of God fore-ſaw, that the iſſue betweene the Church, and the Heretiques would not be Virgin or no Virgin, but whether Chriſt were made of a woman. Some Heretiques did queſtion the firſt; The Helvidians denied her perpetuall Virginitie: But that Hereſie, and ſome others that oppoſed her Virginitie, vaniſhed in a ſhort time. But the Manichees, that laſted long, and ſpred farre in the old times, and the Anabaptiſts, which abound yet, deny that Chriſt was made of a woman; They
D ſay, that Chriſt paſſed through her, as water through a Pipe, but tooke nothing of her ſubſtance; and then, if he took not the nature of mankinde, he hath not redeemed mankinde. And therefore in that Propheſie of Ieremy, that Chriſt ſhould be borne, and in this Goſpel, in our Text, that Chriſt was borne, the Holy Ghoſt maintaines and continues that phraſe, Made of a woman: And where he begins to expreſſe his Divinitie in miracles, at the marriage in Cana, there Chriſt himſelfe calls her, by no other name, Woman, what have I to doe with thee? And when he had drawne all his miracles to a glorious conſummatum eſt, upon the Croſſe, he cals her there, by that name too, Woman, behold thy Son. Here then was no ſuch curious inſiſting upon Styles and Titles, and names of Dignities, no unkindneſſe, no diſpleaſure taken; if one ſhould leave out a Right Honourable, or Right Worſhipfull, or an addition of an Office or Dignity; The powerfulneſſe of Chriſts birth, conſiſts in this, That he is made of God; The miraculouſneſſe of Chriſts birth,
E conſiſted in this, that he was made of a Virgin, and yet the Prophet and the Apoſtle, two principall Secretaries of the Holy Ghoſt, preſent him with this addition, made of a woman. Chriſt had one priviledge in his birth, which never any Prince had, or ſhall have, that is, that he choſe what Mother he would have, and might have been borne of what woman he would have choſen. And in this large and univerſall choyce, though he choſe a woman full of grace to be his Mother, yet that he might give ſpirituall comfort to all ſorts of women, firſt to thoſe, who ſhould be unjuſtly ſuſpected, and inſimulated of ſin and incontinency, when indeed they were innocent, hee was content to come of a Mother, who ſhould be ſubject to that ſuſpicion, and whom her husband ſhould think to be with child, before he married her, and thereupon purpoſe to put her away; And then, to fill thoſe women, who had been guilty of that ſinne, with reliefe in their conſciences againſt the wrath of God, and with reparation of their reputation and good name in the world, it was his unſearchable will and pleaſure, that in all that Genealogie, and pedigree which he, and his ſpirit hath inſpired the Euangeliſts to record of his Anceſtors, there is not one woman named, of whom Chriſt is deſcended, who is not dangerouſly noted in the Scriptures, to have had ſome aſperſion of incontinence upon her; as both St. Hierome, and St. Ambroſe, and St. Chryſoſtome obſerves, of Thamar, of Berſeba, and of Ruth alſo.

So then, Chriſt Jeſus who came onely for the reliefe of ſinners, is content to be known to have come, not onely of poore parents, but of a ſinfull race; and though he exempted his Bleſſed Mother, more then any, from ſin, yet he is now content to be born again of ſinful Mothers: In that ſoul, that accuſes it ſelf moſt of ſin; In that ſoul, that cals now to mind, (with remorce, and not withdelight) the ſeverall times, and places, and waies, wherein ſhe hath offended God; In that ſoul that acknowledgeth it ſelf to have bin a ſink of uncleanneſſe, a Tabernacle, a Synagogue of Satan; In that ſoul, that hath been as it were poſſeſſed with Mary Magdalens ſeven Devils, yea with him, whoſe name was Legion, with all Devils; In that ſinful ſoul would Chriſt Jeſus fain be born, this day, and make that ſoul, his Mother, that he might be a regeneration to that ſoul. We cannot afford Chriſt, ſuch a birth in us, as he had, to be born of a Virgin; for every one of us wel-nigh hath married himſelf to ſome particular ſin, ſome beloved ſin, that he can hardly divorce himſelfe from; nay, no man keepes his faith, to that one ſin, that he hath marryed himſelfe to, but mingles himſelfe with other ſins alſo. Though Covetouſneſſe, whom he loves, as the wife of his boſome, have made him rich, yet he will commit adultery with another ſin, with Ambition; and he will part, even with thoſe riches, for Honour: Though Ambition be his wife, his marryed ſin, yet he will commit adultery with another ſin, with Licentiouſneſſe, and he will endanger his Honour, to fulfill his Luſt; Ambition may be his wife, but Luſt is his Concubine. We abandon all ſpirituall chaſtity, all virginitie, we marry our particular ſinnes, and then we divide our loves with other ſins too: Thou haſt multiplyed thy fornications, and yet art not ſatisfied, is a complaint, that reaches us all, in ſpirituall fornications, and goes very farre, in carnall. And yet, for all this, we are capable of this Conception, Chriſt may be borne in us, for all this: As God ſaid unto the Prophet, Take thee a wife of fornications, and children of fornications; ſo is Chriſt Jeſus content to take our ſoules, though too often mothers of fornications: As long as we are united, and incorporated in his beloved Spouſe, the Church, conforme our ſelves to her, grow up in her, hearken to his word in her, feed upon his Sacraments in her, acknowledge a ſeale of reconciliation, by the abſolution of the Miniſter in her, ſo long, (how unclean ſoever we have bin, if wee abhorre and forſake our uncleanneſſe now) wee participate of the chaſtity of that Spouſe of his, the Church, and in her, are made capable of this conception of Chriſt Jeſus, and ſo, it is as true this houre of us, as it was when the Apoſtle ſpoke theſe words, This is the fulneſſe of time, when God ſent his Son, &c.

Ezech. 16.

Sub lege.

Now you remember, that in this ſecond part, (the manner of Chriſts comming) we propoſed two degrees of humiliation; One which we have handled, in a double reſpect, as he is made, filius mulieris, non Dei, the ſon of a woman, and not the Son of God; the other, as he is filius mulieris, non Virginis, The ſon of a woman, and not called the ſon of a Virgin.

The ſecond remaines, that he was ſub lege, under the law; now, this phraſe, to be under the law, is not alwayes ſo narrowly limited in the Scriptures, as to ſignifie onely the law of Moſes; for, ſo, onely the Jews were under the law, and ſo, Chriſts comming for them, who were under the law, his Death, and Merits ſhould belong onely to the Jews. But St. Auguſtine obſerves, that when Chriſt ſent the meſſage of his birth, to the wiſe men, in the Eaſt, by a ſtarre, and to the ſhepheards, about Bethlem, by an Angel, In paſtoribus, Iudæi; in magis, Gentes vocatæ; The Jews had their calling in that manifeſtation to the ſhepheards, and the Gentiles in that, to the wiſe men in the Eaſt. But beſides that Chriſt did ſubmit himſelfe, to all the waight even of the Ceremoniall law of Moſes, he was under a heavyer law, then that, under that lex decreti, the contract and covenant with God the Father, under that oportuit pati, This he ought to ſuffer, before he could enter into glory. So that his being under the law, may be accounted not a part of his Humiliation, as his being made of a woman was, but rather the whole hiſtory, and frame of his humiliation, All that concernes his obedience, even to that law, which the Father had laid upon him; for, the life and death of Christ, from the Ave Maria, to the consummatum est, from his comming into this World, in his Conception, to his transmigration upon the Crosse, was all under this law, heavier then any law, that any man is under, the law of the contract, and covenant between the Father, and him.

Though therefore we may think, judging by the law of reason, that since Christ came to gather a Church, and to draw the world to him, it would more have advanced that purpose of his, to have been borne at Rome, where the seat of the Empire, and the confluence of all Nations, was, then in Iury, and (if he would offer the Gospel first to the Jews) better to have been borne at Ierusalem, where all the outward, publique, solemne worship of the Jews was, then at obscure Bethlem, and in Bethlem, in some better place then in an Inne, in a Stable, in a Manger; though we may think thus, in the law of reason, yet, non cogitationes meæ cogitationes vestræ, sayes God in the Prophet, My thoughts are not your thoughts, nor my lawes your lawes, for I am sub lege decreti, under another manner of law, then falls within your reading, under an obedience to that covenant, which hath passed betweene my Father, and me, and by those Degrees, and no other way, was my humiliation, for your Redemption, to be expressed. Though we may thinke in the law of Reason, that his work of propagating the Gospel, would have gone better forward, if he had taken for his Apostles, some Tullies, or Hortensii, or Senecaes, great, and perswading Orators, in stead of his Peter, and Iohn, and Matthew, and those Fishermen, and tent-makers, and toll-gatherers; Though we might think in reason, and in piety too, that when he would humble himselfe to take our salvation into his care, it had beene enough, to have beene under the law of Moses, to live innocently, and righteously, without shedding of his bloud; If he would shed bloud, it might have beene enough to have done so in the Circumcision, and scourging, without dying; If he would die, it might have been enough to have dyed some lesse accursed, and lesse ignominious death, then the death of the Crosse; though we might reasonably enough, and piously enough, think thus, yet, non cogitationes vestræ, cogitationes meæ, sayes the Lord, your way is not my way, your law is not my law; for, Christ was sub lege decreti, and thus, as he did, and no other way, it became him to fulfill all righteousnesse, that is, all that Decree of God, which he had accepted, and acknowledged as Righteous. He was so much under Moses law, as he would be: so much under that law, as that he suffered that law, to be wrested against him, and to bee pretended to be broken by him, and to be endited, and condemned by that law. The Jews pressed that law, non sines venefici vivere, Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live, when they attributed all his glorious miracles, to the power of the devil: and the Romans were incensed against him, for treason, and sedition, as though he alienated and withdrew the people from Cæsar. But he was under a heavyer law, then Jews or Romanes, the Law of his Father, and his owne eternall Decree, so farre, as that he came to that sense of the waight thereof, Eli, Eli, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? and was never delivered from the burden of this law, till he pleaded the performance of all conditions between his Father, and him, and delivered up all the evidence thereof, in those words, In manus tuas, Into thy hands, O Lord I give my spirit, and so presented both the righteousnesse of his soule, which had fulfilled the law, and the soule it selfe, which was under the law. He dyed in Execution, and so discharged all; And so we have done with our second part, The manner of his comming.

3. Part.

We are come now, in our Order, to our third part, The purpose of Christs comming; and in that we consider two objects, that Christ had, and two subjects to work upon, two kindes of work, and two kindes of persons; First, to Redeeme, and then to Adopt; Those are his works, his objects; And then, To redeeme those that were under the law, that is, all, but to Adopt those whom he had chosen, us; And those are the persons, the subjects, that he works upon, by his comming.

Sub lege.

First then, (to begin with the persons) those of the first kinde, those that were under the Law: for them, (as we told you before) the law must not be so narrowly restrained here, as to be intended onely of Moses Law, for Christs purpose was not onely upon the Jews; for else, Naaman the Syrian, by whom God fought great battailes, before he was cured of his leprosie, and who, when he was cured, was so zealous of the worship of the true God, that he would needs carry holy earth, to make Altars of, from the place, where the Prophet dwelt: And else, Iob, who though he were of the land of Hus, hath good testimony of being an upright and just man, and one that feared God; And else, the

1. Reg. 17. Widow of Sarepta, whose meale, and oyle God preserved unwasted, and whose dead sonne, God raised againe, at the prayer of Eliah; All these, and all others, whom the searching Spirit of God, seales to his service, in all the corners of the earth, because they are strangers in the land of Israel, should not be under the Law, and so should have no profit by Christs being made under the Law, if the Law should be understood, onely of the Law of Moses. And therefore to be under the Law, signifies here, thus much, To be a debter to the law of nature, to have a testimony in our hearts and consciences, that there lyes a law upon us, which we have no power in our selves to performe; that to those lawes, To love God with all our powers, and to love our neighbour as our selves, and to doe, as we would be done to, we finde our selves naturally bound, and yet wee finde our selves naturally unable to performe them, and so to need the assistance of another, which must be Christ Jesus, to performe them for us; And so, all men, Jews and Gentiles are under the Law, because naturally they feele a law upon them, which they breake. And therefore whersoever our power becomes defective, in the performance of this law, if our will be not defective too, if we come not to say, God hath given us an impossible Law, and therefore it is lost labour, to goe about to performe it, or God hath given us another to performe this Law for us, and therefore nothing is required at our hands; If we abstaine from these quarrels to the law, and these murmurings at our owne infirmity, wee shall finde, that the fulnesse of time is this day come, this day Christ is come to all that are under the Law, that is, to all mankinde; to all, because all are unable to performe that Law, which they all see, by the light of nature to lye upon them.

Redemit. These then be the persons of the first kinde, All, all the world; Dilexit mundum, God so loved the world, that he gave his Son for it, for all the world; And, accordingly, venit salvare mundum, the obedience of the Son, was as large as the love of the Father, Hee came to save all the world, and he did save all the world; God would have all men, and Christ did save all men. It is therefore fearefully (and scarce allowably said) that Christ did contrary to his Fathers will, when he called those to grace, of whom he knew his Fathers pleasure to bee, that they should have no grace; It is fearefully and dangerously said, Absurdum non esse, Deum interdum falsa loqui, & falsum loquenti credendum, that it is not absurd to say, (that is, that it may truly be said) that God does sometimes speake untruly, and that we are bound to beleeve God, when he does so: for, if we consider the soveraigne balme of our soules, the blood of Christ Jesus, there is enough for all the world, if we consider the application of this physick, by the Ministers of Christ Jesus in the Church, hee hath given us that spreading Commission, To goe and preach to every creature, we are bid to offer, to apply, to minister this to all the world: Christ hath excommunicated no Nation, no shire, no house, no man: Hee gives none of his Ministers leave to say to any man, thou art not Redeemed, he gives no wounded nor afflicted conscience leave, to say to it selfe, I am not Redeemed. There may be meat enough brought into the house, for all the house, though some be so weake, as they cannot, (which is the case of the Gentiles) some so stubborne, as they will not eate, (which is the case of the carnall man, though in the Christian Church.)

He came to all, There are the persons, and to Redeeme all, there is his errand; but how to Redeeme? S. Hierome saies, Gentes non Redimuntur, sed emuntur: The Gentiles, saies hee, are not properly Christs, by way of Redeeming, but by an absolute purchase: To which purpose those words are also applied, which the Apostle saies to the Corinthi-
1 Cor. 6. 20. ans, Ye are bought with a price, S. Hieroms meaning therein, is, that if we compare the Jews and the Gentiles, though God permitted the Jews, in punishment of their rebellions, to bee captivated by the devill in Idolatries, yet the Jews were but as in a mortgage, for they had beene Gods peculiar people before; But the Gentiles were as the devils inheritance, for God had never claimed them, nor owned them for his; and there-
Ps. 2. 8. fore God sayes to Christ, Postula à me, Aske of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance; as though they were not his yet, or not his by that title, as the Jews were. So that, in S. Hieromes construction, the Jewes, which were Gods people before, were properly Redeemed, the Gentiles, to whom God made no title before, are rather bought, then redeemed. But, Nullum tempus occurrit Regi, against the King of Kings there runnes no prescription; no man can devest his Allegeance to his Prince, and say he will be subject no longer; And therefore, since the Gentiles, were his by his first title of Creation,

(for,

A (for, it is he that hath made us, and not we our ſelves, nor the devill neither) when all we, by our generall revolt, and prevarication, (as we were all collectively in Adams loynes) came to be under that law, morte morieris, Thou ſhalt dye the death, when Chriſt came in the fulneſſe of time, and delivered us from the ſharpeſt, and heavieſt clauſe of that Law, which is the ſecond death, then he Redeemed us properly, becauſe, (though not by the ſame title of Covenant, as the Jews were) yet we were his, and ſold over to his enemy. Theſe then were the perſons, All, (none can ſay that he did not need him, none can ſay, that he may not have him) And this was his firſt worke, to Redeeme, to vindicate them from the uſurper, to deliver them from the intruder, to emancipate them from the tyran, to cancell the covenant betweene hell, and them, and reſtore them ſo far to their liberty, as that they might come to their firſt Maſter, if they would; this was Redeeming.

Adoptio.

B But in his other worke, which is Adoption, and where the perſons were more particular, not all, but wee, Chriſt hath taken us to him, in a ſtraiter and more peculiar title, then Redeeming. For, A ſervando Servi, men who were, by another mans valour, ſaved and redeemed from the enemy, or from preſent death, they became thereby, ſervants to him that ſaved and redeemed them: Redemption makes us (who were but ſubjects before, for all are ſo, by creation) ſervants; but it is but ſervants; but Adoption makes us, who are thus made ſervants by Redemption, ſons: for, Adoption is verbum forenſe, though it be a word which the Holy Ghoſt takes, yet he takes it from a civill uſe, and ſignification, in which, it expreſſes in divers circumſtances, our Adoption into the ſtate of Gods children. Firſt, he that adopted another, muſt by that law, be a man, who had no children of his owne; And this was Gods caſe towards us; Hee had no children of his owne, wee were all filii iræ, The children of wrath, not one of us could be ſaid to bee the child of God, by nature, if we had not had this Adoption in Chriſt. Secondly, he, who, C by that law, might Adopt, muſt be a Man, who had had, or naturally might have had children; for an Infant under yeares, or a man, who by nature was diſabled from having children, could not Adopt another; And this was Gods caſe towards us too; for God had had children without Adoption; for by our creation in Innocence, we were the ſons of God till we died all in one tranſgreſſion, and loſt all right, and all life, and all meanes of regaining it, but by this way of Adoption in Chriſt Jeſus. Againe, no man might adopt an elder man then himſelfe; and ſo, our Father by Adoption, is not onely Antiquus dierum, The ancient of Daies, but Antiquior diebus ancienter then any Daies, before Time was; he is (as Damaſcene forces himſelfe to expreſſe it) Super-principale principium, the Beginning, and the firſt Beginning, and before the firſt beginning; He is, ſaies he, æternus, and præ-æternus, Eternall, and elder then any eternity, that we can take into our imagination. So likewiſe no man might adopt a man of better quality then himſelfe, and D here, we are ſo far from comparing, as that we cannot comprehend his greatneſſe, and his goodneſſe, of whom, and to whom, S. Auguſtin ſaies well, Quid mihi es? If I ſhall goe about to declare thy goodneſſe, not to the world in generall, but Quid mihi es, how good thou art to me, Miſerere ut loquar, ſaies he, I muſt have more of thy goodneſſe, to be able to tell thy former goodneſſe, Be mercifull unto me againe, that I may bee thereby able to declare how mercifull thou waſt to me before, except thou ſpeake in me, I cannot declare what thou haſt done for me. Laſtly, no man might be adopted, into any other degree of kindred, but into the name, and right of a ſon; he could not be an adopted Brother, nor coſin, nor nephew: And this is eſpecially our dignity; wee have the Spirit of Adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father. So that, as here is a fulneſſe of time in the text, ſo there is a fulneſſe of perſons, All, and a fulneſſe of the worke belonging to them, Redeeming, Emancipation, delivering from the chaines of Satan, (we were his by Creation, E we ſold our ſelves for nothing, and he redeemed us, without money, that is, without any Eſa. 52. coſt of ours) but becauſe for all this generall Redemption, we may turne from him, and ſubmit our ſelves to other ſervices, therefore he hath Adopted us, drawne into his family and into his more eſpeciall care, thoſe who are choſen by him, to be his. Now that Redemption reached to all, there was enough for all; this diſpenſation of that Redemption, this Adoption reaches onely to us, all this is done, That wee might receive the Adoption of Sonnes.

Nos.

But who are this Wee? why, they are the elect of God. But who are they, who are theſe elect? Qui timidè rogat, docet negare: If a man aske me with a diffidence, Can I be the adopted ſon of God, that have rebelled againſt him, in all my affections, that have troden troden upon his Commandements, in all mine actions, that have divorced my ſelfe from him, in preferring the love of his creatures before himſelfe, that have murmured at his corrections, and thought them too much, that have undervalued his benefits, and thought them too little, that have abandoned, and proſtituted my body, his Temple, to all uncleanneſſe, and my ſpirit to indevotion, and contempt of his Ordinances; can I be the adopted ſon of God, that have done this? Ne timidè roges, aske me not this, with a diffidence and diſtruſt in Gods mercy, as if thou thoughtſt with Cain thy iniquities were greater then could be forgiven; But aske me with that holy confidence, which belongs to a true convert, Am not I, who, though I am never without ſinne, yet am never without hearty remorce and repentance for my ſinnes; though the weakneſſe of my fleſh ſometimes betray mee, the ſtrength of his Spirit ſtill recovers me; though my body be under the paw of that lion, that ſeekes whom hee may devoure, yet the lion of Judah raiſes againe and upholds my ſoule; though I wound my Saviour with many ſinnes, yet all theſe, bee they never ſo many, I ſtrive againſt, I lament, confeſſe, and forſake as farre as I am able. Am not I the child of God, and his adopted ſon in this ſtate? Roga fidenter, aske me with a holy confidence in thine and my God, & doces affirmare, thy very queſtion gives me mine anſwer to thee, thou teacheſt me to ſay, thou art; God himſelfe teaches me to ſay ſo, by his Apoſtle, The foundation of God is ſure, and this is the Seale, God knoweth who are his, and let them that call upon his name, depart from all iniquity: He that departs ſo far, as to repent former ſinnes, and ſhut up the wayes, which he knows in his conſcience, doe lead him into tentations, he is of this quorum, one of us, one of them, who are adopted by Chriſt, to be the ſonnes of God. I am of this quorum, if I preach the Goſpell ſincerely, and live thereafter, (for hee preaches twice a day, that followes his owne doctrine, and does as he ſaies) And you are of this quorum, if you preach over the Sermons which you heare, to your owne ſoules in your meditation, to your families in your relation, to the world in your converſation. If you come to this place, to meet the Spirit of God, and not to meet one another, If you have ſate in this place, with a delight in the Word of God; and not in the words of any ſpeaker, If you goe out of this place, in ſuch a diſpoſition, as that, if you ſhould meet the laſt Trumpets at the gates, and Chriſt Jeſus in the clouds, you would not intreat him to goe back, and ſtay another yeare: To enwrap all in one, if you have a religious and ſober aſſurance, that you are his, and walke according to your beleefe, you are his, and, as the fulneſſe of time, ſo the fulneſſe of grace is come upon you, and you are not onely within the firſt commiſſion, of thoſe who were under the Law, and ſo Redeemed, but of this quorum who are ſelected out of them, the adopted ſons of that God, who never diſinherits thoſe that forſake not him.

LUKE. 2. 29, & 30.

B Lord now letteſt thou thy ſervant depart in peace, according to thy word: For mine eyes have ſeen thy ſalvation.

THe whole life of Chriſt was a continuall Paſſion; others die Martyrs, but Chriſt was born a Martyr. He found a Golgatha, (where he was crucified) even in Bethlem, where he was born; For, to his tenderneſſe then, the ſtrawes were almoſt as ſharp as the thornes after; and the Manger as uneaſie at firſt, as his Croſſe at laſt. His birth and his death were but one continuall act, and his Chriſtmas-day and his Good Friday, are but the evening and morning of one and the ſame day. And as even his birth, is his death, ſo every action and paſſage that manifeſts Chriſt to us, is his birth; for, Epiphany is manifeſtation; And therefore, though the Church doe now call Twelf-day Epiphany, becauſe upon that day
C Chriſt was manifeſted to the Gentiles, in thoſe Wiſe men who came then to worſhip him, yet the Ancient Church called this day, (the day of Chriſts birth) the Epiphany, becauſe this day Chriſt was manifeſted to the world, by being born this day. Every manifeſtation of Chriſt to the world, to the Church, to a particular ſoule, is an Epiphany, a Chriſtmas-day. Now there is no where a more evident manifeſtation of Chriſt, then in that which induced this text, Lord now letteſt thou thy ſervant, &c.

It had been revealed to Simeon (whoſe words theſe are) that he ſhould ſee Chriſt before he dyed; And actually, and really, ſubſtantially, eſſentially, bodily, preſentially, perſonally he does ſee him; ſo it is Simeons Epiphany, Simeons Chriſtmas-day. So alſo this day, in which we commemorate and celebrate the generall Epiphany, the manifeſtation of Chriſt to the whole world in his birth, all we, we, who beſides our intereſt in the univerſall Epiphany and manifeſtation implyed in the very day, have this day re-D ceived the Body and Blood of Chriſt in his holy and bleſſed Sacrament, have had another Epiphany, another Chriſtmas-day, another manifeſtation and application of Chriſt to our ſelves; And as the Church prepares our devotion before Chriſtmas-day, with foure Sundayes in Advent, which brings Chriſt nearer and nearer unto us, and remembers us that he is comming, and then continues that remembrance again, with the celebration of other feſtivals with it, and after it, as S. Stephen, S. Iohn, and the reſt that follow; ſo for this birth of Chriſt, in your particular ſoules, for this Epiphany, this Chriſtmas-day, this manifeſtation of Chriſt which you have had in the moſt bleſſed Sacrament this day, as you were prepared before by that which was ſaid before, ſo it belongs to the through celebration of the day, and to the dignity of that myſterious act, and to the bleſſedneſſe of worthy, and the danger of unworthy Receivers, to preſſe that evi-
E dence in your behalf, and to enable you by a farther examination of your ſelves, to depart in peace, becauſe your eyes have ſeen his ſalvation.

To be able to conclude to you ſelves, that becauſe you have had a Chriſtmas-day, a manifeſtation of Chriſts birth in your ſoules, by the Sacrament, you ſhall have a whole Good-Friday, a crucifying, and a conſummatum eſt, a meaſure of corrections, and joy in thoſe corrections, tentations, and the iſſue with the tentation; And that you ſhall have a Reſurrection, and an Aſcenſion, an inchoation, and an unremoveable poſſeſſion of heaven it ſelf in this world. Make good your Chriſtmas day, that Chriſt by a worthy receiving of the Sacrament, be born in you, and he that dyed for you, will live with you all the yeare, and all the yeares of your lives, and inſpire into you, and receive from you at the laſt gaſp, this bleſſed acclamation, Lord now letteſt thou thy ſervant, &c.

Diviſio.

The end of all digeſtions, and concoctions is aſſimilation, that that meate may become our body. The end of all conſideration of all the actions of ſuch leading and exemplar men, as Simeon was, is aſſimilation too; That we may be like that man. Therefore we ſhall make it a firſt part, to take a picture, to give a character of this man, to conſider how Simeon was qualified and prepared, matured and diſpoſed to that confidence, that he could deſire to depart in peace, intimated in that firſt word, Now; now, that all that I look for is accompliſhed; And farther expreſſed in the firſt word of the other clauſe, For, for mine eyes have ſeen thy ſalvation; Now, now the time is fulfilled; For, for mine eyes have ſeen. And then enters the ſecond part, what is the greateſt happineſſe that can be well wiſhed in this world, by a man well prepared, is, that he may depart in peace; Lord now letteſt thou, &c. And all the way, in every ſtep that we make, in his light, (in Simeons light) we ſhall ſee light; we ſhall conſider, that that preparation, and diſpoſition, and acquieſcence, which Simeon had in his Epiphany, in his viſible ſeeing of Chriſt then, is offered to us in this Epiphany, in this manifeſtation and application of Chriſt in the Sacrament; And that therefore every penitent, and devout, and reverent, and worthy receiver, hath had in that holy action his Now, there are all things accompliſhed to him, and his For, for his eyes have ſeen his ſalvation; and ſo may be content, nay glad to depart in peace.

Præſentatio.

In the firſt part then, in which we collect ſome marks, and qualities in Simeon which prepared him to a quiet death, qualities appliable to us in that capacity, as we are fitted for the Sacrament, (for in that way only, we ſhall walk throughout this exerciſe) wee conſider firſt, the action it ſelf, what was done at this time. At this time our Saviour Chriſt, according to the Law, by which all the firſt born were to be preſented to God in the Temple, at a certain time after their birth, was preſented to God in the Temple, and there acknowledged to be his; And then, bought of him again by his parents, at a certain price preſcribed in the Law. A Lord could not exhibite his Son to his Tenants, and ſay, this is your Land-lord; nor a King his Son to his Subjects, and ſay, this is your Prince; but firſt he was to be tendred to God; his they were all; He that is not Gods firſt, is not truly his Kings, nor his own. And then God does not ſell him back againe to his parents, at a racked, at an improved price; He ſels a Lord, or a King back againe to the world, as cheap as a Yeoman, he takes one and the ſame price for all; God made all Mankinde of one blood, and with one blood, the blood of his Son, he bought all Mankinde again: At one price, and upon the ſame conditions, he hath delivered over all into this world; Tantummodo crede, and then fac hoc, & vives, is the price of all; Beleeve, and live well: More he asks not, leſſe he takes not for any man, upon any pretence of any unconditioned decree.

Columbæ.

At the time of this preſentation, there were to be offered a paire of Turtles, or a paire of Pigeons. The Sacrifice was indifferent; Turtles that live ſolitarily, and Pigeons, that live ſociably, were all one to God. God in Chriſt may be had in an active, and ſociable life, denoted in the Pigeon, and in the ſolitary and contemplative life, denoted in the Turtle; Let not Weſtminſter deſpiſe the Church, nor the Church the Exchange, nor the Exchange and trade deſpiſe Armes; God in Chriſt may be had in every lawfull calling. And then, the Pigeon was an embleme of fecundity, and fruitfulneſſe in marriage; And the Turtle may be an Embleme of chaſte widowhood; for, I thinke we finde no Bigamy in the Turtle. But in theſe Sacrifices we finde no Embleme of a naturall, or of a vowed barrenneſſe: Nothing that countenances a vowed virginity, to the diſhonour or undervaluing of marriage. Thus was our Saviour preſented to God; And in this eſpecially was that fulfilled, The glory of the later houſe ſhall be greater then the glory of the former; The later Temple exceeded the former in this, that the Lord, the God of this houſe, was in the houſe bodily, as one of the congregation; And the little body of a ſucking childe, was a Chappell in that Temple, infinitely more glorious then the Temple it ſelfe. How was the joy of Noah at the return of the Dove into the Ark, multiplied upon Simeon at the bringing of this Dove into the Temple? At how cheape a price was Chriſt tumbled up and down in this world? It does almoſt take off our pious ſcorn of the low price, at which Iudas ſold him, to conſider that his Father ſold him to the world for nothing; and then, when he had him again, by this new title of primogeniture and preſentation, he ſold him to the world again, if not for a Turtle, or for a Pigeon, yet at moſt for 5. ſhekels, which at moſt is but 10. ſhillings.

Agg. 2. 9.

And

A And yet you have had him cheaper then that, to day in the Sacrament: whom hath Christ coſt 5. ſhekels there? As Chriſt was preſented to God in the Temple, ſo is hee preſented to God in the Sacrament; not ſucking, but bleeding. And God gives him back again to thee. And at what price? upon this exchange; Take his firſt born, Chriſt Jeſus, and give him thine. Who is thine? Cor primogenitum, ſayes S. Auguſt: The heart is the firſt part of the body that lives; Give him that; And then, as it is in nature, it ſhall be in grace too, the laſt part that dyes; for it ſhall never dye; If a man eat the bread that commeth down from heaven, he ſhall not die, ſayes Chriſt. If a man in exchange of his heart receive Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe, he can no more die then Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe can die. That which Eſchines ſaid to Socrates, admits a faire accommodation here; He ſaw every body give Socrates ſome preſent, and he ſaid, Becauſe I have nothing elſe to give, I will give thee my ſelfe. Do ſo, ſayes Socrates, and I will give thee back again to B thy ſelf, better then when I received thee. If thou have truly given thy ſelfe to him in the Sacrament, God hath given thee thy ſelfe back, ſo much mended, as that thou haſt received thy ſelf and him too; Thy ſelfe, in a holy liberty, to walk in the world in a calling, and himſelf, in giving a bleſſing upon all the works of thy calling, and imprinting in thee a holy deſire to do all thoſe works to his glory. And ſo having thus far made this profit of theſe circumſtances in the action it ſelf, appliable to us as receivers of the Sacrament, that as the childe Jeſus was firſt preſented to God in the Temple, ſo for your children, (the children of your bodies, and the children of your mindes, and the children of your hands, all your actions, and intentions) that you direct them firſt upon God, and God in the Temple, that is, God manifeſted in the Church, before you aſſigne them, or determine them upon any other worldly courſes, and then, that as God returned Chriſt as all other children, at a certain price, ſo God delivers man upon certain, and upon the C ſame conditions: He comes not into the world, nor he comes not to the Sacrament, as to a Lottery, where perchance he may draw Salvation, but it is ten to one he miſſes, but upon theſe few and eaſie conditions, Beleeve, & Love, he may be ſure: And then alſo, that the Sacrifice, Pigeons, or Turtles was indifferent, ſo it were offered to God, for any honeſt calling, is acceptable to God, if Gods glory be intended in it; That of marriage and of widowhood we have ſome typicall intimations in the Law, in the Pigeon, and in the Turtle, but of a vow of virginity, begun in the parents for their temporall ends, and forced upon their children, for thoſe ends, we have no ſhadow at all; That Chriſt who was ſold after by Iudas for a little money, was ſold in this preſentation by his Father, for leſſe, and yet for leſſe then that to us, this day in the Sacrament. Having made theſe uſes of theſe circumſtances in the action it ſelfe, we paſſe on now, to the conſideration of ſome ſuch qualities, and diſpoſitions of this perſon, Simeon, as may be appliable to us in D our having received the Sacrament.

Firſt then, we receive it, though not literally, and expreſly in the ſtory, yet by convenient implication there, and by generall tradition from all, that Simeon was now come to a great age, a very old Man. For ſo S. Auguſt. argues, That God raiſed up two witneſſes for Chriſt in the Temple; one of each Sex; and both of much reverence for age; Anna, whoſe age is expreſſed, and Simeon, who is recommended in the ſame reſpect, ſaies that Father, for age too. And Nicephorus, and others with him, make him very old; as it is likely he was, if he were, as Pet: Galatinus makes him, the ſon of Rabbi Hillel, Hillel the maſter of Gamaliel, the maſter of S. Paul. So then we accept him; A perſon in a reverend age. Even in nature Age was the center of reverence; the channell, the valley, to which all reverence flowed; temporall juriſdiction, and ſpirituall juriſdiction, the Magiſtracy, and the Prieſthood were appropriated to the eldeſt; almoſt in all vulgar lan- E guages, the name of a Lord, or magiſtrate, hath no other derivation then ſo, an Elder; Senior noſter, is a word that paſſes freely, through the authors of the middle age, for our Lord, or our King; and the ſame derivation hath the name of Prieſt, in a holy language, Presbyter an Elder. So evermore in the courſe of the Scripture all counſell, and all government is placed in the Elders; and all the ſervice of God is expreſſed ſo, even in heaven too, by the foure and twenty Elders. Thy Creator will be remembred in the dayes of thy youth; but God hath had longer experience of that man, and longer converſation with that man, who is come to a holy age. That wiſe King, who could carry nothing to a higher pitch in any compariſon, then to a Crowne, ſaies, Age is a crowne of glory, when it is found in the wayes of the righteous; but in the waies of righteouſneſſe, no bleſſing is a bleſſing; blessing; and in the waies of righteousnesse, wealth may bé a crowne of our labours, and health may be a crowne of our temperance, but age is the crowne of glory, of reverence; that crowne, the crowne of reverence, the Lord the righteous Judge hath reserved to that day, the day of our age, because our age is the seale of our constancy, and perseverance. In this blessed age, Simeon was thus dignified, admitted to this Epiphany, this manifestation of Christ. And, to be admitted to thy Epiphany, and manifestation of Christ in the Sacrament, thou must put off the yong man, and put on the old. God, to whose Table thou art called, is represented as Antiquus Dierum, the ancient of Daies; and his Guests must be of mortified affections; He must be crucified to the world, that will receive him, that was crucified for the world; the lusts of youth, the voluptuousnesse of youth, the revengefulnesse of youth, must have a holy damp, and a religious stupidity shed upon them, that come thither. Nay, it is not enough to bee suddenly old, to have sad, and mortified thoughts then; no, nor to be suddenly dead, to renounce the world then, that houre, that morning, but quatriduani fitis, you should have been dead three daies, as Lazarus; you should have passed an Examination, an accusation, a condemnation of your selves, divers daies before ye came to that Table. God was most glorified in the raising of Lazarus, when he was long dead, and putrified; God is most glorified in giving a resurrection to him, that hath been longest dead; that is, longest in the Contemplation of his owne sinfull and spirituall putrefaction. For, he that stinks most in his owne, by true contrition, is the best perfume to Gods nostrils, and a conscience troubled in it selfe, is Odor quietis, as Noahs sacrifice was, a savor of rest to God.

Sacerdos. This assistance we have to the exaltation of our devotion, from that circumstance, that Simeon was an old man; we have another from another, that he was a Priest, and in that notion and capacity, the better fitted for this Epiphany, this Christmas, this Manifestation of Christ. We have not this neither in the letter of the story; no, nor so constantly in Tradition, that he was a Priest, as that he was an old man: But it is rooted in Antiquity too; In Athanasius, in St. Cyrill, in Epiphanius, in others, who argue, and inferre it fairly and conveniently, out of some Priestly acts, which Simeon seemes to have done in the Temple, (as the taking of Christ in his armes, which belongs to the Priest, and the blessing of God, which is the Thanks-giving to God, in the behalfe of the congregation, and then the blessing of the people, in the behalfe of God, which are acts peculiar to the Priest.) Accepting him in that quality, a Priest, we consider, that as the King takes it worse in his houshold servants, then in his Subjects at large, if they goe not his wayes, so they who dwell in Gods house, whose livelihood growes out of the revenue of his Church, and whose service lies within the walls of his Church, are most inexcusable, if they have not a continuall Epiphany, a continuall Manifestation of Christ: All men should looke towards God, but the Priest should never looke off from God. And, at the Sacrament every man is a Priest. I had rather that were not said, (which yet a very Calvin. Reverend Divine sayes) That this Simeon might be aliquis plebeius homo, some ordinary common man, that was in the Temple at that time, when Christ was brought. He, who Chemnicius. is of another sub-division, (though in the reformed Church too) collects piously, that God chose extraordinary men, to give testimony of his Sonne; Nicodemus a great Magistrate, Gamaliel a great Doctor, Iairus a Ruler in the Synagogue, and this Simeon, in probability, pregnant enough, a Priest. But was that any great Addition to him, if hee were so? For holinesse, certainly it was; But for outward dignity, and respect, it was so Josephus. too, amongst them. In omni Natione, certum aliquod Nobilitatis argumentum. Every Nation hath some particular way of ennobling, and some particular evidence, and declaration of Nobility: Armes for a great part, is that in Spaine; and Merchandize in some States in Italy; and learning in France, where besides the very many preferments by the Church, in which, some other Nation may be equall to them, there are more preferments, by other wayes of learning, especially of Judicature, then in any other Nation. All Nations, sayes Iosephus, had some peculiar way, and amongst the Jews, sayes he, Priesthood was that way; A Priest was, even for civill priviledges, a Gentleman. Therefore hath the Apostle, not knighted, nor ennobled, but crowned every good soule, with that style, Regale Sacerdotium, That they are a Royall Priesthood; To be Royall without Priesthood, seemed not to him Dignity enough. Consider then, that to come to the Communion Table, is to take Orders; Every man should come to that Altar, as holy as the Erasmus. Priest, for there he is a Priest: And, Sacerdotem nemo agit, qui libenter aliud est, quam Sacerdos:

A cerdos: No man is truly a Prieſt, which is any thing elſe beſides a Prieſt; that is, that entangles himſelfe in any other buſineſſe, ſo, as that that hinders his function in his Prieſthood. No man comes to the Sacrament well, that is ſorry hee is there; that is, whom the penalty of the law, or obſervation of neighbours, or any collaterall reſpect brings thither. There thou art a Prieſt, though thou beeſt but a lay-man at home; And then, no man that hath taken Orders, can deprive himſelfe, or deveſt his Orders, when he will: Thou art bound to continue in the ſame holineſſe after, in which thou preſenteſt thy ſelfe at that Table. As the ſailes of a ſhip when they are ſpread and ſwolne, and the way that the ſhip makes, ſhewes me the winde, where it is, though the winde it ſelfe be an inviſible thing, ſo thy actions to morrow, and the life that thou leadeſt all the yeare, will ſhew mee, with what minde thou cameſt to the Sacrament, to day, though onely God, and not I, can ſee thy minde. Live in remembrance, that thou
B waſt a Prieſt to day; (for no man hath received Chriſt, that hath not ſacrificed himſelf.) And live, as though thou wert a Prieſt ſtill; and then I ſay, with Sidonius Apollinaris, Malò Sacerdotalem virum, quam Sacerdotem, I had rather have one man that lives as a Prieſt ſhould doe, then a hundred Prieſts that live not ſo. A worthy Receiver ſhall riſe in Judgement againſt an unworthy Giver: Chriſt ſhall be the Sacrifice ſtill, and thou the Prieſt, that cameſt but to receive, becauſe thou haſt ſacrificed thy ſelfe; and he the Iudas, that pretended to be the Prieſt, becauſe he hath betrald Chriſt to himſelfe, and as much as lay in him, evacuated the Sacrament, and made it of none effect to thee.

It is farther added for his honour, and for his competency, and fitneſſe for this Epiphany, to ſee his Saviour, that he was Iuſtus, a juſt, and righteous man. This is a legall Righteouſneſſe; a Righteouſneſſe, in which St. Paul ſayes, he was unreproachable; that is, in the ſight of all the world. And this Righteouſneſſe, even this outward righteouſ-
C neſſe, he muſt bring with him that comes to this Epiphany, to this Manifeſtation, and Application of his Saviour, to him, in the Sacrament: It muſt ſtand well betweene him, and all the world. If thou bring thy gift to the Altar, ſayes Chriſt, (if thou bring thy ſelfe to the Altar, ſayes our caſe) and there remembreſt that thy brother hath ought againſt thee, (it was ill done, not to remember it before; but if thou remember it then) Goe thy way, ſayes Chriſt, firſt be reconciled to thy brother, and then come, and offer thy gift; that is, offer thy ſelfe for that ſacrifice: Better come a month after, with a cleare, then kneele it out then with a perplexed conſcience. It is, If thy brother have ought againſt thee; how little ſoever: If thou have but ſcandalized him, though thou have not injured him, yet venture not upon this holy action, till thou have ſatisfied him. Thou maiſt be good; good ſo, as that thou haſt intended no ill to him: He may be good too; good ſo, as that he wiſhes no ill to thee. And yet ſome negligence and remiſneſſe
D in thee, may have ſtruck upon a weakneſſe and a tenderneſſe in him, ſo as that he may become, to think uncharitably of thee; and though this uncharitableneſſe be his fault, and not thine, yet the negligence that occaſioned it, was thine: Satisfie him; and that rectifies both; it redeemes thy negligence, it recovers his weakneſſe. Till that be done, neither of you are fit for this holy action; God neither accepts that man, that is negligent of his actions, and cares not what others think, nor him that is over-eaſie to be ſcandalized, and miſ-interpret actions, otherwiſe indifferent: For, to them who ſtudy not this righteouſneſſe, to ſtand upright in the good opinions of good men, as God ſaies, Why takeſt thou my word into thy mouth, ſo Chriſt ſhall ſay, to the ſhaking of that conſcience, why takeſt thou my Body, and Bloud into thy hand?

This muſt be done; He muſt be juſt, righteous in the eyes of men; though more ſeeme to be implyed in his other character, that he was Timoratus, which we tranſlate Devout:
E In the former, his object was man, though godly men; here it is God himſelfe: Man muſt be reſpected, but God eſpecially. And this devotion is well placed in feare; for Baſis verbi eſt timor ſanctus, ſayes St. Auguſtine; and it is excellently ſaid, if this bee his meaning, That whatſoever I promiſe my ſelfe out of the word of God, yet the Baſis upon which that promiſe ſtands, is my feare of God: If my feare of God fall, the word of God, ſo farre as it is a promiſe to me, falls to. Tertullian intends the ſame thing, when he ſayes, fundamentum ſalutis timor; Though I have a holy confidence of my ſalvation, yet the foundation of this confidence is a modeſt, and a tender, and a reverentiall feare, that I am not diligent enough in the performance of thoſe conditions which are required to the eſtabliſhing of it; for this Eulabeia, which St. Hierome tranſlates Timoratum, and we

Iuſtus, V 25.

Mat. 5. 23.

Timoratus.

we translate Devout, is a middle disposition betweene a Pharisaicall superstition, and a negligent irreverence, and profanation of Gods Ordinance. I come not with this Eulabeia, with Simeons disposition, to my Epiphany, to my receiving of my Saviour; if I think that Bread, my God, and superstitiously adore it, for that is Pharisaicall, and carnall; neither doe I bring that disposition thither, if I think God no otherwise present there, then in his own other Ordinances, and so refuse such postures, and actions of reverence, as are required to testifie outwardly mine inward devotion; for these may well consist together, I am sure I receive him effectually, when I looke upon his Mercy; I am afraid I doe not receive him worthily, when I look upon mine owne unworthinesse.

We cannot pursue this Anatomy of good old Simeon, this Just, and Devout Priest, so farre, as to shew you all his parts, and the use of them all, in particular. His example, and the characters that are upon him, are our Alphabet. I shall onely have time to name the rest of those characters; you must spell them, and put them into their syllables; you must forme them, and put them into their words; you must compose them, and put them into their Syntaxis, and sentences; that is, you must pursue the imitation, that when I have told you what he was, you may present your selves to God, such as he was. He was one that had the Holy Ghost upon him, saies that Story. The testimony given before, that he was Iustus, & Timoratus, righteous, and fearing God, was evidence enough, that the Holy Ghost was upon him. This addition is a testimony of a more particular presence, and operation of the Holy Ghost, in some certaine way; and the way is agreed by all, to be, In dono Prophetiæ, the Holy Ghost was upon him, in the spirit of Prophesie, so, as that he made him, at that time, a Prophet. Thou art a Prophet upon thy selfe, when thou commest to the Communion; Thou art able to foretell, and to pronounce upon thy selfe, what thou shalt be for ever; Vpon thy disposition then, thou maist conclude thine eternall state; then thou knowest which part of St. Pauls distribution falls upon thee; whether that tribulations and anguish upon every soule of man, that doth evill; Or that, But glory, and honour, and peace to every man, that worketh good. Thou art this Prophet; silence not this Prophet; doe not chide thy conscience for chiding thee; Stone not this Prophet; doe not petrifie, and harden thy conscience against these holy suggestions: Say not with Ahab to the Prophet, Hast thou found me out, O mine enemy? when an unrepented sinne comes to thy memory then, be not thou sorry that thou remembrest it then, nor doe not say, I would this sin had not troubled me now, I would I had not remembred it till to morrow; For, in that action, first, in Thesi, for the Rule, thou art a Preacher to thy selfe, and thou hast thy Text in St. Paul, He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himselfe; And then in Hypothesi, for the application to the particular case, thou art a Prophet to thy selfe; Thou that knowest in thy selfe, what thou doest then, canst say to thy selfe, what thou shalt suffer after, if thou doe ill.

Spiritus Sanctus.

Rom. 2. 9.

Expectavit.

There are more Elements in the making up of this man; many more. He waited, saies his story; He gave God his leisure. Simeon had informed himselfe, out of Daniel, and the other Prophets, that the time of the Messias comming was neare: As Daniel had informed himselfe out of Ieremy, and the other Prophets, that the time of the Deliverance from Babylon, was neare: Both waited patiently, and yet both prayed for the accelerating of that, which they waited for; Daniel for the Deliverance, Simeon for the Epiphany. Those consist well enough, patiently to attend Gods time, and yet earnestly to solicite the hastning of that time; for that time is Gods time, to which, our prayers have brought God; as that price was Gods price for Sodome, to which Abrahams solicitation brought God, and not the first fifty. That Prophet that sayes, Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker, that is, that presses God before his time, saies also, for all that, Oh that thou wouldest rent the heavens, and come downe. When thou commest to this seale of thy peace, the Sacrament, pray that God will give thee that light, that may direct and establish thee, in necessary and fundamentall things; that is, the light of faith to see, that the Body and Bloud of Christ, is applied to thee, in that action; But for the manner, how the Body and Bloud of Christ is there, wait his leisure, if he have not yet manifested that to thee: Grieve not at that, wonder not at that, presse not for that; for hee hath not manifested that, not the way, not the manner of his presence in the Sacrament, to the Church. A peremptory prejudice upon other mens opinions, that no opinion but thine can be true, in the doctrine of the Sacrament, and an uncharitable condemning of other men, or other Churches

Esay 45. 9.

Esay 64. 1.

A Churches that may be of another perſwaſion then thou art, in the matter of the Sacrament, may fruſtrate and diſappoint thee of all that benefit, which thou mightſt have, by an humble receiving thereof, if thou wouldeſt excerciſe thy faith onely, here, and leave thy paſſion at home, and referre thy reaſon, and diſputation to the Schoole.

He waited, ſaies the ſtory; And he waited for the conſolation of Iſrael. It is not an appropriating of hopes, or poſſeſſions of thoſe hopes, to himſelfe; but a charitable deſire, of a communication of this conſolation, upon all the Iſrael of God. Therefore is the Sacrament a Communion; Therefore is the Church, which is built of us, Built of lively ſtones: And in ſuch buildings, as ſtones doe, Vnusquiſque portat alterum, & portatur ab altero: Every ſtone is ſupported by another, and ſupports another. As thou wouldeſt be well interpreted by others, interpret others well; and, as when thou commeſt to heaven, the joy, and the glory of every ſoule, ſhall bee thy glory, and thy joy; B ſo when thou commeſt to the porch of the Triumphant Church, the doore of heaven, the Communion table, deſire that that joy, which thou feeleſt in thy ſoule then, may then be communicated to every communicant there.

To this purpoſe, to teſtifie his devotion to the communion of Saints, Simeon came into the Temple, ſaies the ſtory; to doe a holy worke, in a holy place. When we ſay, that God is no acceptor of perſons, we doe not meane, but that they which are within his Covenant, and they that have preſerved the ſeales of his grace, are more acceptable to him, then they which are not, or have not. When we ſay, that God is not tied to places, we muſt not meane, but that God is otherwiſe preſent, and workes otherwiſe, in places conſecrated to his ſervice, then in every prophane place. When I pray in my chamber, I build a Temple there, that houre; And, that minute, when I caſt out a prayer, in the ſtreet, I build a Temple there; And when my ſoule prayes without any voyce, my very C body is then a Temple: And God, who knowes what I am doing in theſe actions, erecting theſe Temples, he comes to them, and proſpers, and bleſſes my devotions; and ſhall not I come to his Temple, where he is alwaies reſident? My chamber were no Temple, my body were no Temple, except God came to it; but whether I come hither, or no, this will be Gods Temple: I may loſe by my abſence, He gaines nothing by my comming. He that hath a cauſe to be heard, will not goe to Smithfield, nor he that hath cattaile to buy or ſell, to Weſtminſter; He that hath bargaines to make, or newes to tell, ſhould not come to doe that at Church; nor he that hath prayers to make, walke in the fields for his devotions. If I have a great friend, though in caſes of neceſſity, as ſickneſſe, or other reſtraints, hee will vouchſafe to viſit me, yet I muſt make my ſuits to him at home, at his owne houſe. In caſes of neceſſity, Chriſt in the Sacrament, vouchſafes to come home to me; And the Court is where the King is; his bleſſings are with his Ordinances, whereſoever: But the place to which he hath invited me, is his houſe. Hee D that made the great Supper in the Goſpel, called in new gueſts; but he ſent out no meat to them, who had been invited, and might have come, and came not. Chamber-prayers, ſingle, or with your family, Chamber-Sermons, Sermons read over there; and Chamber-Sacraments, adminiſtred in neceſſity there, are bleſſed aſſiſtants, and ſupplements; they are as the almes at the gate, but the feaſt is within; they are as a cock of water without, but the Ciſtern is within; habenti dabitur; he that hath a handfull of devotion at home, ſhall have his devotion multiplyed to a Gomer here; for when he is become a part of the Congregation, he is joynt-tenant with them, and the devotion of all the Congregation, and the bleſſings upon all the Congregation, are his bleſſings, and his devotions.

He came to a holy place, and he came by a holy motion, by the Spirit, ſaies his Evi- E dence, without holineſſe, no man ſhall ſee God; not ſo well, without holineſſe of the place; but not there neither, if he truſt onely to the holineſſe of the place, and bring no holineſſe with him. Betweene that fearefull occaſion of comming to Church, which S. Auguſtine confeſſes and laments, That they came to make wanton bargaines with their eyes, and met there, becauſe they could meet no where elſe; and that more fearfull occaſion of comming, when they came onely to elude the Law, and proceeding in their treacherous and traiterous religion in their heart, and yet communicating with us, draw God himſelfe into their conſpiracies, and to mocke us, make a mocke of God, and his religion too: betweene theſe two, this licencious comming, and this treacherous comming, there are many commings to Church, commings for company, for obſervation, for muſique:

ſique: And all theſe indiſpoſitions are ill at prayers; there they are unwholeſome, but at the Sacrament, deadly: He that brings any collaterall reſpect to prayers, looſes the benefit of the prayers of the Congregation; and he that brings that to a Sermon, looſes the bleſſing of Gods ordinance in that Sermon; hee heares but the Logique, or the Retorique, or the Ethique, or the poetry of the Sermon, but the Sermon of the Sermon he heares not; but he that brings this diſpoſition to the Sacrament, ends not in the loſſe of a benefit, but he acquires, and procures his owne damnation. A Viderunt oculi. All that we conſider in Simeon, and apply from Simeon, to a worthy receiver of the Sacrament, is how he was fitted to depart in peace. All thoſe peeces, which we have named, conduce to that: but all thoſe are collected into that one, which remaines yet, Viderunt oculi, that his eyes had ſeene that ſalvation; for that was the accompliſhment and fulfilling of Gods Word, According to thy word; All that God had ſaid, ſhould be done, was done; for, as it is ſaid, *v.*26. It was revealed unto him, by the holy Ghoſt, that hee ſhould not ſee death, before he had ſeene the Lords Chriſt, and now his eyes had ſeene that Salvation. Abraham ſaw this before; but, but with the eye of faith; and yet rejoyced to ſee it ſo, he was glad even of that. Simeon ſaw it before this time; then, when he was illuſtrated with that Revelation, he ſaw it; but, but with the eye of hope; of ſuch hope Abraham had no ſuch ground; no particular hope, no promiſe, that hee ſhould ſee the Meſſiah in his time; Simeon had, and yet he waited, he attended Gods leaſure; But hope defer'd maketh the heart ſick, (ſaies Solomon) but when the deſire comes, it is a tree of life. His deſire was come; he ſaw his ſalvation. Perchance not ſo, as S. Cyprian ſeemes to take it, That till this time Simeon was blinde, and upon this preſentation of Chriſt in the Temple, came to his ſight againe, and ſo ſaw this Salvation: for, I thinke, no one Author, but S. Cyprian, ſaies ſo, that Simeon was blinde till now, and now reſtored to ſight; And I may eaſe S. Cyprian too, of that ſingularity; for it is enough, and abundantly evident, that that book in which that is ſaid (which is, Altercatio Iaſonis & papiſci de Meſſia) cannot poſſibly be S. Cyprians. But with his bodily eyes, open to other objects before, he ſaw the Lords Salvation, and his Salvation; the Lords, as it came from the Lord, and his, as it was appliable to him. He ſaw it, according to his word; that is, ſo far, as God had promiſed, he ſhould ſee it. He ſaw not, how, that God, which was in this Child, & which was this child, was the Son of God; The manner of that eternall Generation he ſaw not. He ſaw not how this Son of God became man in a Virgins womb, whom no man knew; The manner of this Incarnation he ſaw not: for this eternall Generation, and this miraculous Incarnation, fell not within that Secundùm verbum, according to thy Word; God had promiſed Simeon nothing concerning thoſe myſteries: But Chriſtum Domini, the Lords Salvation, and his Salvation, that is, the perſon who was all that (which was all, that was within the word, and the promiſe) Simeon ſaw, and ſaw with bodily eyes. Beloved, in the bleſſed, and glorious, and myſterious Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Chriſt Jeſus, thou ſeeſt Chriſtum Domini, the Lords Salvation, and thy Salvation, and that, thus far with bodily eyes; That Bread which thou ſeeſt after the Conſecration, is not the ſame bread, which was preſented before; not that it is Tranſubſtantiated to another ſubſtance, for it is bread ſtill, (which is the hereticall Riddle of the Roman Church, and ſatans ſophiſtry, to diſhonour miracles, by the affiduity and frequency, and multiplicity of them) but that it is ſevered, and appropriated by God, in that Ordinance to another uſe; It is other Bread, ſo, as a Judge is another man, upon the bench, then he is at home, in his owne houſe. In the Roman Church, they multiply, and extend miracles, til the miracle it ſelfe crack, and become none, but vaniſh into nothing, as boyes bubbles, (which were but bubbles before, at beſt) by an overblowing become nothing: Nay they conſtitute ſuch miracles, as do not onely deſtroy the nature of the miracle, but deſtroy him, that ſhould doe that miracle, even God himſelfe: for, nothing proceeds farther to the deſtroying of God, then to make God do contradictory things; for, contradictions have falſehood, and ſo imply impotency, and infirmity in God. There cannot be a deeper Atheiſme, then to impute contradictions to God; neither doth any one thing ſo overcharge God with contradictions, as the Tranſubſtantiation of the Roman Church. There muſt be a Body there, and yet no where; In no place, and yet in every place, where there is a conſecration. The Bread and the Wine muſt nouriſh the body, nay, the bread and the wine may poyſon a body, and yet there is no bread, nor wine there. They multiply miracles, and they give not over, till they make God unable to doe a miracle, till they make him

*Prov.*13.12. B C D E

A him a contradictory, that is, an impotent God. And therefore Luther inferres well, that since miracles are so easie and cheape, and obvious to them, as they have induced a miraculous transubstantiation, they might have done well to have procured one miracle more, a trans-accidentation, that since the substance is changed, the accidents might have beene changed too; and since there is no bread, there might be no demensions, no colour, no nourishing, no other qualities of bread neither; for, these remaining, there is rather an annihilation of God, in making him no God by being a contradictory God, then an annihilation of the Bread, by making that, which was formerly bread, God himselfe, by that way of Transubstantiation.

But yet, though this bread be not so transubstantiated, we refuse not the words of the Fathers, in which they have expressed themselves in this Mystery: Not Irenæus his est corpus, that that bread is his body now; Not Tertullians fecit corpus, that that bread is made his body, which was not so before; Not S. Cyprians mutatus, that that bread is B changed; Not Damascens supernaturaliter mutatus, that that bread is not only changed so in the use, as when at the Kings table certain portions of bread are made bread of Essay, to passe over every dish, whether for safety or for Majesty; not only so civilly changed, but changed supernaturally; no nor Theophylacts transformatus est; (which seemes to be the word that goes farthest of all) for this transforming, cannot be intended of the outward form and fashion, for that is not changed; but be it of that internall form, which is the very essence and nature of the bread, so it is transformed, so the bread hath received a new form, a new essence, a new nature, because whereas the nature of bread is but to nourish the body, the nature of this bread now, is to nourish the soule. And therefore, Cum non dubitavit Dominus dicere, hoc est corpus meum, cum signum daret Augustin. corporis, Since Christ forbore not to say, This is my body, when he gave the sign of his C body, why should we forbeare to say of that bread, this is Christs body, which is the Sacrament of his body. You would have said at noone, this light is the Sun, and you will say now, this light is the Candle; That light was not the Sun, this light is not the Candle, but it is that portion of aire which the Sun did then, and which the Candle doth now enlighten. We say the Sacramentall bread is the body of Christ, because God hath shed his Ordinance upon it, and made it of another nature in the use, though not in the substance; Almost 600. years agoe, the Romane Church made Berengarius sweare, sensualiter tangitur, frangitur, teritur corpus Christi, That the body of Christ was sensibly handled, and broken, and chewed. They are ashamed of that now, and have mollified it with many modifications; and God knowes whether 100. yeares hence they will not bee as much ashamed of their Transubstantiation, and see as much unnaturall absurdity in their Trent Canon, or Lateran Canon, as they doe in Berengarius oath. D As they that deny the body of Christ to be in the Sacrament, lose their footing in departing from their ground, the expresse Scriptures; so they that will assign a particular manner, how that body is there, have no footing, no ground at all, no Scripture to Anchor upon: And so, diving in a bottomlesse sea, they poppe sometimes above water to take breath, to appeare to say something, and then snatch at a loose preposition, that swims upon the face of the waters, and so the Roman Church hath catched a Trans, and others a Con, and a Sub, and an In, and varied their poetry into a Transubstantiation, and a Consubstantiation, and the rest, and rymed themselves beyond reason, into absurdities, and heresies, and by a young figure of similiter cadens, they are fallen alike into error, though the errors that they are fallen into, be not of a like nature, nor danger. We offer to goe no farther, then according to his Word; In the Sacrament our eyes see his salvation, according to that, so far, as that hath manifested unto us, and in that light wee depart in E peace, without scruple in our owne, without offence to other mens consciences.

Having thus seene Simeon in these his Dimensions, with these holy impressions, these 2 Part. blessed characters upon him, first, [1] A man in a reverend age, & then, [2] In a holy function and calling, and with that, [3] Righteous in the eyes of men, and withall, [4] Devout in the eyes of God, [5] And made a Prophet upon himselfe by the holy Ghost, [6] still wayting Gods time, and his leasure, [7] And in that, desiring that his joy might be spread upon the whole Israel of God, [8] Frequenting holy places, the Temple, [9] And that upon holy motions, and there, [10] seeing the salvation of the Lord, that is, Discerning the application of salvation in the Ordinances of the Church, [11] And lastly, contenting himselfe with so much therein, as was according to his word, and not inquiring farther then God had had beene pleased to reveale, and having reflected all these severall beames upon every worthy Receiver of the Sacrament, the whole Quire of such worthy receivers may joyne with Simeon in this Antiphon, Nunc Dimittis, Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, &c. S. Ambrose reades not this place as we doe, Nunc dimittis, but Nunc dimitte, not, Lord thou doest so, but, Lord doe so, and so he gives it the forme of a prayer; and implyes not only a patience, and a contentednesse, but a desire, and an ambition that he might die; at least such an indifferency, and equanimity as Israel had, when he had seen Ioseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, after he had seen his face, the next face that he desired to see, was the face of God. For, howsoever there may bee some disorder, some irregularity, in S. Pauls Anathema pro fratribus, that he desired to be separated from Christ, rather then his brethren should, (that may scarce be drawen into consequence, or made a wish for us to imitate) yet to S. Pauls Cupio dissolvi, to an expresse, and to a deliberate desire, to be dissolved here, and to be united to Christ in heaven, (still with a primary relation to the glory of God, and a reservation of the will of God) a godly, a rectified and a well-disposed man may safely come. And so, (I know not upon what grounds) Nicephorus sayes, Simeon did wish, and had his wish; he prayed that he might die, and actually he did die then. Neither can a man at any time be fitter to make and obtain this wish, then when his eyes have seen his salvation in the Sacrament. At least, make this an argument of your having beene worthy receivers thereof, that you are in Æquilibrio, in an evennesse, in an indifferency, in an equanimity, whether ye die this night or no. For, howsoever S. Ambrose seem to make it a direct prayer, that he might die, he intends but such an equanimity, such an indifferency; Quasi servus non refugit vitæ obsequium, & quasi sapiens lucrum mortis amplectitur, sayes that Father; Simeon is so good a servant, as that he is content to serve his old master still, in his old place, in this world, but yet, he is so good a husband too, as that hee sees what a gainer he might be, if he might be made free by death. If thou desire not death, (that is the case of very few, to doe so in a rectified conscience, and without distemper) if thou beest not equally disposed towards death (that should be the case of all; and yet we are far from condemning all that are not come to that equanimity) yet if thou now feare death inordinately, I should feare that thine eyes have not seen thy salvation to day; who can feare the darknesse of death, that hath had the light of this world, and of the next too? who can feare death this night, that hath had the Lord of life in his hand to day? It is a question of consternation, a question that should strike him, that should answer it, dumb (as Christs question, Amice, quomodo intrasti? Friend, how camest in hither? did him to whom that was said) which Origen askes in this case, When wilt thou dare to goe out of this world, if thou darest not goe now, when Christ Jesus hath taken thee by the hand to leade thee out?

In pace. This then is truly to depart in peace, by the Gospell of peace, to the God of peace. My body is my prison; and I would be so obedient to the Law, as not to break prison; I would not hasten my death by starving, or macerating this body: But if this prison be burnt down by continuall feavers, or blowen down with continuall vapours, would any man be so in love with that ground upon which that prison stood, as to desire rather to stay there, then to go home? Our prisons are fallen, our bodies are dead to many former uses; Our palate dead in a tastlesnesse, Our stomach dead in an indigestiblenesse; our feete dead in a lamenesse, and our invention in a dulnesse, and our memory in a forgetfulnesse; and yet, as a man that should love the ground, where his prison stood, we love this clay, that was a body in the dayes of our youth, and but our prison then, when it was at best; wee abhorre the graves of our bodies; and the body, which, in the best vigour thereof, was but the grave of the soule, we over-love. Pharaohs Butler, and his Baker went both out of prison in a day; and in both cases, Ioseph, in the interpretation of their dreames, calls that, (their very discharge out of prison) a lifting up of their heads, a kinde of preferment: Death raises every man alike, so far, as that it delivers every man from his prison, from the incumbrances of this body: both Baker and Butler were delivered of their prison; but they passed into divers states after, one to the restitution of his place, the other to an ignominious execution. Of thy prison thou shalt be delivered whether thou wilt or no; thou must die; Foole, this night thy soule may be taken from thee; and then, what thou shalt be to morrow, prophecy upon thy selfe, by that which thou hast done to day; If thou didst depart from that Table in peace, thou canst canſt depart from this world in peace. And the peace of that Table is, to come to it in pace deſiderii, with a contented minde, and with an enjoying of thoſe temporall bleſſings which thou haſt, without macerating thy ſelf, without uſurping upon others, without murmuring at God; And to be at that Table, in pace cogitationum, in the peace of the Church, without the ſpirit of contradiction, or inquiſition, without uncharitableneſſe towards others, without curioſity in thy ſelfe: And then to come from that Table in pace domeſtica, with a boſome peace, in thine own Conſcience, in that ſeale of thy reconciliation, in that Sacrament; that ſo, riding at that Anchor, and in that calme, whether God enlarge thy voyage, by enlarging thy life, or put thee into the harbour, by the breath, by the breathleſneſſe of Death, either way, Eaſt or Weſt, thou maiſt depart in peace, according to his word, that is, as he ſhall be pleaſed to manifeſt his pleaſure upon thee.

SERMON V.

Preached at Pauls, upon Chriſtmas Day. 1627.

EXOD. 4. 13.

O my Lord, ſend I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt ſend.

IT hath been ſuſpitiouſly doubted, more then that, freely diſputed, more then that too, abſolutely denied, that Chriſt was born the five and twentieth of December, that this is Chriſtmas-day: yet for all theſe doubts, and diſputations, and denials, we forbeare not, with the whole Church of God, conſtantly and confidently to celebrate this for his Day. It hath been doubted, and diſputed, and denied too, that this Text, O my Lord, ſend I pray thee, by the hand of him, whom thou wilt ſend, hath any relation to the ſending of the Meſſiah, to the comming of Chriſt, to Chriſtmas-day; yet we forbeare not to wait upon the ancient Fathers, and as they ſaid, to ſay, that Moſes having received a commandement from God, to undertake that great employment of delivering the children of Iſrael from the oppreſſions of Pharaoh in Ægypt, and having excuſed himſelfe by ſome other modeſt and pious pretences, at laſt, when God preſſed the imployment ſtill upon him, he determines all in this, O my Lord, ſend I pray thee, by the hand of him, whom thou wilt ſend, or, (as it is in our Margin) when thou ſhouldeſt ſend. It is a work, next to the great work of the redemption of the whole world, to redeem Iſrael out of Ægypt; And therefore doe both workes at once, put both into one hand, and mitte quem miſſurus es, ſend him, whom I know, thou wilt ſend, him, whom purſuing thine own decree, thou ſhouldeſt ſend, ſend Chriſt, ſend him now, to redeem Iſrael from Ægypt.

Theſe words then (though ſome have made that interpretation of them, and truly, not without a faire apparance, and probability, and veriſimilitude) doe not neceſſarily imply a ſlackneſſe in Moſes zeale, that he deſired not affectionately, and earneſtly the deliverance of his Nation from the preſſures of Ægypt; nor doe they imply any diffidence, or diſtruſt, that God could not, or would not endow him with faculties fit for that imployment; But, as a thoughtfull man, a penſive, a conſiderative man, that ſtands ſtill for a while, with his eyes fixed upon the ground, before his feete, when he caſts up his head, hath preſently, inſtantly the Sun, or the heavens for his object, he ſees not a tree, nor a houſe, nor a ſteeple by the way, but as ſoon as his eye is departed from the earth where it was long fixed, the next thing he ſees is the Sun or the heavens; ſo when Moſes had fixed himſelfe long upon the conſideration of his own inſufficiency for this ſervice, when he tooke his eye from that low peece of ground, Himſelfe, conſidered as he was then, he fell upon no tree, no houſe, no ſteeple, no ſuch conſideration as this, God may endow me, improve me, exalt me, enable me, qualifie me with faculties fit for this ſervice, but his firſt object was that which preſented an infallibility with it, Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe, the Meſſias himſelfe, and the firſt petition that he offers to God is this, O my Lord ſend I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt ſend. For me, as I am, I am altogether unfit; when thou ſhalt be pleaſed to work upon me, thou wilt finde me but ſtone, hard to receive thy holy impreſſions, and then but ſnow, eaſie to melt, and loſe thoſe holy formes again: There muſt be labour laid, and perchance labour loſt upon me; but put the buſineſſe into a ſafe hand, and under an infallible inſtrument, and Mitte quem miſſurus es, ſend him whom, I know, thou wilt ſend, him, whom, purſuing thine own decree, thou ſhouldeſt ſend, ſend him, ſend Chriſt now. A

Diviſio. As much as Paradiſe exceeded all the places of the earth, doe the Scriptures of God exceed Paradiſe. In the midſt of Paradiſe grew the Tree of knowledge, and the tree of life: In this Paradiſe, the Scripture, every word is both thoſe Trees; there is Life and Knowledge in every word of the Word of God. That Germen Iehova, as the Prophet Eſay calls Chriſt, that Off-ſpring of Jehova; that Bud, that Bloſſome, that fruit of God himſelfe, the Son of God, the Meſſiah, the Redeemer, Chriſt Jeſus, growes upon every tree in this Paradiſe, the Scripture; for Chriſt was the occaſion before, and is the conſummation after, of all Scripture. This have I written (ſayes S. Iohn,) and ſo ſay all the Pen-men of the holy Ghoſt, in all that they have written, This have we written, that ye may know that ye have eternall life. Knowledge and life growes upon every tree in this Paradiſe, upon every word in this Booke, becauſe upon every Tree here, upon every word, grows Chriſt himſelfe, in ſome relation. B

1 Iohn 5.13.

From this Branch, this Text, O my Lord ſend, I pray thee by the hand of him, whom thou wilt ſend, we ſhall not ſo much ſtand, to gather here and there an Apple, that is, to conſider ſome particular words of the Text it ſelfe, as endeavour to ſhake the whole tree, that is, the Context, and coherence and dependance of the words: for, ſince all that paſſed between God and Moſes in this affaire, and negotiation, Gods employing of Moſes, and Moſes preſenting his excuſes to God, and Gods taking of all thoſe excuſes, determines in our Text, in our Text is the whole ſtory, virtually and radically implyed; And therefore, by juſt occaſion thereof, we ſhall conſider firſt, That though for the ordinary duties of our callings, ariſing out of the evidence of expreſſe Scriptures, we are allowed no hæſitation, no diſputation, whether we will doe them or no; but they require a preſent, and an exact execution thereof: yet in extraordinary caſes, and in ſuch actions as are not laid upon us, by any former and permanent notification thereof in Scripture, ſuch as was Moſes caſe here, to undertake the deliverance of Iſrael from Egypt; in ſuch caſes, not onely ſome hæſitation, ſome deliberation, ſome conſultation in our ſelves, but ſome expoſtulation with God himſelfe, may be excuſable in us. We ſhall therefore ſee, that Moſes did excuſe himſelf four wayes; And how God was pleaſed to joyn iſſue with him in all foure, and to caſt him, and overcome him in them all: And when we come to conſider his fift, which is rather a Diverſion upon another, then an Excuſe in himſelfe, and yet, is that, which is moſt literally in our Text, O my Lord ſend, I pray thee, by the hand of him, whom thou wilt ſend, becauſe this was a thing which God had reſerved wholly to himſelfe, The ſending of Chriſt: we ſhall ſee, that God would not have been preſſed for that, but, (as it followes immediately, and is alſo a bough of this tree, that is, grows out of this Text) God was angry; But yet (as we ſhall ſee in the due place) it was but ſuch an anger, as ended in an Inſtruction, rather then in an Increpation; and in an Encouragement, rather then in a Deſertion, for he eſtabliſhed Moſes in a reſolution to undertake the worke, by joyning his brother Aaron in commiſſion with him. So then, wee have ſhak'd the tree, that is, reſolv'd and analyz'd the Context, of all which, the Text it ſelfe is the root, and the ſeale. And, as we have preſented to your ſight, we ſhall farther offer to your taſt, and digeſtion, and rumination, theſe particular fruits; Firſt, that ordinary Duties require a preſent execution; Secondly, that in Extraordinary, God allowes a Deliberation, and requires not an implicite, a blind obedience: And in a third place, wee ſhall give you thoſe foure circumſtances, that accompanied, or conſtituted Moſes deliberation, and Gods removing of thoſe foure impediments: And in a fourth roome, that Conſultation or Diverſion, The ſending of Chriſt: And in that, How God was affected with it, He was angry: angry that Moſes would offer to looke into thoſe things, which he had lockt up in his ſecret counſels, ſuch as that ſending of Chriſt, which he intended: C D E

But

A But yet, not angry ſo, as that he left Moſes unſatisfied, or un-accommodated for the maine buſineſſe, but ſetled him in a holy and chearfull readineſſe to obey his commandement. And through all theſe particulars, we ſhall paſſe, with as much clearneſſe, as the waight, and as much ſhortneſſe, as the number will permit.

Firſt then, our firſt Conſideration conſtitutes that Propoſition, Ordinary Duties, ariſing out of the Evidence of Gods Word, require a preſent Execution. There are Duties that binde us ſemper, and ad ſemper, as our Caſuiſts ſpeak; we are Alwayes bound to doe them, and bound to doe them Alwayes; that is, Alwayes to produce Actus elicitos, Determinate acts, Succeſſive and Conſecutive acts, conformable to thoſe Duties; whereas in ſome other Duties, we are onely bound to an Habituall diſpoſition, to doe them in ſuch and ſuch neceſſary caſes; And thoſe Actions of the later ſort, fall in Genere Deliberativo, we may conſider Circumſtances, before we fall under a neceſſity of doB ing them; that is, of doing them Then, or doing them Thus: Of which kind, even thoſe great duties of Praying, and Faſting are; for we are alwayes bound to Pray, and alwayes bound to Faſt; but not bound to faſt alwayes, nor alwayes to pray. But for Actions of the firſt kind, ſuch as are the worſhipping of God, and the not worſhipping of Images; ſuch as are the ſanctifying of Gods Sabbaths, and the not blaſpheming of his Name, which ariſe out of cleare and evident commands of God; they admit no Deliberation, but require a preſent Execution. Therefore as S. Stephen ſaw Chriſt, ſtanding at the right hand of his Father, (a poſture that denotes firſt a readineſſe to ſurvay, and take knowledge of our diſtreſſes, and then a readineſſe to proceed, and come forth to our aſſiſtance) ſo in our Liturgie, in our Service, in the Congregation, we ſtand up at the profeſſion of the Creed, at the rehearſing the Articles of our Faith, thereby to declare to God, and his Church, our readineſſe to ſtand to, and our readineſſe to proceed in that Profeſſion. The
C commendation which is given of Andrew, and Peter for obeying Chriſts call, lyes not ſo much in the Reliquerunt retia, that they left their nets, as in the Protinus reliquerunt, that forthwith, immediately, without farther deliberation, they left their nets, the meanes of their livelyhood, and followed Chriſt. The Lord and his Spirit hath anointed us to preach, ſayes the Prophet Eſay: To preach what? Acceptabilem annum, to preach the acceptable yeare of the Lord. All the yeare long the Lord ſtands with his armes open to embrace you, and all the yeare long we pray you in Chriſts ſtead, that you would be reconciled to God. But yet, God would faine reduce it to a narrower compaſſe of time, Hodie ſi vocem ejus audieritis, that you would heare his voyce to day, and not harden your hearts to day: And to a narrower compaſſe then that, Dabitur in illa hora, ſayes Chriſt, The holy Ghoſt ſhall teach you in that houre: In this houre the holy Ghoſt offers himſelfe unto you: And to a narrower compaſſe then an houre, Beati qui nunc eſuritis, qui nunc fletis, Bleſſed are ye
D that hunger now, and that mourn now, that put not off yeares, nor dayes, nor hours, but come to a ſenſe of your ſins, and of the meanes of reconciliation to God, now, this minute. And therefore, when ye reade, Iuſta pondera, juſt weights, and juſt balances, and juſt meaſures, a juſt Hin, and a juſt Ephah ſhall ye have, I am the Lord your God, Do not you ſay, ſo I will hereafter, I will come to juſt weights and meaſures, and to deale uprightly in the world, as ſoon as I have made a fortune, eſtabliſhed a ſtate, raiſed a competency for wife and children, but yet I muſt doe as other men doe; when you reade Remember that you keep holy the Sabbath day, (and by the way, remember that God hath called his other holy dayes, and holy convocations, Sabbaths too) remember that you celebrate his Sabbaths by your preſence here, doe not you ſay, ſo I will if I can riſe time enough, if I can dine ſoon enough; when you reade, ſweare not at all, doe not you ſay, no more I would but that I live amongſt men that will not beleeve me without ſwearing, and laugh at me
E if I did not ſweare; for duties of this kinde, permanent and conſtant duties ariſing out of the evidence of Gods word, ſuch as juſt and true dealing with men, ſuch as keeping Gods Sabbaths, ſuch as not blaſpheming his name, have no latitude about them, no conditions in them; they have no circumſtance, but are all ſubſtance, no apparell, but are all body, no body, but are all ſoule, no matter, but are all forme; They are not in Genere deliberativo, they admit no deliberation, but require an immediate, and an exact execution.

But then, for extraordinary things, things that have not their evidence in the word of God formerly revealed unto us, whether we conſider matters of Doctrine, and new opinions, or matter of Practiſe, and new commands, from what depth of learning ſoever that that new opinion ſeeme to us to riſe, or from heighth of Power ſoever that new-Command ſeeme to fall, it is ſtill in genere deliberativo, ſtill we are allowed, nay ſtill wee are commanded to deliberate, to doubt, to conſider, before we execute. As a good Author in the Roman Church, ſayes, Perniciosius eſt Eccleſiæ, It is more dangerous to the Church, to accept an Apocryphall book for Canonicall, then to reject a Canonicall booke for Apocryphall: ſo may it be more dangerous, to doe ſome things, which to a diſtempered man may ſeeme to be commanded by God, then to forbeare ſome things, which are truely commanded by him. God had rather that himſelfe ſhould be ſuſpected, then that a falſe god ſhould be admitted. The eaſineſſe of admitting Revelations, and Viſions, and Apparitions of ſpirits, and Purgatory ſouls in the Roman Church; And then, the over-bending, and ſuper-exaltation of zeale, and the captivity to the private ſpirit, which ſome have fallen into, that have not beene content to conſiſt in moderate, and middle wayes in the Reformed Church; this eaſineſſe of admitting imaginary apparitions of ſpirits in the Papiſt, and this eaſineſſe of ſubmitting to the private ſpirit, in the Schiſmatike, hath produced effects equally miſchievous: Melancholy being made the ſeat of Religion on the one ſide, by the Papiſt, and Phrenzy on the other ſide, by the Schiſmatick. Multi, præ ſtudio immoderato intendi in contrarium aberrarunt à medio, was the obſervation and the complaint of that Father in his time, and his prophecy of ours; That many times, an over-vehement bending into ſome way of our owne chooſing, does not onely withdraw us from the left hand way, the way of ſuperſtition, and Idolatry, from which wee ſhould all draw, but from the middle way too, in which we ſhould ſtand, and walk. And then, the danger is thus great, facile in omnia flagitia impulit, quos religione decepit diabolus; As God doth, the devill alſo doth make Zeal and Religion his inſtrument. And in other tentations, the devill is but a ſerpent; but in this, when he makes zeale and religion his inſtrument, he is a Lyon. As long as the devill doth but ſay, Doe this, or thou wilt live a foole, and dye a begger; Doe this, or thou canſt not live in this world, the devill is but a devill, he playes but a devils part, a lyer, a ſeducer; But when the devill comes to ſay, Doe this, or thou canſt not live in the next world, thou canſt not be ſaved, here the devill pretends to be God, here he acts Gods part, and ſo prevails the more powerfully upon us. And then, when men are ſo miſ-tranſported, either in opinions, or in actions, with this private ſpirit, and inordinate zeale, Quibus non poteſt auferre fidem, aufert charitatem, ſayes the ſame Father, Though the devill hath not quenched faith in that man himſelfe, yet he hath quenched that mans charity towards other men; Though that man might be ſaved, in that opinion which he holds, becauſe (perchance) that opinion deſtroyes no fundamentall point, yet his ſalvation is ſhrewdly ſhaked, and endangered, in his uncharitable thinking, that no body can be ſaved that thinks otherwiſe. And as it works thus to an uncharitableneſſe in private, ſo doth it to turbulency, and ſedition in the publique. Of which, we have a pregnant, and an aplyable example in the life of Conſtantine the Emperour; In his time, there aroſe ſome new queſtions, and new opinions in ſome points of Religion; the Emperor writ alike to both parties, thus: De rebus ejuſmodi, nec omnino rogetis, nec rogati reſpondeatis: Doe you move no queſtions, in ſuch things, your ſelves; and if any other doe, yet be not you too forward, to write, ſo much as againſt them. What queſtions doth he meane? That is expreſſed, Quas nulla lex, Canonve Eccleſiaſticus neceſſario præſcribit; Such queſtions, as are not evidently declared, and more then evidently declared, neceſſarily enjoyned by ſome law, ſome rule, ſome Canon of the Church: Diſturbe not the peace of the Church, upon Inferences, and Conſequences, but deale onely upon thoſe things, which are evidently declared in the Articles, and neceſſarily enjoyned by the Church. And yet, though that Emperor declared himſelfe on neither ſide, nor did any act in favour of either ſide, yet becauſe he did not declare himſelfe on their ſide, thoſe promovers of theſe new opinions, Eo pervenere, (ſayes that Author) ut imagines Imperatoris violarint, They came as far as they could, to violate the perſon of the Emperour, for they violated and defac'd his ſtatues, his images, his pictures, the enſigns of his power and honour; And in this inſolency they continued (ſayes that Author) even after the Emperour had ſilenced both parties; when he, by his expreſſe Edict, had forbidden both ſides to write, the promovers of the new opinions would write. Still ſuch men think, that whatſoeuer they think, is not onely true in it ſelfe, but neceſſary for ſalvation to every man; whereas new opinions, that may vary from the Scriptures; new commands, that may vary from the Church, are ſtill in Genere deliberativo, they admit, they

A they require Deliberation. Blinde and implicite faith ſhall not ſave us in matter of Doctrine, nor blinde and implicite obedience, in matter of practice; neither is there any faith ſo blinde, and implicite, as to beleeve thoſe imaginary apparitions of ſpirits, nor any obedience ſo blinde and implicite, as to obey our owne private ſpirit, and diſtempered zeale. Truly, I ſhould hope better of their ſalvation, who in the firſt darker times, doubted of the Revelations of St. Iohn, then of theirs, who in theſe cleare and evident times, accept, and enjoyne, and magnifie, ſo much as they doe in the Romane Church, the Revelations of St. Brigid: And I ſhould rather accompany them, who out of their charitable moderation, doe beleeve, that ſome Chriſtians, though poſſeſſed with ſome errours, may be ſaved, then them, who out of their paſſionate ſeverity, firſt call every difference from themſelves, an errour; and then every errour, damnable; and doe not onely pronounce, that none that holds any ſuch errour, can bee ſaved, but that no man,
B though he hold none of thoſe errours himſelfe, can be ſaved, if he think any man can be ſaved, that holds them. And ſo we have done with thoſe two propoſitions, which are the walls upon which our whole fraime is to be laid; That ordinary duties require a preſent execution, that was our firſt: but extraordinary admit deliberation, that was our ſecond Conſideration; And now our third is, to conſider Moſes caſe in particular, as it was an example of both.

As Moſes was an example of the preſent performance of an evident duty, we carry you back, to the former chapter, where this roote, this Text is firſt laid, that is, this employment firſt begun to be notified. There ver. 4. God calls Moſes, and he calls him by name, and by name twice, Moſes, Moſes. Of this, Moſes could not be ignorant; and therefore he comes to a preſent diſcharge of this duty to a preſent anſwer, ecce adſum, Lord, here I am. This is the advantage of innocence above guiltineſſe; God called Adam in Para-
C diſe, and he called him by name, and with a particular inquiſition, Adam, ubi es? Adam, where art thou? And Adam hid himſelfe; God calls Moſes, and Moſes anſwers. Hee that is uſed to heare God, at home, in his conſcience, and in his eares, at Church, and uſed to anſwer God, in both places, at home in his private meditations, and in publique devotions at Church; he that is uſed to heare, and uſed to anſwer God thus, ſhall be glad to heare him, in his laſt voice, in his Angels Trumpets, and to that voice, Surgite qui dormitis, Ariſe thou that ſleepeſt in the duſt, and ſtand up to Judgement, as he ſhall have inveſted the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt Jeſus, he ſhall anſwer in the very words of Chriſt Jeſus; I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive, for evermore, Amen. In this evident duty then, Moſes permitted himſelfe no liberty; God called, and he anſwered inſtantly; He anſwered in action, as well as in words; and, indeed, that is our loudeſt, and moſt muſicall anſwer, to anſwer God, in deed, in action. So Moſes did; He came, he D haſtned to the place, where God ſpake. It is one good argument of piety, to love the place where God ſpeakes, the houſe of his preſence. But yet Moſes received an inhibition from God there, ne appropies, Come not too neare, too cloſe to this place. God loves that we ſhould come to him here, in his houſe; but God would not have us preſſe too cloſe upon him here; we muſt not be too familiar, too fellowly, too homely with God, here at home, in his houſe, nor loath to uncover our head, or bow our knee at his name. When God proceeded farther with Moſes, and comes to ſay, deſcendi ut liberem, I am come downe to deliver Iſrael from Egypt, (which was the firſt intimation that God gave of that purpoſe) Moſes likes that well enough, oppoſes nothing to that, that God would be pleaſed to thinke of ſome courſe for delivering of Iſrael, and enable ſome Inſtrument for that worke; for that is, for the moſt part Gods deſcending, and his comming down,
E to put his power inſtrumentally, miniſterially, into the hand of another; Generall things, and remote things doe not much affect us; Moſes ſayes nothing to Gods generall propoſition; That he was come downe to deliver Iſrael, but when God comes to that particular, veni ergo ut mittam te, Come therefore that I may ſend thee, him into Egypt, Moſes to Pharaoh, this was a Rock in his Sea, and a Remora upon his Ship, a Hill in his way, and a Snake in his path. Some light, that this was about the time, when Iſrael ſhould be delivered, there was before. Moſes takes knowledge, that God had promiſed Abraham, that after foure generations, they ſhould come back; and the foure generations were come about. Some light, that Moſes ſhould be the man, by whom they ſhould bee delivered, it ſeemes there was before; for upon that hiſtory which is in the ſecond chapter of this booke, that Moſes ſlew an Egyptian who oppreſſed one of his Countrymen,

St.

Acts 7.25. St. Stephen, in his owne Funerall Sermon, ſayes, That Moſes, in that act ſuppoſed, his brethren would have underſtood, how that God, by his hand would deliver them, but they underſtood it not. So that it ſeemes ſome ſuch thing had gone out in voyce, ſome revelation, ſome intimation, ſome emanation of ſome kinde of light there had beene, by which they might have underſtood it, though they did not. But when Moſes remembers now, that that ſucceeded not, that they apprehended not the offer of his ſervice then, and that he was now growne to be eighty yeares old, and that forty of that eighty had been ſpent in an obſcure, in a Shepherds life, and that he muſt now be ſent, not onely to worke upon that people, who ſhewed no forwardneſſe towards him then, and might abſolutely have forgotten him now, but upon Pharaoh himſelfe, this created in Moſes this hæſitation, this deliberation; perchance not without ſome tincture of infirmity, but farre from any degree of impiety; perchance not without ſome expoſtulation with God, but farre from any reluctation againſt God. Conſider Abraham; Abraham the Father of the faithfull; of whom, as the Apoſtle ſayes, that he hoped beyond hope, we may ſay, that he beleeved beyond faith, for, (as he ſayes) he followed God, not knowing whither he led him; Gen.18.22. Abraham came to another manner of expoſtulation with God, in the behalfe of Sodome; He ſayes to God, wilt thou deſtroy the righteous with the wicked? Abſit, be that farre from thee; and he repeats it Abſit, be that farre from thee; and he pleads it with God, Shall not the Iudge of all the earth doe right? Now as St. Paul ſayes of Eſay, Eſay was bold when he ſaid thus and thus; ſo we may ſay of Abraham, Abraham was bold, when he could conceive ſuch an imagination, that God would deſtroy the righteous with the wicked, or that the Judge of all the earth ſhould not doe right; yet Abraham is not blamed for this. Mat.16.23. Conſider St. Peters proceeding with Chriſt; he comes to a rebuking of Chriſt, and to a more vehement abſit, Lord be this far from thee, this ſhall not be unto thee, ſpeaking of his going up to Jeruſalem, upon which journey dependeth the whole work of our redemption. And though S. Peter incurred an increpation from Chriſt, yet that which he did, was rooted in love, and piety, though it were mixt with inconſideration. S. Peter went farther then Abraham, but Abraham farther then Moſes; As therefore that firſt Revelation, which Moſes may ſeeme to have received, when he was forty yeares before this, in Egypt, did not ſo binde him, to a preſent proſecution of that work of their deliverance, but that, upon occaſion he did withdraw himſelfe from Egypt, and continue from thence, in a forty yeares abſence; ſo neither did this intimation, which he received from God now, ſo binde him up, but that hee might piouſly preſent his owne unfitneſſe for that employment; for it does not ſo much imply a deniall to undertake the ſervice, as a petition, that God would ſuper-endow him, with parts, and faculties, fit for that ſervice; It is farre from that ſtubborne ſonnes non ibo, I will not goe to work in that Vineyard; But it is onely this, except God doe ſomewhat for me before I goe, I ſhall be very unfit to goe: And that any Ambaſſadour may ſay to his Prince, any Miniſter of State to his Maſter, any Meſſenger of God to God himſelfe. And therefore good occaſion of doctrines of edification offering it ſelfe from that conſideration, wee ſhall inſiſt a little, upon each of his excuſes, though they be foure.

Quis ego. His firſt proſpect that he looks upon in himſelf, his firſt object, that by way of objection he makes to God, is himſelf, and his owne unworthineſſe. To conſider others, is but to travaile: to be at home, is to conſider our ſelves: upon others we can looke, but in oblique lines; onely upon our ſelves, in direct. Man is but earth; Tis true; but earth is the center. That man who dwels upon himſelf, who is alwaies converſant in himſelf, reſts in his true center. Man is a celeſtiall creature too, a heavenly creature; and that man that dwels upon himſelfe, that hath his converſation in himſelfe, hath his converſation in heaven. If you weigh any thing in a ſcale, the greater it is, the lower it ſinkes; as you grow greater and greater in the eyes of the world, ſinke lower and lower in your owne. If thou aſk thy ſelf Quis ego, what am I? and beeſt able to anſwer thy ſelfe, why now I am a man of title, of honour, of place, of power, of poſſeſſions, a man fit for a Chronicle, a man conſiderable in the Heralds Office, goe to the Heralds Office, the ſpheare and element of Honour, and thou ſhalt finde thoſe men as buſie there, about the conſideration of Funerals, as about the conſideration of Creations; thou ſhalt finde that office to be as well the Grave, as the Cradle of Honour; And thou ſhalt finde in that Office as many Records of attainted families, and eſcheated families, and empoveriſhed and forgotten, and obliterate families, as of families newly erected and preſently celebrated. In what heighth ſoever, any of

A of you that ſit here, ſtand at home, there is ſome other in ſome higher ſtation then yours, that weighs you downe: And he that ſtands in the higheſt of ſubordinate heighths, nay in the higheſt ſupreme heighth in this world, is weighed downe, by that, which is nothing; for what is any Monarch to the whole world? and the whole world is but that; but what? but nothing. What man amongſt us lookes Moſes way, firſt upon himſelfe; perchance enow doe ſo; but who lookes Moſes way, and by Moſes light? firſt upon himſelfe, and in himſelfe, firſt upon his owne inſufficiencies; what man amongſt us, that is named to any place, by the good opinion of others, or that cals upon others, and begs, and buyes their good opinion for that place, begins at Moſes, Quis ego? What am I? where have I ſtudied and practiſed ſufficiently before, that I ſhould fill ſuch or ſuch a place of Judicature? Quis ego? What am I? where have I ſerved, and laboured, and preached in inferiour places of the Church, that I ſhould fill ſuch or a ſuch a place of Dignity or
B prelacy there? Quis ego? What am I? where have I ſeene and encountred, and diſcomfited the enemy, that I ſhould fill ſuch or ſuch a place of Command in an army? There is not an Abraham left to ſay, Pulvis & Cinis, O my Lord, I am but duſt and aſhes; not a Iacob left to ſay, Non ſum dignus, O my Lord I am not worthy of the leaſt of theſe preferments; not a David left to ſay, Canis mortuus, & pulex, O my Lord I am but a dead dog, and a flea; But every man is vapor'd up into ayre; and, as the ayre can, hee thinkes he can fill any place: Every man is under that complicated diſeaſe, and that ridling diſtemper, not to be content with the moſt, and yet to be proud of the leaſt thing hee hath; that when he lookes upon men, he diſpiſes them, becauſe he is ſome kind of Officer, and when he looks upon God, hee murmures at him, becauſe he made him not a King. But if man will not come to his Quis ego? who am I? to a due conſideration of himſelfe, God will come to his Quis tu? who art thou? and to his Amice quomodo intraſti?
C friend how came you in? To every man that comes in by undue meanes, God ſhall ſay, as firſt to us, in our profeſſion, what hadſt thou to doe, to take my word into thy mouth? ſo to others in theirs, what hadſt thou to doe, to take my ſword into thy hand? Onely to thoſe who are little in their owne eyes, ſhall God ſay, as Chriſt ſaid to his Church, Noli timere, feare not little flock, for it is your Fathers good pleaſure to give you the Kingdome. It is not called a Kingdome, but the Kingdome; that Kingdome, which alone, is worth all the kingdomes that the devill ſhewed Chriſt, The Kingdome of Heaven. Be but a worme and no man, as David ſpeakes even in the perſon of Chriſt; finde thy ſelfe troden under foot, and under thine owne foot, that is, depreſſed in thine owne eſtimation, and God ſhall raiſe thee with that ſupportation, Feare not thou worme of Iacob, ye men of Iſrael. Be but wormes and no more, in your owne eyes, and God ſhall make you men, bee but men and no more in your owne eyes, and GOD ſhall make you
D the men of his Iſrael. This was Moſes way; not a running away from God, but a turning into himſelfe; not a reluctation againſt God, but a conſideration of himſelfe. For, though the lazy mans Quis ego, ſhall not profit him, when he ſhall ſay, what am I? I am but one man, I can doe nothing alone, and ſo leave all reformation un-attempted in his place, becauſe others will reforme nothing in theirs; (for, that which David ſaies, If thou ſaweſt a thiefe, Currebas, thou didſt riſe and run with him, is not much worſe, then when thou ſeeſt a lazy man, to lye downe and ſleepe with him) Though this mans Quis ego, what am I? ſhall not profit him, for it is but the voice of prevarication, in the ordinary duties of his calling, yet in Moſes caſe, in every undertaking of a new action, this examination, this exinanition of our ſelves is acceptable in the ſight of God. And therefore Calvin ſaies juſtly of this particular, in Moſes caſe, Non modo culpa vacare, ſed laude dignum puto, that Moſes in this his proceeding with God, was ſo far from deſerving blame, that
E hee deſerved much praiſe. And ſo it ſeemes, God himſelfe interpreted it, and accepted it; for firſt, for his way, he gives him that aſſurance, Certainely I will be with thee; and then for the end, and the effect too, he directs him thus, when thou haſt brought forth the people out of Egypt (as, certainely this people thou ſhalt bring from thence) then ſhall they ſerve God upon this Mountaine. And further we may not carry the conſideration of Moſes firſt excuſe, ariſing out of the contemplation of his owne inſufficiency, in generall.

V. 12.

The ſecond doubt and difficulty that Moſes makes to himſelfe, and preſents to God, is this, that hee was not able to tell them to whom he was ſent, his name that ſent him. When I am come to them, ſaies Moſes to God, and ſhall ſay, thou haſt ſent me, and they ſhall ſay, what is his Name, what ſhall I ſay unto them? In Euſebius his hiſtory, A Tyran, a perſecutor, askes askes a martyr, Artalus, in the midst of his torments, in scorne and contempt, What is your Gods name? you pretende a necessity of worshipping a new God, your God, but what shall we call your God, what is your Gods name? And the Martyr answered, Qui plures sunt, nominibus decernuntur, qui unus est, nomine non indiget: You who worship many Gods, need many names to distinguish your Gods by; we, who know but one God, need no other name of God, but God; wee who worship the onely true God, need not the semi-gods, nor the sesqui-gods of the Romane Church; not their semi-gods, their halfe-gods, men beatified, but not sanctified; made private gods, but not publique gods; chamber-gods, but not Church-gods; nor any sesqui-god, any that must be more then God, and receive appeales from God, and reverse the decrees of God, which they make the office of the Virgin Mary, whom no man can honour too much, that makes her not God, and they dishonour most, that make her so much more. But yet, some names, some notifications of God, no doubt the Jews had: Moses sayes here, that he would tell them, that the God of their Fathers had sent him; which was a name of specification, and distinction of this G O D, from all the gods of the Gentiles. But in this place, Moses desires such a name of God, as might not onely intimate to them to whom he was sent, a great power in that Prince that sent him, but might also intimate a great privacy, and confidence in him that was sent; A name, by which he might be knowne, to know more of that God, then other men knew; for, nothing advances a busines more, then when hee that is employed, is beleeved to know the mind, and to have the heart of him, that sends him. Therefore God gives Moses a cyphar; God declares to Moses, his bosome name, his viscerall name, his radicall, his fundamentall name, the name of his Essence, Qui sum, I am; Goe, and tell them, that he whose name is I am, hath sent thee. It is true, that literally in the Originall, this name is conceived in the future; it is there, Qui ero, I that shall be. But this present acceptation, I am, hath passed through all Translators, and all Commentors, and Fathers, and Councels, and Schooles, and the whole Church of God rests in it. And I know but one, (who is of the Reformation, and of the most rigid sub-division in the Reformation, and who hath many other singularities besides this) that will needs translate this name, Qui eram, I was. Howsoever, all intend, that this is a name that denotes Essence, Beeing: Beeing is the name of God, and of God onely: for, of every other creature, Plato saies well, Ejus nomen est potius non esse; The name of the Creator is, I am, but of every creature rather, I am not, I am nothing. Hee considers it, and concludes it, in the best, and noblest of creatures, Man; for, he, as well as the rest, plus habet non entis, quam entis; Man hath more privatives, then positives in him; Man hath but his owne beeing; Man hath not the beeing of an Angel, nor the beeing of a lyon; God hath all in a kind of eminence more excellently then the kinds themselves, onely his name is I am. Plato pursues this consideration usefully; Habuit ante aternum non esse, Man had an eternall not beeing before; that is, before the creation; for those infinite millions of millions of generations before the Creation, there was a God, whose name was I am; but till within these sixe thousand yeares, Man was not, there was no man. And so saies Plato, Haberet aternum non esse, as Man had an eternall not beeing before the Creation; so he would have another eternall not-being after his dissolution by death, in soule, as well as in body, if God did not preserve that beeing, which he hath imprinted in both, in both. And jam dum est, saies he, As man had one eternall not beeing before, and would have another after, so for that beeing which he seemes to have here now, it is a continuall declination into a not being, because he is in continuall change, and mutation, quæ desinit in non esse, as he saies well; Every change and mutation bends to a not beeing, because in every change, it comes to a not being that which it was before; onely the name of God is I am.

Piscator.

In which name, God gave Moses, and does give us who are also his Embassadors, so much knowledge of himselfe, as that we may tell you, though not what God is, yet, that God is; God, in the notification of this name, sends us sufficiently instructed, to establish you in the assurance of an everlasting, and an ever-ready God, but not to scatter you with unnecessary speculations, and impertinencies concerning this God. He is no fit messenger between God and his Church, that knowes not Gods name; that is, how God hath notified, and manifested himselfe to man. God hath manifested himselfe to man in Christ; and manifested Christ in the Scriptures; and manifested the Scriptures in the Church; the name of God is the notification of God; how God will be called by

A by man, and that is, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and how God will be called upon by man, that is, that all our prayers to God be directed in, and through, and by, and for Christ Jesus. If we know the name of God, Qui sum, I am, that is, beleeve Christ Jesus, whom we worship to have been from all eternity, to be God; and then for more particular points, beleeve those Doctrines, quæ sunt, which are, that is, Quæ sunt ubique, & semper, as Lyrinensis sayes, which have been alwayes beleeved, and alwayes beleeved to have been necessary to be beleeved as articles of Faith, through the whole Catholique Church, if we know the name of God thus, we have our Commission, and our qualification in that Gospell, Goe, and teach all Nations, and baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost; that is the name of God to a Christian, the Trinity. And least that Commission so delivered in the generall and fundamentall manner, professing the Trinity, should not seem enough, it is repeated and paraphrased in the B verse following, Teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. First there is a Teaching; good life it self is but a commentary, an exposition upon our preaching; that which is first laid upon us is preaching; and then teach them to observe, that is, to practise; breed them not in an opinion that such a faith as is without workes is enough; and teach them to observe All; For, for matter of practice, He that breakes one Law is guilty of all, and he that thinkes to serve God by way of compensation, that is, to recompense God by doing one duty, for the omission of another, sins even in that, in which he thinkes he serves God; and for matter of beleefe, he that beleeves not all, solvit Iesum, as S. John speakes, he takes Jesus in peeces, and after the Jews have crucified him, he dissects him, and makes him an Anatomy. We must therefore teach all; but then it is but all, which Christ hath commanded us; additionall and traditionall doctrines of the Papist, speculative and dazling, riddling and entangling perplexities of the C Schoole, passionate, and uncharitable wranglings of Controverters, these fall not in Moses Commission, nor ours, who participate of his; we are to deliver to you by the Ordinance of God, Preaching, The name of God, that is, how God hath manifested himself to man, and how God will be called upon by man, That God is your God in Christ, if you receive Christ in the Scriptures, applyed in the Church. And farther we carry not our consideration upon this second excuse of Moses, in which (as in the former, he considered his insufficiency in the generall) he considers it in this, that he had not studied, he had not acquired, he had not sought the knowledge of those Mysteries which appertained to that calling, implyed in that, that he did not know Gods name.

His third excuse, which induces a great discouragement, arises out of a defect in nature, whereas the former is rather of art, and study, and consideration; and to be naturally defective in those faculties, which are essentiall and necessary to that work, which D is under our hand, is a great discouragement. Lameness is not alwayes an insupportable calamity; but for Mephibosheth to have been hindred by lameness then, when he should have received favour from the King, and setled his inheritance, this was a heavy affliction. Lowness of stature is no insupportable thing; but when Zacheus came with such a desire to see Christ, then to be disappointed by reason of his lowness, this might affect him. It is not alwayes insupportable to lack the assistance of a servant, or a friend; But when the Angel hath troubled the water, and made it medicinall for him that is first put in and no more, then to have lyen many yeares in expectation, and still to lack a servant, or a friend to do that office, this is a misery. And this was Moses case; God will send him upon a service, that consisted much in perswasion, and good speech, and he sayes, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken to thy servant. Where we see, there is some degree of eloquence required in the delivery of Gods Mes- E sages. There are not so eloquent Bookes in the world, as the Scriptures; neither should a man come to any kinde of handling of them with uncircumcised lips, as Moses speaks, or with an extemporall and irreverent, or over-homely and vulgar language. The preparation of the heart is of the Lord, sayes Solomon; but it is not only that; The preparation of the heart, and the answer of the tongue is of the Lord. To conceive good things for the glory of God, and to expresse them to the edification of Gods people, is a double blessing of God. Therefore does Hester form and institute her prayer to God so, Give me boldnesse, O Lord of all power; but she extends her prayer farther, And give me eloquent speech in my mouth. And the want of this in a naturall defect, and unreadinesse of speech discouraged Moses. And when God recompenses, and supplyes this defect in Moses, he does it but thus, I will be with thy mouth, and I will teach thee what thou ſhalt ſay. Still it is Moſes that muſt ſay it; ſtill Moſes mouth that muſt utter it. Beloved, it is the generall Ordinance of God, of whom, as we have received mercy, we have received the Miniſtery, and it is the particular grace of God that inanimates our labours, and makes them effectuall upon you; All that is not of our planting, nor watring, but of God that gives the increaſe; But yet we muſt labour to get, and labour to improve ſuch learning, and ſuch language, and ſuch other abilities as may beſt become that ſervice; for the naturall want of one of theſe, retarded Moſes from a preſent acceptation of Gods imployment. And ſo truly, ſhould put any man, that puts himſelf, or puts his ſon upon this profeſſion, upon that conſideration, whether he have ſuch naturall parts as will admit acquiſitions, and ſuperedifications fit for that calling. And farther we carry not Moſes third excuſe, raiſed out of a naturall defect, non ſum eloquens, I am not eloquent enough. A

Non credent. The fourth is a ſhrewd diſcouragement: In the firſt verſe of this Chapter, He anſwered and ſaid, but behold, they will not beleeve me; when I have told them thy name, how thou haſt manifeſted thy ſelfe to them, and in what name they muſt call upon thee, Behold, they will not beleeve me; And this is the ſaddeſt diſcouragement that can fall upon the Miniſter and Meſſenger of God, not to be beleeved. God found this, and complained of it at firſt, Quouſq; non credent? how long will it be ere this people beleeve? they will never beleeve. The Prophet Eſay foreſaw this; Quis credidit? Lord who hath beleeved our report? No man doth, no man will beleeve us. S. John found this prophecy of Eſay fulfilled even then, when Chriſt in perſon was preaching, and working of Miracles; then ſayes that Euangeliſt, was that of Eſay fulfilled; They beleeved not his report. And S. Paul ſaw it performed amongſt the Gentiles, as well as S. John amongſt the Jews, Lord who hath beleeved our report? Chriſt hath ſaid himſelfe, and Chriſt hath bidden us ſay, Qui non crediderit, damnabitur, He that beleeves not, ſhall be damned: And yet, Lord who hath beleeved our report? There cannot fall a ſadder diſcouragement upon the Meſſenger of God, then not to be beleeved. Num. 14. 11. Eſay 53. 1. John 12. 38. Rom. 10. 16.

How loth we finde the bleſſed Fathers of the Primitive Church, to lack company at their Sermons? How earneſtly Leo, in one of his Anniverſary Sermons, complaines of multitudes, and thruſts at Playes, and Masks, and of a thinneſſe, and ſcarcity, and ſolitude at Church? How glad they were to draw men thither? And then how much they endevoured, to hold them in a diſpoſition of hearkning unto them, when they had them? Sometimes with obſerving them with phraſes of humiliation; So Damaſcene profeſſes himſelfe Minimum ſervum Eccleſiæ, the meaneſt and unworthieſt ſervant to that Congregation. So Leo preſents himſelfe, Ad veſtra paratus obſequia, Ready to doe all obſequious ſervice to that Congregation: And ſo S. Auguſtine, In hoc vobis ſervimus, we ſhall doe this congregation the beſt ſervice, in handling this point thus. Sometimes they did it ſo, by ſubmitting themſelves to the Congregation, in phraſes of humiliation; and ſometimes, by taking knowledge of the pious, and devout behaviour of the congregation, even in their Sermons, and thanking them for it; As Leo does too, Quod non tacito honoraſtis affectu, That they did countenance that which was ſaid, with a holy murmur, with a religious whiſpering, and with an ocular applauſe, with fixing their eyes upon the Preacher, and with turning their eyes upon one another; for thoſe outward declarations were much, very much in uſe in thoſe times. And though in the exceſſe of ſuch outward declarations, S. Chryſoſt: complain of them, Non Theatrum Eccleſia, My maſters, what mean you, the Church is not a Theater, Quæ mihi iſtorũ plauſuum utilitas? what get I by theſe plaudites, & acclamations? I had rather have one ſoul, then all theſe hands and eyes: yet it is eaſie to obſerve, in the generall proceeding of thoſe bleſſed Fathers, that they had a holy delight to be heard, and to be heard with delight. For, Nemo flectitur, qui moleſtè audit; No man profits by a Sermon, that heares with paine, or wearineſſe. Therefore S. Chryſoſtome awakes his drouzie Auditory with that alarme, His quæ jam dicuntur, &c. Hearken, I pray you now, ſayes he; for, Non rem vulgarem pollicemur, It is no ordinary matter that I ſhall tell you: and having ſo awakened them, he keeps them awake, with ſuch Doctrines as he thought fitteſt for their edification. And to the ſame purpoſe, S. Auguſtine does not onely profeſſe of himſelfe, Non pratermitto iſtos numeros clauſularum, That he ſtudied at home, to make his language ſweet, and harmonious, and acceptable to Gods people, but he beleeves alſo, that S. Paul himſelfe, and all the Apoſtles, had a delight, and a complacency, and a holy melting of the bowels, when the congregation D E

A gregation liked their preaching: The Fathers were glad to be heard, glad to be lik'd, and glad to be understood too; for, therefore doth Damascen repeat, almost verbatim, that great Sermon of his De Imaginibus, a second time, because (as he assignes the reason) he was not throughly understood, in the first preaching thereof; And therefore doth Ezra extend himself so far, as to preach from morning (as it is in the Originall, from the light) till noone, that by giving himselfe that compasse, he might carry every point in a clearnesse, as he went. Now if these blessed Fathers, these Angels of the Church, these Archangels of the Primitive Church, were thus affected, if they were not frequented, but neglected for other entertainments; or if they were not hearkned to, when they were heard, but heard perfunctorily, fragmentarily, here and there a rag, a piece of a sentence; Or if they were not understood, because they that heard were scattered, and distracted with other thoughts, and so withdrawne from their observation; or if they were not li-
B ked, because the Auditory had some pre-contracts upon other Preachers, that they liked better; how may we think, that those holy and blessed spirits were troubled, if they were not beleeved? This destroyes and demolishes the whole body of our building; this evacuates the whole function of our Ministery, if we lose our credibility; if we may not be beleeved; if the Church conceive a jealousie, that we preach to serve turnes; And therefore væ per quem, and væ per quos; woe unto that man (if any such man there should ever be) that gives just occasion of such a jealousie, that he preaches to serve turnes; And woe to them (who abound every where) who entertaine such jealousies, where no just occasion is offered, but mis-interpret the faithfull labours of Gods true servants, and think every thing done to serve turns, that doth not agree with their distemper, in the likenesse of zeale. The Fathers were sorry if they were not heard, if they were not understood, if they were not lik'd; But the saddest discouragement of all, is the Non cre-
C dent, if we be not beleeved. And farther we carry not our Consideration upon Moses four excuses; of which the first was, in Contemplation of his own insufficiency in generall; The second, in that particular, of not having furnished himselfe with additions necessary for that service; The third, because he had a defect in naturall faculties; and the last, for the indisposition of them, to whom he was to goe.

But then the fift, which is not so much an excuse, as a petition, (O my Lord, send I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send) tasts of most vehemence, and, as it may seem, of some passion in Moses. He sayes first, Quis ego? I am not worthy of this employment; That's true; but thou art able to qualifie me for it; and that objection is taken away. Quod nomen? I know not thy name, how thou wilt be called, and how thou wilt be called upon by men; I have not studied that: But thou hast revealed unto me the knowledge of fundamentall doctrines, necessary for salvation, and that objection is re-
D moved. Non facundus, I am not eloquent, not of ready speech, defective in those naturall faculties; But the spirit of eloquence, and the irresistiblenesse of perswasion is in that mouth, in which thou speakest: and that excuse is taken away too. Non credent; I know their stubbornnesse, to whom I goe, they will not beleeve me; But thou hast put the power of Miracles into my hands, as well as knowledge into my heart; God makes sometimes a plaine and simple mans good life, as powerfull, as the eloquentest Sermon. All this I acknowledge, sayes Moses; But yet, O Lord, when thou shalt have done all this, in me, and in them, made me worthy by thy power, taught me thy Name by thy grace, infused a perswasibility into them, and a perswasivenesse into me, by thy Spirit, yet there is One who is to be sent, One whom I know thou wilt send, One, whom, pursuing thine owne Decree, thou shouldst send, One, whose shooe-latchet I shall not be worthy to untie then, when thou shalt have multiplyed all these qualifications upon
E me, and therefore, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by his hand, send him, send Christ now. So then, with the ancient Fathers, with Iustin Martyr, with S. Basil, with Tertullian, with more, many, very many more, we may safely take this to be a supplication, That God would be pleased to hasten the comming of the Messias.

Of our later writers, Calvin departs from the Ancients herein, so farre, as to say, nimis coacta, it seemes somewhat a forced, somewhat an unnaturall sense, to interpret these words of the comming of Christ; but he proceeds no farther. But another, of the same sub-division, is, (as he uses to be) more assured, more confident; and he saies, est omnimoda & præcisa recusatio; It is an absolute refusall in Moses, to obey the commandement of God: And that truly, needed not to have beene said. Now, when wee consider the exposition in the Roman Church, when their great Bishop, (I mean their great writing Bishop) departs from the Ancients, & does not understand these words of the comming of Christ, a Jesuit is so bold with that Bishop, (their order forbids them to be Bishops, but not to be Controllers over Bishops) as to tell him, levis objectio, that he departs from a good foundation, the Fathers, and that upon a light reason. And when another Author in that Church proceeds farther, to so much vehemence, so much violence, as to say, that it is not only an incommodious, but a superstitious sense, to interpret these words of the comming of Christ, two Jesuits correct him, almost in the same words, (for in the waies of contumely and defamation, they agree well) and say, audacter obstrepit, he does but sawcily bark, and kick against the ancient Fathers, quibus ipse, saies Pererius, to whom himselfe is not to be compared, neither for learning in himselfe, nor for place and dignity in the Church, nor for sanctity and holinesse of life in the world. They may bee as bold with one another, as they please; Indeed they are so used to uncharitable phrases towards all others, as sometimes they cannot spare one another. For our part, wee lay no such imputations upon any of our later men, that accept not that sense of these words, but yet, we cannot doubt of leave to accompany the Fathers in that Exposition, that these words, O my Lord, send I pray thee, by the hand of him, whom thou wilt send, are a petition, and not a reluctation against God. And that, not as Lyra takes them; Lyra takes them to be a petition, and not a reluctation; but a petition of Moses, that hee would send Aaron; That, if he would send any, he should send a man of better parts, and abilities, then himselfe; and this is a rare modesty, when a man is named for any place, to become suter for another to that place; Moses was the meekest man upon earth; but this was not his meaning here. Nor as Rabbi Solomon takes it; hee takes it for a Petition, and no reluctation; but, a Petition, that God would send Iosuah; For, (sayes that Rabbi) Moses had had a Revelation, that Iosuah, and not he, should be the man, that should bring that People into the Land of Promise; and therefore, since Iosuah was to have the honour of the action, Moses would have laid the burden upon him too; but this makes Moses a more fashionall, a more particular, a more selfe-considering man, for his owne estimation, then he was. But, with the Ancients, and later devout men, wee piously beleeve Moses in these words to have extended his Devotion towards his Nation, and the whole world together, as farre, as one of them hath extended the Exposition; quid prodest ex Egypto exire, & in peccatis manere, saies he; what shall they bee the better, for comming out of the pressures of Egypt, if they must remaine still, under the oppression of a sinfull conscience? And that must be their case, if thou send but a Moses, and not a Christ to their succour. Quid Pharaonem effugere, & non Diabolum, saies he; what shall they get, in being delivered from Pharaoh, if they be not delivered from the Devill? Intrare in terram promissam, & non in cœlum? What preferment is it, to dwell in a good Land, and to bee banished out of heaven? And this will be their case, if thou send but a Moses, and not a Christ, for their deliverance. He carries it from them, to God himselfe: Quid unum populum è servitute temporali liberare, & totum genus humanum relinquere sub potestate Diaboli? What glory will it bee to thee, O God, who studiest thine owne glory, to deliver one Nation from a temporall bondage, and leave all Mankinde under everlasting condemnation? And that must be the case of all, if thou send but a Moses, and not a Christ; Moses, may, by thine abundant goodnesse, doe some good; but there is one, one appointed to be sent, that will doe all which Moses should doe, better then Moses, and infinitely more then Moses can doe, or, of himselfe, so much as wish to bee done; and therefore send him, send him now, to doe all together: And so these words are a Petition, and no Reluctation, though some men have taken them so; and a Petition for the sending of Christ, and no Aaron, no Iosuah, no other man; though some have taken so too.

Ferus.

Iratus Deus. Exod. 32. 32.

Yet we doe not deliver Moses from all infirmity herein; no nor from all errour, and mistaking; no more then wee doe in that other prayer of his, dele me, pardon this people, or blot my name out of thy Booke, where Moses capitulated too narrowly, and upon too strict conditions with God. Therefore, in this place, it followes presently upon this prayer, That God was angry with him. Unseasonable prayers, though because they may be rooted in piety, they may be, in some sort, excusable in him that makes them, yet may be unacceptable to God. S. August. prayed for a dead Mother, Monica; and S. Ambrose prayed for a dead Master, Theodosius; God forbid wee should condemne Augustine or Ambrose of impiety in doing so; But God forbid wee should make Augustine or Ambrose

A broſe his example, our rule to doe ſo ſtill. This ſending of Chriſt, which Moſes ſolicites here, was de Arcanis Dei; It was one of the ſecrets of his State, and of his government; It was one of his boſome Counſels, and Cabinet Decrees: One of thoſe reſerved caſes, which he had communicated to no man; as the day of Chriſts ſecond comming, his comming to Judgement, is now; which God hath communicated to no man; as the cleare underſtanding of the ſtate of the dead, who are departed this life, God hath imparted to no man; nor ſome circumſtances of time, and place, and perſon in Antichriſt; God hath revealed theſe to no man, nor to his whole Church; Theſe are acts of his Regality, and of his Prerogative; and as Princes ſay of their Prerogative, nolumus diſputari, wee will not have it diſputed, nor called into queſtion, ſo for theſe Reſerved caſes, and unrevealed Counſels of God, ſuch as was the firſt comming of Chriſt in Moſes time, and ſuch as is the ſecond comming of Chriſt, now in our time, God would not be importuned.

B God meant to give the children of Iſrael a King, from the beginning; we preſume hee meant it, becauſe it is the beſt bleſſing of all formes of government: And wee ſee hee meant it, becauſe long before, hee eſtabliſhed Lawes, by which, they ſhould governe themſelves, in their chuſing their King, and by which, their King ſhould governe them, when he was choſen; yet God was angry, when they importuned him for a King, at ſuch a time, and upon ſuch termes, as he intended not to doe it. But now, becauſe in Moſes caſe, though there were not a preſent obedience, yet there was no diſobedience, the fault being no greater, the anger was not great neither; and therefore we may ſafely ſay with Rupertus, that the iratus fuit, was but non propitius fuit; God was ſo angry, as that hee did not grant, nor accept Moſes petition, nor entertaine any farther diſcourſe with him, concerning the ſending of Chriſt; In Abrahams ſolicitation, in the behalfe of Sodome, it is ſaid, that God went not away, as long as Abraham had any thing to ſay;

C But here, God was ſo farre angry, as to break off Moſes diſcourſe: But his anger was not ſo much an Increpation, that he had ſaid any thing, as an Inſtruction that hee ſhould ſay no more of Gods unrevealed purpoſes. Deut. 17.

Therefore God does not continue his anger, ſo as to diſcontinue his worke. It was but a Catechiſticall anger, ſuch an anger as S. Bernard begges at Gods hands, Iraſcaris mihi Domine, O Lord, be angry with me, and leave mee not to my ſelfe; thou haſt an anger, that inſtructs in the way; but thou haſt a heavy indignation, that confounds, and exterminates in the end. Therefore our prayer in the Litany, is not, O Lord bee never angry with us; but, O Lord, be not angry with us, for ever. David was a man according to Gods heart; yet, no doubt, but God was angry with David, for the matter of Vriah, as himſelfe calls it. God was not angry with Moſes ſo, as that he gave over his purpoſe of delivering Iſrael, or of delivering Iſrael by him, and him eſtabliſhed in a

D cheerefull aſſurance to undertake it; for in the ſame breath, in the ſame words, in the ſame verſe, wherein his anger is expreſſed, his Benignity, and his Benevolence is expreſſed alſo; for there he ſaies, Is not Aaron thy Brother; I know he can ſpeake well; and alſo, behold, he commeth forth to meet thee: God had laid it ſo, that Moſes ſhould be ſetled this way, by having ſo able a man, and then, a man in whom he might be ſo confident, as a brother, joyned in commiſſion with him. Slide wee in this note by the way; God loves not ſingularity: God bindes us to nothing, that was never ſaid but by one: As God loves Sympathy, God loves Symphony; God loves a compaſſion and fellow-feeling of others miſeries, that is Sympathy, and God loves Harmony, and fellow beleeving of others Doctrines, that is Symphony: No one man alone makes a Church; no one Church alone makes a Catholique Church. Chriſt ſent his owne Diſciples by couples, two and two: And Aquinas ſayes out of his obſervation, Monachus ſolus eſt

E Dæmon ſolitarius: Though naturally a Monk muſt love retirednеſſe, yet a ſingle Monk, a Monk alwaies alone, ſaies he, is plotting ſome ſingular miſchiefe. Deus qui habitat in nobis, etiam nos cuſtodiet ex nobis, is excellently ſaid by that excellent Father: God that dwels in us, will ſuſtaine the building, and repaire the building out of our ſelves; that is, he will make us Tutelar Angels to one another; and a holy, and reverentiall reſpect to one another, in good converſation, ſhall keep us from many ſinfull actions, which we would commit if we were alone. So then, God was not ſo angry, nor angry ſo with Moſes, as that he did not purſue his firſt purpoſe upon him, of ſending him, & ſending him ſo, as might beſt ſpeed, & advance his Negotiation. And therfore, as Moſes praying for Chriſts firſt cōming, which was one of Gods reſerved caſes, and an act of his regality, and Prerogative, though he had not that prayer granted, yet was not left unſatisfied, nor unaccommodated by God, ſo, (which is the end, that wee drive all to) when the calamities, and diſtreſſes of this life oppreſſe us, and we pray for the ſecond comming of Chriſt, in the conſummation of all, in glory, though, becauſe this ſecond comming of Chriſt, is one of Gods Reſerved caſes, and an act of his Regality, and Prerogative, hee doe not grant that, that Chriſt doe not come ſo, yet, in his bleſſed Spirit, he will come to us, in an aſſurance, that when he ſhall come ſo, in judgement, wee in his right, ſhall ſtand upright even in that Judgement: And, if in extraordinary diſtreſſes, wee pray for extraordinary relieſes, though extraordinary helps, and miracles bee Reſerved caſes, and acts of his Regality, and Prerogative; yet, as he remembers his mercies, of old, hee will remember his miracles of old too, (and as his mercies are new every morning, his miracles ſhall bee new every morning too; and all that he did in eighty eight, in the laſt Centurry, he ſhall doe (if we need it) in twenty eight, in this Century.) And though he may be angry with our prayers, as they are but verball prayers, and not accompanied with actions of obedience, yet he will not be angry with us for ever, but re-eſtabliſh at home, zeale to our preſent Religion, and good correſpondence, and affections of all parts to one another, and our power, and our honour, in forraign Nations. Amen.

SERMON VI.

Preached at S. Pauls, upon Chriſtmas Day. 1628.

Lord, who hath beleeved our report?

Domine, quis credidit auditui noſtro?

I Have named to you no booke, no chapter, no verſe, where theſe words are written: But I forbore not out of forgetfulneſſe, nor out of ſingularity, but out of perplexity rather, becauſe theſe words are written, in more then one, in more then two places of the Bible. In your ordinary converſation, and communication with other men, I am ſure you have all obſerved, that many men have certaine formes of ſpeech, certaine interjections, certaine ſuppletory phraſes, which fall often upon their tongue, and which they repeat almoſt in every ſentence, and, for the moſt part, impertinently; and then, when that phraſe conduces nothing to that which they would ſay, but rather diſorders and diſcompoſes the ſentence, and confounds, or troubles the hearer. And this, which ſome doe out of ſlackneſſe, and in-obſervance, and infirmity, many men, God knowes, do out of impiety; many men have certaine ſuppletory Oathes, with which they fill up their Diſcourſe, then, when they are not onely not the better beleeved, but the worſe underſtood for thoſe blaſphemous interjections. Now, this, which you may thus obſerve, in men, ſometimes out of infirmity, ſometimes out of impiety, out of an accommodation and communicableneſſe of himſelfe to man, out of deſire, and a ſtudy, to ſhed himſelfe the more familiarly, and to infuſe himſelfe the more powerfully into man, you may obſerve even in the holy Ghoſt in himſelfe, in the Scriptures, which are the diſcourſe and communication of God with man; There are certaine idioms, certaine formes of ſpeech, certaine propoſitions, which the holy Ghoſt repeats ſeverall times, upon ſeverall occaſions in the Scriptures. It is ſo in the inſtrumentall Authors of the particular Bookes of the Bible; There are certaine formes of ſpeech, certaine characters, upon which I would pronounce, That's Moſes, and not David, that's Iob, and not Solomon, that's Eſay and not Ieremy. How often does Moſes repeat his Vivit Dominus, and Ego vivo, As the Lord liveth, and As I live, ſaith the Lord? How often does Solomon repeat his vanitas vanitatum, All is vanity? How often does our bleſſed Saviour repeat his Amen, Amen?

A Amen? and, in another ſenſe, then others had uſed that word before him; ſo often, as that you may reckon it thirtie times, in one Evangeliſt; ſo often, as that that may not inconveniently be thought ſome reaſon, why S. Iohn called Chriſt by that name, Amen, Thus ſaith Amen, He whoſe name is Amen. How often does S. Paul, (eſpeciallly in his Epiſtles to Timothy, and to Titus) repeat that phraſe Fidelis Sermo, This is a true, and faithfull ſaying? And how often, his juratory caution, Coram Domino, before the Lord; As God is my witneſſe? And as it is thus for particular perſons, and particular phraſes, that they are often repeated; ſo are there certaine whole ſentences, certaine intire propoſitions, which the holy Ghoſt does often repeat in the Scripture. And, except we except that propoſition, of which S. Peter makes his uſe, That God is no accepter of perſons, (for that is repeated in very many places, that every where, upō every occaſiō, every man might be remembred of that, that God is no accepter of perſons; Take heed how you preſume upon your B own knowledge, or your actions, for God is no accepter of perſons; Take heed how you condemne another man for an Heretique, becauſe he beleeves not juſt as you beleeve; or for a Reprobate, becauſe he lives not juſt as you live, for God is no accepter of perſons; Take heed how you relie wholly upon the outward means, that you are wrapped in the covenant, that you are bred in a reformed Church, for God is no accepter of perſons) except you will except this propoſition, I ſcarce remember any other that is ſo often repeated in the Scriptures, as this which is our Text, Lord, who hath beleeved our report? For, it is firſt in the Prophet Eſay. There the Prophet is in holy throws, and pangs, and agonies, till he be delivered of that prophecy, the comming of the Meſſiah, the incarnation of Chriſt Jeſus, and yet is put to this exclamation, Domine, quis credidit? Lord who hath beleeved our report? And then you have theſe words in the Goſpell of S. Iohn; C where we are not put upon the conſideration of a future Chriſt in prophecy, but the Evangeliſt exhibits Chriſt in perſon, actually, really, viſibly, evidently, doing great works, exeeuting great judgements, multiplying great Miracles; and yet put to the application of this exclamation, Domine, quis credidit? Lord, who hath beleeved this report? And then you have theſe words alſo in S. Paul, where we doe not conſider a prophecy of a future Chriſt, nor a hiſtory of a preſent Chriſt, but an application of that whole Chriſt to every ſoule, in the ſetling of a Church, in that concatenation of meanes for the infuſion of faith expreſſed in that Chapter, ſending, and preaching, and hearing; and yet for all theſe powerfull and familiar aſſiſtances, Domine, quis credidit? Lord, who hath beleeved that report? So that now beloved, you cannot ſay that you have a Text without a place; for you have three places for this Text: you have it in the great Prophet, in Eſay, in the great Evangeliſt, in S. Iohn; and in the great Apoſtle, in S. Paul. And becauſe in all three places, the words miniſter uſefull doctrine of edification, we ſhall, by yours and D the times leave, conſider the words in all three places.

In all three, the words are a ſad and a ſerious expoſtulation of the Miniſter of God, with God himſelfe, that his Meanes and his Ordinances powerfully committed to him, being faithfully tranſmitted by him to the people, were nevertheleſſe fruitleſſe, and ineffectuall. I doe Lord as thou biddeſt me, ſayes the Prophet Eſay; I prophecy, I foretell the comming of the Meſſiah, the incarnation of thy Son for the ſalvation of the world, and I know that none of them that heare me, can imagine or conceive any other way for the redemption of the world, by ſatisfaction to thy Juſtice, but this, and yet, Domine quis credidit? Lord who hath beleeved my report? I doe Lord as thou biddeſt me, ſayes Chriſt himſelfe in S. Iohn; I come in perſon, I glorifie thy name, I doe thy will, I preach thy Goſpell, I confirm my doctrine with evident Miracles, and I ſeale thoſe Seales, I confirm thoſe Miracles with my Blood; and yet, Quis credidit? Lord E who hath beleeved my report? I doe Lord as thou biddeſt me, ſayes every one of us, who, as we have received mercy, have received the Miniſtery; I obey the inward calling of the Spirit, I accept the outward calling of the Church; furniſhed, and eſtabliſhed with both theſe, I come into the world, I preach abſolution of ſins to every repentant Soule, I offer the ſeales of reconciliation to every contrite ſpirit; and yet, Domine quis credidit? Lord who hath beleeved my report? Indeed it is a ſad contemplation, and muſt neceſſarily produce a ſerious and a vehement expoſtulation, when the predictions of Gods future judgements (ſo we ſhall finde the caſe to have been in the words in Eſay) when the execution of Gods preſent judgements, (ſo we ſhall finde the caſe to have been in the words in S. Iohn) when the Ordinances of God, for the reliefe of any ſoule, in any judgement, in his Church, are not beleeved. To ſay I beleeve you not, amounts to a lye; Not to beleeve Gods warnings before, not to beleeve Gods preſent judgements, not to beleeve that God hath eſtabliſhed a way to come to him in all diſtreſſes, this is to give God the lye; and with this is the world charged in this Text, Lord who hath beleeved our report? A

1 Part. Eſay 53. 1. First then, where we finde theſe words firſt, the Prophet reproaches their unbeleefe, and hardneſſe of heart, in this, that they did not beleeve future things, future calamities, future judgements; for that is intended in that place. For, though this 53. of Eſay be the continuation, and the conſummation of that doctrine which the Prophet began to propoſe in the Chapter immediatly preceding, which is, the comming of the Meſſiah (in generall, the comfortableſt doctrine that could be propoſed) though this Chapter be eſpecially that place, upon which S. Hierome grounds that Eulogy of Eſay, that Eſay was rather an Euangeliſt then a Prophet, becauſe of his particular declaration of Chriſt in this Chapter; though upon this Chapter our Expoſitors ſometimes ſay, that as we cite the Goſpell according to S. Matthew, and the Goſpell according to S. Iohn, ſo here we may ſay, the Goſpell according to the Prophet Eſay; yet though this be a prophecy of the comming of Chriſt, and ſo, the comfortableſt doctrine that can be propoſed in the generall, and in the end, and fruit of that comming, yet it is a prophecy of the exinanition of Chriſt, of the evacuation of Chriſt, of the inglorious and ignominious eſtate, the calamitous, and contumelious eſtate of Chriſt: Their Meſſias they ſhould have; but that Meſſias ſhould be reputed a Malefactor, and as a Malefactor crucified; Which miſeries, and calamities being to fall upon him, for them, they ought to have been as ſenſible, and as much affected with thoſe miſeries to be endured for them, as if they had been to have fallen upon themſelves. The later Jews and their Rabbins ſince the diſperſion, doe not, will not beleeve this prophecy of miſeries, and calamities to belong to their Meſſias. They do not, they wil not beleeve, that that which is ſaid, That there is no form, no beauty, no comelineſſe in him, ſo that men ſhould long for him before, or deſire to look upon him after, ſhould have any reference to their Meſſiah, whom they expect in all outward ſplendor and glory; Nor that that which is added there, That he ſhould be deſpiſed, and rejected of men, a man of ſorrows, and acquainted with griefes, ſhould belong to him, in whoſe proceedings in this world, they look for continuall Victories and Triumphs. But they will needs underſtand theſe miſeries, and calamities prophecyed here, to be thoſe calamities, and thoſe miſeries, which have fallen, and dwelt upon their Nation, ever ſince their diſperſion after Chriſts death. Now let it be but ſuch a prophecy as that; take it either way; The Chriſtian way, a prophecy of calamities upon the Meſſiah for them; or the Jews way, of calamities upon them for the Meſſiah; ſtill it is a prophecy of future calamities, future judgements, of which they ought to have been ſenſible, and with which they ought to have been affected, and were not: And ſo that's their charge, they did not beleeve the Prophets report, they were not moved with Gods judgments denounced upon them, by thoſe Prophets. Now, was this ſo hainous, not to beleeve a Prophet? B

Ver. 2. C

D

Prophetæ. The office and function of a Prophet, in the time of the Law, was not ſo evident, nor ſo ordinary an office, as the office of the Prieſt and Miniſter in the Goſpel now is; There was not a conſtant, an ordinary, a viſible calling in the Church, to the office of a Prophet. Neither the high-prieſt, nor the Eccleſiaſticall Conſiſtory, the Synedrium, did by any impoſition of hands, or other Collation, or Declaration, give Orders to any man ſo, as that thereby that man was made a Prophet. I know ſome men, of much induſtry, and perſpicacy too, in ſearching into thoſe Scriptures, the ſenſe whereof is not obvious to every man, have thought that the Prophets had an outward and a conſtant declaration of their Calling. And they think it proved, by that which is ſaid to Eliah, when God commands him to anoint Hazael K. of Syria, & to anoint Iehu K. of Iſrael, & to anoint Eliſha Prophet in his own room: Therefore, ſay they, the Prophet had as much evidence of his Calling, as the Miniſter hath, for that unction was as evident a thing, as our Impoſition of hands is. And it is true, it was ſo, where it was actually, and really executed. But then, nothing is more evident, then that this word Meſhiach, which ſignifies Anointing, is not reſtrained to that very action, a real unction, but frequently transferred, & communicated in a Scripture uſe, to every kind of Declaration of any Election, any Inſtitution, any Inauguration, any Inveſtiture of any perſon to any place; And, leſſe then that, of any appropriation, any applicatiõ of any thing to any particular uſe. Any appointing was an anointing; As in particular (for

1 Reg. 19. 15. E

A (for many other places) where S. Hierome reades, Arripite clypeos, buckle your ſhields; To you, which was an alarm to them, to arm, the originall hath it, and ſo hath our tranſlation, Anoint your ſhields; to apply them to their right uſe, was called an Anointing. And when God cals Cyrus, the King of Perſia, Vnctum ſuum, his Anointed; it were weakly, and improperly argued from that word, that Cyrus King of Perſia, was literally, actually, anointed; for that unction was peculiar to the Kings of Iſrael; but Cyrus was the anointed of the Lord, that is, declared and avowed by the Lord, to be his choſen Inſtrument. Neither could Eliah, literally execute this commandement, for anointing Haſael King of Syria; for Haſael the King of Syria could not be anointed by the Prophet of the Lord, for ſuch unction was peculiar to the Kings of Iſrael. And for the Kings of Iſrael themſelves, their owne Rabbins tell us, that they were not ordinarily anointed, but onely in thoſe caſes, where there aroſe ſome queſtion, and difference, about the ſucceſſion; as in

B Solomons caſe; there, becauſe Adoniah pretended to the ſucceſſion; to make all the more ſure, David proceeded with a ſolemnity, and appointed an anointing of Solomon, which, otherwiſe, ſay their Rabbins, had not been done. But howſoever it may have been for their Kings, there ſeemes to be a plaine diſtinction betweene them, and the Prophets in the Pſalme, for this evidence of unction; Touch not mine Anointed, ſayes God there: They, they that were Anointed, conſtitute one rank, one claſſis; and then followes, And doe my Prophets no harme: They, they who were not Anointed, the Prophets, conſtitute another claſſis, another rank. So that then an internall, a ſpirituall unction the Prophets had, that is, an application, an appropriation to that office from God, but a conſtant, an evident calling to that function, by any externall act of the Church, they had not, but it was an extraordinary office, and impoſed immediatly by God; and therfore the people might ſeem the more excuſable, if they did not beleeve a Prophet preſently, becauſe the office of the

C Prophet did not carry with it, ſuch a manifeſtation by any thing evidently done upon him, and viſible to them, that by that, that man muſt be a Prophet. But, as God clothes himſelfe with light, as with a garment; ſo God clothes, and apparells his works with light too: for, fruſtra feciſſet, ſayes S. Ambroſe, God had made creatures to no purpoſe, if he had not made light to ſee them by. Therefore when God does any extraordinary worke, he accompanies that work with an extraordinary light, by which, he for whoſe inſtruction God does that work, may know that work to be his. So when he ſent his Prophets to his people, he accompanied their miſſion, with an effectuall light, and evidence, by which, that people did acknowledge in their owne hearts, that that man was ſent by God to them. Therefore they called that man at firſt, Roeh, videntem, a Seer, one whom they acknowledged to have beene admitted to the ſight of God, in the declaration of his will to them: for ſo we have it in Samuel, He that is now called a Prophet, was before time called

D a Seer. And then that addition of the name of a Prophet, gave them a farther qualification; for, Nabi, which is a Prophet, is from Niba; and Niba, is venire facio, to cauſe, to make a thing to come to paſſe. So that a Prophet was not onely præfator, but præfactor; He did not only preſage, but preordain; that is, there was ſuch an infallibility, ſuch an inevitableneſſe in that which he had ſaid, as that his very ſaying of it, ſeemed to them ſome kind of cauſe of the accompliſhing thereof. For, hence it is, that we have that phraſe ſo often in the new Teſtament, This and this was thus and thus done, that ſuch and ſuch a Prophecy might be fulfilled: They never went to that heighth, that ſuch or ſuch a ſecret purpoſe, or unrevealed Decree of God might be fulfilled; but they reſted in the Declaration which God had made in his Church, and were ſatisfied in the execution of his Decrees, in his viſible Ordinances. Therefore the increpation which the Prophet layes upon the people here, (Lord, who hath beleeved our report) is not, that they did not beleeve

E thoſe Prophets to be Prophets, (for though that were an extraordinary office, yet it was accompanied with an extraordinary light) neither was it, that they did not beleeve that thoſe things which were prophecyed by them, ſhould come to paſſe, (for they beleeved that man to be Roeh, a Seer, one that had ſeen the Counſels of God concerning them; And they beleeved him to be Nabi, venire facientem, one upon whoſe word they might as infallibly rely, as upon a cauſe, for an effect;) But this was the ſinne of this people, this was the ſorrow of this Prophet, that they did not beleeve theſe predictions to belong to them, they did not beleeve that theſe judgements would fall out in their time. In one word, preſent ſecurity was their ſinne. And was that ſo hainous?

So hainous, as that that is it, with which God was ſo highly incenſed, and with which hee

he meant ſo deeply to affect his people, in that conſiderable paſſage, in that remarkeable, and vehement place, where he expoſtulates thus with them; Heare ye ſcornfull men, (yee that make a jeſt, a ſcorn of future judgements) Heare ye ſcornfull men, that rule this people, (ſayes God there) (you that have a power over the affections of the people in the Pulpit, and can perſwade what you will, or a power over the wils of the people in your place, and can command what you will) you that tell them (ſayes the Prophet there) we have made a covenant with death, and are at an agreement with hell, (feare you nothing, let us alone; ambitious Princes ſhall turn their forces another way, antichriſtian plots ſhall be practiſed in other nations) you that tell them (ſayes he) when the overflowing ſcourge ſhall paſſe through, it ſhall not come to you, (howſoever ſuperſtition be eſtabliſhed in other places, howſoever prevailing armies be multiplied elſe-where, yet you ſhal have your religion, & your peace ſtill; for we have made a covenant with death, & with hell, we are at an agreement) Heare ye ſcornfull men, (ſayes God) you that put this ſcorn upon my predictions, your covenant with death ſhall be diſannulled, and your agreement with death ſhall not ſtand, (the faire promiſes of others to you, your own promiſes to your ſelves ſhall deceive you) and the overflowing ſcourge ſhall paſſe thorough, thorough you all, for, you, (you ſcornfull men) ſhall be trodden down by it; and, (as it followes there, in an elegant, and a vehement expreſſion) it ſhall be a vexation, onely to underſtand the report: You that would not beleeve the report of the Prophet, that for theſe and theſe ſins, ſuch and ſuch Judgements ſhould fall upon you, ſhall be confounded even with the report, the noyſe, the newes, how this overflowing ſcourge hath paſſed thorough your neighbours round about you; how much more with the ſenſe, when you your ſelves ſhall be trodden down by it? There is ſcarce any of the Prophets, in which, God does not drive home this increpation of their ſecurity, and inſenſibleneſſe of future calamities. As in Eſay, ſo in Ezechiel God ſayes, what is that Proverb which ye have in the Land of Iſrael? (it was, it ſeemes, in every mans mouth, proverbially ſpoken by all) what was it? This, The dayes are prolonged, and every viſion failes; The viſion which he ſayes, is for many dayes to come, and he propheſieth of the times afarre off. But, (ſayes God there) In your dayes, O rebellious houſe, will I ſay the word, and performe it: Not ſay it in our dayes, and performe it upon our children; but God will ſpeake, and ſtrike together, we ſhall heare him, and feele him at once, if wee be not ſeriouſly affected with his predictions.

The ſame way God goes in Ieremy, as in Eſay, and in Ezechiel. I have ſent unto you all my ſervants, the Prophets, (ſayes God there) God hath no other ſervants, to this purpoſe, but his Prophets: If your dangers have beene, by Gods appointment, preached to you, God hath done. You muſt not, as Dives did, in the behalfe of his brethren, looke for Meſſengers from the ſtate of the dead; you muſt not ſtay for inſtruction, nor for amendment, till you be Pro mortuis, (as the Apoſtle ſpeakes) as good as dead, ready to dye; you muſt not ſtay till a Judgement fall, and then preſume of underſtanding by that vexation, or of repentance by that affliction; for, this is to hearken after Meſſengers, from the ſtate of the dead, to think of nothing till we be ready to joyne with them; But as Abraham ſayes there to Dives, Thy brethren have the Law, and the Prophets, and that is enough, that is all, ſo God ſayes here, I have ſent them all my ſervants, the Prophets; that is enough, that is all: eſpecially, when, (as God addes there) He hath riſen early, and ſent his Prophets, that is, given us warning time enough, before the calamity come neare our owne gates. But when they rejected, and deſpiſed all his Propheſies, and denunciations of future Judgements, then followes the ſentence, the finall, and fearfull ſentence, The Lord hath forſaken, and rejected them; Them; whom? as it followes in the ſentence, The Lord hath forſaken, and rejected the generation of his wrath; The generation of his wrath? There is more horrour, more conſternation in that manner of expreſſing that rejection, then in the rejection it ſelfe; There is an inſupportable waight, in that word, His wrath; but even that is infinitely aggravated in the other, The generation of his wrath. God hath forgot that Iſrael is his Son, and his firſt borne; So he avowed him to be in Moſes commiſſion to Pharaoh. God hath forgot that He rebuked Kings for his ſake; that he teſtifies to have done in his behalfe, in David; God hath forgot that they were heires according to the promiſe; that is their dignification in the Apoſtle; forgot that they were the apple of his own eye, that they were as the ſignet upon his own hand; forgot that Ephraim is his deare Son, that he is a pleaſing child, a child for whom his bowels were troubled; God hath forgot all theſe paternities, all theſe filiations, all theſe incorporatings, all theſe inviſcerations of Iſrael into his

A his owne boſome, and Iſrael is become the generation of his wrath. Not the ſubject of his wrath; A people upon whom God would exerciſe ſome one act of indignation, in a temporall calamity, as captivity, or ſo; or multiply acts of indignation, in one kinde, as adding of penury or ſickneſſe to their captivity; nor is it onely a multiplying of the kinds of calamity, as the aggravating of temporall calamities with ſpirituall, oppreſſion of body and ſtate, with ſadneſſe of heart, and dejection of ſpirit; for all theſe, as many as they are, are determined in this life; but that which God threatens, is, that he will for their grievous ſinnes, multiply lifes upon them, and make them immortall for immortall torments; They ſhall bee a generation of his wrath; they ſhall dye in this world, in his diſpleaſure, and receive a new birth, a new generation in the world to come, in a new capacity of new miſeries; they ſhall dye in the next world, every minute, in the privation of the ſight of God, and every minute receive a new generation, a new birth, a new capacity of reall and ſenſible torments. When God hath ſent all his ſervants, the Prophets, and ſo done all that is neceſſary for premonition, and riſen early to ſend thoſe Prophets, warned them time enough, to avoid the danger, and they are not affected with the ſenſe of theſe predictions, God ſhall make them, us, any State, any Church, the generation of his wrath, God ſhall forget his former paternities, and our former filiations; forget his mercies exhibited to us in the reformation of Religion, in the preſervation of our State, in the augmenting and adorning of our Church, and after all this, make us the generation of his wrath. And this may well be conceived to be the lamentable ſtate deplored in this text, as the words are conſidered in their firſt place, the Prophet Eſay, Lord, who hath beleeved our report. But this is brought nearer to us, in the ſecond place, as wee have the words in S. Iohn; where we doe not conſider things in a remote diſtance, but Chriſt was in a perſonall and actuall exerciſe of his works of power, and ſoveraignty, and yet the Evangeliſt comes to this, Lord, who hath beleeved this report? Iohn 12.38.

2 Part.

That's true in a great part, which Irenæus ſaies, Prophetiæ antequam effectum habent, ænigmata ſunt, & ambiguitates hominibus, That prophecies till they come to be fulfilled, are but clouds in the eyes, and riddles in the underſtanding of men. So, many particulars, concerning the calling of the Jews, concerning the time, and place, and perſon, and duration, and actions of Antichriſt, concerning the generall Judgement, and other things, that lye yet, as an Embryon, as a child in the mothers wombe, embowelled in the wombe of prophecie, are yet but as clouds in the eyes, as riddles in the underſtandings of the learneſt men. Daniel himſelfe, found that which he found in the Prophet Ieremy, concerning the deliverance of Iſrael from Babylon, to be wrapped up in ſuch a cloud, as that it is fairely collected by ſome, that Daniel himſelfe at that time, did not clearly underſtand the Prophet Ieremy. But theſe clouds, for the moſt part, ariſe in us, out of our curioſity, that wee will needs know the time, when theſe prophecies ſhall be fulfilled; when the Jews ſhall be called, when Antichriſt ſhall be fully manifeſted, when the day of Judgement ſhall be: And ſo, for ſuch queſtions as theſe, Chriſt enwraps not onely his Apoſtles, but himſelfe in a cloud; for, that cloud which he caſts upon them, Non eſt veſtrum, It belongs not to you, to know times, and ſeaſons, he ſpreads upon himſelfe alſo, Non eſt meum, It belongs not to me, not to me, as the Son of man, to know when the day of Judgment ſhall be. But for that uſe of a prophecy, that the prediction of a future Judgement ſhould induce a preſent repentance, that was never an enigmaticall, a cloudy doctrine, but manifeſt to all, in all prophecies of that kinde. But this, this commination of future judgements, for preſent repentance, wrought not upon theſe men; but, becauſe they have no changes, therefore they feare not God: And, becauſe ſentence againſt an evill worke, is not executed ſpeedily, therefore their hearts are fully ſet in them, to do evill. But now, in the manifeſtation of Chriſt, they ſaw evident changes; changes, and revolutions in the higheſt ſpheare; they ſaw a new King, and they heard ſtrangers proclaime him; forraigne Kings doe not ſend Ambaſſadors to congratulate, but come in perſon, to doe their homage, and aske their audience in that ſtyle, Where is he that is borne King of the Iews? not an elective, not an arbitrary, not a conditionall, a proviſionall King, but an hereditary, a naturall King, Borne King of the Iews. They heare ſtrangers proclaime him, and they proclaime him themſelves, in that act of Recognition, in that acclamatory Hoſanna, in this Chapter, Bleſſed is the King of Iſrael, that commeth in the name of the Lord. They ſaw changes; changes with which Herod was troubled, and all Jeruſalem with him. And they ſaw ſentence executed; for, as ſoone as Chriſt manifeſted himſelfe, Iohn Baptiſt ſaies, Pſal. 55.19. Eccleſ. 8.11. Mat. 2.2. v. 13. Mat. 3.3.

Now,

Mat. 3.10. Mat. 3.12. Now, now that Christ declares himselfe, the axe is laid unto the roote of the tree, and now, saies he, His fanne is in his hand, and he will purge his floore. And this sentence he executed, this regall power he exercised, not onely after that Recognition of his subjects, in their Hosannaes in this chapter, (for, upon that, he did go into the Temple, and cast out the buyers, and sellers) but some yeares before that, at his first manifestation of himselfe, and

Iohn 2.3. soone after Iohn Baptists Now, now is the axe laid to the roote of the Tree, did Christ execute this sentence, not onely to drive, but to scourge them out, that prophaned the Temple; which was the second miracle, that we ascribe to Christ. Indeed all his miracles were so many acts, not onely of his regall power over some men, but of his absolute prerogative, over the whole frame, and body of nature. Nor can we conceive how the beholders of those miracles, could argue to themselves, otherwise then thus; The winds and seas obey this man, for when he suffers them, the winds roare, and when hee whispers a silence to them, they are silenced; The Devils and uncleane spirits obey him; for when he suffers it, they preach his glory, and when he refuses honour from so dishonourable mouths, they are silent. Death it selfe obeyes him; for, when he will, death withholds his hand from closing that mans eye, that lyes upon his last gaspe, and the last stroke of his bell, and hee does not die; and, when he will, death withdraws his hand from him, who had beene foure daies in his possession, and redelivers Lazarus to a new life. This they saw; and could they choose but say, the wind, and the sea, the devill, and uncleane spirits, and death it selfe obeyes this man, how shall we stand before this man, this King, this God? yet for all this voice, this loud voice of miracles, (for when S. Chrysostome sayes, Omni tuba clarior per opera demonstratio, Every good worke hath the voyce of a trumpet, every miracle hath the voice of thunder,) for all this loud voice, (as it is said in the verse before the text, Though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they beleeved not on him) it is faine to come to that, Quis credidit, Lord who hath beleeved this report? The first of Esay 9.6. those great names which were given to Christ, in the Prophet Esay, was Mirabilis, The wonderfull, The supernaturall man, the man that workes miracles; for, of the Apostles it is said, by them, great miracles were wrought, but God wrought those miracles, by them. Christ wrought his miracles himself; And his Birth, and his Life, and Death, and Resurrection, and Ascension, were all complicated, and elemented of miracles. If hee fasted himselfe, he did that miraculously; and it was with a miracle, when he feasted others.

Mark. 1.34. Mat. 9.35. He healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many Devils, saies S. Marke; And S. Matthew carries it a great deale farther, Hee went about all the Cities, and villages, healing every sickenesse, and every disease among the people. Therefore Christ makes that, (the evidence of his miracles) the issue betweene them, If these mighty works had beene

Mat. 11.21. done in Tyre and Sidon, Tyre and Sidon would have repented; And therefore he places

Iohn 15.22. their inexcusableneſſe in that, If I had not come, and spoken to them, they had had no sinne; Nay, if I had not spoken to them, in this loud voyce, the voyce of miracles, they might have had some cloake for their sinne, but now they have none, saies Christ in that place; And, beloved, are not we inexcusable in that degree? Have not wee seene changes, and seene judgements executed, and seene miraculous deliverances, and yet Domine quis credidit? Lord who hath beleeved these reports?

I would wee could but take aright a mis-taken translation, and make that use that is offered us in others error. The vulgar Edition, the translation of the Roman Church, reads that place, in the 77. Psalme and 11. verse thus, Nunc cœpi, saies David, Now I have taken out my lesson the right way, now I have laid hold upon God by the right handle, Nunc cœpi, Now I have all that I need to have; what is it? This; Hæc mutatio dextræ Dei, this is to take out my lesson aright, to understand God truly, and to know, & acknowledge, that this change which I see, is an act of the right hand of God, and that it is a judgement, and not an accident. O, beloved, that wee would not be afraid of giving God too much glory; not afraid of putting God into too much heart; or of making God too imperious over us, by acknowledging, that Hæc mutatio dextræ Dei, that all our changes are acts of the right hand of God, and come from him. But we are not onely subject to the Prophets increpation, Quis credit, that we doe not beleeve Gods warnings of future judgements, but to the Euangelists increpation, in the person of Christ, Quis credidit? we do not beleeve present judgements to be judgements. An invincible navy hath beene sent against us, and defeated, and we sacrifice to a casuall storme for that; wee say the winds delivered us. A powder treason hath been plotted, and discovered, and we sacrifice

A to a caſuall letter for that; we ſay, the letter delivered us. A devouring plague hath raigned, and gone out againe, and we ſacrifice to an early froſt for that; we ſay, the cold weather delivered us. Domeſtique encumbrances, perſonall infirmities, ſadneſſe of heart, dejection of ſpirit oppreſſes us, and then weares out, and paſſes over, and we ſacrifice for that, to wine, and ſtrong drinke, to muſique, to Comedies, to converſation, and to all Iobs miſerable comforters; wee ſay, it was but a melancholique fit, and good company hath delivered us of it. But when God himſelfe ſaies, There is no evill done in the City, but I doe it, we may be bold to ſay, there is no good done in the world but hee does it. The very calamities are from him; the deliverance from thoſe calamities much more. All comes from Gods hand; and from his hand, by way of hand-writing, by way of letter, and inſtruction to us. And therefore to aſcribe things wholy to nature, to fortune, to power, to ſecond cauſes, this is to miſtake the hand, not to know Gods hand; But to
B acknowledge it to be Gods hand, and not to read it, to ſay that it is Gods doing, and not to conſider, what God intends in it, is as much a ſlighting of God, as the other. Now, in every ſuch letter, in every judgement, God writes to the King; but it becomes not me to open the Kings letter, nor to preſcribe the King his interpretation of that judgement. In every ſuch letter, in every judgement God writes to the State; but I will not open their letter, nor preſcribe them their interpretation of that judgement; God, who of his goodneſſe hath vouchſafed to write unto them in theſe letters, of his abundant goodneſſe interprets himſelfe to their religious hearts. But then, in every ſuch letter, in every judgement, God writes to me too; and that letter I will open, and read that letter; I will take knowledge that it is Gods hand to me, and I will ſtudy the will of God to me in that letter; and I will write back again to my God and return him an anſwer, in the amendment of my life, and give him my reformation for his information. Elſe I am
C fallen lower then under the Prophets increpation, non credidi, I have not beleeved comminations of future judgements, under Chriſts increpation too, non credidi, I doe not beleeve judgements to be judgements, or (which is as dangerous an ignorance) not to be inſtructive judgements, medicinall and catechiſticall judgements to me. And this may well be the explication, at leaſt, the application and accommodation of theſe words, Lord who hath beleeved our report, in thoſe places, the Prophet Eſay, and the Euangeliſt S. Iohn. There remaines only the third place, where we have theſe words in the Apoſtle S. Paul, and in them, there, doe not conſider, a prophecy of a future Chriſt, as in Rom. 10. 16.
Eſay, nor a hiſtory of a preſent Chriſt, as in S. Iohn, but we conſider an application of all, prophecy, and hiſtory, all that was foretold of Chriſt, all that was done and ſuffered by Chriſt, in this, that there is a Church inſtituted by Chriſt, endowed with meanes of reconciling us to God, what judgements ſoever our ſins have drawen God to threaten a-D gainſt us, or to inflict upon us; and yet for all theſe offers, of all theſe helps, the Miniſter is put to this ſad expoſtulation, Domine, quis credidit? Lord, who hath beleeved our report?

Here then the Apoſtles expoſtulation with God, and increpation upon the people, 3. Part.
may uſefully be conceived to be thus carried; from the light and notification of God, which we have in nature, to a clearer light, which we have in the Law and Prophets, and then a clearer then that in the Goſpell, and a clearer, at leaſt a nearer then that, in the Church. Firſt then, even the naturall man is inexcuſable (ſayes this Apoſtle) if he doe not ſee the inviſible God in the viſible creature; inexcuſable, if he doe not reade the law written in his own heart. But then, Quis credidit auditui ſuo? who hath beleeved his own report? who does reade the Law written in his own heart? who does come home to Church to himſelf, or hearken to the motions of his own ſpirit, what he ſhould doe, or E what will become of him, if he doe ſtill as he hath done? or who reades the hiſtory of his own conſcience, what he hath done, and the judgements that belong to thoſe former actions? Therefore we have a clearer light then this; Firmiorem propheticum ſermonem, ſayes S. Peter, We have a more ſure word of the Prophets; that is, as S. Auguſtine reades that 2 Pet. 1. 19.
place, clariorem, a more manifeſt, a more evident declaration in the Prophets, then in nature, of the will of God towards man, and his rewarding the obedient, and rejecting the diſobedient to that will. But then, Quis credidit auditui prophetico, who hath beleeved the report of the Prophet, ſo far, as to be ſo moved and affected with a propheey, as to ſuſpect himſelfe, and apply that prophecy to himſelfe, and to ſay this judgement of his belongs to this ſin of mine? Therefore we have a clearer light then this; God, who Heb. 1. 1.
at ſundry times, and in divers manners, ſpake to the Fathers by the Prophets, hath in theſe laſt

 dayes

dayes ſpoke to us by his Son, ſayes the Apoſtle; He ſpake perſonally, and he ſpake aloud, A in the declaration of Miracles; But, Quis credidit auditui ſibi? who beleeved even his report? did they not call his preaching ſedition, and call his Miracles conjuring? Therefore we have a clearer, that is, a nearer light then the written Goſpell, that is, the Church.
For, the principall intention in Chriſts Miracles, even in the purpoſe of God, was but thereby to create and conſtitute, and eſtabliſh an aſſurance, that he that did thoſe Miracles, was the right man, the true Meſſias, that Son of God, who was made man for the redemption and ranſome of the whole world. But then, that which was to give them their beſt aſſiſtance, that that was to ſupply all, by that way, to apply this generall redemption to every particular ſoule, that was the eſtabliſhing of a Church, of a viſible and conſtant, and permanent meanes of ſalvation, by his Ordinances there, uſq; ad conſumma- tionem, till the end of the world. And this is done, ſayes this Apoſtle here; Chriſt is come, and gone, and come again; Born, and dead, and riſen again; Aſcended, and B ſate at the right hand of his Father in our nature, and deſcended again in his Spirit, the Holy Ghoſt; that Holy Ghoſt hath ſent us, us the Apoſtles; we have made Biſhops; they have made Prieſts and Deacons; and ſo that body, that family, that houſhold of Ver. 14. the faithfull, by their Miniſtery is made up. 'Tis true, ſayes the Apoſtle here, Men cannot be ſaved without calling upon God; nor call upon him acceptably without Faith;
nor beleeve truly without Hearing; nor heare profitably without Preaching; nor preach avowably, and with a bleſſing, without ſending; All this is true ſayes our Apoſtle in this place; but all this is done; ſuch a ſending, ſuch a preaching, ſuch a hearing is eſta-Ver. 19. bliſhed; For, I ask but this, ſayes he, Have they not heard? Yes verily, their ſound went into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world; And, for my ſelfe, ſayes he, I
Rom. 15. 20. have ſtrived to preach the Goſpell, where Chriſt was not named; that is, to carry the Church farther then the reſt had carried it, and now all is done, ſayes the Apoſtle. So that here C is the caſe, if the naturall man ſay, alas they are but dark notions of God which I have in nature; if the Jew ſay, alas they are but remote and ambiguous things which I have of Chriſt in the Prophets; If the ſlack and hiſtoricall Chriſtian ſay, alas they are but generall things, done for the whole world indifferently, and not applyed to me, which I reade in the Goſpell, to this naturall man, to this Jew, to this ſlack Chriſtian, we preſent an eſtabliſhed Church, a Church endowed with a power, to open the wounds of Chriſt Jeſus to receive every wounded ſoule, to ſpread the balme of his blood upon every bleeding heart; A Church that makes this generall Chriſt particular to every Chri-ſtian, that makes the Saviour of the world, thy Saviour, and my Saviour; that offers the originall ſinner Baptiſme for that; and the actuall ſinner, the body and blood of Chriſt Jeſus for that; a Church that mollifies, and entenders, and ſhivers the preſumptuous ſinner with denouncing the judgements of God, and then, conſolidates and eſtabli- D ſhes the diffident ſoule with the promiſes of his Goſpell; a Church, in contemplation whereof, God may ſay, Quid potui Vineæ, what could I doe more for my people then I have done? firſt to ſend mine only Son to die for the whole world, and then to ſpread a Church over the whole world, by which that death of his might be life to every ſoule.
This we preach, this we propoſe, according to that commiſſion put into our hands, Ite, prædicate, Goe, and preach the Goſpell to every creature, and yet, Domine, quis credidit?
Lord, who hath beleeved our report?

In this then, the Apoſtle and this Text, places the inflexible, the incorrigible ſtiffe-neſſe of mans diſobedience, in this he ſeales up his inexcuſableneſſe, his irrecoverable-neſſe, firſt, that he is not afraid of future judgements, becauſe they are remote; then, that he does not beleeve preſent judgements to be judgements, becauſe he can make ſhift to call them by a milder name, accidents, and not judgements, and can aſſigne ſome natu- E rall, or morall, or caſuall reaſon for them. But eſpecially in this, that he does not be-leeve a perpetuall preſence of Chriſt in his Church, he does not beleeve an Ordinance of meanes, by which, all burdens of bodily infirmities, of croſſes in fortune, of dejection of ſpirit, and of the primary cauſe of all theſe, that is, ſin it ſelfe may be taken off, or made eaſie unto him; he does not beleeve a Church.

Now, as in our former part we were bound to know Gods hand, and then bound to reade it, to acknowledge a judgement to be a judgement, and then to conſider what God intended in that judgement, ſo here we are bound to know the true Church, and then to know what the true Church propoſes to us. The true Church is that, where the word is

A is truely preached, and the Sacraments duly adminiſtred. But it is the Word, the Word inſpired by the holy Ghoſt; not Apocryphall, not Decretall, not Traditionall, not Additionall ſupplements; and it is the Sacraments, Sacraments inſtituted by Chriſt himſelf, and not thoſe ſuper-numerary ſacraments, thoſe poſthume, poſt-nati ſacramẽts, that have been multiplyed after: and then, that which the true Church propoſes, is, all that is truly neceſſary to ſalvation, and nothing but that, in that quality, as neceſſary. So that Problematical points, of which, either ſide may be true, & in which, neither ſide is fundamentally neceſſary to ſalvation, thoſe marginal & interlineary notes, that are not of the body of the text, opinions raiſed out of ſingularity, in ſome one man, and then maintained out of partiality, and affection to that man, theſe problematicall things ſhould not be called the Doctrine of the Church, nor lay obligations upon mens conſciences; They ſhould not diſturb the general peace, they ſhould not extinguiſh particular charity towards one another.

B The Act then, that God requires of us, is to beleeve: ſo the words carry it in all the three places: The Object, the next, the neareſt Object of this Belief, is made the Church; that is, to beleeve that God hath eſtabliſhed means for the application of Chriſts death, to all, in all Chriſtian Congregations. All things are poſſible to him that beleeveth, ſaith our Saviour; In the Word, and Sacraments, there is Salvation to every ſoule, that beleeves there is ſo: As on the other ſide, we have from the ſame mouth, and the ſame pen, He that beleeveth not, is damned. Faith then being the root of all, and God having vouchſafed to plant this root, this faith, here in his terreſtriall paradiſe, and not in heaven; in the manifeſt miniſtery of the Goſpell, and not in a ſecret and unrevealed purpoſe, (for faith comes by hearing, and hearing by preaching, which are things executed and tranſacted here in the Church) be thou content with thoſe meanes which God hath ordained, and take thy faith in thoſe meanes, and beleeve it to be influxus ſuaſorius, that C it is an influence from God, but an influence that works in thee by way of perſwaſion, and not of compulſion; It convinces thee, but it doth not conſtraine thee: It is, as S. Auguſtine ſayes excellently, Vocatio congrua, it is the voice of God to thee: but, his voice then, when thou art fit to heare, and anſwer that voice; not fitted by any exaltation of thine own naturall faculties, before the cõming of grace; nor fitted by a good husbanding of Gods former grace, ſo as in rigor of juſtice to merit an increaſe of grace, but fitted by his preventing, his auxiliant, his concomitant grace, grace exhibited to thee, at that time when he calls thee: for, ſo ſaies that Father, Sic eum vocat, quo modo ſcit ei congruere, ut vocantẽ non reſpuat: God calls him then, when he knows he wil not reſiſt his calling; But he doth not ſay, then, when he cãnot reſiſt; that needs not be ſaid. But, as there is põdus gloriæ, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, an eternall weight of glory, which mans underſtanding cannot cõprehend; ſo there is Pondus gratiæ, a certain weight of grace, that God layes upon that ſoule, D which ſhall be his, under which that ſoule ſhall not eaſily bend it ſelf any way from God.

This then is the ſumme of this whole Catechiſme, which theſe words, in theſe three places doe conſtitute: Firſt, that we be truely affected with Gods fore-warnings, and ſay there, Domine credo, Lord I beleeve that report, I beleeve that judgement to be denoun ced againſt my ſin: And then, that we be duely affected with preſent changes, and ſay there, Domine credo, Lord I beleeve that report, I beleeve this judgement to come from thee, and to be a letter of thy hand; Lord enlighten others to interpret it aright, for thy more publique glory, and me, for my particular reformation. And then, laſtly, to be ſincerely, and ſeriouſly affected with the Ordinances of his Church, and to reſt in them, for the means of our ſalvation; and to ſay there, Domine credo, Lord I beleeve this report, I beleeve that I cannot be ſaved without beleeving, nor beleeve without hearing; And therefore, whatſoever thou haſt decreed to thy ſelfe above in heaven, give me a holy aſſi- E duity of indevor, and peace of conſcience, in the execution of thy Decrees here; And let thy Spirit beare witneſſe with my ſpirit, that I am of the number of thine elect, becauſe I love the beauty of thy houſe, becauſe I captivate mine underſtanding to thine Ordinances, becauſe I ſubdue my will to obey thine, becauſe I find thy Son Chriſt Jeſus made mine, in the preaching of thy word, and my ſelfe made his, in the adminiſtration of his Sacraments. And keep me ever in the armes, and boſome of that Church, which without any tincture, any mixture, any leaven of ſuperſtition, or Idolatry, affords me all that is neceſſary to ſalvation, and obtrudes nothing, enforces nothing to be beleeved, by any Determination, or Article of hers that is not ſo. And be this enough for the Explication, and Application, and Complication of theſe words, in all theſe three places.

SERMON VII.
Preached upon Chriſtmas day.

JOHN 10. 10.

I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

THE Church celebrates this day, the Birth of our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, bleſſed for ever; And though it fall amongſt the ſhorteſt dayes in the yeere, yet of all the Feſtivals in the yeere, it is the longeſt: It is a day that conſiſts of twelve dayes; A day not meaſured by the naturall and ordinary motion of the Sun, but by a ſupernaturall and extraordinary Star, which appeared to the Wiſemen of the Eaſt, this day, and brought them to Chriſt, at Bethlem, upon Twelfe day. That day, Twelfe day, the Church now calls the Epiphany; The ancient Church called this day (Chriſtmas day) the Epiphany. Both dayes together, and all the dayes betweene, This day, when Chriſt was manifeſted to the Jews, in the Shepheards by the Angels, and Twelfe day, when Chriſt was manifeſted to the Gentiles in thoſe Wiſemen of the Eaſt, make up the Epiphany, that is, the manifeſtation of God to man. And as this day is in ſuch a reſpect a longer day then others, ſo, if we make longer houres in this day, then in other dayes; if I extend this Sermon, if you extend your Devotion, or your Patience, beyond the ordinary time, it is but a due, and a juſt celebration of the Day, and ſome accommodation to the Text, for, I am come, as he, in whoſe Name and Power I came, came; and he tels you, that He came that you might have life, and might have it more abundantly.

God, who vouchſafed to be made Man for man, for man vouchſafes alſo to doe all the offices of man towards man. He is our Father, for he made us: Of what? Of clay; So God is Figulus, ſo in the Prophet; ſo in the Apoſtle, God is our Potter. God ſtamped his Image upon us, and ſo God is Statuarius, our Minter, our Statuary. God clothed us, and ſo is veſtiarius; he hath opened his wardrobe unto us. God gave us all the fruits of the earth to eate, and ſo is œconomus, our Steward. God poures his oyle, and his wine into our wounds, and ſo is Medicus, and Vicinus, that Phyſitian, that Neighbour, that Samaritan intended in the Parable. God plants us, and waters, and weeds us, and gives the increaſe; and ſo God is Hortulanus, our Gardiner. God builds us up into a Church, and ſo God is Architectus, our Architect, our Builder; God watches the City when it is built; and ſo God is Speculator, our Sentinell. God fiſhes for men, (for all his Iohns, and his Andrews, and his Peters, are but the nets that he fiſhes withall) God is the fiſher of men; And here, in this Chapter, God in Chriſt is our Shepheard. The book of Iob is a repreſentation of God, in a Tragique-Comedy, lamentable beginnings comfortably ended: The book of the Canticles is a repreſentation of God in Chriſt, as a Bridegroom in a Marriage-ſong, in an Epithalamion: God in Chriſt is repreſented to us, in divers formes, in divers places, and this Chapter is his Paſtorall. The Lord is our Shepheard, and ſo called, in more places, then by any other name; and in this Chapter, exhibits ſome of the offices of a good Shepheard. Be pleaſed to taſte a few of them. Firſt, he ſayes, The good Shepheard comes in at the doore, the right way. If he come in at the window, that is, alwayes clamber after preferment; If he come in at vaults, and cellars, that is, by clandeſtin, and ſecret contracts with his Patron, he comes not the right way: When he is in the right way, His ſheep heare his voyce: firſt there is a voyce, He is heard; Ignorance doth not ſilence him, nor lazineſſe, nor abundance of preferment; nor indiſcreet, and diſtempered zeale does not ſilence him; (for to induce, or occaſion a ſilencing upon our ſelves, is as ill as the ignorant, or the lazie ſilence) There is a voyce, and (ſayes that Text) is is his voyce, not alwayes another in his roome; for (as it is added in the next verſe)

A The ſheep know his voyce, which they could not doe, if they heard it not often, if they were not uſed to it. And then, for the beſt teſtimony, and conſummation of all, he ſayes, The good Shepheard gives his life for his ſheep. Every good Shepheard gives his life, that is, ſpends his life, weares out his life for his ſheep: of which this may be one good argument, That there are not ſo many crazie, ſo many ſickly men, men that ſo ſoon grow old in any profeſſion, as in ours. But in this, Chriſt is our Shepheard in a more peculiar, and more incommunicable way, that he is Paſtor humani generis, & eſca; firſt, that he feeds not one Pariſh, nor one Dioceſſe, but humanum genus, all Mankinde, the whole world, and then feeds us ſo, as that he is both our Paſtor, and our Paſture, he feeds us, and feeds us with himſelfe, for, His fleſh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed. And therefore Honor celebratur totius gregis, per annua feſta paſtoris: As often as we come to celebrate the comming of this Shepheard, in giving that honour, we receive an honour, becauſe that is
B a declaration, that we are the ſheepe of that paſture, and the body of that head. And ſo much being not impertinently ſaid, for the connexion of the words, and their complication with the day, paſſe we now to the more particular diſtribution and explication thereof, I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

In theſe words, our parts will be three; for, firſt we muſt conſider the Perſons, The Shepheard and the ſheep, God and Man, Him and Them, Them indefinitely, all them, all men, I came, ſayes Chriſt, I alone, that they, all they might have life: And ſecondly we conſider the action it ſelf, as it is wrapped up in this word, veni, I came; for, that is firſt, that he who was alwaies omnipreſent, every where before, did yet ſtudy a new way of comming, & communicating himſelf with man, veni, I came, that is, novo modo veni, I came by a new way; And then, that he, who fed his former flock but with Propheſies, and promiſes, that he would come, feeds us now with actuall performances, with his reall preſence, and the
C exhibition of himſelf. And laſtly we ſhall conſider the end, the purpoſe, the benefit of his comming, which is life: And firſt, ut daret, that he might give life, bring life, offer life to the world, (which is one mercy) and then, ut haberent, that we might have it, embrace it, poſſeſſe it, (which is another) and, after both, a greater then both, that we might have this life abundantius, more abundantly; which is, firſt, abundantius illis, more abundantly then other men of this world, and then abundantius ipſis, more abundantly then we our ſelves had it in this world, in the world to come; for, therefore he came, that we might have life, and might have it more abundantly.

First then, in our firſt part, we conſider the Perſons, The Shepheard and the Sheepe, Him and Them, God and Man; of which Perſons, the one for his Greatneſſe, God, the other for his littleneſſe, man, can ſcarce fall under any conſideration. What eye can fixe it ſelf upon Eaſt and Weſt at once? And he muſt ſee more then Eaſt and Weſt, that ſees
D God, for God ſpreads infinitely beyond both: God alone is all; not onely all that is, but all that is not, all that might be, if he would have it be. God is too large, too immenſe, and then man is too narrow, too little to be conſidered; for, who can fixe his eye upon an Atome? and he muſt ſee a leſſe thing then an Atome, that ſees man, for man is nothing. First, for the incomprehenſibleneſſe of God, the underſtanding of man, hath a limited, a determined latitude; it is an intelligence able to move that Spheare which it is fixed to, but could not move a greater: I can comprehend naturam naturatam, created nature, but for that natura naturans, God himſelfe, the underſtanding of man cannot comprehend. I can ſee the Sun in a looking-glaſſe, but the nature, and the whole working of the Sun I cannot ſee in that glaſſe. I can ſee God in the creature, but the nature, the eſſence, the ſecret purpoſes of God, I cannot ſee there. There is defatigatio in intellectualibus, ſayes the ſaddeſt and ſoundeſt of the Hebrew Rabbins, the ſoule may be E tired, as well as the body, and the underſtanding dazeled, as well as the eye. It is a good note of the ſame Rabbi, upon thoſe words of Solomon, fill not thy ſelfe with hony, leſt thou vomit it, that it is not ſaid, that if thou beeſt cloyd with it, thou maiſt be diſtaſted, diſaffected towards it after, but thou maiſt vomit it, and a vomit works ſo, as that it does not onely bring up that which was then, but that alſo which was formerly taken. Curious men buſie themſelves ſo much upon ſpeculative ſubtilties, as that they deſert, and abandon the ſolid foundations of Religion, and that is a dangerous vomit; To ſearch ſo farre into the nature, and unrevealed purpoſes of God, as to forget the nature, and duties of man, this is a ſhrewd ſurfet, though of hony, and a dangerous vomit. It is not needfull for thee, to ſee the things that are in ſecret, ſayes the wiſe man, non indiges, thou needeſt deſt not that knowledge: Thou maiſt doe well enough in this world, and bee Gods good ſervant, and doe well enough in the next world, and bee a glorious Saint, and yet never ſearch into Gods ſecrets. Te decet Hymnus, (ſo the vulgar reades that place) To thee, O Lord, belong our Hymnes, our Pſalmes, our Prayſes, our cheerefull acclamations; and conformably to that, we tranſlate it, Praiſe waiteth for thee, O God in Sion: But if we will take it according to the Originall, it muſt be, Tibi ſilentium laus eſt, Thy praiſe, O Lord, conſiſts in ſilence: That that man praiſes God beſt, that ſayes leaſt of him; of him, that is of his nature, of his eſſence, of his unrevealed will, and ſecret purpoſes. O that men would praiſe the Lord, is Davids provocation to us all, but how? O that men would praiſe the Lord, and declare his wondrous works to the ſons of men! but not to goe about to declare his unrevealed Decrees, or ſecret purpoſes, is as good a way of praiſing him, as the other. And therefore, O that men would praiſe the Lord, ſo, forbeare his Majeſty, when he is retired into himſelfe, in his Decrees, and magnifie his Majeſty, as he manifeſts himſelfe to us, in the execution of thoſe Decrees; of which, this in our Text is a great one, that he that is infinitely more then all, deſcended to him, that is infinitely leſſe then nothing; which is the other perſon whom we are to conſider in this part, ille illis, I to them, God to us.

Illis.

The Hebrew Doctors almoſt every where repeat that adage of theirs, lex loquitur linguam filiorum hominum, God ſpeakes mens language, that is, the Holy Ghoſt in the Scriptures deſcends to the capacity and underſtanding of man, and ſo preſents God in the faculties of the minde of man, and in the lineaments of the body of man. But yet, ſay they, there is never braine, nor liver, nor ſpleene, nor any other inward part aſcribed to God, but onely the heart. God is all heart, and that whole heart, that inexhauſtible fountaine of love, is directed wholly upon man. And then, though in the Scriptures, thoſe bodily lineaments, head and feet, and hands, and eyes, and eares be aſcribed to God, God is never ſaid to have ſhoulders; for, ſay they, ſhoulders are the ſubjects of burdens, and therein the figures of patience, and ſo God is all ſhoulder, all patience; he heares patiently, he ſees patiently, he ſpeakes patiently, he dyes patiently: And is there a patience beyond that? In Chriſt there is, he ſuffers patiently a quotidian Crucifying; we kill the Lord of Life every day, every day we make a mock of Chriſt Jeſus, and tread the blood of the Covenant under our feet every day: And as though all his paſſion, and blood, and wounds, and heart, were ſpent by our former oathes, and blaſphemies, we crucifie him dayly by our dayly ſins, that we might have new blood, and heart, and wounds to ſweare by; and all this hee ſuffers patiently, and after all this, ille illis, to this man, this God comes.

Illis, qui nihil. Eſay.40.15.

He to us, God to man; all to nothing: for upon that we inſiſt firſt, as the firſt diſproportion betweene us, and ſo the firſt exaltation of his mercy towards us. Man is, ſayes the Prophet Eſay, Quaſi ſtilla ſitulæ, As a drop upon the bucket. Man is not all that, not ſo much as that, as a drop upon the bucket, but quaſi, ſomething, ſome little thing towards it; and what is a drop upon the bucket, to a river, to a ſea, to the waters above the firmament? Man to God? Man is, ſayes the ſame Prophet in the ſame place, Quaſi momentum ſtateræ; we tranſlate it, As ſmall duſt upon the balance: Man is not all that, not that ſmall graine of duſt; but quaſi, ſome little thing towards it: And what can a graine of duſt work in governing the balance? What is man that God ſhould be mindfull of him? Vanity ſeemes to be the lighteſt thing, that the Holy Ghoſt could name; and when he had named that, he ſayes, and ſayes, and ſayes, often, very, very often, All is vanity. But when he comes to waigh man with vanity it ſelfe, he findes man lighter then vanity: Take, ſayes he, great men, and meane men altogether, and altogether they are lighter then vanity. When that great Apoſtle ſayes of himſelfe, that he was in nothing behinde the very chiefeſt of the Apoſtles, and yet, for all that, ſayes he was nothing; who can think himſelfe any thing, for being a Giant in proportion, a Magiſtrate in power, a Rabbi in learning, an Oracle in Counſell? Let man be ſomething; how poore, and inconſiderable a ragge of this world, is man? Man, whom Paracelſus would have undertaken to have made, in a Limbeck, in a Furnace: Man, who, if they were altogether, all the men, that ever were, and are, and ſhall be, would not have the power of one Angel in them all, whereas all the Angels, (who, in the Schoole are conceived to be more in number, then, not onely all the Species, but all the individualls of this lower world) have not in them all, the power of one finger of Gods hand: Man, of whom when David had ſaid, (as the loweſt diminution

A nution that he could put upon him) I am a worme and no man, He might have gone lower, and ſaid, I am a man and no worm; for man is ſo much leſſe then a worm, as that wormes of his own production, ſhall feed upon his dead body in the grave, and an immortall worm gnaw his conſcience in the torments of hell. And then, if that which God, and God in the counſaile and concurrence, and cooperation of the whole Trinity hath made thee, Man, be nothing, canſt thou be proud of that, or think that any thing which the King hath made thee, a Lord, or which thy wife hath made thee, Rich, or which thy riches have made thee, an Officer? As Iob ſayes of impertinent comforters, miſerable comforters, ſo I ſay of theſe Creations, miſerable creations are they all. Only as thou maiſt be a new creature in Chriſt Jeſus, thou maiſt be ſomething; for that's a nobler, and a harder creation then the firſt; when God had a clod of red earth in his hand, to make me in Adam, he had more towards his end, then when he hath me, an unregenerate, and B rebellious ſoule, to make a new creature in Chriſt Jeſus. And yet Ille illis, to this man comes this God, God that is infinitely more then all, to man that is infinitely leſſe then nothing, which was our firſt diſproportion, and the firſt exaltation of his mercy; and the next is, Ille illis, Illis qui hoſtes, that this God came to this man, then when this man was a profeſſed enemy to this God. Pſ. 22.6.

Si contrarium Deo quæras nihil eſt, ſaies S. Auguſtine. If thou aske me what is contrary to God, I cannot ſay, that any thing is ſo; for, whatſoever is any thing, hath a beeing, and whatſoever hath ſo, hath in that very beeing ſome affinity with God, ſome aſſimilation to God; ſo that nothing is contrary to God. If thou aske mee, Quis hoſtis, who is an enemy to GOD, I cannot ſay that of any thing in this World, but man. That viper that flew at Saint Paul, was not therein an enemy to GOD; that viper did not direct it ſelfe upon S. Paul, as S. Paul was a uſefull, and a neceſſary inſtru- C ment of Chriſt; But S. Paul himſelfe was a direct enemy to Chriſt himſelfe, Tu me, thou perſecuteſt me, ſaies Chriſt himſelfe unto him. And if we be not all enemies to God in ſuch a direct oppoſition, as that we ſinne therefore becauſe that ſinne violates the maje- ſty of God, (and yet truly every habituall, and deliberated ſinne amounts to almoſt as much, becauſe in every ſuch ſinne, we ſeeme to try concluſions, whether God can ſee a ſinne, or be affected with a ſinne, or can, or cares to puniſh a ſinne, as though we doubted whether God were a preſent God, or a pure God, or a powerfull God, and ſo conſe- quently whether there be any God or no) If we be not all enemies to God, in this kind, yet in adhering to the enemy we are enemies; In our prevarications, and eaſie betrayings, and ſurrendring of our ſelves to the enemy of his kingdom, ſatan, we are his enemies. For ſmall wages, and ill-paid penſions we ſerve him; and leſt any man ſhould flatter and delude himſelfe, in ſaying, I have my wages, and my reward before hand, my pleaſures in this life, the puniſhment, (if ever) not till the next, The Apoſtle deſtroyes that dreame, D with that queſtion of confuſion, What fruit had you then in thoſe things, of which you are now aſhamed? Certainly ſin is not a gainfull way; without doubt more men are impoveri- ſhed, and beggered by ſinful courſes, then enriched; what fruit had they? ſays the Apoſtle, and ſin cannot be the way of honour, for we dare not avow our ſins, but are aſhamed of them, when they are done, fruitleſneſs, unprofitableneſs before, ſhame and diſhonor after, and yet for theſe we are enemies to God; and yet for all this God comes to us; Ille illis, the Lord of Hoſts, to naked and diſarmed man, the God of peace to this enemy of God. Some men will continue kinde, where they finde a thankfull receiver, but God is kinde to the unthankfull, ſayes Chriſt himſelfe. There may be found a man that will dye for his friend, ſayes he; but God dyed for his enemies: Then when ye were enemies, you were reconciled to God by the death of his Son. To come ſo in-glorioufly, he that is infinitely E more then all, to him that is infinitely leſſe then nothing, (that was our firſt diſproportion, and the firſt exaltatation of his mercy) to come, (ſhall we venture to ſay ſo) ſo ſelfe pro- ditorioufly, as to betray himſelfe and deliver himſelfe to his enemies, (that was our ſe- cond) is equalled, at leaſt, in a third, ille illis, he to them, that is unus omnibus, he alone for the ſalvation of all men, as it is expreſly ſaid, for this word in our Text, they, hath no limitation, I came, I alone, that they, all they might be the better. Rom 6.21. Luke 6.35. 1 Cor. 5.14.

Some of the ancient Fathers, delivering the mercies of God, ſo, as the articles of our Church enjoyne them to bee delivered, that is, generally, as they are delivered in the Scriptures, have delivered them ſo over-generally, that they have ſeemed loth to thinke the devill himſelfe excluded from all benefit of Chriſts comming. Some of the later Authors

Authors in the Roman Church, (who, as pious as they pretend to be towards the Fathers, are apter to discover the nakednesse of the Fathers, then we are) have noted in Iustin Martyr, and in Epiphanius, and in Clement of Alexandria, and in Oecumenius, (and Oecumenius is no single Father, but Pater patratus, a manifold Father, a complicated father, a Father that collected Fathers) and even in S. Ierome himselfe, and S. Ambrose too, some inclinations towards that opinion, that the devill retaining still his faculty of free will, is therefore capable of repentance, and so of benefit by this comming of Christ; And those Authors of the Roman Church, that modifie the matter, and excuse the Fathers herein, excuse them no other way but this, that though that opinion and doctrine of those Fathers, bee not true in it selfe, yet it was never condemned by any Councell, nor by any ancient Father. So very far, did very many goe in enlarging the mercies of God in Christ, to all. But waiving this over-large extention and profusion thereof, and directing it upon a more possible, and a more credible object, that is, Man; S. Cyril of Alexandria, speaking of the possibility of the salvation of all men, saies, by way of objection to himselfe, Omnes non credunt, How can all be saved since all doe not beleeve? but, saies he, Because actually they do not beleeve, is it therefore impossible they should beleeve? And for actuall beleefe, saies he, though all doe not, yet so many doe, ut facilè qui pereant, superent, that, by Gods goodnesse, more are saved, then lost, saies that Father of tender and large bowels, S. Cyril. And howsoever he may seeme too tender, and too large herein, yet it is a good peece of counsaile, which that Rabbi whom I named before, gives, Ne redarguas ea falsitatis, de quorum contrariis nulla est demonstratio, Be not apt to call any opinion false, or hereticall, or damnable, the contrary whereof cannot be evidently proved. And for this particular, the generall possibility of salvation, all agree that the merit of Christ Jesus is sufficient for all. Whether this all-sufficiency grow ex intrinseca ratione formali, out of the very nature of the merit, the dignity of the person being considered, or grow ex pacto, & acceptatione, out of the acceptation of the Father, and the contract betweene him and the Son, for that, let the Thomists, and the Scotists, in the Roman Church wrangle. All agree, that there is enough done for all. And would God receive enough for all, and then, exclude some, of himselfe, without any relation, any consideration of sinne? God forbid. Man is called by divers names, names of lownesse enough, in the Scriptures; But, by the name of Enosh, Enosh that signifies meere misery, Man is never called in the Scriptures, till after the fall of Adam. Onely sinne after, and not any ill purpose in God before, made man miserable. The manner of expressing the mercy of God, in the frame and course of Scriptures, expresses evermore the largenesse of that mercy. Very often, in the Scriptures, you shall finde the person suddenly changed; and when God shall have said in the beginning of a sentence, I will shew mercy unto them, them, as though he spoke of others, presently, in the same sentence, he will say, my loving kindnesse will I not draw from thee; not from thee, not from them, not from any; that so whensoever thou heareſt of Gods mercy proposed to them, to others, thou mightest beleeve that mercy to bee meant to thee, and whensoever they, others heare that mercy proposed to thee, they might beleeve it to be meant to them. And so much may, to good purpose, be observed out of some other parts of this Chapter, in another translation. In the third verse it is said, His sheepe heare his voice, In the Arabique translation it is Oves audit, His sheepe in the plurall, does heare, in the singular. God is a plurall God, and offers himselfe to all, collectively; God is a singular God, and offers himselfe to every man, distributively. So also is it said there, Nominibus suo, He cals his sheepe by their names; It is names in the plurall, and theirs, in the singular: whatsoever God proposes to any, he intends to all. In which contemplation, S. Augustine breaks out into that holy exclamation, O bone omnipotens qui sic curas unumquemque nostrûm, tanquam solum cures, & sic omnes tamquam singulos, O good and mighty God, who art as loving to every man, as to all mankind, and meanest as well to all mankind, as to any man. Be pleased to make your use of this note, for the better imprinting of this largenesse of Gods mercy. Moses desires of God, that he would shew him Vias suas, His waies, his proceedings, his dealings with men; that which he calls after, Gloriam suam, His glory, how he glorifies himselfe upon man, God promises him in the next verse, that he will shew him Omne bonum, All his goodnesse, God hath no way towards man but goodnesse, God glorifies himselfe in nothing upon man, but in his owne goodnesse. And therefore when God comes to the performance of this promise, in the next Chapter, he showes him his way, and his glory, Moses.

Exod. 33. 13. V. 18. V. 19.

Exod. 34. 6.

A glory, and his goodneſſe, in ſhewing him that he is a mercifull God, a gracious God, a long-ſuffering God, a God that forgives ſins and iniquities, and (as the Hebrew Doctors note) there are thirteen attributes, thirteen denotations of God ſpecified in that place, and of all thoſe thirteen, there is but one that taſts of judgement, (That he will puniſh the ſins of Fathers upon Children.) All the other twelve are meerly, wholly mercy; ſuch a proportion hath his mercy above his juſtice, ſuch a proportion, as that there is no cauſe in him, if all men be not partakers of it. Shall we ſay, (ſayes S. Cyril) Melius agriculturam non exerceri, ſi quæ nocent tolli non poſſunt, It were better there were no tillage, then that weeds ſhould grow, Melius non creaſſe, better that God had made no men, then that ſo many ſhould be damned. God made none to be damned; And therefore though ſome would expunge out of our Litany, that Rogation, that Petition, That thou wouldſt have mercy upon all men; as though it were contrary to Gods purpoſe to have mercy
B upon all men; yet S. Auguſtine enlarges his charity too far, Libera nos Domine, qui jam invocamus te, deliver us O Lord, who do now call upon thee, Et libera eos qui nondum invocant, ut invocent te, & liberes eos, and deliver them who do not yet call upon thee, that they may call upon thee, and be farther delivered by thee. But it is time to paſſe from this firſt part, the conſideration of the Perſons, Ille Illi, that God who is infinitely more then All, would come to man who is infinitely leſſe then nothing; that God who is the God of peace, would come to man his profeſſed enemy; that God, the only Son of God, would come to the reliefe of man, of all men, to our ſecond generall part, the action it ſelf, ſo far as it is enwrapped in this word, Veni, I came; I came that they might have life.

Through this ſecond part, veni, I came, we muſt paſſe apace; becauſe, upon the third, 2 Part.
the end of his comming, (that they might have life) we muſt neceſſarily inſiſt ſome time.
In this therefore, wee make but two ſteps; And this the firſt, that that God who is om-
C nipreſent, alwayes every where, in love to man, ſtudyed a new way of comming, of communicating himſelfe to man; veni, I came, novo modo, ſo as I was never with man before. The rule is worth the repeating, lex loquitur linguam filiorum hominum, God ſpeakes mans language, that is, ſo, as that he would be underſtood by man. Therefore to God, who alwayes fills all places, are there divers Poſitions, and Motions, and Tranſitions aſcribed in Scriptures. In divers places is God ſaid to ſit; Sedet Rex, The Lord ſitteth King for ever. Howſoever the Kings of the earth be troubled, and rayſed, and throwne Pſal. 29. 10.
downe againe, and troubled, and raiſed, and throwne downe by him, yet the Lord ſitteth King for ever. Habitat in Cœlis, ſayes David, and yet ſedet in circulis terræ, ſayes Eſay, The Lord dwelleth in the heavens, and yet hee ſits upon the compaſſe of this earth: Where no earth-quake ſhakes his ſeat; for ſedet in confuſione (as Eſay 40. 22.
one Tranſlation reads that place, Pſal. 29. 10.) The Lord ſitteth upon the flood, (ſo wee D reade it) what confuſions ſoever diſorder the world, what floods ſoever ſurround and overflow the world, the Lord ſits ſafe. Other phraſes there are of like denotation. Exit de loco, Behold the Lord commeth out of his place; that is, he produces, and brings to light, Eſay 26. 21.
things which he kept ſecret before. And ſo, Revertar ad locum, I will goe, and returne to Hoſe. 5. 15.
my place; that is, I will withdraw the light of my countenance, my preſence, my providence from them. So that heaven is his place, and then is he ſaid to come to us, when he manifeſts himſelf unto us in any new manner of working. In ſuch a ſenſe was God come to us, when he ſaid, I lift up my hands to heaven, and ſay, I live for ever. Where Deut. 32. 40.
was God when he lifted up his hands to heaven? Here, here upon earth, with us, in his Church, for our aſſurance, and our eſtabliſhment, making that proteſtation (denoted in the lifting up of his hands to heaven) that he lived for ever, that he was the everliving God, and that therefore we need feare nothing. God is ſo omnipreſent, as that the Ubi-
E quitary will needs have the body of God every where: ſo omnipreſent, as that the Stancariſt will needs have God not only to be in every thing, but to be every thing, that God is an Angel in an Angel, and a ſtone in a ſtone, and a ſtraw in a ſtraw. But God is truly ſo omnipreſent, as that he is with us before he comes to us: Quid peto ut venias in me, Auguſt.
qui non eſſem, ſi non eſſes in me? why doe I pray that thou wouldſt come into me, who could not only not pray, but could not bee, if thou wert not in me before? But his comming in this Text, is a new act of particular mercy, and therefore a new way of comming. What way? by aſſuming our nature in the bleſſed Virgin. That that Paradoxa virgo, (as Amelberga the wife of one of the Earls of Flanders, who lived continently even in mariage, and is therfore called Paradoxa virgo, a Virgin beyond opinion) that this moſt bleſſed blessed Virgin Mary should not only have a Son, (for Manes, the Patriarch of that great Sect of Heretiques, the Manichees, boasted himselfe to be the son of a Virgin, and some casuists in the Romane Church have ventured to say, that by the practice and intervention of the devill there may be a childe, and yet both parents, father and mother remain Virgins) But that this Son of this blessed Virgin, should also be the Son of the eternall God, this is such a comming of him who was here before, as that if it had not arisen in his own goodnesse, no man would ever have thought of it, no man might ever have wished, or prayed for such a comming, that the only Son of God should come to die for all the sons of men. For Aliud est hic esse, aliud hic tibi esse; It is one thing for God to be here in the world, another thing to be come hither for thy sake, born of a woman for thy salvation. And this is the first act of his mercy wrapped up in this word, Veni, I came, I who was alwayes present, studied a new way of comming, I who never went from thee, came again to thee.

The other act of his mercy enwrapped in this word, veni, I came, is this, that he that came to the old world but in promises, and prophecies, and figures, is actually, really, personally, and presentially come to us; of which difference, that man will have the best sense, who languishes under the heavy expectation of a reversion, in office, or inheritance, or hath felt the joy of comming to the actuall possession of such a reversion. Christ was the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world; appointed for a Sacrifice from that first promise of a Messias in Paradise long before that; from all eternity. For, whensoever the election of the elect was, (date it when you will) Christ was at that election; and not only as the second person in the Trinity, as God, but Christ considered as man, and as the propitiation and sacrifice for man; for whosoever was elected, was elected in Christ. Christ was alwayes come in Gods purpose; and early come in Gods promise; and continually comming in the succession of the Prophets; with such a confidence, as that one of them sayes, Puer datus, filius natus, A childe is given unto us, a Son is born unto us; Born and given already; because the purpose of God, in which he was born, cannot be disappointed; the promise of God, by which he was given, cannot be frustrated; the Prophets of God, by whom he was presented, cannot be mistaken. But yet, still it was a future thing. Christ is often called the Expectation of the world; but it was all that while, but an Expectation, but a reversion of a future thing. So God fed that old world with expectation of future things, as that that very name by which God notified himself most to that people, in his commission by Moses to Pharaoh, was a future name; howsoever our Translations and Expositions run upon the present, as though God had said Qui sum, my name is I am, yet in truth it is Qui ero; my name is I shall be. They had evidences enow that God was; but God was pleased to establish in them an assurance that he would be so still; and not only be so still as he was then; but that hee would be so with them hereafter as he was never yet, he would be Immanuel, God with us so, as that God and man should be one person. It was then a faire assurance, and a blessed comfort which the children of Israel had in that of Zechary, Ecce venit rex, Rejoyce ye daughters of Sion, and shout ye daughters of Ierusalem, Behold thy King commeth riding unto thee, upon an Asse. But yet this assurance, though delivered as in the present, produced not those acclamations, and recognitions, and Hosannaes, and Hosanna in the highest, to the Son of David, as his personall, and actuall, and visible riding into Jerusalem upon Palme-Sunday did. Amougst the Jews there was light enough to discern this future blessing, this comming of Christ; but they durst not open it, nor publish it to others. We see the Jews would dye in defence of any part of their Law, were it but the Ceremoniall; were it but for the not eating of Swines flesh; what unsufferable torments suffered the seven brothers in the Maccabees, for that? But yet we never finde that any of them dyed, or exposed themselves to the danger, or to the dignity of Martyrdome for this Doctrine of the Messias, this future comming of Christ. Nay, we finde that the Septuagint, who first translated the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, for King Ptolome, disguised divers places thereof, and departed from the Originall, rather then propose this future comming of the Son of God to the interpretation of the world. A little Candle they had for themselves, but they durst not light anothers Candle at it. So also some of the more speculative Philosophers had got some beames of this light, but because they saw it would not be beleeved, they let it alone, they said little of it. Hence is it that S. Augustine sayes, si Platonici reviviscerent, if Plato and his Disciples should rise from the dead,

De civit. Dei lib. 8. cap. 4.

A dead, and come now into our ſtreets, and ſee thoſe great Congregations, which thruſt and throng every Sabbath, and every day of holy convocation, to the worſhip of our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, Hoc fortaſſe dicerent, This it is likely they would ſay, ſayes he, Hæc ſunt, quæ populis perſuadere non auſi, conſuetudini ceſſimus, This is that religion, which becauſe it conſiſted ſo much in future things, we durſt not propoſe to the people, but were fain to leave them to thoſe preſent, and ſenſible, and viſible things, to which they had been accuſtomed before, leſt when we had ſhaked them in their old religion, we ſhould not be able to ſettle, and eſtabliſh them in the new; And, as in civill government, a Tyranny is better then an Anarchy, a hard King better then none, ſo when we conſider religions, Idolatry is better then Atheiſme, and ſuperſtition better then profaneneſſe. Not that the Idolater ſhall any more be ſaved then the Atheiſt; but that the Idolater having been accuſtomed to ſome ſenſe and worſhip of God (of God in his eſtimation) B is therefore apter to receive religious impreſſions, then the Atheiſt is. In this then conſiſts this ſecond act of Chriſts mercy to us in this word veni, I am actually, really, perſonally, preſentially come, that thoſe types and figures and ſacrifices, which repreſented Chriſt to the old world, were not more viſible to the eye, more palpable to the hand, more obvious to the very bodily ſenſes, that Chriſt himſelf hath been ſince to us. Therefore S. John does not only reſt in that, That which was from the beginning, (Chriſt was alwayes in purpoſe, in prophecy, in promiſe) nor in that, That which we have heard, (the world heard of Chriſt long before they ſaw him) but he proceeds to that, That which we have ſeen, and looked upon with our eyes, and handled with our hands, that declare we unto you. So that we are now delivered from that jealouſie that poſſeſſed thoſe Septuagint, thoſe Tranſlators, that they durſt not ſpeak plain, and delivered from that ſuſpition that poſſeſſed Plato, and his diſciples, that the people were incapable of that doctrine. Wee C know that Chriſt is come, and we avow it, and we preach it, and we affirm, that it is not onely as impious, and irreligious a thing, but as ſenſleſſe, and as abſurd a thing to deny that the Son of God hath redeemed the world, as to deny that God hath created the world; and that he is as formally, and as gloriouſly a Martyr that dyes for this Article, The Son of God is come, as he that dyes for this, There is a God. And theſe two acts of his mercy, enwrapped in this one word, veni, I came, (firſt, that he who is alwayes preſent, out of an abundant love to man, ſtudied a new way of comming, and then, that he who was but betrothed to the old world by way of promiſe, is married to us by an actuall comming) will be farther explicated to us, in that, which only remaines and conſtitutes our third, and laſt part, the end and purpoſe of his comming, That they might have life, and might have it more abundantly. And though this laſt part put forth many handles, wee can but take them by the hand, and ſhake them by the hand, that is, open them, and ſo D leave them.

D Firſt then in this laſt part, we conſider the gift it ſelf, the treaſure, Life, That they might have life. Now life is the character by which Chriſt ſpecificates and denominates himſelfe; Life is his very name, and that name by which he conſummates all his other names, I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; And therefore does Peter juſtly and bitterly upbraid the Jews with that, Ye deſired a murderer, (an enemy to life) to be granted unto you, and killed the Prince of Life. Acts 3. 14. It is an honour to any thing that it may be ſworn by; by vulgar and triviall things men might not ſweare, How ſhall I pardon them this? ſayes God, They have ſworn by things that are not gods. And therefore God, who in ſo many places profeſſes to ſweare by himſelf, and of whom the Apoſtle ſayes, That becauſe he could ſweare by no greater, he ſwore by himſelfe, becauſe he could propoſe no greater thing in himſelf, no clearer notion of himſelf then life, (for his life is his eternity, and E his eternity is himſelfe) does therefore through all the Law and the Prophets ſtill ſweare in that form, Vivo ego, vivit Dominus, As I live, ſaith the Lord, and as the Lord liveth; ſtill he ſweares by his own life; As that ſolemne Oath which is mentioned in Daniel, is conceived in that form too, He lift up his right hand and his left hand to heaven, and ſwore by him that liveth for ever; that is, by God, and God in that notion as he is life. All that the Queen and the Councell could wiſh and appreeate to the King, was but that, Life, In ſempiternum vive, vive in æternum, O King live for ever. God is life, and would not the death of any. We are not ſure that ſtones have not life; ſtones may have life; neither (to ſpeak humanely) is it unreaſonably thought by them, that thought the whole world to be inanimated by one ſoule, and to be one intire living creature; and in that reſpect does

This is the worſt that the Apoſtle ſayes of the young wanton widow, That if ſhe live in pleaſure, ſhe is dead whilſt ſhe lives. So is that Magiſtrate that ſtudies nothing but his own honour, and dignity in his place, dead in his place; And that Prieſt that ſtudies nothing but his owne eaſe, and profit, dead in his living; And that Judge that dares not condemne a guilty perſon, And (which is the bolder tranſgreſſion) dares condemne the innocent, deader upon the Bench, then the Priſoner at the Barre; God hath included all that is Deut. 30. 15. good, in the name of Life, and all that is ill in the name of Death, when he ſayes, See, I have ſet before thee Vitam & Bonum, Life and Good, Mortem & Malum, Death and Evill.
Hab. 2. 4. This is the reward propoſed to our faith, Iuſtus fide ſua vivit, To live by our faith: And this is the reward propoſed to our works, Fac hoc & vives, to live by our works; All is life. And this fulneſſe, this conſummation of happineſſe, Life, and the life of life, ſpiritu- B all life, and the exaltation of ſpirituall life, eternall life, is the end of Chriſts comming, I came that they might have life.

Vt daret. And firſt, ut daret, that he might give life, bring life into the world, that there might be life to be had, that the world might be redeemed from that loſſe, which S. Auguſtine ſayes it was falne into, Perdidimus poſſibilitatem boni, That we had all loſt all poſſibility of life. For, the heaven and the earth, and all that the Poet would call Chaos, was not a deader lump before the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, then Mankind was, before the influence of Chriſts comming wrought upon it. But now that God ſo loved the world, as that he gave his Son, now that the Son ſo loved the world, as that he Pſal. 19. 6. gave himſelfe, as David ſayes of the Sun of the firmament, the father of nature, Nihil abſconditum, there is nothing hid from the heat thereof; ſo we ſay of this Son of God, the Father of the faithfull in a far higher ſenſe, then Abraham was called ſo, Nthil abſcon-
ditum, there is nothing hid from him, no place, no perſon excluded from the benefit of his C comming. The Son hath paid, the Father hath received enough for all; not in ſingle money, for the diſcharge of thy leſſer debts, thy idle words, thy wanton thoughts, thy unchaſt looks, but in maſſie talents, to diſcharge thy crying debts, the clamors of thoſe poore whom thou haſt oppreſſed, and thy thundring debts, thoſe blaſphemies by which thou haſt torne that Father that made thee, that Sonne that redeemed thee, that holy 1 Reg. 5. Ghoſt that would comfort thee. There is enough given; but then, as Hiram ſent materials ſufficient for the building of the Temple, but there was ſomething elſe to be done, for the fitting, and placing thereof; ſo there is life enough brought into the world, for all the world, by the death of Chriſt, but then there is ſomething elſe to be done for the application of this life to particular perſons, intended in this word in our Text, ut haberent, I came that they might have life.

Vt haberent. There is Ayre enough in the world, to give breath to every thing, though every thing D doe not breath. If a tree, or a ſtone doe not breathe, it is not becauſe it wants ayre, but becauſe it wants meanes to receive it, or to returne it. All egges are not hatched that the Matt. 23. 37. hen ſits upon; neither could Chriſt himſelfe get all the chickens that were hatched, to come, and to ſtay under his wings. That man that is blinde, or that will winke, ſhall ſee no more ſunne upon S. Barnabies day, then upon S. Lucies; no more in the ſummer, then Pſal. 130. 7. in the winter ſolſtice. And therefore as there is copioſa redemptio, a plentifull redemption brought into the world by the death of Chriſt, ſo (as S. Paul found it in his particular Acts 22. 6. converſion) there is copioſa lux, a great & a powerfull light exhibited to us, that we might ſee, and lay hold of this life, in the Ordinances of the Church, in the Confeſſions, and Abſolutions, and Services, and Sermons, and Sacraments of the Church: Chriſt came ut daret, that he might bring life into the world, by his death, and then he inſtituted his Church, ut haberent, that by the meanes thereof this life might be infuſed into us, and in- E fuſed ſo, as the laſt word of our Text delivers it, Abundantius, I came, that they might have life more abundantly.

Abundantius. Auguſt. Dignaris Domine, ut eis, quibus debita dimittis, te, promiſſionibus tuis, debitorem facias; This, O Lord, is thine abundant proceeding; Firſt thou forgiveſt me my debt to thee, and then thou makeſt thy ſelfe a debter to me by thy large promiſes; and after all, performeſt thoſe promiſes more largely then thou madeſt them. Indeed, God can doe nothing ſcantly, penuriouſly, ſingly. Even his maledictions, (to which God is ever loth to come) his firſt commination was plurall, it was death, and death upon death, Morte morieris. Death may be plurall; but this benediction of life cannot admit a ſingular, Chajim,

A which is the word for life, hath no ſingular number. This is the difference betweene Gods Mercy, and his Judgements, that ſometimes his Judgements may be plurall, complicated, enwrapped in one another, but his Mercies are alwayes ſo, and cannot be otherwiſe; he gives them abundantiùs, more abundantly.

More abundantly then to whom? The naturall man hath the Image of God imprinted in his ſoule; eternity is God himſelfe, man hath not that, not eternity; but the Image of eternity, that is Immortality, a poſt-eternity there is in the ſoule of man. And then, man is all ſoule in Moſes expreſſion; For, hee does not ſay that man had, but that man was a living ſoule. So that the naturall man hath life more abundantly then any other creature, (howſoever Oakes, and Crowes, and Harts may bee ſaid to out-live him) becauſe he hath a life after this life. But Chriſt came to give life more abundantly then this. Illis, gentibus. Gen. 2. 7.

B That he did, when he came to the Jews in promiſes, in Types, and Figures, and Sacrifices: He gave life more abundantly to the Jew, then to the Gentile, becauſe he gave him better meanes to preſerve that life, better meanes to illuſtrate that Image of God in his ſoule, that is, to make his Immortality Immortall happineſſe, (for otherwiſe our Immortality were our greateſt curſe) better meanes to conforme himſelfe to God, by having a particular Law for the direction of all his actions, which the Gentiles had not. For, therein eſpecially conſiſted the abundant favour of God to the Jews, as it is expreſſed by Moſes, Vnto what Nation are their gods come ſo neare unto them, as the Lord our God is come unto us? And in what conſiſted this nearneſſe? In this, What Nation hath Lawes and Statutes ſo righteous as we have? God gave man life more abundantly then other creatures, becauſe he gave him Immortality; God gave the Jews life more abundantly then other men, by giving them a Law to make their Immortality Immortall happineſſe, Illis, Judæis.

C and yet there is a further abundantiùs, Chriſt came to give us, us Chriſtians, life more abundantly then Gentile, or Jew.

Iuſtin Martyr denies, that ever any underſtood the true God, till Chriſt came. He goes upon the ſame ground that S. Paul does, Whilſt you were without Chriſt, you were without God; that is, without ſuch an evidence, ſuch a manifeſtation, ſuch an aſſurance of God, as faith requires, or as produces faith. For, the Ceremoniall Lawes of the Jewes caſt as many ſhadowes as it did lights, and burdened them in eaſing them. Whereas the Chriſtian Religion, is, as Greg. Nazianz. ſayes, Simplex & nuda, niſi pravè in artem difficiliorem converteretur: It is a plaine, an eaſie, a perſpicuous truth, but that the perverſe and uncharitable wranglings of paſſionate and froward men, have made Religion a hard, an intricate, and a perplexed art; ſo that now, that Religion, which carnall and worldly men, have, by an ill life, diſcredited, and made hard to be beleeved, the paſſion, and per- Illis, Chriſtianis.

D verſneſſe of Schoole-men, by Controverſies, hath made hard to bee underſtood. Whereas the Chriſtian Religion, is of it ſelfe Iugum ſuave, a ſweet, and an eaſie yoak, and verbum abbreviatum, an abridgement and a contracted doctrine; for, where the Jews had all abridged in decem verba (as Moſes calls the ten Commandements, ten words) the Chriſtian hath all abridged in duo verba, into two words, love God, love thy neighbour. So Chriſt hath given us, us Chriſtians life abundantiùs, more abundantly then to the Gentile, or to the Jew; but there is a farther abundance yet; all this is but abundantiùs illis, more abundantly then to others, but Chriſt hath given us life abundantiùs ipſis, more abundantly then to our ſelves.

That is, in the Chriſtian Church, he hath given us meanes to be better to day then yeſterday, and to morrow then to day. That grace which God offers us in the Church, Abundantiùs ipſis.

E does not onely fill that capacity, which we have, but give us a greater capacity then we had: And it is an abuſe of Gods grace, not to emprove it, or not to procure ſuch farther grace, as that preſent grace makes us capable of. As it is an improvident, and dangerous thing to ſpend upon the ſtock, ſo is it to rely upon that portion of grace, which I thinke I had in my election, or that meaſure of Sanctification, which I came to in my laſt ſickneſſe. Chriſt gives us life abundantiùs illis, better meanes of eternall life then to Gentile or Jew, and abundantiùs ipſis; better, that is, nearer aſſurance, in our growth of grace, and encreaſe of Sanctification every day, then in the conſideration of any thing done by God, in our behalfe, heretofore.

Now, with theſe abundances (in which, we exceed illos, and ipſos, others and our ſelves) Chriſt comes to us, in this, that he hath conſtituted, and eſtabliſhed a Church; Eccleſia.

and therefore wee conſider his abundant proceeding in that work. From this day, in which, the firſt ſtone of that building, the Church, was laid, (for, though the foundations of the Church were laid in Eternity, yet, that was under ground, the firſt ſtone above ground, that is, the manifeſtation of Gods purpoſe to the world was laid this day, in Chriſts birth) from this day, the Incarnation of Chriſt, (for, of all thoſe names, by which the ancients deſigne this day, Chriſtmas day, Athanaſius calling it the Subſtantiation of Chriſt; Tertullian, the Incorporation of Chriſt; Damaſcen, the Humanation of Chriſt; Of all thoſe fifty names, which are collected out of the Fathers, for this day, moſt concurre in that name, The Incarnation of Chriſt) from this day, God proceeded ſo abundantly in enlarging his Church, as that, within two hundred yeares, Tertullian was able to ſay, Ipſa hoſpitalia ægrorum, The very hoſpitals of the Chriſtians are more and more ſumptuouſly built, and more richly endowed, then the very Temples of the Idols, or then the Palaces of Idolatrous Princes. And ſtill abundantiùs, not to compare onely with Idolaters, but with the Jews themſelves, and with them, in that wherein they magnified themſelves moſt, their Temple. That Church, which Iuſtinian the Emperour built at Conſtantinople, and dedicated to Sophia, to the wiſedome of God, (and the wiſedome of God is Chriſt, Chriſt is the Power of God, and the Wiſedome of God, 1 Cor. 1.24) is found by them, who have written that ſtory, in bigneſſe, and in beauty, to have exceeded Solomons Temple: Though in that, there were employed for many yeares, thirty thouſand Carpenters, and forty thouſand Maſons, and (other endowments of rich veſſell being proportionable to it) more then twenty thouſand Bowls, and Goblets of gold, and ſilver, yet Iuſtinians Church at Conſtantinople exceeded that: Unto the riches of this wiſedome of God, Chriſt Jeſus, flowed all the treaſure of the World, and upon this Wiſedome of God, Chriſt Jeſus, waited all the wiſedome of the World. For, at that time, when Chriſt came into the world, was learning at that heighth, as that accounting from Cicero and Virgil, (two great Maſters in two great kindes) to the two Plinies, (which may ſhut up one age) we may reckon in that one ſtate, under whoſe government Chriſt was born, Rome, ſeaven or eight ſcore Authors, more then ever they had before or after. This is Pſal. 118.24. the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoyce, and be glad in it. And as Conſtantine ordained, that upon this day, the Church ſhould burne no Oyle, but Balſamum in her Lamps, ſo let us ever celebrate this day, with a thankfull acknowledgment, that Chriſt, who is unctus Domini, The Anointed of the Lord, hath anointed us with the Oyle of gladneſſe above our fellowes, and given us life more abundantly then others, in making us partakers of theſe meanes of ſalvation in his Church.

But I bring it cloſer then ſo; now, and here, within theſe wals, and at this houre, comes Chriſt unto you, in the offer of this abundance; and with what penuriouſneſſe, penuriouſneſſe of devotion, penuriouſneſſe of reverence do you meet him here? Deus ſtetit, Pſal. 82.1. ſaies David, God ſtandeth in the Congregation; does God ſtand there, and wilt thou ſit? ſit, and never kneele? I would ſpeake ſo, as the congregation ſhould not know whom I meane; but ſo, as that they whom it concernes, might know I meane them; I would ſpeake: for, I muſt ſay, that there come ſome perſons to this Church, and perſons of example to many that come with them, of whom, (excepting ſome few, who muſt therefore have their praiſe from us, as, no doubt, they have their thanks and bleſſings from God) I never ſaw Maſter nor ſervant kneele, at his comming into this Church, or at any part of divine ſervice. David had ſuch a zeale to Gods ſervice, as that he was content to be thought a foole, for his humility towards the Arke. S. Paul was content to be thought mad; ſo was our bleſſed Saviour himſelfe, not onely by his enemies, but by his
John 10.20. owne friends and kinsfolke. Indeed, the roote of that word Tehillim, which is the name
Mar. 3.21. of the Pſalmes, and of all cheerefull and hearty ſervice of God, is Halal, and Halal is Inſanire, To fall mad; And, if humility in the ſervice of God here, be madneſſe, I would more of us were more out of our wits, then we are; I would all our Churches were, to that purpoſe, Bedlams. S. Hieroms rule is not onely frequenter orandum, to come often to prayers, but Flexo corpore orandum, to declare an inward humiliation by an outward. As our comming to Church is a teſtification, a profeſſion of our religion, to teſtifie our fall in Adam, the Church appoints us to fall upon our knees; and to teſtifie our Reſurrection in Chriſt Jeſus, the Church hath appointed certaine times, to ſtand: But no man
Juſt. Mar. is ſo left to his liberty, as never to kneele. Genuflexio eſt peccatorum, kneeling is the ſinners poſture; if thou come hither in the quality of a ſinner, (and, if thou do not ſo, what doeſt thou

A thou here, the whole need not the Physitian) put thy selfe into the posture of a sinner, kneele. We are very far from enjoyning any one constant forme to be alwaies observed by all men; we onely direct you, by that good rule of S. Bernard, Habe reverentiam Deo, ut quod pluris est ei tribuas. Doe but remember, with what reverence thou camest into thy Masters presence, when thou wast a servant, with what reverence thou camest to the Councell table, or to the Kings presence, if thou have beene called occasionally to those high places; and Quod pluris est, such reverence, as thou gavest to them there, be content to afford to God here. That Sacrifice that struggled at the Altar, the Ancients would not accept for a Sacrifice; But Cæsar would not forbeare a sacrifice for struggling, but sacrificed it for all that. He that struggles, and murmures at this instruction, this increpation, is the lesse fit for a sacrifice to God, for that; But the zeale that I bear to Gods house, puts so much of Cæsars courage into mee, as, for all that struggling, to say now, and to
B repeat as often as I see that irreverence continued, to the most impatient struggler, Deus stetit, God stands in the Congregation, and wilt thou sit; sit, and never kneele? Venite, saies David, Let us come hither, let us be here; what to doe? Venite adoremus, Let us come and worship; How? will not the heart serve? no; Adoremus & procidamus, Let us fall downe, and kneele before the Lord our Maker. Humiliation is the beginning of sanctification; and as without this, without holinesse, no man shall see God, though he pore whole nights upon the Bible; so without that, without humility, no man shall heare God speake to his soule, though hee heare three two-houres Sermons every day. But if God bring thee to that humiliation of soule and body here, hee will emprove, and advance thy sanctification abundantiùs, more abundantly, and when he hath brought it to the best perfection, that this life is capable of, he will provide another abundantiùs, another maner of abundance in the life to come; which is the last beating of the pulse of this text, the last
C panting of the breath thereof, our anhelation, and panting after the joyes, and glory, and eternity of the kingdome of Heaven; of which, though, for the most part, I use to dismisse you, with saying something, yet it is alwaies little that I can say thereof; at this time, but this, that if all the joyes of all the Martyrs, from Abel to him that groanes now in the Inquisition, were condensed into one body of joy, (and certainly the joyes that the Martyrs felt at their deaths, would make up a far greater body, then their sorrowes would doe,) (for though it bee said of our great Martyr, or great Witnesse, (as S. Iohn calls Christ Jesus) to whom, all other Martyrs are but sub-martyrs, witnesses that testifie his testimony, Non dolor sicut dolor ejus, there was never sorrow like unto his sorrow, it is also true, Non gaudium sicut gaudium ejus, There was never joy like unto that joy which was set before him, when he endured the crosse;) If I had all this joy of all these Martyrs, (which would, no doubt, be such a joy, as would worke a liquefaction, a melting of D my bowels) yet I shall have it abundantiùs, a joy more abundant, then even this superlative joy, in the world to come. What a dimme vespers of a glorious festivall, what a poore halfe-holyday, is Methusalems nine hundred yeares, to eternity? what a poore account hath that man made, that saies, this land hath beene in my name, and in my Ancestors from the Conquest? what a yesterday is that? not six hundred yeares. If I could beleeve the transmigration of soules, and thinke that my soule had beene successively in some creature or other, since the Creation, what a yesterday is that? not six thousand yeares. What a yesterday for the past, what a to morrow for the future, is any terme, that can be comprehended in Cyphar or Counters? But as, how abundant a life soever any man hath in this world for temporall abundances, I have life more abundantly then hee, if I have the spirituall life of grace, so what measure soever I have of this spirituall life of grace, in this world, I shall have that more abundantly in Heaven, for there,
E my terme shall bee a terme for three lives; for those three, that as long as the Father, and the Son, and the holy Ghost live, I shall not dye. And to this glorious Son of God, and the most almighty Father, &c.

MAT. 5. 16.

Let your light ſo ſhine before men, that they may ſee your good works, and glorifie your Father which is in heaven.

C

EIther of the names of this day, were Text enough for a Sermon, Purification, or Candlemas. Joyne we them together, and raiſe we only this one note from both, that all true purification is in the light; corner purity, clandeſtine purity, conventicle purity is not purity. Chriſt gave himſelf for us, ſayes the Apoſtle, that he might purifie to himſelf a peculiar people. How ſhall this purification appeare? It follows; They ſhall be zealous of good works; They ſhall not wrangle about faith and works, but be actually zealous of goods works. For, purification was accompanied with an oblation, ſomething was to be given; A Lamb, a Dove, a Turtle; All, emblemes of mildneſſe; true purity is milde, meek, humble, and to deſpiſe and undervalue others, is an inſeparable mark of falſe purity. The oblation of this dayes purification is light: ſo the day names it, Candlemas-day, ſo your cuſtome celebrates it, with many lights. Now, when God received lights into his Tabernacle, hee received none of Tallow, (the Oxe hath hornes) he received none of Waxe, (the Bee hath his ſting) but he received only lampes of oyle. And, though from many fruits and berries they preſſed oyle, yet God admitted no oyle into the ſervice of the Church, but only of the Olive; the Olive, the embleme of peace. Our purification is with an oblation, our oblation is light, our light is good works; our peace is rather to exhort you to them, then to inſtitute any ſolemne, or other then occaſionall compariſon between faith and them. Every good work hath faith for the roote; but every faith hath not good works for the fruit thereof. And it is obſervable, that in all this great Sermon of our Saviours in the Mount, (which poſſeſſeth this, and the two next Chapters) there is no mention of faith, by way of perſwaſion or exhortation thereunto, but the whole Sermon is ſpent upon good works. For, good works preſuppoſe faith; and therefore he concludes that they had but little faith, becauſe they were ſo ſolicitous about the things of this world, O ye of little faith. And as Chriſt concludes an unſtedfaſtneſſe in their faith, out of their ſolicitude for this world, ſo may the world juſtly conclude an eſtabliſhment in their faith, if they ſee them exerciſe themſelves in the works of mercy, and ſo let their light ſhine before men, that they may ſee their good works, and glorifie their Father which is in heaven.

Mat. 6. 30.

Diviſio.

These are words ſpoken by our Saviour to his Diſciples in the Mount; a treaſure depoſited in thoſe diſciples, but in thoſe diſciples, as depoſitaries for us; an Oracle uttered to thoſe diſciples, but through thoſe diſciples to us; Paradiſe convayed to thoſe diſciples, but to thoſe diſciples, as feoffees in truſt for us; to every one of us, in them (from him, him, that rides with his hundreds of Torches, to him that crawles with his ruſh-candle our Saviour ſayes, Let your light ſo ſhine before men, that they may ſee your good works, &c

The words have two parts; ſo muſt our explication of them; firſt a precept, Sic luce
at, (Let your light ſo ſhine before men) and then the reaſon, the purpoſe, the end, the effect
ut videant, (that men may ſee your good works, and &c.) From the firſt bough will diver branches ſpring, and divers from the other; all of good taſte and nouriſhment, if we might ſtay to preſſe the fruits thereof. We cannot; yet, in the firſt we ſhall inſiſt while upon each of theſe three; Firſt, the light it ſelf, what that is, Sic luceat lux, Le your light ſo ſhine; And then, ſecondly, what this propriety is, lux veſtra, (let your ligh ſhine, yours;) And laſtly what this emanation of this light upon others is, coram homini bus, (let your light ſhine before men.) The ſecond part, which is the reaſon, or the effect of this precept, ut videant, (that men may ſee your good works, and glorifie your Father whic is in heaven) abounds in particular conſiderations; and I ſhould weary you, if I ſhoul make you ſtand all the while under ſo heavy a load, as to charge your memories with al thoſe particulars, ſo long before I come to handle them. Reſerving them therefore t their due time, anon, proceed we now to the three branches of our firſt part, firſt th light in it ſelf, then the propriety in us, laſtly, the emanation upon others, Let your ligh
ſo ſhine before men.

1 Part. Lux.

First, for the light it ſelf, There is a light that lightneth every man that commeth int the world. And, even this univerſall light is Chriſt, ſayes S. Iohn, (He was that light tha John 1.9. lighteth every man that commeth into the world.) And this univerſall enunciation, (H lightneth every man) moved S. Cyril to take this light for the light of nature, and natural John 1.3. reaſon. For even nature and naturall reaſon is from Chriſt. All things were made by him Coloſ.1.16. ſayes S. Iohn, even nature it ſelf. And, By him, and for him, all things viſible, and inviſi ble were created, ſayes the Apoſtle. And therefore our latter men of the Reformation, ar not to be blamed, who for the moſt part, purſuing S. Cyrils interpretation, interpret thi univerſall light, that lightneth every man, to be the light of nature. Divers others of th Fathers take this univerſall light (becauſe Chriſt is ſaid to be this light) to be Baptiſme
For, in the primitive Church, as the Nativity of Chriſt was called the Epiphany, Mani feſtation, ſo Baptiſme was called Illumination. And ſo, Chriſt lightens every man tha comes into the world, (that is, into the Chriſtian world) by that Sacrament of Illumina tion, Baptiſme. S. Auguſtine brought the expoſition of that univerſall propoſition int a narrow roome; That he enlightned all that came into the world, that is, all that were enlightned in the world, were enlightned by him; there was no other light; and ſo h makes this light to be the light of faith, and the light of effectuall grace, which all have not, but they that have, have it from Chriſt. Now which of theſe lights is intended i our Text, Let you light ſhine out? is it of the light of nature, at our comming into th world, or the light of Baptiſme, and that generall grace that accompanies all Gods Or dinances, at our comming into the Church, or the light of faith, and particular grace ſealing our adoption, and ſpirituall filiation there? Properly, our light is none of theſe three; and yet it is truly, all; for our light is the light of good works; and that light pro ceeds from all the other three, and ſo is all thoſe, and then it goes beyond all three, an ſo is none of them. It proceeds from all; for, if we conſider the firſt light, the light o nature, in our creation, We are (ſayes the Apoſtle) his workmanſhip, created in Chriſt Ieſu Epheſ.2.10. unto good works. So that we were all made for that, for good works; even the natural man, by that firſt light. Conſider it in the ſecond light, in baptiſme; there we dye i Chriſt, and are buried in Chriſt, and riſe in Chriſt, and in him we are new creatures, an with him we make a covenant in baptiſme, for holineſſe of life, which is the body o good works. Conſider the third, that of faith, and as every thing in nature is, ſo faith i Jam.2.26. perfected by working; for, faith is dead, without breath, without ſpirit, if it be withou
workes. So, this light is in all thoſe lights; we are created, we are baptized, we are ado pted for good works; and it is beyond them all, even that of faith; for, though faith have a preheminence, becauſe works grow out of it, and ſo faith (as the root) is firſt, ye works have the preheminence thus, both that they include faith in them, and that they dilate, and diffuſe, and ſpread themſelves more declaratorily, then faith doth. There John 6.28. fore, as our Saviour ſaid to ſome that asked him, What ſhall we do that we might work th work of God? (you ſee their minde was upon works, ſomething they were ſure was to b done) This is the work of God, that ye beleeve in him whom he hath ſent, and ſo refers them to faith, ſo to another that asks him, What ſhall I do, that I may have eternall life? (all goe upon that, that ſomething there muſt be done, works there muſt be) Chriſt ſayes, Keepe the Commandements, and ſo refers him to works. He hath ſhewed thee O man, what is good, and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do juſtly, and to ſhew mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God? This then is the light that lighteth every man that goes out of the world, good works; for, their works follow them. Their works; they ſhall be theirs, even after their death; which is our ſecond branch in this firſt part, the propriety, lux veſtra, let your light ſhine. Mat. 19. 16. Mic. 6. 8. Apoc. 14. 13.

to

I cannot alwaies call the works that I do, my works; for ſometimes God works them, and ſometimes the devill: Sometimes God works his owne worke, The Lord will do his worke, his ſtrange worke, and bring to paſſe his act, his ſtrange act. Sometimes he works my works, Thou Lord haſt wrought all our workes in us. In us, and in all things elſe, Operatur omnia in omnibus, he worketh all in all. And all this in all theſe, Secundum conſilium voluntatis ſuæ, After the counſaile of his owne will; for, I will worke, and who ſhall let it? But for all this his generall working, his enemy works in us too. That which I doe, I allow not, ſaies the Apoſtle; nay, I know it not; for, ſaies he, what I hate, that I doe. And, if I doe that I would not doe, it is no more I that doe it, but ſin that dwelleth in me. Yet, for all this diverſe, this contrary working, as S. Auguſtine ſayes of the faculty of the will, Nihil tam noſtrum, quam voluntas, there is nothing ſo much our owne, as our will before we worke, ſo there is nothing ſo much our owne, as our workes, after they are done. They ſtick to us, they cleave to us; whether as fomentations to nourish us, or as corraſives, to gnaw upon us, that lyes in the nature of the worke; but ours they are; and upon us our works work. Our good works are more ours, then our faith is ours. Our faith is ours as we have received it, our worke is ours, as we have done it. Faith is ours, as we are poſſeſſors of it, the work ours, as we are doers, actors in it. Faith is ours, as our goods are ours, works, as our children are ours. And therefore when the Prophet Habakkuk ſaies, Fide ſua, The juſt ſhall live by his faith, that particle His, is a word of poſſeſſion, not a word of Acquiſition; That God hath infuſed that faith into him, and ſo it is his, not that he hath produced that faith in himſelfe. His faith muſt ſave him; his own, and not anothers, not his parents faith, though he be the ſon of holy parents, not the Churches faith, (if he be of yeares) though he be within the covenant, but his own perſonall faith; yet not his ſo, as that it grew in him, or was produced in him, by him, by any plantation, or ſemination of his own. And therefore S. Paul in citing that place of Habakkuk (as he doth cite it three ſeverall times) in all thoſe places leaves out that particle of propriety, and acquiſition, his, and ſtill ſayes, The juſt ſhall live by faith, and he ſayes no more. And when our bleſſed Saviour ſayes to the woman with the bloody iſſue, Fides tua, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole, it was ſaid then, when he had ſeen that woman come trembling and fall down at his feet; he ſaw outward declarations of her faith, he ſaw works. And ſo, in divers of thoſe places, where Chriſt repeats that, fides tua, thy faith, we finde it added, Ieſus videns fidem, Ieſus ſeeing their faith. With what eyes? he looked upon them with his humane eyes, not his divine; he ſaw not (that is, conſidered not at that time) their hearts, but their outward declarations, and proceeding as a good man would, out of their good works concludes faith. Velle & nolle noſtrum eſt, to aſſent or to diſ-aſſent is our own; we may chooſe which we will doe; Ipſumq́, quod noſtrum eſt, ſine Dei miſeratione noſtrum non eſt; But though this faculty be ours, it is ours, but becauſe God hath imprinted it in us. So that ſtill to will, as well as to doe, to beleeve, as well as to work, is all from God; but yet they are from God in a diverſe manner, and a diverſe reſpect; and certainly our works are more ours then our faith is, and man concurres otherwiſe in the acting and perpetration of a good work, then he doth in the reception and admiſſion of faith. Sed quæ non fecimus ipſi, ſayes the Poet; and he was Vates, a Prophet in ſaying ſo, Vix ea noſtra voco; nothing is ours, but that which we have done our ſelves; and all that is ours. And though Chriſt refer us often to beliefe, in this life, becauſe he would be ſure to plant, and faſten ſafely that which is the only true root of all, that is, faith, yet when he comes to Judgement, in the next life, all his proceeding is grounded upon workes, and he judges us by our fruits. So then, God gives us faith, immediatly from himſelfe, and out of that faith, he produces good works, inſtrumentally, by us, ſo, as that thoſe works are otherwiſe ours, then that faith is. And this the propriety, lux veſtra, let your light ſhine, which we propoſed for the ſecond branch in this firſt part, that God vouchſafes to afford us an interest, in the working of our salvation; And then our third branch is, the emanation of this light, from us, to others, Coram hominibus, let your light shine before men. A

Luceat. Emanatio.

There was a particular Holy-day amongst the heathen, that bore the name of this day, Accensio luminum, Candlemas day; A superstitious multiplying of Lamps, and Torches in Divine Service. This superstition Lactantius reproves, elegantly, and bitterly. Num mentis suæ compos putandus est? can we think that man in his wits, that offers to God, the Father, and Fountaine, the Author and Giver of all light, a Candle for an Oblation, for a Sacrifice, for a New-yeares gift? Solem contempletur, sayes he; Let that man but consider seriously the Sun, and he will see, that that God who could spare him so glorious a light as the Sun, needs not his Candle. And therefore sayes Tertullian, (reprehending the same superstition) Lucernis diem non infringimus, we doe not cut off, we doe not shorten our dayes, by setting up lights at noone, nor induce, nor force, nor make night before it comes.

Lactant.

I would not be understood to condemne all use of candles by day, in Divine Service, nor all Churches that have or doe use them; For, so, I might condemne even the Primitive Church, in her pure and innocent estate. And therefore, that which Lactantius, almost three hundred yeares after Christ, sayes of those Lights, and that which Tertullian, almost a hundred yeares before Lactantius, sayes, in reprehension thereof, must necessarily be understood of the abuse, and imitation of the Gentiles therein; for, that the thing it selfe, was in use, before eyther of their times, I thinke, admits little question. About Lactantius time, fell the Eliberitan Councell; and then the use, and the abuse was evident. For, in the thirty fourth Canon of that Councell, it is forbidden to set up Candles in the Church-yard: And, the reason that is added, declares the abuse, Non sunt enim inquietandi spiritus fidelium, That the soules of the Saints departed should not be troubled. Now the setting up of lights could not trouble them; but these lights were accompanied with superstitious Invocations, with magicall Incantations, and with howlings and ejulations, which they had learnt from the Gentiles, and with these, the soules of the dead, were, in those times, thought to be affected, and disquieted. It is in this Ceremony of lights, as it is in other Ceremonies; They may be good in their Institution, and grow ill in their practise. So did many things, which the Christian Church received from the Gentiles, in a harmlesse innocency, degenerate after, into as pestilent superstition there, as amongst the Gentiles themselves. For, ceremonies, which were received, but for the instruction, and edification of the weaker sort of people, were made reall parts of the service of God, and meritorious sacrifices. To those ceremonies, which were received as signa commonefacientia, helps to excite, and awaken devotion, was attributed an operation, and an effectuall power, even to the ceremony it selfe; and they were not practised, as they should, significativè, but effectivè, not as things which should signifie to the people higher mysteries, but as things as powerfull, and effectuall in themselves, as the greatest Mysteries of all, the Sacraments themselves. So lights were received in the Primitive Church, to signifie to the people, that God, the Father of lights, was otherwise present in that place, then in any other, and then, men came to offer lights by way of sacrifice to God; And so, that which was providently intended for man, who indeed needed such helps, was turned upon God, as though he were to be supplied by us. But what then? Because things good in their institution, may be depraved in their practise, Ergonè nihil cerimoniarum rudioribus dabitur, ad juvandam eorum imperitiam? Shall therefore the people be denyed all ceremonies, for the assistance of their weakenesse? Id ego non dico; I say not so, sayes he. Omnino illis utile esse sentio hoc genus adminiculi; I think these kinds of helps to be very behoovefull for them; Tantum hic contendo, all that I strive for, is but Moderation; and that Moderation he places very discreetly in this, That these ceremonies may be few in number; That they may be easie for observation; That they may be clearely understood in their signification; wee must not therefore be hasty in condemning particular ceremonies: For, in so doing, in this ceremony of lights, we may condemne the Primitive Church, that did use them, and wee condemne a great and Noble part of the reformed Church, which doth use them at this day.

These superstitious lights, are not the lights we call for here, sic luceat, let your light shine out; but lux vestra, your light, the light of good works; let that shine out. Truly, this carrying, and diffusing of light to others is so blessed a thing, as that though Lucifer, (whose

A (whose name signifies the carrying of light) be now an odious name, an infamous name, applyed onely to the Devill, yet a great Bishop in the Primitive Church abstained not from that name, forbore not that name, Lucifer Talaritanus; that he might carry about him, in his name, a remembrancer, ferre lucem, to carry light to others, he was content with that name, Lucifer. God had made light the first day, and yet he made many lights after. One light of thine shines out in our eyes, thy profession of Christ; let us see more lights, works worthy of that profession. God calls the Sun, and the Moone too, Great lights, because though there be greater in the Firmament, they appeare greatest to us; those works of ours are greatest in the sight of God, that are greatest in the sight of men, that are most beneficiall, most exemplary, and conduce most to the promoving of others to glorifie God. To such rich men, as produce no light at all, (no works) that of S. Augustine is appliable, cimices sunt, they are as these wormes, or flies, the cimices, B qui vivi mordent, mortui fœtent, They bite, and suck a man, whilst they live, and they stink pestilently, and offend so, when they are dead. The actions of such rich men are mischievous whilst they live, and their memory odious when they are dead. But all rich men are not such, to be absolutely without all light. But then they may have light, (a determined purpose to doe some good works) and yet this light not shine out. No man can more properly be said to hide his light under a bushell, (which because Christ sayes, (in the verse before our Text) no man does, certainly no man should doe) then he, who hath disposed some part of his estate to pious uses, but hides it in his will, and locks up that will in his cabinet; For, in this case, though there be light, yet it does not shine out. Your gold, and your silver is cankered, sayes S. James, and the rust of them shall be a witnesse, and shall eate your flesh, as it were fire. He does not say the gold and the silver it self, as reproving the ill getting of it, but the rust, the hiding, the concealing thereof, shall be C this witnesse against thee, this executioner upon thee. That man dyes in an ill state, of whose faith we have had no evidence, till, after his death, his executors meet, and open his Will, and then publish some Legacies to pious uses: And we had no evidence before, if he had done no good before. For, shew me thy faith without thy works, sayes the Apostle; and he proposes it, as an impossible thing, impossible to shew it, impossible to have it. And therefore, as good works are our owne, so are they never so properly our owne, as when they are done with our owne hands; for this is the true shining of our light, the emanation from us, upon others. And so have you the three peeces, which constitute our first part, the precept, Let your light shine before men; The light it selfe, not the light of nature, nor of Baptisme, nor of Adoption, but the light of good works; And then the Appropriation of this light, how these workes are ours, though the goodnesse thereof be onely from God; And lastly the emanation of this light upon others; D which cannot well be said to be an emanation of our light, of light from us, except it be whilst we are we, that is, alive. And so we passe to those many particulars, which frame our second part, the reason, and the end of this, That men may see your good works, and glorifie your Father which is in heaven.

In this end, our beginning is, ut videant, that men may see it. The apparitions in old times, were evermore accompanied with lights; but they were private lights; such an old woman, or such a child saw a light; but non videbant homines, it did not shine out, so that men might see this light. We have a story delivered by a very pious man, and of the truth whereof he seemes to be very well assured, that one Conradus a devout Priest, had such an illustration, such an irradiation, such a coruscation, such a light at the tops of those fingers, which he used in the consecration of the Sacrament, as that by that light of his fingers ends, he could have reade in the night, as well as by so many Candles; E But this was but a private light, & non viderunt homines, It did not shine out, so that men might see it. Blessed S. Augustine reports, (if that Epistle be S. Augustines) that when himselfe was writing to S. Hierome, to know his opinion of the measure and quality of the Joy, and Glory of Heaven, suddenly in his Chamber there appeared ineffabile lumen, sayes he, an unspeakable, an unexpressible light, nostris invisum temporibus, such a light as our times never saw, and out of that light issued this voyce, Hieronymi anima sum, I am the soule of that Hierome to whom thou art writing, who this houre dyed at Bethlem, and am come from thence to thee, &c. But this was but a private light, and whatsoever S. Augustine saw, (who was not easily deceived, nor would deceive others) non videbant homines, this light did not shine so, as that men might see it. Here, in our Text, there there is a light required that men may ſee. Thoſe lights of their apparitions we cannot ſee; There is a light of ours, which our adverſaries may ſee, and will not; which is truly the light of this Text, the light of good works. Though our zeale to good works ſhine out aſſiduouſly, day by day in our Sermons, and ſhine out powerfully in the Homilies of our Church, compoſed expreſly to that purpoſe, and ſhine out actually in our many ſumptuous buildings, and rich endowments, (in which works, we of this Kingdome, in this laſt Century, ſince the Reformation of Religion, have perhaps exceeded our Fathers, in any one hundred of yeares, whilſt they lived under the Romane perſwaſion) yet ſtill they cry out, we are enemies of this light, and abhorre good works. As I have heard them, in ſome obſcure places abroad, Preach, that here in England, we had not onely no true Church, no true Prieſthood, no true Sacraments, but that we have no materiall Churches, no holy Convocations, no obſerving of Sundayes, or Holy dayes, no places to ſerve God in; ſo I have heard them Preach, that we doe not onely not advance, but that we cry downe, and diſcredit, and diſſwade, and diſcountenance the doctrine of good works. It is enough to ſay to them, as the Angel ſaid to the Devill, Increpet te Dominus, The Lord rebuke thee. And the Lord does rebuke them, in enabling us to proceed in theſe pious works, which, with ſo notorious falſhood they deny; And we doe rebuke them, the beſt and moſt powerfull way, in that, (as the Apoſtle ſayes) we conſider one another, (conſider the neceſſities of others) and provoke one another to love, and good workes.

Heb. 10. 24.

But then, if this be Gods end in our good works, ut videant homines, that men may ſee them, why is Chriſt ſo earneſt, in this very ſermon as to ſay, Take heed you do not your almes before men, to be ſeene of them? Is there no contradiction in theſe? far from it; The intent of both precepts together make up this doctrine, That we doe them not therefore, not to that end, that men may ſee them. So far we muſt come, that men muſt ſee them, but we muſt not reſt there; for, it is but Sic luceat, Let your light ſhine out ſo, it is not, let it ſhine out therefore; Our doing of good workes muſt have a farther end, then the knowledge of men, as we ſhall ſee, towards our end, anon.

Mat. 6. 1.

Opera.

Men muſt ſee them then, and ſee them to be workes, Vt videant opera, That they may ſee your works: which is a word that implies difficulty, and paine, and labour, and is accompanied with ſome loathneſſe, with ſome colluctation. Doe ſuch workes, for Gods ſake, as are hard for thee to doe. In ſuch a word does God deliver his Commandement of the Sabbath; not that word, which in that language ſignifies ordinary and eaſie works, but ſervile and laborious workes, toyleſome and gainefull workes, thoſe workes thou maiſt not doe upon the Sabbath. But thoſe workes, in the vertue of the precept of this text, thou muſt doe in the ſight of men; thoſe that are hard for thee to doe. David would not conſecrate nor offer unto God, that which coſt him nothing; firſt he would buy Araunahs threſhingfloare at a valuable price, and then he would dedicate it to God. To give old cloathes, paſt wearing, to the poore, is not ſo good a worke as to make new for them. To give a little of your ſuperfluities, not ſo acceptable as the widows gift, that gave all. To give a poore ſoule a farthing at that doore, where you give a Player a ſhilling, is not equall dealing; for, this is to give God quiſquilias frumenti, The refuſe of the wheat. But doe thou ſome ſuch things, as are truly works in our ſenſe, ſuch as are againſt the nature, and ordinary practice of worldly men to doe; ſome things, by which they may ſee, that thou doſt prefer God before honour, and wife, and children, and hadſt rather build, and endow ſome place, for Gods ſervice, then poure out money to multiply titles of honour upon thy ſelfe, or enlarge joyntures, and portions, to an unneceſſary, and unmeaſurable proportion, when there is enough done before.

2. Sam. 24. 24.

Mat. 12. 42.

Opera Bona.

Let men ſee that that thou doeſt, to be a worke, qualified with ſome difficulty in the doing, and then thoſe workes, to be good workes, Videant opera bona, that they may ſee your good works. They are not good works how magnificent ſoever, if they be not directed to good ends. A ſuperſtitious end, or a ſeditious end vitiates the beſt worke. Great contributions have beene raiſed, and great ſummes given, to build, and endow Seminaries, and ſchooles, and Colledges in forraine parts; but that hath a ſuperſtitious end. Great contributions have beene raiſed, and great ſummes given at home, for the maintenance of ſuch refractary perſons, as by oppoſing the government and diſcipline of the Church, have drawne upon themſelves, ſilencings, and ſuſpenſions, and deprivations; but that hath a ſeditious end. But, give ſo, as in a rectified conſcience, and not a diſtempered zeale,

A (a rectified conſcience is that, that hath the teſtimony and approbation of moſt good men, in a ſucceſſion of times, and not to rely occaſionally upon one or a few men of the ſeparation, for the preſent) give ſo, as thou maiſt ſincerely ſay, God gave me this, to give thus, and ſo it is a good worke. So it muſt be, a worke (ſomething of ſome importance) and a good worke, (not depraved with an ill end) and then your worke, Vt videant opera veſtra, That they may ſee your good works.

They are not your works, if that that you give be not your owne. Nor is it your own, if it were ill gotten at firſt. How long ſoever it have beene poſſeſſed, or how often ſoever it have beene transformed, from money to ware, from ware to land, from land to office, from office to honour, the money, the ware, the land, the office, the honour is none of thine, if, in thy knowlege, it were ill gotten at firſt. Zachæus, in S. Luke, gives halfe his goods to the poore; but it is halfe of his, his owne, for there might be goods in his houſe, B which were none of his. Therefore in the ſame inſtrument, he paſſes that ſcrutiny, If I have taken any thing unjuſtly, I reſtore him foure-fold. Firſt let that that was ill gotten, be deducted, and reſtored, and then, of the reſt, which is truly thine owne, give cheerefully. When Moſes ſaies, that our yeares are three ſcore and ten, if we deduct from that terme, all the houres of our unneceſſary ſleep, of ſuperfluous ſittings at feaſts, of curioſity in dreſſing, of largeneſſe in recreations, of plotting, and compaſſing of vanities, or ſinnes, ſcarce any man of threeſcore and ten, would be ten years old, when he dyes. If we ſhould deale ſo with worldly mens eſtates, (defalſe unjuſt gettings) it would abridge and attenuate many a ſwelling Inventory. Till this defalcation, this ſcrutiny be made, that you know what's your owne, what's other mens, as your Tombe ſhall be but a monument of your rotten bones, how much gold or marble ſoever be beſtowed upon it, ſo that Hoſpitall, that free-ſchoole, that Colledge that you ſhall build, and endow, will bee but a C monument of your bribery, your extortion, your oppreſſion; and God, who will not be in debt, (though he owe you nothing that built it) may be pleaſed to give the reward of all that, to them, from whom that which was ſpent upon it, was unjuſtly taken; for, The wealth of the ſinner is laid up for the righteous, ſaies Solomon. The ſinner may doe pious works, and the righteous may be rewarded for them; the world may thinke of one founder, and God knowes another. That which is enjoyn'd in the name of light here, is works, (not trifles) and good works, (made good by the good ends they are directed to) and then your workes (done out of that which is truly your owne) and by ſeeing this light, men will be mov'd to glorifie your Father which is in Heaven; which is the true end of all; that men may ſee them, but ſee them therefore, To glorifie your Father which is in Heaven.

He does not ſay, that by ſeeing your good works, men ſhall glorifie your ſonnes upon earth. And yet truly, even that part of the reward, and retribution is worth a great deale D of your coſt, and your almes; that God ſhall eſtabliſh your poſterity in the world, and in the good opinion of good men. As you have your eſtates, you have your children from God too. As it is Davids recognition, Dominus pars hæreditatis meæ, The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance, ſo the Poſſedi virum à Domino, was Eves Recognition upon the birth of her firſt ſon, Cain, I have gotten, I poſſeſſe a man from the Lord. Now that that man that thou poſſeſſeſt from the Lord, thy ſon, may poſſeſſe that land that thou poſſeſſeſt from the Lord, it behooves thee to be righteous; for ſo, (by that righteouſneſſe) thou becomeſt a foundation for poſterity, (The righteous is an everlaſting foundation) his light, (his good workes) ſhall be a chearefull light unto him; (for, The light of the righteous reioyceth him.) They ſhall be ſo in this life, and, He ſhall have hope in his death, ſaith Solomon; that is, hope for himſelf in another world, & hope of his poſterity in this world; E for, ſaies he, He leaveth an inheritance to his childrens children; that is, an inheritance, out of which hee hath taken, and reſtored all that was unjuſtly got from men, and taken a bountifull part, which he hath offered to God in pious uſes, that the reſt may deſcend free from all claimes, and encumbrances upon his childrens children. The righteous is merciſull, and lendeth, ſaies David. Mercifull as his Father in Heaven is mercifull; that is, in perpetuall, not tranſitory endowments, (for, God did not ſet up his lights, his Sun, and his Moone for a day, but for ever, and ſuch ſhould our light, or good works be too.) Hee is mercifull, and he lendeth; to whom? for to the poore he giveth; he looks for no returne from them, for they are the waters upon which he caſts his bread. Yet he lendeth; He that hath pity on the poore, lendeth to the Lord. The righteous is mercifull and lendeth, and then, (as David addes there) His ſeed is bleſſed. Bleſſed in this (which followes there)

Psal.112.4. that he shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever, (which he ratifies againe, Surely he shall not be moved for ever; that is, he shall never be moved, in his posterity) And as he is blessed that way, blessed in the establishment of his possession upon his childrens children, so is he blessed in this, that his honour, and good name shall bee poured out as a fragrant oyle upon his posterity, The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance. Their memory shall be alwaies alive, and alwaies fresh in their posterity, when The name of the wicked shall rot. So then, the fruit of the righteous is the tree of life, saies Solomon; that is, the righteous shall produce plants, that shall grow up, and flourish; so his posterity shall be a tree of life to many generations; and then, The glory of children are their Fathers, saies that wise King; As Fathers receive comfort from good children, so children receive glory from good parents; in this are children glorified, that they had righteous Fathers, that lent unto the Lord. So that, (to recollect these peeces) it is no small reward that God affords you, if men, seeing your good workes, glorifie, that is, esteeme, and respect, and love, and honour your children upon earth. But it is not onely that; your good workes shall bee an occasion of carrying glory upon the right object, They shall glorifie your Father, which is in heaven.

Non Patrem. It is not the Father which is in Heaven; that they should glorifie God, as the common Father of all, by creation. For, for that they need not your light, your good works; The Heavens declare the glory of God, saies David; that is, glorifie him in an acknowledgement, that he is the Father of them, and of all other things by creation. Is not hee thy Father? hath he not made thee? is an interrogatory ministred by Moses, to which all things must answer with the Prophet Malachie, yes, He is our Father, for he hath made us. But that's not the paternity of this text, as God is Father of us all by creation. Nor as he is a Father of some in a more particular consideration, in giving them large portions, great patrimonies in this world; for, thus, he may be my Father and yet disinherit me; hee may give me plenty of temporall blessings, and withhold from me spirituall, and eternall blessings. Now, to see this, men need not your light, your good workes; for, they see dayly, That he maketh his sun to shine on the evill, and on the good; and causeth it to raine on the just, and the unjust; He feeds Goates as well as Sheepe, he gives the wicked temporall blessings, as well as the righteous. These then are not the paternities of our text, that men, by this occasion, glorifie God as the Father of all men by creation, nor as the Father of all rich men, by their large patrimonies, not as he is the Father, not as he is a Father, but as he is your Father, as he is made yours, as he is become yours, by that particular grace of using the temporall blessings which he hath given you, to his glory, in letting your light shine before men. For, it were better God disinherited us so, as to give us nothing, then that he gave us not the grace to use that that he gave us, well: without this, all his bread were stone, and all his fishes serpents, all his temporall liberality malediction. How much happier had that man beene, that hath wasted thousands in play, in riot, in wantonnesse, in sinfull excesses, if his parents had left him no more at first, then he hath left himselfe at last? How much nearer to a kingdome in Heaven had hee beene, if he had beene borne a begger here? Nay, though he have done no ill, (of such excessive kinds) how much happier had he beene, if he had had nothing left him, if hee have done no good? There cannot be a more fearfull commination upon man, nor a more dangerous dereliction from God, then when God saies, I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices; Though thou offer none, I care not, Ile never tell thee of it, nor reprove thee for it, I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices. And when he saies, (as he does there) If I bee hungry I will not tell thee; I will not awake thy charity, I will not excite thee, not provoke thee, with any occasion of feeding me, in feeding the poore. When God shall say to me, I care not whether you come to Church or no, whether you pray or no, repent or no, confesse, receive or no, this is a fearfull dereliction; so is it, when he saies to a rich man, I care not whether your light shine out, or no; whether men see your good works or no; I can provide for my glory other waies. For, certainly God hath not determined his purpose, and his glory so much in that, to make some men rich that the poore might be relieved, (for, that ends in bodily reliefe) as in this, that he hath made some men poore, whereby the rich might have occasion to exercise their charity; for, that reaches to spirituall happinesse; for which use, the poore doe not so much need the rich, as the rich need the poore; the poore may better be saved without the rich, then the rich without the poore. But when men shall see, that that God, who is the Father of us all, by creating us,

A us, and the father of all the rich, by enriching them, is alſo become your father, yours by adoption, yours by infuſion of that particular grace, to doe good with your goods, then are you made bleſſed inſtruments of that which God ſeeks here, his glory, They ſhall glorifie your father which is in heaven.

Glory is ſo inſeparable to God, as that God himſelf is called Glory, They changed their Glory into the ſimilitude of an Oxe; Their glory, their true God into an inglorious Idol. That glory may dwell in our land, ſayes he; that is, that God may dwell therein. The firſt end of letting our light to ſhine before men, is, that they may know Gods proceedings; but, the laſt end to which all conduces, is, that God may have glory. Whatſoever God did firſt in his own boſome, in his own decree, (what that was, contentious men will needs wrangle) whatſoever that firſt act was, Gods laſt end in that firſt act of his was his own glory. And therefore to impute any inglorious or ignoble thing to God, comes too neare blaſphemy. And be any man who hath any ſenſe or taſte of nobleneſſe, or honour, judge, whether there be any glory in the deſtruction of thoſe creatures whom they have raiſed, till thoſe perſons have deſerved ill at their hands, and in ſome way have damnified them, or diſhonoured them. Nor can God propoſe that for glory, to deſtroy man till he finde cauſe in man. Now, this glory, to which Chriſt bends all in this Text, (that men by ſeeing your good works, might glorifie your Father) conſiſts eſpecially in theſe two declarations, Commemoration, and Imitation; a due celebration of former founders and benefactors, and a pious proceeding according to ſuch precedents, is this glorifying of God.

Gloria. Pſal. 106. 20. Pſal. 85. 10.

When God calls himſelf ſo often, The God of Abraham, of Iſaac, and of Iacob, God would have the world remember, that Abraham, Iſaac, and Iacob were extraordinary men, memorable men. When God ſayes, Though theſe three men, Noah, Daniel, and Iob were here, they ſhould not deliver this people, God would have it knowne, that Noah, Daniel, and Iob were memorable men, and able to doe much with him. When the Holy Ghoſt is ſo carefull to give men their additions, That Iabal was the father of ſuch as dwell in Tents, & keep Cattell, & Iubal the father of Harpers, and Organiſts, and Tubal-Cain of all Gravers in Braſſe and Iron. And when he preſents with ſo many particularities every peece of worke, that Hiram of Tyre wrought in Braſſe for the furniſhing of Solomons Temple, God certainly is not afraid that his honour will be diminiſhed, in the honourable mentioning of ſuch men as have benefited the world by publique good works. The wiſe man ſeemes to ſettle himſelfe upon that meditation; let us now praiſe famous men, ſayes he, and our fathers that begot us; and ſo he inſtitutes a ſolemne commemoration, and gives a catalogue of Enoch, and Abraham, and Moſes, and Aaron, and ſo many more, as poſſeſſe ſix Chapters; nor doth he ever end the meditation till he end his booke; ſo was he fixt upon the commemoration of good men; as S. Paul likewiſe feeds and delights himſelfe in the like meditation, even from Abel. It is therefore a wretched impotency, not to endure the commemoration, and honourable mentioning of our Founders and Benefactors. God hath delivered us, and our Church, from thoſe ſtraights, in which, ſome Churches of the Reformation have thought themſelves to be, when they have made Canons, That there ſhould be no Bell rung, no dole given, no mention made of the dead at any Funerall, leſt that ſhould ſavour of ſuperſtition. The Holy Ghoſt hath taught us the difference between praiſing the dead, and praying for the dead, betweene commemorating of Saints, and invocating of Saints. We underſtand what David meanes, when he ſayes, This honour have all his Saints, and what S. Paul meanes, when he ſayes, Vnto the only wiſe God be honour, and glory, for ever and ever. God is honoured in due honour given to his Saints, and glorified in the commemoration of thoſe good men whoſe light hath ſo ſhined out before men, that they have ſeen their good workes. But then he is glorified more, in our imitation, then in our commemoration.

Gloria ex Commemoratione. Ezech. 14. 14. Gen. 4. 20. 1 Reg. 7. 13. Eccluſ. 44. 1. Heb. 11. Pſal. 149. 9. 1 Tim. 1. 17.

Herein is my Father glorified, (ſayes Chriſt) that ye beare much fruit. The ſeed ſowed in good ground, bore ſome an hundred fold, the leſſe thirty. The ſeed (in this caſe) is the example that is before you, of thoſe good men, whoſe light hath ſhined out ſo, that you have ſeene their good workes. Let this ſeed, theſe good examples bring forth hundreds, and ſixties, and thirties in you, much fruit; for herein is your Father glorified, that you beare much fruit. Of which plentifull encreaſe, I am afraid there is one great hinderance that paſſes through many of you, that is, that when your Will lyes by you, in which ſome little lamp of this light is ſet up, ſomething given to God in pious uſes, uſes, if a Ship miſcarry, if a Debtor break, if your ſtate be any way empaired, the firſt that ſuffers, the firſt that is blotted out of the Will, is God and his Legacy; and if your eſtates encreaſe, portions encreaſe, and perchance other legacies, but Gods portion and legacy ſtands at a ſtay. Chriſt left two uſes of his paſſion; application and imitation. He ſuffered for us, ſayes the Apoſtle; for us, that is, that we might make his death ours, apply his death, and then (as it follows there) he left us an example. So Chriſt gives us two uſes of the Reformation of Religion; firſt, the doctrine, how to doe good works without relying upon them, as meritorious; and then example, many, very many men (and more by much, in ſome kindes of charity ſince the Reformation of Religion, then before) even in this City, whoſe light hath ſhined out before you, and you have ſeen their good works. That as this noble City hath juſtly acquired the reputation and the teſtimony of all who have had occaſion to conſider their dealings in that kinde, that they deale moſt faithfully, moſt juſtly, moſt providently, in all things which are committed to their truſt for pious uſes, from others, not only in a full employment of that which was given, but in an improvement thereof, and then an employment of that emprovement to the ſame pious uſe, ſo every man in his particular may propoſe to himſelfe, ſome of thoſe bleſſed examples which have riſen amongſt your ſelves, and follow that, and exceed that; That as your lights are Torches, and not petty Candles, and your Torches better then others Torches, ſo he alſo may be a larger example to others, then others have been to him, for, Herein is your Father glorified, if you beare much fruit, and that is the end of all, that we all doe, That men ſeeing it, may glorifie our Father which is in heaven.

Gloria ex Imitatione. Iohn 15. 8. Mat. 4. 20.

Preached upon Candlemas day.

ROM. 13. 7.

Render therefore to all men their dues.

The Text being part of the Epiſtle of that day, that yeare.

THE largeneſſe of this ſhort Text conſiſts in that word, Therefore; therefore becauſe you have been ſo particularly taught your particular duties, therefore perform them, therefore practiſe them; Reddite omnibus debita, Render therefore to every man his due. The Philoſopher might ſeem to have contracted as large a law, into a few words, in his ſuum cuique, as the Holy Ghoſt had done in his Reddite omnibus; if it were not for this, Therefore; for that carries our conſideration over the whole Epiſtle. This Epiſtle particularizing all duties, which appertaine ad pietatem erga Deum, to our religious worſhip of God, ad charitatem erga proximum, to charitable offices towards one another, and ad ſanctimoniam propriam, to a ſanctification and holineſſe of life in our ſelves: You have ſeen a liſt of your debts, ſayes the Apoſtle, (and that men deeply endebted are loath to doe) you have ſeen what you owe God, what you owe your ſelves, and what you owe the world, Reddite ergo omnibus debita, be therefore behinde hand with none of theſe, but render unto all their dues: Foh, our debts here are not reſtrained to thoſe that are mentioned in the following part of this verſe, Tribute, and Cuſtome, and Feare, and Honour, but it is the knot that ties up all, and this Text in this verſe, is the ſame that begins the next verſe alſo; Reddite debita omnibus, Render to all men their dues, and Nemini quicquam debeas, Owe nothing to any man, is all one: It is farther then many uſe to come, to know what they owe; ſince I have brought you ſo far, ſayes our Apoſtle, Render to all men their dues.

Diviſio. It is one degree of thrift, (but for the moſt part it comes late) to bring our debts into as few hands as we can. Our debt here we cannot bring into fewer then theſe three, to God, to our Neighbour, to our ſelves. Conſider our debts to God, to be our ſins, and ſo we dare not come to a reckoning with him, but we diſcharge our ſelves intirely upon

our

A our ſurety, our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus: but yet of that debt we muſt pay an acknowledgement, an intereſt (as it were) of praiſe, for all that we have, and of prayer for all that we would have, and theſe are our debts to God. Conſider our debts to man, and our creditors are perſons above us, and perſons below us, ſuperiours, and inferiours; and to ſuperiours (who are the perſons of whom this Text, or this verſe, is moſt literally intended) we are debtors firſt in matter of ſubſtance, expreſſed here, in thoſe words Tribute, and Cuſtome; and in matter of ceremony, expreſſed here, in thoſe words, Feare, and Honour. And to our inferiours, we are debtors for counſell to direct them, and for reliefe in compaſſion of their ſufferings. And then to come to our third ſort of creditors, to our ſelves, we owe our ſelves ſome debts which are to be tendred at noone, which are to be paid in our beſt ſtrength and proſperity, in the courſe of our lives; and ſome which are to be tendred at night, at our Sun-ſet, at our deaths: Reddite ergo omnibus, Render therefore to
B all their dues. For your firſt debt, to God, we bring you to Church; this is no place to arreſt in; but yet the Spirit of God calls upon you for thoſe debts, praiſe him in his holy place, and pray to him in his houſe, which is the houſe of prayer. For your debts of the ſecond kinde, to other men, for thoſe to ſuperiours, we ſend you to Court; for thoſe to inferiours, we ſend you to Hoſpitals, and priſons; and though Courts and priſons be ill paying places, yet pay you your debts of ſubſtance, and of ceremony, of tribute, and of honour, at Court; and your debt of counſell and relief to thoſe that need them, in the darkeſt corners. And for you third kinde of debts, debts to your ſelves, make eaven with your ſelves all the way in your lives, leſt your payment prove too heavy, and you break, and your hearts breake, when you come to ſee that you cannot doe that upon your death-bed: Reddite omnibus, Render to all, to God, to man, to your ſelves, their dues.

To begin then with our beginning, our debts to God; if we take that definition of 1 Part. Deo.
C of debts, which ariſes out of the ſound of the word, Debere eſt de alio habere, a man owes all that which he hath received of another, we are debtors of all that we have, and all that we are, to God; our well being, and our very being is from him. If we take that definition of debt, Debere eſt Iure aliquo teneri ad dandum aut faciendum aliquid, To owe, is to be bound by ſome Law, to give ſomething, or to doe ſomething to ſome perſon; The Law of Nature in our hearts, the Law of the Creature in our eyes, the Law of the Word in our eares, provokes us to give and to doe ſomething to that God, who hath given and done all to us; and more then giving or doing, hath ſuffered ſo much for us. What then is the paiment which we are to make? Firſt, Glory, Praiſe: For, in all his works, God Laus.
ſtill propoſed to himſelfe, his Glory. Thoſe men who will needs be of Gods Cabinet Counſell, and pronounce what God did firſt, what was his firſt Decree, and the firſt clauſe in that Decree, thoſe men who will needs know, and then publiſh Gods ſecrets,
D (And, by the way, that, which ſometimes it may concerne us to know, yet it may be a Libell to publiſh it) Thoſe myſteries, which, for the oppoſing and countermining ſtubborne, and perverſe Hereſies, it may concerne us, in Councels and Synods, and other fit places, to argue, and to cleare, it may be an injury to God, and againſt his Crowne, and Dignity, in breaking the peace of the Church, to publiſh and divulge to every popular auditory, and every itching eare, and thereby perplexe the conſciences of weak men, or offer contentious men, that which is their food, and delight, diſputation; Theſe men, I ſay, though they differ, in their order, whether Gods Decree of Reprobation and Salvation, were before his Decree of Creation, (for ſome place it before, and ſome after) yet all, on all ſides agree in this, That Gods firſt purpoſe was his owne glory; that was his firſt Decree, by what degrees ſoever he proceeded to the execution of that Decree. And ſo in the great and incomprehenſible work of our Salvation, when that was uttered
E in the mouth of Angels to the Shepheards, that Ambaſſage began with a Gloria in excelſis, There was Peace upon earth, and there was good will towards men, but firſt there was Glory to God on high. And though to correct Hereticall and Schiſmaticall men, amongſt whom, ſome would expreſſe themſelves in Gods ſervice, in one manner, and ſome in another, to the endangering of Doctrine, and to the confuſion of Order, and thereupon ſome would ſay, in the Church-Service, Gloria Patri, in Filio, per Spiritum Sanctum, Glory be to the Father, in the Son, by the Holy Ghoſt; And ſome Gloria Patri per Filium, Glory be to the Father by the Son; And ſome Gloria Patri, & Filio, per Spiritum Sanctum, Glory be to the Father, and the Son, by the Holy Ghoſt; Though to prevent the danger of theſe divers formes of ſervice, the Church came to determine all, in that one, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt, yet we ſee A out of the formes of the Heretiques themſelves, ſtill ſo farre as they conceived the Godhead to extend, ſo farre they extended Glory, in that holy acclamation; thoſe who be-leeved not the Son to be God, or the Holy Ghoſt not to be God, left out Glory, when they came to their Perſons; but to him that is God, in all confeſſions, Glory appertains.

Now Glory is, Clara cum laude notitia, ſayes S. Ambroſe: It is an evident knowledge, and acknowledgement of God, by which, others come to know him too; which acknowledgement is well called a recognition, for it is a ſecond, a ruminated, a reflected knowledge: Beaſts doe remember, but they doe not remember that they remember; they doe not reflect upon it, which is that that conſtitutes memory: Every carnall and naturall man knowes God, but the acknowledgement, the recognition, the manifeſtati-on of the greatneſſe and goodneſſe of God, accompanied with praiſe of him for that, this appertaines to the godly man, and this conſtitutes glory. If God have delivered me from B a ſickneſſe, and I doe not glorifie him for that, that is, make others know his goodneſſe to me, my ſickneſſe is but changed to a ſpirituall apoplexy, to a lethargy, to a ſtupefaction. If God have delivered us from deſtruction in the bowels of the Sea, in an Invaſion, and from deſtruction in the bowels of the earth, in the Powder-treaſon, and we grow faint in the publication of our thanks for this deliverance, our puniſhment is but aggravated, for we ſhall be deſtroyed both for thoſe old ſins which induced thoſe attempts of thoſe deſtructions, and for this later and greater ſin, of forgetting thoſe deliverances; God requires nothing elſe; but he requires that, Glory and Praiſe. And that booke of the Scriptures, of which, S. Baſil ſayes, That if all the other parts of Scripture could periſh, yet out of that booke alone, we might have enough for all uſes, for Catechizing, for Preaching, for Diſputing; That whole Booke, which containes all ſubjects that ap-pertaine to Religion, is called altogether Sepher Tehillim, The Booke of praiſes, for all our C Religion is Praiſe. And of that Book every particular Pſalme is appointed by the Church, and continued at leaſt for a thouſand and two hundred yeares, to be ſhut up with that humble and glorious acclamation, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt; O that men would therefore praiſe the Lord, and declare the wonderfull works that he doth for the ſons of men! Nil quiſquam debet niſi quod turpe eſt, non reddere, ſayes the Law: It is Turpe, an infamous and ignominious thing, not to pay debt; And, infamous and ignominious, are heavy and reproachfull words in the Law; and the Goſpell would adde to that Turpe, Impium: It is not onely an infamous but an impious, an irreligious thing, not to pay debts. As in debts, the State, and the Judge is my ſecurity, they undertake I ſhall be paid, or they execute Judgement; ſo, conſider our ſelves as Chriſtians, God is my ſecurity, and he will puniſh where I am defrauded. Either thou oweſt God nothing, (And then, if thou owe him nothing, from whom, or from what D hath ſhe ſtollen that face, that is faire; or he that eſtate, that is rich; or that office, that commands others; or that learning, and thoſe orders and commiſſion, that preaches to others; or they their ſoules, that underſtand me now? If you owe nothing, from whom had you all theſe, all this?) Or if thou doſt owe, Turpe eſt, Impium eſt, It is an unworthy, it is an unhoneſt, it is an irreligious thing, not to pay him, in that money, which his owne Spirit mints, and coynes in thee, and of his owne bullion too, praiſe and thanksgiving. Not to pay him then, when he himſelfe gives thee the money that muſt pay him, the Spirit of Thankfulneſſe, falls under all the reproaches, that Law or Goſpell can inflict in any names. How many men have we ſeene molder and crumble away great eſtates, and yet pay no debts? It is all our caſes: What Poems, and what Orati-ons we make, how induſtrious, and witty we are, to over-praiſe men, and never give God his due praiſe? Nay how often is the Pulpit it ſelfe, made the ſhop, and the E Theatre of praiſe upon preſent men, and God left out? How often is that called a Ser-Pſal. 148. 2. mon, that ſpeakes more of Great men, then of our great God? Laudate eum omnes Angeli ejus, laudate eum omnes virtutes ejus; David calls upon the Angels, and all the Hoſt of Heaven, to praiſe God, and in the Romane Church, they will employ willingly all their praiſe upon the Angels, and the Hoſt of Heaven it ſelfe; and this is not reddere debitum; here is mony enough ſpent, but no debt paid; praiſe enough given, but not to
Ver. 10. the true God. Laudate eum ligna fructifera, & univerſa pecora, & volucres pennatæ, ſayes
David there; David calls upon fruits, and fowle, and cattle to praiſe God, and we praiſe, and ſet forth our lands, and fruits, and fowle, and cattle, with all Hyperbolicall praiſes;

praiſes; and this is not reddere debitum, no paiment of a debt, where it is due. Laudate cum juvenes, & ſenes, & virgines, ſayes David too; He calls upon old men, and young men, and virgins, to praiſe the Lord, and we ſpend all our praiſes, upon young men, which are growing up in favour, or upon old men, who have the government in their hands, or upon maidens, towards whom our affections have tranſported us, and all this is no paiment of the debt of praiſe. Laudate eum Reges terræ, Principes & omnes Judices; V. 11. He calls upon Kings, and Judges, and Magiſtrates to praiſe God, and we employ all our praiſe upon the actions of thoſe perſons themſelves. Beloved, God cannot be flattered, he cannot be over-praiſed, we can ſpeake nothing Hyperbolically of God: But he cannot be mocked neither; He will not be told, I have praiſed thee, in praiſing thy creature, which is thine Image; would that diſcharge any of my debt to a Merchant, to tell him, that I had beſtowed as much, or more mony then my debt, upon his picture? Though Princes, and Judges, and Magiſtrates be pictures, and Images of God, though beauty, and riches, and honour, and power, and favour, be, in a proportion, ſo too, yet, as I bought not that Merchants picture, becauſe it was his, or for love of him, but becauſe it was a good peece, and of a good Maſters hand, and a good houſe-ornament; ſo though I ſpend my nights, and dayes, and thoughts, and ſpirits, and words, and preaching, and writing, upon Princes, and Judges, and Magiſtrates, and perſons of eſtimation, and their praiſe, yet my intention determines in that uſe which I have of their favour, and reſpects not the glory of God in them; and when I have ſpent my ſelfe to the laſt farthing, my lungs to the laſt breath, my wit to the laſt Metaphore, my tongue to the laſt ſyllable, I have not paid a farthing of my debt to God; I have not praiſed him, but I have praiſed them, till not only my ſelfe, but even they, whom I have ſo miſpraiſed, are the worſe in the ſight of God, for my over-praiſing; I have flattered them, and they have taken occaſion by that, to thinke that their faults are not diſcerned, and ſo they have proceeded in them.

This is then our firſt debt to God, glory and praiſe, which is, (as we ſaid out of S. Ambroſe) a manifeſtation of Gods bleſſing to us: for it is not towards God as it is towards great perſons, under whom we have riſen, that we ſhould be afraid to let the world know, how rich we are, leſt they that raiſed us, ſhould borrow of us, or draw us into bands for them: God requires nothing but the glory, the manifeſtation, that by knowing what he hath done for thee, others may know what to hope, and what to pray for, at his hands: In our debts to God, the novverint univerſi, is the quietus eſt, our publiſhing of them, to his praiſe and glory, is his acquittance and diſcharge for them.

Our other debt to God is Prayer, for that alſo is due to him, and him onely; For, Si quod petendum eſt petis, ſed non à quo petendum eſt, impius es: If we direct our prayers to any, even for temporall things, as to the Authors of thoſe benefits, we may poure out as many prayers, as would have paid that debt, if they had been rightly placed, but yet by ſuch a paiment, our debt is growne a debt of a higher nature, a ſin. This is a circumſtance, nay, an eſſentiall difference peculiar to our debts to God, that we doe not pay them, except we contract more; we grow beſt out of debt, by growing farther in debt; by praying for more, we pay our former debt. Oratio. Auguſt. Domus mea Domus Orationis, my houſe, ſaies God, is a houſe of prayer; for this uſe, and purpoſe, he built himſelfe a houſe upon earth; He had praiſe and glory in heaven before, but for Prayer he erected a houſe here, his Church. All the world is his Exchequer, he gives in all; from every creature, from Heaven, and Sea, and Land, and all the inhabitants of all them, we receive benefits; But the Church is his Court of Requeſts, there he receives our petitions, there we receive his anſwers.

It is true that neither is that houſe onely for prayer, nor prayer onely for that houſe: Chriſt, in his perſon, conſecrated that place, the Temple, by Preaching too: And for prayer elſewhere, Chriſt did much accuſtome himſelfe to private prayer: But in him, who was truly Head of the Church, the whole Church was; Chriſt alone, was a Congregation, he was the Catholique Church. But when we meet in Gods houſe, though, by occaſion, there be no Sermon, yet if we meet to pray, we pay our debt, we doe our duty; ſo doe we not, if we meet at a Sermon, without prayer. The Church is the houſe of prayer, ſo, as that upon occaſion, preaching may be left out, but never a houſe of preaching, ſo, as that Prayer may be left out. And for the debt of prayer, God will not be paid, with money of our owne coyning, (with ſudden, extemporall, inconſiderate prayer) prayer) but with currant money, that beares the Kings Image, and inſcription; The Church of God, by his Ordinance, hath ſet his ſtampe, upon a Liturgie and Service, for his houſe. Audit Deus in corde cogitantis, quod nec ipſe audit, qui cogitat, ſayes S. Bernard: God heares the very firſt motions of a mans heart, which, that man, till he proceed to a farther conſideration, doth not heare, not feele, not deprehend in himſelfe.

That ſoule, that is accuſtomed to direct her ſelfe to God, upon every occaſion, that, as a flowre at Sun-riſing, conceives a ſenſe of God, in every beame of his, and ſpreads and dilates it ſelfe towards him, in a thankfulneſſe, in every ſmall bleſſing that he ſheds upon her; that ſoule, that as a flowre at the Suns declining, contracts and gathers in, and ſhuts up her ſelfe, as though ſhe had received a blow, when ſoever ſhe heares her Saviour wounded by a oath, or blaſphemy, or execration; that ſoule, who, whatſoever ſtring be ſtrucken in her, baſe or treble, her high or her low eſtate, is ever tun'd toward God, that ſoule prayes ſometimes when it does not know that it prayes. I heare that man name God, and aske him what ſaid you, and perchance he cannot tell; but I remember, that he caſts forth ſome of thoſe ejaculationes animæ, (as S. Auguſt: calls them) ſome of thoſe darts of a devout ſoule, which, though they have not particular deliberations, and be not formall prayers, yet they are the indicia, pregnant evidences and bleſſed fruits of a religious cuſtome; much more is it true, which S. Bernard ſaies there, of them, Deus audit, God heares that voice of the heart, which the heart it ſelfe heares not, that is, at firſt conſiders not. Thoſe occaſionall and tranſitory prayers, and thoſe fixed and ſtationary prayers, for which, many times, we binde our ſelves to private prayer at ſuch a time, are payments of this debt, in ſuch peeces, and in ſuch ſummes, as God, no doubt, accepts at our hands. But yet the ſolemne dayes of payment, are the Sabbaths of the Lord, and the place of this payment, is the houſe of the Lord, where, as Tertullian expreſſes it, Agmine facto, we muſter our forces together, and beſiege God; that is, not taking up every tatter'd fellow, every ſudden ragge or fragment of ſpeech, that riſes from our tongue, or our affections, but muſtering up thoſe words, which the Church hath levied for that ſervice, in the Confeſſions, and Abſolutions, and Collects, and Litanies of the Church, we pay this debt, and we receive our acquittance. Firſt, we muſt be ſure to pray, where we may be ſure to ſpeed, and onely God can give. It is a ſtrange thing, ſaies Juſtin Martyr, to pray to Eſculapius or to Apollo for health, as Gods thereof, Qui apud Chironem medicinã didicerunt; when they who pray to them, may know, to whom thoſe gods were beholden for all their medicines, and of whom they learnt all their phyſick: why ſhould they not rather pray to their Maſters, then to them? why ſhould Apollo, Chiroes ſcholar, and not Chiro, Apollo's Maſter, be the god of phyſick? why ſhould I pray to S. George for victory, when I may goe to the Lord of Hoſts, Almighty God himſelfe; or conſult with a Seargeant, or Corporall, when I may goe to the Generall? Or to another Saint for peace, when I may goe to the Prince of peace Chriſt Jeſus? Why ſhould I pray to Saint Nicolas for a faire paſſage at Sea, when he that rebuked the ſtorme, is nearer me then S. Nicolas? why ſhould I pray to S. Antony for my hoggs, when he that gave the devill leave to drowne the Gergeſens whole heard of hoggs, did not do that by S. Antonies leave, nor by putting a caveat or præ-non-obſtante in his monopoly of preſerving hoggs? I know not where to finde S. Petronilla when I have an ague, nor S. Apollonia, when I have the tooth-ache, nor S. Liberius, when I have the ſtone: I know not whether they can heare me in Heaven, or no; Our Adverſaries will not ſay, that all Saints in Heaven heare all that is ſaid on earth: I know not whether they be in Heaven, or no: our Adverſaries will not ſay, that the Pope may not erre, in a matter of fact, and ſo may canonize a Traytor for a Saint: I know not whether thoſe Saints were ever upon earth or no; our Adverſaries will not ſay, that all their Legends were really, hiſtorically true, but that many of them, are holy, but yet ſymbolicall inventions, to figure out not what was truly done before, but what wee ſhould endeavour to doe now. I know my Redeemer liveth, and I know where he is; and no man knowes, where he is not. He is our Creditor, to him we muſt pray. But for what? we may finde in ſome reſpects a better modell of prayer in heathen, and unchriſtian Rome, then in ſuperſtitious Rome. There wee finde their prayer to have beene, Aut innocentiam des nobis, aut maturam pœnitentiam; preſerve us O Lord, in an innocencie, or afford us a ſpeedy repentance: And as we finde that there was in that State a publique Officer, Conditor precum, that made their Collects, and prayers for publique uſe, ſo wee finde in their prayers, that which may make

A make us asham'd; At first, for many yeares, their prayer was, Vt res populi Romani ampliores facerent, that their Gods would enlarge their State; after that, it was, Vt res perpetuò incolumes servarent, that their Gods would preserve, and establish them, in that State; And after, Vota nuncupata, si res eo stetissent statu; They vowed their service, and their sacrifice to God, upon condition that he should keepe them alwaies in that State, and not otherwise. So far therefore they may be our example, that they contented themselves with a competency, but not, that they made themselves Judges of that competency. We come to Gods house to pay a debt, and our debt is, to confesse that we can have from none but him, nor desire from him any more, then he is pleased to give.

We come now to our second sort of Creditors, to whom wee are commanded to render their dues, to men: And of them, to our Superiors first, and then to our Inferiors. For, that with which, the Apostle enters into this Chapter, Omnis anima, Let every soule be subject to the higher powers, S. Chrysostome applies Ad Prophetam, & Euangelistam, though he were a Prophet, or an Euangelist; S. Bernard, Ad Episcopum, & Archiepiscopum, though a Bishop, or Archbishop, (for, though they be as spirituall meteors betweene Heaven, and earth, and stand betweene God and us, yet they are subject to that jurisdiction, which God hath given man over man, though they were in an extraordinary calling, (the Prophets were so) yet they were subject to an ordinary jurisdiction;) And Theophylact, and Theodoret both, apply it ad Monachum & Fratrem, to Monks and Friers; though they seeme to be gone out of the world, yet to this entendment, of being subject to higher powers, they are all within the world, no Cloyster, no Cathedrall Church, no profession, no dignity is a sanctuary, a priviledged place from the payment of this debt. Here is a Quo warranto to be brought against all, and what exception can bee pleaded to this Omnis anima, let every soule be subject? The Anabaptist would not pay this debt, hee acknowledges no Magistrate, and yet John Baptist did, who submitted himselfe to Herod; The Jesuit will not pay this debt, he acknowledges no secular Magistrate, and yet Christ Jesus did, who submitted himselfe to Pilate; Nemo seculatior Pilato, cui adstitit Dominus judicandus, saies S. Bernard, there was never a more seculat Judge then Pilate, and yet the Lord of life was judg'd to death by him.

We cannot enlarge this consideration to all our Creditors, in these debts, not to all Superiors, naturall, as Parents, and civill, as Magistrates, and Ecclesiasticall, as Prelates, and that which is mixt of all, matrimoniall, from the wife to the husband, and therefore we contract it to the roote of all, the Soveraigne; And to him we consider first a Reall, and substantiall, and then a circumstantiall and ceremoniall debt. The substantiall debt is paid in a faithfull, in a ready and chearfull paying of those debts, those Tributes, and Customes, (as the Apostle cals them here) which belong to the King, and he that makes no conscience in defrauding the publique, he that withholds part of this debt, whensoever he can, he would pay that which he payes, in counterfait money, if he durst: hee that deceives, because he sees he can scape with that deceit, he would coyne too, if he saw too, that he could scape for that coyning. A principall reason that makes coyning and adulterating of money capitall in all states, is not so much because hee that coynes usurpes the Princes authority, (for every coyner is not a pretender to the Crowne) nor because he diminishes the Princes majesty, (for what is the Prince the worse in that his face is stamped by another in base mettall, then when that is done by himselfe, or when his face is graved in any stone that is not precious?) as because he that coynes, injuries the publique: and no man injuries the publique more, then he, who defrauds him, who is Gods steward for the publique, the King. In matter of cloathes and apparell, God wrought a miracle in private mens cases, in continuing and enlarging the children of Israels cloathes in the wildernesse: In matter of meat he wrought a miracle in private mens behalfe too, in feeding so many, with so few loaves, and fishes; and so he did for drinke too, in a miraculous providing of wine at the Marriage; for, meat, and drink, and cloathes are things necessary for every man: But because money is not so, if these other things may otherwise be had, (as some nations have lived, by permutation of commodities, without money) therefore God never wrought a miracle in matter of money, in any private mans case; But because money is the most necessary of all, to the publique, to the Prince, therefore he wrought a miracle for that; and for that, onely then, when that money was to be employed upon tribute to Cæsar; no miracle in matter of money but for tribute. As it is a signe of subjection to see a man stand bare headed, so it may be a declination towards a worſe condition, to ſee a State bare headed, to ſee the Prince, the Head, kept bare, by being either defrauded of that which is ordinarily due to him, or denied that which becomes alſo due in the payment, though it were extraordinarily given in the grant. But I am not here, to deale upon affections, but conſciences, and but ſo far upon them, in this point, as they finde themſelves in a rectified, and well examined conſcience, to have beene enemies to the publique, by having defrauded that, by any meanes, of that which was truly due to it. And to bring that into conſideration, which is little conſidered, that as it is a greater ſinne to defraud the publique, then to defraud any private perſon, ſo doth the aſſiſting of the publique lay a greater obligation upon us, then the aſſiſting of any other, by private almes. A

Ceremoniali. The other debt from us to men, and of them to Superiours, and of them principally to the Soveraigne, we called ceremoniall; And the Apoſtle, in that which followes in this verſe, referres chiefely to that, in thoſe words, Feare, and Honour, for it conſiſts eſpecially in thoſe things, wherein, by outward reverence, we contribute to the maintenance, and upholding of the dignity of the Prince; and of theſe outward ceremoniall things hath God alwaies profeſſed himſelfe to be moſt jealous. And, (if I miſtake not, as I may eaſily doe, in things ſo far removed out of my way) when in your judiciall proceedings in criminall cauſes, you make the greateſt offences to be againſt the Crowne and Dignity, in the firſt, (the Crowne) you intend the eſſentiall part, and in the other, (the Dignity) the ceremoniall, the Honour, and Reverence, and Reputation of the Prince. God gave his very Eſſence to his Son, he was very God of very God; But when this Son of his became man, that which God ſayes in generall, my Honour will I give to no man, reaches ſo far to the Son of God himſelfe, as that the honour due to God, is not to be given to the body, not to the manhood of Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe. How very great a part of the Law of God was ceremoniall? and how very heavy puniſhments were ordained for the breakers even of thoſe Ceremonies? The Sabbaths themſelves, S. Paul puts amongſt Ceremonies: And that man, who aſſiſted the Reformation of Religion, with as much learning, and modeſty, as any, defines the Commandment of the Sabbath well, to be Morale præceptum, de Ceremoniali, That though the Commandment be morall, and binde all men for ever, yet that which is commanded in that morall Commandement, is in it ſelfe Ceremoniall; for, indeed, all that which we call by the generall name of Religion, as it is the outward worſhip of God, is Ceremoniall, and there is nothing more morall, then that ſome ceremoniall things there muſt be. Now, as theſe Ceremoniall things are due to God himſelfe, ſo are they to them, to whom God hath imparted his name, in ſaying they are Gods. Wee ſhall not read in any ſecular or prophane ſtory, of greater humility and reverence in ſubjects to their Princes, then in the booke of God, to the Kings there. What phraſes of abjecting themſelves, in reſpect of the Prince, can exceed Davids humble expreſſing of himſelfe to Saul? Or Daniels magnifying the King, when he cals him King of Kings? And certainly ſome of the beſt, and moſt religious of Chriſtian Emperors tooke to themſelves ſo great Titles, in their ſtile, as can be excuſed no other way, but becauſe their Predeceſſors had done ſo, there lay a neceſſity upon them, to keepe this ceremoniall reſpect and dignity, at the ſame heighth, becauſe upon the Ceremoniall, much of the Eſſentiall depends too. And therefore God pierces to the roote, to the heart, when he forbids an irreverent, or unreſpective thought of the Prince, for, ſaies he, Thoſe that have wings, ſhall declare the matter; God imployes ſo many Informers, as Angels; It is not an office unworthy of the Angels of Heaven, much leſſe of any other Angels of the Church, (no, not though it be delivered by way of confeſſion) to diſcover any diſloyall purpoſes; though in other caſes, by our owne Canons, that ſeale of Confeſſion lay juſtly a ſtrong obligation upon us, and God gives Angels an ability, a faculty, which in their nature they have not, that is, to know thoughts; for this purpoſe, for the diſcovery of ſuch irreverent, and diſloyall hearts. Angels doe not know thoughts naturally, yet to this purpoſe they ſhall know thoughts, ſaies God. Morall men ſhould not diſcover the ſecrets of friends, we ſhould not diſcover the things we receive in confeſſion; but when it comes to matter of diſloyalty, all morall ſeales, and all Eccleſiaſticall ſeales loſe their obligation. B

The foote of this account, the totall ſumme of this Ceremoniall debt to Superiors, is, that due reſpect be given to every man, in his place; for when young men thinke it the onely argument of a good ſpirit, to behave themſelves fellowly, and frowardly to great perſons, C

A persons, those greater persons in time, take away their respect from Princes, and at last, (for in the chain of order, every link depends upon one another) God loses the respect and honour due to him; private men lessen their respect of Magistrates, and Magistrates of Princes, and Princes and all, of God. And therefore, that which S. Chrysostome sayes of the highest rank; Non putes Christiana philosophia dignitatem ladi, reaches to all sorts, Let no man think that he departs from the dignity of a Christian, in attributing to every man that which appertains to the dignity of his place. I speak not all this, as though a man should lose the substance for the ceremony, that that man, whose place it is to advise and counsell, should be so ceremonious with his superiour, as to concurre with him in the allowance of all his errors. Caput meum confessatum est (it is an expostulation of S. Bernards) My head is bruised, corrupted, putrified, (he speakes it of his head, his superiour, a Bishop) Et jam sanguine ebulliente, putaverim esse tegendum, now my head runs downe
B with blood, can I think to cover it? Quicquid apposuero, cruentabitur, whatsoever I lay to it will be bloody too; if I dissemble, or cover his faults, his blood will fall upon me, and I shall have part of his sins. Every wife hath a superiour at home, so hath every childe, and every servant, and every man a superiour some where, in some respect, that is, in a spirituall respect: for so, not only the King, but the highest spirituall person hath a superiour for absolution. And to this superiour respectively, every man owes a ceremoniall respect, as a debt, though this debt be not so far, as to accompany him, or to encourage him in his ill purposes, for that is too high a ceremony, and too transcendent a complement, to be damned for his sake, by concurring with my superiour in his sins. And then, they whose office it is to direct, even their superiours, by their counsell, (as that office may in cases belong to a wife, to a childe, to a servant, as Iob professes it was in his family) have also a ceremoniall duty in that duty, which is, to doe even that, with
C sweetnesse, with respect, with reverence. It was a better rule in so high a businesse, then a man would look for at a Friars hands, which S. Bernard hath, Absit prudentia & benevolentia, non sunt perfecta consilia: No man is a good Counsellor, for all his wisdome, and for all his liberty of speech, except he love the person whom he counsels: If he do not wish him well, as well as tell him his faults, he is rather a Satyrist, and a Calumniator, and seeks to vent his own wisdome, and to exercise his authority, then a good Counsellor. And therefore, sayes that Father, before Christ took Peter into that high place, he asked him, and asked him thrice, Amas me? Loveſt thou me? He would be sure of his love to him first, before he preferred him; Vix in multitudine hominum, unum reperio, in utraq; gratia consummatum, sayes he still: Not one man amongst a thousand, that is both able to give counsell to great persons, and then doth that office out of love to that person,
D but rather to let others see his ability in himself, or his authority and power over that person, and so upon pretence of counselling, opens his weaknesses to the knowledge, and to the contempt of other men; as Davids wife, when he had danced (as she thought) undecently before the Ark, spoke freely enough, with liberty enough, but it was with scorn, and contempt: And this is in no sort any payment of this ceremoniall debt, which is, (that the foundations, and the substance being preserved, that is, the glory of God, and morall, and religious truths being kept inviolate) to think, and say, and doe, those things which may conduce to the estimation, and dignity of his superiour.

to render to them also their dues; for, to them we said at beginning, there was due, counsell, if they were weak in understanding; and there was due, relieſe, if they were weak in their fortunes. For the first, there are some persons in so high place in this world, as that they can owe nothing to any temporall superiour, for they have none:
E But there is none so low in this world, but he hath some lower then he is, to pay this debt of counsell and advise to: at least the debt of prayer for him, if he will not receive the debt of counsell to him. But in this place (for haste) we contract our selves to the debt of relieſe to the poore: Amongst whom, we may consider one sort of poore whom we our selves have made poore, and damnified, and then our debt is Restitution, and another sort, whom God, for reasons unknowne to us hath made poore, and there our debt is Almes. For the first of these (those whom thou hast damnified and made poore) thou needst not come to the Apostles question of the blinde man, Did this man sin or his parents, that he is born blinde? Did this man waste himself in house-keeping, or in play, or in wantonnesse, that he is become poore? Neither he sinned, nor his parents, sayes Christ; neither neither exceſſe, nor play, nor wantonneſſe hath undone this man, but thy prevarication in his cauſe, thy extortion, thy oppreſſion: And now he ſtarves, and thou hunteſt after a popular reputation of a good houſe-keeper with his meate; now he freezes in nakedneſſe, and thy train ſhines in liveries out of his Wardrobe; every Conſtable is ready to lay hold upon him for a rogue, and thy ſon is Knighted with his mony. Sileat licèt fama, non ſilet fames, ſayes good and holy Bernard, fame may be ſilent, but famine will not: perchance the world knowes not this, or is weary of ſpeaking of it, but thoſe poore wretches that ſtarve by thy oppreſſion, know it, and cry out in his hearing, where thine own conſcience accompanies them, and cryes out with them againſt thee. Pay this debt, this debt of reſtitution, and pay it quickly; for nothing periſhes, nothing decayes an eſtate more, nothing conſumes, nothing enfeebles a ſoule more, then to let a great debt run on long. A

Eleemoſyna. But if they be poore of Gods making, and not of thine (as they are to thee, if thou know not why, or how they are become poore) (for though God have inflicted poverty upon them for their ſins, that is a ſecret between God and them, that which God hath revealed to thee, is their poverty, and not their ſins) then thou oweſt them a debt of almes, though not reſtitution: though thou have nothing in thy hands which was theirs, yet thou haſt ſomething which ſhould be theirs; nothing perchance which thou haſt taken from them, but ſomething certainly which thou haſt received from God for them; and in that ſenſe S. Bernard ſayes truly, in the behalfe, and in the perſon of the poore, to waſtfull men, Noſtrum eſt quod effunditis, you are prodigall, there is one fault; but then you are prodigall of that which is not your own, but ours, and that is a greater; and then we whoſe goods you waſt, are poore and miſerable, and that is the greateſt fault of all. Nobis crudeliter ſubtrahitur, quod inaniter expenditis, whatſoever you ſpend wantonly and vainly upon your ſelves, or ſinfully upon others, is cruelly and bloodily drawen out of our bowels, and worſe then ſo, ſacrilegiouſly too, becauſe we are the Temples of the Holy Ghoſt: If not properly taken away becauſe we had it not, yet unjuſtly and cruelly with-held and kept away, becauſe we ſhould have it, ſay thoſe poore ſoules to theſe waſtfull prodigalls in that devout and perſwaſive mouth of S. Bernard. Here is a double miſery, of which you, you that are prodigals are authors, Vos vanitando peritis, nos ſpoliando perimitis, In this prodigality you waſte your ſelves, even your ſoules, and you rob us; you leave us naked in the cold, and you caſt your ſelves into dark and tormenting fire. So that whether they be poore of Gods making, or poore of your making, Reddite debitum, pay the debt you owe, to the one by almes, to the other by reſtitution. B C

3. Part. Nos. We deſcend now to our laſt creditors, our ſelves. It is a good rule of S. Bernard, Qui ad ſui menſuram proximum diligit, ſeipſum diligere norit, ſince we are commanded to love our neighbour, as our ſelves, we muſt be ſure to love our ſelves ſo as we ſhould doe, or elſe we proceed by a wrong, and a crooked rule. So to give ſome gueſſe of our ability, and of our willingneſſe, to pay our debts to God, and our debts to man, we muſt conſider what we owe, and how we pay our ſelves. Thou art a debtor (as S. Paul ſayes of himſelfe) to the Greek, and to the Barbarian, to the wiſe, and to the unwiſe; And thou thy ſelfe art amongſt ſome of theſe; wiſe and learned in the beſt art, though thou know not a letter, rich and mighty in the beſt treaſure, though thou poſſeſſe not a penny, if thou pay theſe debts duly, (for as God tels us we may buy without money, ſo we may pay debts without money) and then ignorant and unlettered, in the midſt of thy library and languages, and poore and beggarly in the midſt of thy coffers and rentals, if thou call not thy ſelfe to this account, for his debt to himſelfe alone, is debt enough to oppreſſe any man. Solus mihi ſervandus, ſayes S. Bernard, I am Biſhop over no man but my ſelfe, I have no larger Dioceſſe then mine own perſon, no mans debts to pay but mine own, nor any man to pay them to, but to my ſelfe, Solus tamen mihi ſum ſcandalo, yet I am ſcandalized in my ſelfe, I have brought an ill name upon my ſelfe, to be an ill pay maſter to mine own ſoul; Solus tædio, though I have no creditor to diſappoint but my ſelfe, yet I am growen a tedious, and dilatory man to my ſelf, I have taken longer and longer daies with my ſelfe, and ſtill put off my repentances, from ſickneſſe to ſickneſſe, Solus tædio, ſolus oneri, I am a burden to my ſelfe, I have over-burdened my ſelf even with collaterall ſecurity, with entring into new bands, with new vows upon my repentances, new contracts, new ſtipulations, new proteſtations to my God, which I have forfeited alſo, ſolus oneri; and ſolus periculo, I am become a dangerous man to my ſelfe, I dare not truſt D E

my

A my ſelf alone, though I abſtain from my former ſinfull company, yet cuſtome of ſinne hath made me a tentation to my ſelf, and I ſin where no tentation offers it ſelf: Solus mihi ſervandus, I have no body to ſave, ſayes S. Bernard in his Cloiſter, but my ſelf, and I cannot doe that, but I damne my ſelf alone.

Begin therefore to pay theſe debts to thy ſelfe betimes; for, as we told you at beginning, ſome you are to tender at noone, ſome at evening. Even at your noon and warmeſt Sun-ſhine of proſperity, you owe your ſelves a true information, how you came by that proſperity, who gave it you, and why he gave it. Let not the Olive boaſt of her own fatneſſe, nor the Fig-tree of her own ſweetneſſe, nor the Vine of her own fruitfulneſſe, for we were all but Brambles. Let no man ſay, I could not miſſe a fortune, for I have ſtudied all my youth; How many men have ſtudied more nights, then he hath done hours, and ſtudied themſelves blinde, and mad in the Mathematiques, & yet withers in beggery B in a corner? Let him never adde, But I ſtudied in a uſefull and gainfull profeſſion; How many have done ſo too, and yet never compaſſed the favour of a Judge? And how many that have had all that, have ſtruck upon a Rock, even at full Sea, and periſhed there? In their Grandfathers & great Grandfathers, in a few generations, whoſoever is greateſt now, muſt ſay, With this ſtaffe came I over Jordan, nay, without any ſtaffe came I over Jordan, for he had in them at firſt, a beginning of nothing. As for ſpiritual happineſſe, Non volentis, nec currentis, ſed miſerentis Dei, It is not in him that would run, nor in him that doth, but only in God that proſpers his courſe; ſo for the things of this world, it is in vain to riſe early, and to lie down late, and to eat the bread of ſorrow, for, niſi Dominus ædificaverit, niſi Dominus cuſtodierit, except the Lord build the houſe, they labour in vaine, except the Lord keep the City, the watchman waketh but in vain. Come not therefore to ſay, I ſtudied more then my fellows, and therefore am richer then my fellows, but ſay, C God that gave me my contemplations at firſt, gave me my practice after, and hath given me his bleſſing now. How many men have worn their braines upon other ſtudies, and ſpent their time and themſelves therein? how many men have ſtudied more in thine own profeſſion, and yet, for diffidence in themſelves, or ſome disfavour from others, have not had thy practice? How many men have been equall to thee, in ſtudy, in practice, and in getting too, and yet upon a wanton confidence, that that world would alwayes laſt, or upon the burden of many children, and an expenſive breeding of them, or for other reaſons, which God hath found in his wayes, are left upon the ſand at laſt, in a low fortune? whileſt the Sun ſhines upon thee in all theſe, pay thy ſelf the debt, of knowing whence, and why all this came, for elſe thou canſt not know how much, or how little is thine, nor thou canſt not come to reſtore that which is none of thine, but unjuſtly wrung from others. Pay therefore this debt of ſurveying thine eſtate, and then pay thy ſelfe thine own too, by a chearfull enjoying and uſing that which is truly thine, and doe not deny D nor defraud thy ſelfe of thoſe things which are thine, and ſo become a wretched debtor, to thy back, or to thy belly, as though the world had not enough, or God knew not what were enough for thee.

Pay this debt to thy ſelfe of looking into thy debts, of ſurveying, of ſevering, of ſerving thy ſelfe with that which is truly thine, at thy noone, in the beſt of thy fortune, and in the ſtrength of thine underſtanding; that when thou commeſt to pay thy other, thy laſt debt to thy ſelf, which is, to open a doore out of this world, by the diſſolution of body and ſoule, thou have not all thy money to tell over when the Sun is ready to ſet, all the account to make of every bag of money, and of every quillet of land, whoſe it is, and whether it be his that looks for it from thee, or his from whom it was taken by thee; whether it belong to thine heire, that weepes joyfull tears behinde the curtain, or belong E to him that weeps true, and bloody teares, in the hole in a priſon. There will come a time, when that land that thou leaveſt ſhall not be his land, when it ſhall be no bodies land, when it ſhall be no land, for the earth muſt periſh; there will be a time when there ſhall be no Mannors, no Acres in the world, and yet there ſhall lie Mannors and Acres upon thy ſoul, when land ſhall be no more, when time ſhall be no more, and thou paſſe away, not into the land of the living, but of eternall death. Then the Accuſer will be ready to interline the ſchedules of thy debts, thy ſins, and inſert falſe debts, by abuſing an over-tenderneſſe, which may be in thy conſcience then, in thy laſt ſickneſſe, in thy death-bed: Then he will be ready to adde a cyphar more to thy debts, and make hundreds thouſands, and abuſe the faintneſſe which may be in thy conſcience then, in thy laſt ſick-neſſe, in thy death-bed. Then he will be ready to abuſe even thy confidence in God, and bring thee to think, that as a Pirate ventures boldly home, though all that he hath be ſtoln, if he be rich enough to bribe for a pardon; ſo, howſoever thoſe families periſh whom thou haſt ruined, and thoſe whole pariſhes whom thou haſt depopulated, thy ſoule may goe confidently home too, if thou bribe God then, with an Hoſpitall or a Fellowſhip in a Colledge, or a Legacy to any pious uſe in apparance, and in the eye of the world.

Luk. 16. 2. Pay thy ſelfe therefore this debt, that is, make up thine account all the way, for when that voyce comes, Redde rationem, Give up an account of thy Stewardſhip, it is not, goe home now, and make up thy account perfect; but now, now deliver up thine account; if it be perfect, it is well, if it be not, here is no longer day, for Iam non poteris villicare, now thou canſt be no longer Steward, now thou haſt no more to doe with thy ſelfe. Here the Eſay 38. 1. voyce is not in the word to Ezekiah, Diſpone domui, put thy houſe in order, for, morieris, thou ſhalt die; For, there God had a gracious purpoſe, to give him a longer terme, but here it is, foole, this night, repetunt, not they ſhall, but they doe fetch away thy ſoule, and then what is become of that To morrow, which thou hadſt imagined and promiſed to thy ſelfe, for the paiment of this debt, of this repentance? Be juſt therefore to thy ſelfe all the way; pay thy ſelfe, and take acquittances of thy ſelfe, all the way, which is onely done under the ſeale, and in the teſtimony of a rectified conſcience. Let thine owne conſcience be thine evidence, and thy Rolls, and not the opinion of others: Non tutum planè, ſed ſtultum, ibi theſaurum tuum recondere, ubi non vales reſumere, cum volueris, ſayes Saint Bernard. It is not providently done, to lock thy treaſure in a cheſt, of which thou haſt no key, and to which thou haſt no acceſſe: Si ponis in os meum, jam non in tua, ſed mea poteſtate eſt, ut te laudare, vel tibi derogare poſſim: If thou build thy reputation upon my report, it is now in my power, not in thine, whether thou ſhalt be good or bad, honourable or infamous: Sanum vas, & inconcuſſum, conſcientia, a good conſcience is a ſweet veſſell, and a ſtrong; Quicquid in ea repoſueris, ſervabit vivo, & defuncto reſtituet: Whatſoever thou laieſt up in that, ſhall ſerve thee all thy life, and after; and that ſhall be thine acquittance, and diſcharge, at thy laſt paiment, in manus tuas, when thou returneſt thy ſpirit, into his hands that gave it: And then reddidiſti debita omnibus, thou ſhalt have rendred to all their dues, when thou haſt given the King, Honour; the poore, almes; thy ſelfe, peace; and God thy ſoule.

ROM. 12. 20.

Therefore if thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirſt give him drink; for, in ſo doing thou ſhalt heap coales of fire on his head.

IT falls out, I know not how, but, I take it from the inſtinct of the Holy Ghoſt, and from the Propheticall ſpirit reſiding in the Church of God, that thoſe Scriptures which are appointed to be read in the Church, all theſe dayes, (for I take no other this Terme) doe evermore afford, and offer us Texts, that direct us to patience, as though theſe times had eſpecial need of thoſe inſtructions. And truly, ſo they have; for though God have ſo farre ſpared us as yet, as to give us no exerciſe of patience in any afflictions, inflicted upon our ſelves, yet, as the heart akes if the head doe, nay, if the foote ake, the heart akes too; ſo all that profeſſe the name of Chriſt Jeſus aright, making up but one body, we are but dead members of that body, if we be not affected with the diſtempers of of the moſt remote parts thereof. That man ſayes but faintly, that he is heart-whole, that is macerated with the Gout, or lacerated with the Stone; It is not a heart, but a ſtone growne into that forme, that feeles no paine, till the paine ſeize the very ſubſtance thereof. How much and how often S. Paul delights himſelfe with that ſociable ſyllable, Syn, Con, Conregnare, and Convificare, and Conſedere, of Raigning together, and living, and quickning together: As much alſo doth God delight in it, from us, when we expreſſe it in a Conformity, and Compunction, and Compaſſion, and Condolency, and (as it is but a little before the Text) in weeping with them that weepe. Our patience therefore being actually exerciſed in the miſeries of our brethren round about us, and probably threatned in the aimes and plots of our adverſaries upon us, though I hunt not after them, yet I decline not ſuch Texts, as may direct our thoughts upon duties of that kinde. 2 Tim. 2. 12. Eph. 2. 1, 6.

This Text does ſo; for the circle of this Epiſtle of S. Paul, this precious ring, being made of that golden Doctrine, That Juſtification is by faith, and being enameled with that beautifull Doctrine of good works too, in which enameled Ring, as a precious ſtone in the midſt thereof, there is ſet, the glorious Doctrine of our Election, by Gods eternall Predeſtination, our Text falls in that part, which concernes obedience, holy life, good works; which, when both the Doctrines, that of Juſtification by faith, and that of Predeſtination have ſuffered controverſie, hath been by all ſides embraced, and accepted; that there is no faith, which the Angels in heaven, or the Church upon earth, or our own conſciences can take knowledge of, without good works. Of which good works, and the degrees of obedience, of patience, it is a great one, and a hard one that is enjoyned in this Text; for whereas S. Auguſtine obſerves ſixe degrees, ſixe ſteps in our behaviour towards our enemies, whereof the firſt is nolle lædere, to be loth to hurt any man by way of provocation, not to begin; And a ſecond, nolle amplius quam læſus lædere, That if another provoke him, yet what power ſoever he have, he would returne no more upon his enemy, then his enemy had caſt upon him, he would not exceed in his revenge; And a third, velle minus, not to doe ſo much as he ſuffered, but in a leſſe proportion, onely to ſhew ſome ſenſe of the injury; And then another is, nolle lædere licet læſus, to returne no revenge at all, though he have been provoked by an injury; And a higher then that, paratum ſe exhibere ut amplius lædatur, to turne the other cheeke, when he is ſmitten, and open himſelfe to farther injuries; That which is in this Text, is the ſixt ſtep, and the higheſt of all, lædenti benefacere, to doe good to him, of whom we have received evill, If thine enemy hunger, to feed him, if he thirſt, to give him drinke; for in ſo, &c.

The Text is a building of ſtone, and that bound in with barres of Iron: fundamentall Doctrine, in point of manners, in it ſelfe, and yet buttreſſed, and eſtabliſhed with reaſons too, therefore, and for; Therefore feed thine enemy; For, in ſo doing, thou ſhalt heape coales. This therefore, confirmes the precedent Doctrine, and this For, confirmes that confirmation. Diviſio.

But all the words of God are Yea, and Amen, and therefore we need not inſiſt upon reaſons, to ratifie or eſtabliſh them. Our parts ſhall be but two; Mandatum, and Emolumentum; firſt the Commandement, (for we dare not call it by ſo indifferent a name, as an Euangelicall Counſell that we may chooſe whether we will doe or no; It is a Commandement, doe good to thine enemy) And ſecondly, the benefit that we receive by that benefit, we heap coales upon his head. Each part will have divers branches: for, in the Commandement, we ſhall firſt looke upon the perſon, to which God directs us, inimicus, though he be an enemy, and inimicus tuus, though he be thine enemy; but yet it is but tuus, thine enemy; It is not ſimply inimicus homo, the Devill, nor inimicus veſter, a ſpreading enemy, an enemy to the State, nor inimicus Dei, an enemy to Religion; And from the perſon, we ſhall paſſe to the duty, Ciba, and Da aquam, feed, and give drink, in which, all kindes of reliefes are implyed: But that is, ſi eſurierit, if he be hungry; There is no wanton nor ſuperfluous pampering of our enemy required, but ſo much as may preſerve the man, and not nouriſh the enmity. In theſe conſiderations we ſhall determine our firſt part; and our ſecond in theſe; Firſt, that God takes nothing from us, without recompence; nothing for nothing, he ſeales his Commandement with a powerfull reaſon, promiſe of reward: And then, the reward ſpecified here, ariſes from the enemy himſelfe; And that reward is, That thou ſhalt caſt coales of fire upon his head; and congeres, accumulabis, Thou ſhalt heap coales of fire upon him.

It is not ill ſaid by a Jeſuit, of theſe words, Sententia magis Euangelica, quàm Moſaica; This

1. Part. Mandatum. Pelanus.

This Text, that enjoynes benefits upon our enemies, is fitter for the Goſpel, then for the Law, fitter for the new, then for the old Teſtament; and yet it is tam Moſaica, quam Euangelica, to ſhew that it is Univerſall, Catholique, Morall Doctrine, appertaining to Jew, and Chriſtian, and all, this Text is in the old Teſtament, as well as in the new. In the mouth of two witneſſes is this truth eſtabliſhed, in the mouth of a Prophet, and in the mouth of an Apoſtle, Solomon had ſaid it before, and S. Paul ſayes it here, If thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirſt, &c. A

Prov. 25. 21.

Your Senecaes and your Plutarchs have taught you an art, how to make profit of enemies, becauſe as flatterers dilate a man, and make him live the more negligently, becauſe he is ſure of good interpretations of his worſt actions; So a mans enemies contract him, and ſhut him up, and make him live the more watchfully, becauſe he is ſure to be calumniated even in his beſt actions: But this is a leſſon above Seneca, and Plutarch, reſerved for Solomon, and Saint Paul, to make profit by conferring and placing benefits upon enemies: And that is our firſt branch, Though he be an enemy. B

Eſt inimicus.

S. Auguſtine cites, and approves that ſaying of the morall Philoſopher, Omnes odit, qui malos odit, he that hates ill men, hates all men, for if a man will love none but honeſt men, where ſhall he finde any exerciſe, any object of his love? So if a man will hold friendſhip with none, nor doe offices of ſociety to none, but to good natur'd, and gentle, and ſouple, and ſociable men, he ſhall leave very neceſſary buſineſſes undone. The frowardeſt and perverſeſt man may be good ad hoc, for ſuch or ſuch a particular uſe. By good company and good uſage, that is, by being mingled with other ſimples, and ingredients, the very fleſh of a Viper, is made an Antidote: A Viper loſes not his place in Phyſick, becauſe he is poyſon; a Magiſtrate ceaſes not to be a Magiſtrate, becauſe he is an ill man; much leſſe does a man ceaſe to be a man, and ſo to have a title to thoſe duties, which are rooted in nature, becauſe he is of an ill diſpoſition. God makes his Sun to ſhine upon the good, and upon the bad, and ſendeth raine upon the juſt, and upon the unjuſt. God hath made of one bloud all mankinde: how unkindly then, how unmanly is it to draw bloud? We come too ſoone to the name of enemy, and we carry it too farre: Plaintife and Defendant in a matter of Treſpaſſe, muſt be enemies: Diſputers in a Problematicall matter of Controverſie, that concernes not foundations, muſt be enemies; And then all enmity muſt imply an irreconcileableneſſe, once enemies may never be friends againe: we come too ſoone to the name, and we ſtand too long upon the thing; for there are offices and duties even to an enemy; and that, though an enemy in as high a Degree, as the word imports here, oſor, a hater, and oſor tuus, ſuch an enemy as hates thee, which is our next Branch. C

Mat. 5. 45.

Tuus.

We uſe to ſay, that thoſe benefits are longeſt remembred, which are publique, and common; and thoſe injuries, which are private, and perſonall: But truly in both, the private, and perſonall makes the greateſt impreſſion. For, if a man have benefitted the publique, with a Colledge, with an Hoſpitall, with any perpetuall endowment, yet he that comes after to receive the benefit of any ſuch place, for the moſt part determines his thankfulneſſe upon that perſon, who brought him thither, and reflects little upon the founder, or thoſe that are deſcended from him. And ſo it is in injuries, and violences too, we hate men more for perſonall, then for nationall injuries; more, if he have taken my Ship, then if he have attempted my Country. We ſhould be more ſenſible of the publique, but becauſe private and perſonall things doe affect us moſt, the Commandement here goes to the particular; Though he be thine enemy, and hate thee. If you love them that love you, and lend to them that pay you, what thanks have you? Truly not much: Publicans doe the ſame, ſayes S. Matthew; Sinners doe the ſame, ſayes S. Luke: But love you your enemies; For, in the ſame place, where Chriſt puts all thoſe caſes, If a man have been angry with his Brother, If a man haue ſaid Racha to his Brother, if he have called his Brother Foole, he ends all with that, Agree with thine adverſary; Though he be thine adverſary, yet he is thy Brother. If he have damnified thee, calumniated thee, pardon him. If he have done that to another, thou haſt no power to pardon him; Herein onely thou haſt exerciſe of greatneſſe and goodneſſe too, If he be thine enemy, thou and thou onely canſt pardon him; and herein onely thou haſt a Supremacy, and a Prerogative to ſhew. Mat. 5. 22.

So far then, the text goes literally, do good to an enemy; to thine enemy; and literally, no farther: It does not ſay to a State, Si Inimicus veſter; It does not binde us to favour favour, or further a publique enemy; It does not binde the Magistrate to favour Theeves and Murderers at land, nor Pirates at Sea, who are truly Inimici nostri, our enemies even as we are men, enemies to mankinde. It does not binde Societies and Corporations Ecclesiasticall or Civill, to sinke under such enemies, as would dissolve them or impaire them in their priviledges; for such are not onely Inimici vestri, but Vestrorum, enemies of you, and yours, of those that succeed you: And all men are bound to transferre their jurisdictions and priviledges, in the same integrity, in which they received them, without any prevarication. In such cases it is true, that Corporations have no soules, that is, they are not bound to such a tendernesse of conscience; for there are divers lawes in this doctrine of patience, that binde particular men, that doe not binde States and Societies, under those penalties.

Inimicus homo. Luk. 10. 19.

Much lesse does the Commandment bind us to the Inimicus homo, which is the devill, to farther him, by fuelling and advancing his tentations, by high dyet, wanton company, or licencious discourse; and so, upon pretence of maintaining our health, or our cheerefulnesse, invite occasions of sinne. S. Hierome tells us of one sense, in which wee should favour that enemy, the devill, and that in this text, we are commanded to doe so: Benevolus est erga Diabolum, saies he, he is the devils best friend, that resists him; for by our yeelding to the devils tentations, we submit him to greater torments, then, if he mist of his purpose upon us, he should suffer. But betweene this enemy and us, God himselfe hath set such an enmity, that, as no man may separate those whom God hath joyned, so no man may joyne those whom God hath separated; God created not this enmity in the devill; he began it in himselfe; but God created an enmity in us, against him; and, upon no collaterall conditions, may wee bee reconciled to him, in admitting any of his superstitions.

Gen. 3. 15.

It is not then Inimicus vester, the common enemy, the enemy of the State; lesse, Inimicus homo, the spirituall enemy of Mankinde, the devill; least of all, Inimicus Dei, they who oppose God, (so, as God can be opposed) in his servants who professe his truth. David durst not have put himselfe upon that issue with God, (Doe not I hate them, that hate thee) if hee had beene subject to that increpation, which the Prophet Iehu laid upon Iehoshaphat, Shouldst thou helpe the ungodly, and love them, that hate the Lord? But David had the testimony of his conscience, that hee hated them, with a perfect hatred: which, though it may admit that interpretation, that it is De perfectione virtutis, that his perfect hatred, was a hatred becomming a perfect man, a charitable hatred; yet it is De perfectione intentionis, a perfect hatred is a vehement hatred, and so the Chalde paraphrase expresses it, Odio consummato, a hatred to which nothing can be added; Odio religioso, with a religious hatred; not onely that religion may consist with it, but that Religion cannot subsist without it; a hatred that gives the tincture, and the stampe to Religion it selfe. The imputation that lyes upon them, who doe not hate those that hate God, is sufficiently expressed in S. Gregory; He saw how little temporisers and worldly men, were moved with the word Impiety, and ungodlinesse, and therefore he waves that; He saw they preferred the estimation of wisdome before and above piety, and therefore hee saies not Impium est, but stultum est, si illis placere quærimus, quos non placere domino scimus: It is a foolish thing, to endeavour to be acceptable to them, who, in our own knowledge, doe not endeavour to be acceptable to God.

Psal. 139. 21. 2 Chron. 19. 2. Hilar.

But yet, Beloved, even in those enemies, that thus hate God, Solomons rule hath place, There is a time to hate, and a time to love. Though the person be the same, the affection may vary. As S. Cyprian saies, (if that booke be not rather Origens, then Cyprians, for it is attributed to both) Ama fœminas inter Sacra solennia, Love a woman at Church, (that is, love her comming to Church,) (though, as S. Augustine in his time did, we, in our times may complaine of wanton meetings there) But Odio habe in communione privata, Hate, that is, forbeare women in private conversation; so, for those that hate God in the truth of his Gospell, and content themselves with an Idolatrous Religion, we love them at Church, we would be glad to see them here, and though they come not hither, wee love them so far, as that we pray for them; and we love them in our studies so far, as we may rectifie them by our labours; But wee hate them in our Convocations, where wee oppose Canons against their Doctrines, and we hate them in our Consultations, where we make lawes to defend us from their malice, and we hate them in our bed-chambers, where they make children Idolaters, and perchance make the children themselves. We acknowledge with S. Auguſtine, Perfectio odii eſt in charitate, the perfect hatred conſiſts with charity, Cum nec propter vitia homines oderimus, nec vitia propter homines amemus; when the greatneſſe of the men brings us not to love their religion, nor the illneſſe of their Religion, to hate the men. Moſes, in that place, is S. Auguſtines example, whom he propoſes, Orabat & occidebat, he prayed for the Idolaters, and he ſlew them; he hated, ſaies he, Iniquitatem, quam puniebat, that ſin which he puniſhed, and he loved Humanitatem, pro qua orabat, that nature, as they were men, for whom he prayed: for, that, ſaies he, is perfectum odium, quod facti ſunt diligere, quod fecerunt, odiſſe, to love them as they are creatures, to hate them as they are Traytors. Thus much love is due to any enemy, that if God be pleaſed to advance him, De ejus profectu non dejiciamur, ſayes S. Gregory, His advancement doe not deject us, to a murmuring againſt God, or to a diffidence in God; And that when God, in his time, ſhall caſt him downe againe, Congaudeamus juſtitiæ Judicis, condoleamus miſeriæ peremptis, Wee may both congratulate the juſtice of God, and yet condole the miſery of that perſon, upon whom that judgement is juſtly fallen: for, though Inimicus veſter, the enemy that malignes the State, and Inimicus Dei, the enemy that oppoſes our religion, be not ſo far within this text, as that we are bound to feed them, or to doe them good; yet there are ſcarce any enemies, with whom wee may not live peaceably, and to whom we may not wiſh charitably.

Ciba.

We have done with all, which was intended and propoſed of the perſon; we come to the duty expreſſed in this text, Ciba, feed him, and give him drinke. Here, there might be uſe in noting the largeneſſe, the fulneſſe, the abundance of the Goſpell, above the law: Not onely in that the bleſſings of God are preſented in the Old Teſtament, in the name of Milke and Hony, and Oyle, and Wine, (all temporall things) and in the New Teſtament, in the name of Joy, and Glory, (things, in a manner ſpirituall,) But that alſo, in the Old Teſtament, the beſt things are limited, and meaſured unto them; a Gomer of Manna, and no more, for the beſt man, whereas for the joy of the Goſpell, we ſhall enter In Gaudium Domini, Into our Maſters Joy, and be made partakers with Chriſt Jeſus, of that Joy, for which he endured the Croſſe; And here, in this world, Gaudium meum erit, ſaies Chriſt, My Joy ſhall be in you; in what meaſure? Implebitur, ſaies he, Your Joy ſhall be full; How long? for ever; Nemo tollet, your Joy ſhall no man take from you. And ſuch as the Joy is, ſuch is the glory too: How precious? Divitiæ Gloriæ, The Riches of the Glory of his Inheritance; How much? Pondus gloriæ, A waight of glory; How long? Immarceſcibilis Corona, A crowne of Glory, that never fadeth: We might, I ſay, take occaſion of making this compariſon, betweene the Old, and the New Teſtament, out of this Text, becauſe this charity, enjoyned here, in this text, to our enemy, in that place, from whence this text is taken, in the Proverbs, is but Lachem, and Maiim, Bread, and Water; But here, in S. Paul, it is in words of better ſignification, feed him, give him drinke. But indeed, the words, at the narroweſt, (as it is but bread and water) ſignifie whatſoever is neceſſary for the reliefe of him, that ſtands in need. And if we be enjoyn'd ſo much to our enemy, how inexcuſable are thoſe Datores cyminibiles (as the Canoniſts call them) that give Mint, and Cummin for almes, a roote that their Hogs will not, a broth that their Dogs will not eate. Remember in thy charity, the times, and the proportions of thy Saviour; After his Death, in the wound in his ſide, he poured out water, and bloud, which repreſented both Sacraments, and ſo was a bountifull Dole: provide in thy life, to doe good after thy death, and it ſhall be welcome, even in the eyes of God, then: But remember too, that this dole at his death, was not the firſt almes that he gave; his water was his white mony, and his blood was his gold, and he poured out both together in his agony, and ſeverally in his weeping, and being ſcourged for thee. What proportion of reliefe is due to him, that is thy brother in Nature, thy brother in Nation, thy brother in Religion, if meate and drinke, and in that, whatſoever is neceſſary to his ſuſtentation, bee due to thine enemy?

Si eſurierit.

But all this bountifull charity, is Si eſurierit, ſi ſitit, If he be hungry, if he be thirſty. To the King, who beares the care and the charge of the publique, wee are bound to give, Antequam eſuriat, Antequam ſitiat, before he be overtaken with dangerous, and diſhonorable, and leſſe remediable neceſſities: not onely ſubſtantiall wants, upon which our ſafety depends, but circumſtantiall and ceremoniall wants, upon which his Dignity, and Majeſty depends, are alwaies to bee, not onely ſupplied, but prevented. But our enemy muſt be in hunger, and thirſt, that is, reduced to the ſtate, as hee may not become our

A enemy againe, by that which we give, before wee are bound, by this text, to give any thing. No doubt but the Church of Rome hungers ſtill for the money of this land, upon which they fed ſo luxuriantly heretofore: and no doubt but thoſe men, whom they ſhall at any time animate, will thirſt for the blood of this land, which they have ſought before; but this is not the hunger, and the thirſt of the enemy, which we muſt feed: The Commandement goes not ſo far, as to feed that enemy, that may thereby be a more powerfull enemy; But yet, thus far, truly, it does goe, deny no office of civility, of peace, of commerce, of charity to any, onely therefore, becauſe hee hath beene heretofore an enemy.

There remaines nothing of thoſe two branches, which conſtitute our firſt part, the perſon, that is, an enemy reduced to a better diſpoſition; and the duty, that is, to relieve him, with things neceſſary for that ſtate: And for the ſecond part, we muſt ſtop upon
B thoſe ſteps laid downe at firſt, of which the firſt was, That God takes nothing for nothing, he gives a Reward. When God tooke that great proportion of Sheep and Oxen out of his ſubjects goods in the State of Iſrael, for Sacrifice, that proportion, which would have kept divers Kings houſes, and would have victualed divers navies, perchance no man could ſay, I have this, or this benefit, for this, or this Sacrifice; but yet could any man ſay, God hath taken a Sacrifice for nothing? Where we have Peace, and Juſtice, and Protection, can any man ſay, he gives any thing for nothing? When God ſaies, If I were hungry, I would not tell thee, that's not intended, which Tertullian ſaies, Scriptum eſt, Deus non eſuriet nec ſitiet, It is written, God ſhall neither hunger nor thirſt, (for, firſt, Tertullians memory failed him, there is no ſuch ſentence in all the Scripture, as he cites there; And then God does hunger and thirſt, in this ſenſe, in the members of his myſticall body,) neither is that onely intended in that place of the Pſalme (though
C Caſſiodore take it ſo) That if God in his poore Saints, were hungry, he could provide them, without telling thee; but it is, If I were hungry, I need not tell thee; for, The earth is the Lords, and the fulneſſe thereof, and they that dwell therein. God does not alwaies binde himſelfe to declare his hunger, his thirſt, his preſſing occaſions, to uſe the goods of his ſubjects, but as the Lord gives, ſo the Lord takes, where and when he will: But yet, as God transfuſes a meaſure of this Right and power of taking, into them, of whom he hath ſaid, you are Gods, ſo he transfuſes this goodneſſe too, which is in himſelfe, that he takes nothing for nothing; He promiſes here a reward, and a reward ariſing from the enemy, which puts a greater encouragement upon us, to doe it; Super caput ejus, In ſo doing, thou ſhalt heape coales of fire on his head.

God is the Lord of Hoſts, and in this Text, he makes the ſeate of the warre in the enemies Country, and enriches his ſervants Ex manubiis, out of the ſpoyle of the enemy;
D In caput ejus, It ſhall fall upon his head. Though all men that go to the war, goe not upon thoſe juſt reaſons deliberated before in themſelves, which are the defence of a juſt cauſe, the obedience to a lawfull Commandment, yet of thoſe that do goe without thoſe conſcientiense deliberations, none goes therefore, becauſe he may have roome in an Hoſpitall, or reliefe by a penſion, when he comes home lame, but becauſe he may get ſomething, by going into a fat country, and againſt a rich enemy; Though honour may ſeeme to feed upon blowes, and dangers, men goe cheerefully againſt an enemy, from whom ſomething is to be got; for, profit is a good ſalve to knocks, a good Cere-cloth to bruiſes, and a good Balſamum to wounds. God therefore here raiſes the reward out of the enemy, feed him, and thou ſhalt gaine by it. But yet the profit that God promiſes by the enemy here, is rather that we ſhall gaine a ſoule, then any temporall gaine; rather that we ſhall make that enemy a better man, then that we ſhall make him a weaker ene-
E my: God reſpects his ſpirituall good, as we ſhall ſee in that phraſe, which is our laſt branch, Congeres carbones, Thou ſhalt heape coales of fire upon his head.

It is true that S. Chryſoſtome (and not he alone) takes this phraſe to imply a Revenge: that Gods judgements ſhall be the more vehement upon ſuch ungratefull perſons, Et terrebuntur beneficiis, the good turnes that thou haſt done to them, ſhall be a ſcourge and a terror to their conſciences. This ſenſe is not inconvenient; but it is too narrow: The Holy Ghoſt hath taken ſo large a Metaphor, as implyes more then that. It implyes the divers offices, and effects of fire; all this; That if he have any gold, any pure metall in him, this fire of this kindneſſe will purge out the droſſe, & there is a friend made. If he be nothing but ſtraw and ſtubble, combuſtible ſtill, ſtill ready to take fire againſt thee, this fire which Gods breath ſhall blow, will conſume him, and burn him out, and there is an enemy marred: If he have any tenderneſſe any way, this fire will mollifie him towards thee; Nimis durus animus, ſayes S. Auguſtine, he is a very hard hearted man, Qui ſi ultro dilectionem non vult impendere, etiam nolit rependere, Who, though he will not requite thy love, yet will not acknowledge it. If he be waxe, he melts with this fire; and if he be clay, he hardens with it, and then thou wilt arme thy ſelfe againſt that pellet. Origen. Thus much good, God intends to the enemy, in this phraſe, that it is pia vindicta ſi reſipiſcant, we have taken a bleſſed revenge upon our enemies, if our charitable applying of our ſelves to them, may bring them to apply themſelves to God, and to glorifie him: ſi benefaciendo cicuremus, ſayes S. Hierome, if we can tame a wilde beaſt by ſitting up with him, and reduce an enemy by offices of friendſhip, it is well. Aben Ezra. Levi Gherſon. much good God intends him in this phraſe, and ſo much good he intends us, that, ſi non incendant, if theſe coales do not purge him, ſi non injiciant pudorem, if they do not kindle a ſhame in him, to have offended one that hath deſerved ſo well, yet this fire gives thee light to ſee him clearely, and to run away from him, and to aſſure thee, that he, whom ſo many benefits cannot reconcile, is irreconcileable.

MAT. 9. 2.

And Ieſus ſeeing their faith, ſaid unto the ſick of the palſie, My ſon, be of good cheare, thy ſins be forgiven thee.

Diviſio. IN theſe words, and by occaſion of them, we ſhall preſent to you theſe two generall conſiderations; firſt upon what occaſion Chriſt did that which he did, and then what it was that he did. And in the firſt, we ſhall ſee firſt ſome occaſions that were remote, but yet conduce to the Miracle it ſelfe; ſome circumſtances of time, and place, and ſome ſuch diſpoſitions, and then the more immediate occaſion, the diſpoſition of thoſe perſons who preſented this ſick man to Chriſt; and there we ſhall ſee firſt, that Faith was the occaſion of all, for without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe God, and without pleaſing of God, it is impoſſible to have remiſſion of ſins. It was fides, and fides illorum, their faith, all their faith; for, though in the faith of others there be an aſſiſtance, yet without a perſonall faith in himſelfe, no man of ripe age comes ſo far, as to the forgiveneſſe of ſins; And then, this faith of them all, was fides viſa, a faith that was ſeen; Chriſt ſaw their faith, and he ſaw it as man, it was a faith expreſſed, and declared in actions: And yet, when all was done, it is but cum vidit, it is not quia vidit, Chriſt did it When he ſaw, not Becauſe he ſaw their faith, that was not the principle and primary cauſe of his mercy, for the mercy of God is all, and above all; it is the effect and it is the cauſe too, there is no cauſe of his mercy, but his mercy. And when we come in the ſecond part, to conſider what in his mercy he did, we ſhall ſee firſt, that he eſtabliſhes him, and comforts him with a gracious acceptation, with that gracious appellation, Fili, Son: He doth not diſavow him, he doth not diſinherite him; and then, he doth not wound him, whom God had ſtriken; he doth not flea him, whom God had ſcourged; he doth not ſalt him, whom God had flead; he doth not adde affliction to affliction, he doth not ſhake, but ſettle that faith which he had with more, Confide fili, My ſon be of good cheare; and then he ſeales all with that aſſurance, Dimittuntur peccata, Thy ſins are forgiven thee; In which, firſt he catechiſes this patient, and gives him all theſe leſſons, firſt that he gives before we ask, for he that was brought, they who brought him had asked nothing in his behalfe, when Chriſt unasked, enlarged himſelf towards them, Dat prius, God gives before we ask, that is firſt; And then Dat meliora, God gives better things then we ask, All that all they meant to ask, was but bodily

A dily health, and Chriſt gave him ſpirituall; and the third leſſon was, that ſin was the cauſe of bodily ſickneſſe, and that therefore he ought to have ſought his ſpirituall recovery before his bodily health: and then, after he had thus rectified him, by this Catechiſme, implyed in thoſe few words, Thy ſins are forgiven thee, he takes occaſion by this act, to rectifie the by-ſtanders too, which were the Phariſees, who did not beleeve Chriſt to be God: For, for proofe of that, firſt he takes knowledge of their inward thoughts, not expreſſed by any act or word, which none but God could doe; And then he reſtores the patient to bodily health, onely by his word, without any naturall meanes applyed, which none but God could doe neither. And into fewer particulars then theſe, this pregnant and abundant Text is not eaſily contracted.

First then to begin with the Branches of the firſt part, of which the firſt was, to conſi- 1 Part.
B der ſome, ſomewhat more remote circumſtances, and occaſions conducing to this miracle, we cannot avoid the making of ſome uſe of the Time, when it was done: It was done, when Chriſt had diſpoſſeſſed thoſe two men of furious, and raging Devils, amongſt the Gergeſens; at what time, becauſe Chriſt had been an occaſion of drowning their Mar. 8. ult.
heard of ſwine, the whole City came out to meet him, but not with a thankfull reverence, and acclamation, but their proceſſion was, to beſeech him to depart out of their coaſts: They had rather have had their Legion of Devils ſtill, then have loſt their hogs; and ſince Chriſts preſence was an occaſion of impairing their temporall ſubſtance, they were glad to be rid of him.

We need not put on ſpectacles to ſearch Maps for this Land of the Gergeſens; God knows we dwell in it; Non quærimus Ieſum propter Ieſum, (which was a Propheticall complaint by S. Auguſt.) we love the profeſſion of Chriſt only ſo far, as that profeſſion conduces to our temporall ends. We ſeek him not at the Croſſe; there moſt of his friends left
C him; but we are content to embrace him, where the Kings of the Eaſt bring him preſents of Gold, and Myrrh, and Frankincenſe, that we may participate of thoſe: we ſeek him not in the hundred and thirtieth Pſalme, where, though there be plenty, yet it is but copioſa redemtio, plentifull redemption, plenty of that that comes not yet; but in the twenty fourth Pſalm we are glad to meet him, where he proclaims Domini terra, & plenitudo ejus, The earth is the Lords, and the fulneſſe thereof, that our portion therein may be plenteous: We care not for him in S. Peters Hoſpital, where he excuſes himſelfe, Aurum & argentum non habeo, Silver and gold have I none; but in the Prophet Haggais Exchequer we doe, where he makes that claime, Aurum meum, All the gold and all the ſilver is mine. Scarce any Son is Proteſtant enough, to ſtand out a rebuke of his Father, or any Servant of his Maſter, or any Officer of his Prince, if that Father, or Maſter, or Prince would be, or would have him be a Papiſt; But, as though the different formes of Religion, were but the faſ-
D hions of the garment, and not the ſtuffe, we put on, and we put off Religion, as we would doe a Livery, to teſtifie our reſpect to him, whom we ſerve, and (miſerable Gergeſens) had rather take in that Devill againe, of which we have been diſpoſſeſſed three or fourſcore yeares ſince, then loſe another hogge, in departing with any part of our pleaſures or profits; Non quærimus Ieſum propter Ieſum, we profeſſe not Jeſus, for his, but for our owne ſakes.

But we paſſe from the circumſtance of the time, to a ſecond, that though Chriſt thus deſpiſed by the Gergeſens, did, in his Juſtice, depart from them; yet, as the Sea gaines in one place, what it loſes in another, his abundant mercy builds up more in Capernaum, then his Juſtice throwes downe amongſt the Gergeſens: Becauſe they drave him away, in Judgement he went from them, but in Mercy he went to the others, who had not intreated him to come.

E Apply this alſo; And, wretched Gergeſen, if thou have intreated Chriſt to goe from thee, for loſſe of thy hogges, that when thou haſt found the Preaching of Chriſt, or the ſting of thy conſcience whet thereby, to hinder thee in growing rich ſo haſtily as thou wouldſt, or trouble thee, in following thy pleaſures ſo fully as thou wouldſt, thou haſt made ſhift to deveſt, and put off Chriſt, and ſeare up thy conſcience, yet Chirſt comes into his Capernaum now, that ſent not for him; he comes into thy ſoule now, who came not hither to meet him, but to celebrate the day, by this ordinary, and faſhionall meeting; to thee he comes, as into Capernaum, to preach his owne Goſpell, and to work his miracles upon thee. And it is a high mercy in Chriſt, that he will thus ſurprize thy ſoule, that he will thus way-lay thy conſcience, that what collaterall reſpect ſoever ſoever brought thee hither, yet when he hath thee here, he will make thee ſee that thou art in his houſe, and he will ſpeake to thee, and he will be heard by thee, and he will be anſwered from thee; and though thou thoughteſt not of him, when thou cameſt hither, yet he will ſend thee away, full of the love of him, full of comforts from him. A

Mat 9.1. But we paſſe alſo from this, to a third circumſtance, that when he came to Capernaum, he is ſaid to have come into his own City; not Nazareth, where he was borne, but Capernaum where he dwelt, and preached, is called his own City. Thou art not a Chriſtian, becauſe thou waſt borne in a Chriſtian Kingdome, and borne within the Covenant, and borne of Chriſtian Parents, but becauſe thou haſt dwelt in the Chriſtian Church, and performed the duties preſented to thee there.

Againe, Capernaum was his owne City, but yet Chriſt went forth of Capernaum, to many other places. I take the application of this, from you, to our ſelves; Chriſt fixes no man by his example ſo to one Church, as that no occaſion may make his abſence from thence excuſable. But yet when Chriſt did goe from Capernaum, he went to doe his Fathers will, and that, which he was ſent for. Nothing but preaching the Goſpell, and edifying Gods Church, is an excuſe for ſuch an abſence; for, Væ ſi non Euangelizaverit, if he neither preach at Capernaum, nor to the Gergeſens, neither at home, nor abroad, woe be unto him: If I be at home, but to take my tithes; If I be abroad, but to take the aire, woe be unto me. B

But we muſt not ſtop long upon theſe circumſtances; we end all of this kinde, in this one, that when Chriſt had undertaken that great work of the Converſion of the world, by the Word, and Sacraments, to ſhew that the word was at that time the more powerfull meanes of thoſe two, (for Sacraments were inſtituted by Chriſt, as ſubſidiary things, in a great part, for our infirmity, who ſtand in need of ſuch viſible and ſenſible aſſiſtances) Chriſt preached the Chriſtian Doctrine, long before he inſtituted the Sacraments; But yet, though theſe two permanent Sacraments, Baptiſme, and the Supper were not ſo ſoon inſtituted, Chriſt alwayes deſcended ſo much to mans infirmity, as to accompany the preaching of the Word, with certain tranſitory, and occaſionall Sacraments; for miracles are tranſitory and occaſionall Sacraments, as they are viſible ſignes of inviſible grace, though not ſeales thereof; Chriſts purpoſe in every miracle was, that by that work, they ſhould ſee Grace to be offered unto them. Now this hiſtory, from whence this Text is taken, begins, and ends with the principall meanes, with preaching; for, as Mark 2.2. S. Mark relates it, he was in the act of preaching, when this cure was done; And in Mat.9.35. S. Matthew, after all was done, he went about the Cities, and Villages, preaching the Goſpell of the Kingdome: And then betweene, S. Matthew here, records five of his tranſitory and occaſionall Sacraments, five miracles, of which every one, well conſidered, (as the petitions of Abraham did upon God) may juſtly be thought to have gained more and more, upon his Auditory. C D

Firſt, this paralytique man in our Text, who is Sarcina ſibi, over-loaded with himſelf, he cannot ſtand under his own burden, he is cadaver animatum; It is true, he hath a ſoule, but a ſoule in a ſack, it hath no Lims, no Organs to move, this Paralytique, this living dead man, this dead and buryed man, buryed in himſelfe, is inſtantly cured, and recovered. But the Palſie was a ſudden ſickneſſe; what could he doe, upon an inveterate diſeaſe? V.20. He cured the woman that had had the bloudy iſſue twelve yeares, by onely touching the hem of his garment. V.27. After, he extends his miraculous power to two at once, he cures two blinde men. But all theſe, though not by ſuch meanes meerely, yet in nature, and in art might be poſſible, Palſies, and Iſſues, and Blindneſſes have been cured: V.24. but he went farther then ever art pretended to goe; He raiſed the Rulers Daughter to life, then when he was laughed to ſcorne, for going about to doe it. And laſtly to ſhew his Power, as over ſickneſſe, and over death, ſo over hell it ſelfe, he caſt out the Devill out of the dumb man, in ſome ſuch extraordinary manner, as that the multitude marvailed, V.33. and ſaid, It was never ſo ſeene in Iſrael. This then was his way, and this muſt be ours, and it muſt be your way too. Chriſt preached, and he wrought great works, and he preached againe; It is not enough in us to preach, and in you to heare, except both doe and practice, that which is ſaid, and heard; Neither may we, though we have done all this, give over, for every day produces new tentations, and therefore needs new aſſiſtances. And ſo we paſſe from theſe more remote, to that which is our ſecond Branch E

A of this first part, the immediate occasion of Christs doing this miracle, When Iesus saw their faith.

Here then, the occasion of all that ensued, was faith; for, without faith, it is impossible to please God; Where you may be pleased to admit some use of this note, (for it is not a meere Grammaticall curiosity to note it) that it is not said in those words of S. Paul, It is impossible to please God, or impossible to please him, (which is with relation to God, as our Translation hath it,) but it is meerely, simply, onely, impossible to please, and no more, impossible to please any worth pleasing; but if we take away our faith in God, God will take away the protection of Angels, the favour of Princes, the obedience of children, the respect of servants, the assistance of friends, the society of neighbours; God shall make us unpleasing to all; without faith it is impossible to please any, but such, as we shall repent to have made our selves pleasing companions unto. When our Savi-
B our Christ perfected the Apostles Commission, and set his last seale to it, after his Resurrection, he never modifies, never-mollifies their instructions, with any milder phrase then this, He that beleeveth not, shall be damned. It is not, that he shall be in danger of a Councell; no, nor in danger of hell fire: It is not, that it were better a Mill-stone were tyed about his neck, and he cast into the Sea: It is not, that it will goe hard with him at the last day: It is not, that it shall be easier to Tyre, and Sidon, then to him; For he is not bound to beleeve, but that Tyre, and Sidon, and he too, may doe well enough: Here is no modification, no mollification, no reservation; roundly, and irrevocably, Christ Jesus himselfe, after his Resurrection, sayes, Qui non crediderit, he that beleeveth not, shall be damned.

If the Judge must come to a sentence of condemnation, upon any person of great qua-
C lity in the Kingdome, that Judge must not say, Your Lordship must passe out of this world, nor, your Lordship must be beheaded; but he must tell them plainly, You must be carryed to the place of execution and there hanged. Christ Jesus hath given us the Commission and the sentence there; Goe into all the world, preach the Gospell to every creature; And then, the sentence followes upon those that will not receive it, He that beleeveth not, shall be damned. These men then, who prevailed so farre upon Christ, brought faith; though not an explicite faith of all those articles, which we, who from the beginning have been Catechized in all those points, are bound to have, yet a constant assurance that Christ could, and that he would relieve this distressed person, in which assurance, there was enwrapped an implicite faith even of the Messias, that could remove all occasions of sicknesse, even sin it selfe.

There was faith in the case; but in whom? Whose faith was it, that Christ had re-D spect to? To whom hath that Illorum in the Text, their faith, reference? There can be no question, but that it hath reference to those foure friends, that brought this sick man in his bed, to Christ: For, else it could not have been spoken in the plurall, and called their faith. And certainly S. Ambrose does not inconveniently make that particular an argument of Gods greatnesse and goodnesse, of his magnificence, and munificence, Magnus Dominus, qui aliorum meritis, alius ignoscit; This is the large and plentifull mercy of God, that for one mans sake, he forgives another. This Ioash acknowledged in the per-
E son of Elisha; when Elisha was sick, the King came downe to him, and wept over his face, and said, O my Father, my Father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horse men thereof. Here were all the forces of Israel mustred upon one sick bed, the whole strength of Israel consisted in the goodnesse of that one man. The Angel said to Paul, when they were in an evident and imminent danger of shipwrack, God hath given thee all them that sayle with thee; He spared them, not for their owne sakes, but for Pauls. God gave those passengers to Paul so, as he had given Paul himselfe before to Stephen; Si Stephanus non sic oraſſet, Paulum hodiè Eccleſia non haberet, sayes S. Auguſtine; If Paul had not been enwrapped in those prayers, which Stephen made for his persecutors, the Church had lost the benefit of all Pauls labours; and if God had not given Paul the lives of all those passengers in that Ship, they had all perished. For the righteousnesse of a few, (if those few could have been found) God would have spared the whole City of Sodome: And when Gods fury was kindled upon the Cities of that Country, God remembred Abraham, sayes that story, and he delivered Lot: And when he delivered Jerusalem from Sennacherib, he takes his servant David by the hand, he puts his servant David into Commission with himselfe, and he sayes, I will defend this City, and save it, for mine own sake, and

and for my ſervant Davids ſake. Quantus murus Patria vir juſtus, is a holy exclamation of S. Ambroſe, What a Wall to any Towne, what a Sea to any Iland, what a Navy to any Sea, what an Admirall to any Navy, is a good man! Apply thy ſelfe therefore, and make thy converſation with good men, and get their love, and that ſhall be an armour of proofe to thee.

When Saint Auguſtines Mother lamented the ill courſes that her ſonne tooke in his youth, ſtill that Prieſt, to whom ſhe imparted her ſorrowes, ſaid, Filius iſtarum lacrymarum, non poteſt perire; That Son, for whom ſo good a Mother hath ſhed ſo many teares, cannot periſh: He put it not upon that iſſue, filius Dei, the elect child of God, the ſon of predeſtination cannot periſh, for at that time, that name was either no name, or would ſcarce have ſeemed to have belonged to S. Auguſtine, but the child of theſe teares, of this devotion cannot be loſt. Chriſt ſaid to the Centurion, fiat ſicut credidiſti, Goe thy way, and as thou beleeveſt, ſo be it done unto thee, and his ſervant was healed in the ſelfe-ſame houre: The maſter beleeved, and the ſervant was healed. Little knoweſt thou, what thou haſt received at Gods hands, by the prayers of the Saints in heaven, that enwrap thee in their generall prayers for the Militant Church. Little knoweſt thou, what the publique prayers of the Congregation, what the private prayers of particular devout friends, that lament thy careleſneſſe, and negligence in praying for thy ſelfe, have wrung and extorted out of Gods hands, in their charitable importunity for thee. And therfore, at laſt, make thy ſelfe fit to doe for others, that which others, when thou waſt unfit to doe thy ſelfe that office, have done for thee, in aſſiſting thee with their prayers. If thou meet thine enemies Oxe, or Aſſe going aſtray, (ſayes the Law) thou ſhalt ſurely bring it back to him again: If thou ſee the Aſſe of him that hateth thee, lying under his burden, and wouldeſt forbeare to help him, thou ſhalt ſurely help him. Eſtne Deo curæ de Bobus, is the Apoſtles queſtion, Hath God care of Oxen? of other mens Oxen? How much more of his owne Sheep? And therefore if thou ſee one of his Sheep, one of thy fellow Chriſtians, ſtrayed into ſins of infirmity, and negligent of himſelfe, joyne him with thine owne ſoule, in thy prayers to God. Relieve him, (if that be that which he needs) with thy prayers for him, and relieve him, (if his wants be of another kinde) according to his prayers to thee. Cur apud te homo Collega non valeat, ſayes S. Ambroſe, why ſhould not he that is thy Colleague, thy fellow-man, as good a man, that is as much a man as thou, made of the ſame bloud, and redeemed with the ſame bloud as thou art, why ſhould not he prevaile with thee, ſo farre as to the obtaining of an almes, Cum apud Deum, ſervus, & interveniendi meritum, & jus habeat impetrandi, when ſome fellow-ſervant of thine, hath had that intereſt in God, as by his interceſſion, and prayers to advance thy ſalvation? wilt not thou ſave the life of another man that prayes to thee, when perchance thy ſoule hath been ſaved by another man, that prayed for thee?

Mat. 8. 13.

Exod. 23. 4, 5.

Well then; Chriſt had reſpect to their faith, that brought this ſick man to him. Conſuetudo eſt miſerecordis Dei, It is Gods ordinary way, (ſayes S. Chryſoſt.) hunc honorem dare ſervis ſuis, ut propter eos ſalventur & alii, to afford this honour to his ſervants, that for their ſakes he ſaves others. But neither this which we ſay now out of S. Chryſoſtome, nor that which we ſaid before out of S. Ambroſe, nor all that we might multiply out of the other Fathers, doth exclude the faith of that particular man, who is to be ſaved. It is true, that in this particular caſe, S. Hierome ſayes, Non vidit fidem ejus qui offerebatur, ſed eorum qui offerebant, That Chriſt did not reſpect his faith that was brought, but onely theirs that brought him; but except S. Hierome be to be underſtood ſo, that Chriſt did not firſt reſpect his faith, but theirs, we muſt depart from him, to S. Chryſoſtome, Neq; enim ſe portari ſuſtinuiſſet, He would neither have put himſelfe, nor them, to ſo many difficulties, as he did, if he had not had a faith, that is, a conſtant aſſurance in this meanes of his recovery. And therefore the Rule may be beſt given thus; That God gives worldly bleſſings, bodily health, deliverance from dangers, and the like, to ſome men, in contemplation of others, though themſelves never thought of it, all the examples which we have touched upon, convince abundantly.

Ejus.

That God gives ſpirituall bleſſings to Infants, preſented according to his Ordinance, in Baptiſme, in Contemplation of the faith of their Parents, or of the Church, or of their ſureties, without any actuall faith in the Infant, is probable enough, credible enough. But take it as our caſe is, de adultis, in a man who is come to the uſe of his own reaſon, and diſcretion, ſo God never ſaves any man, for the faith of another, otherwiſe then thus, that

A that the faithfull man may pray for the converſion of an unfaithfull, who does not know, nor, if he did, would be content to be prayed for, and God, for his ſake that prayes, may be pleaſed to work upon the other; but before that man comes to the Dimittuntur peccata, that his ſinnes are forgiven, that man comes to have faith in himſelfe. Iuſtus in fide ſua vivit; there is no life without faith, nor In fide aliena, no ſuch life as conſtitutes Righteouſneſſe, without a perſonall faith of our owne. So that this fides illorum, in our Text, this that is called their faith, hath reference to the ſick man himſelfe, as well as to them that brought him. Habak. 2. 4.

And then, in Him, and in Them, it was fides viſa, faith, which, by an ouverract, was declared, and made evident. For, Chriſt, who was now to convay into that company the knowledge that he was the Meſſias, which Meſſias was to be God, and Man, as afterwards for their conviction, who would not beleeve him to be God, he ſhewed that B he knew their inward thoughts, and did ſome other things, which none but God could doe; ſo here, for the better edification of men, he required ſuch a faith, as might be evident to men. For, though Chriſt could have ſeene their faith, by looking into their hearts, yet to think, that here he ſaw it by that power of his Divinity, nimis coactum videtur, It is too narrow, and too forced an interpretation of the place, ſayes Calvin. They then, that is, all they declared their faith, their aſſurance, that Chriſt could, and would help him. It was good evidence of a ſtrength of faith in him, that in a diſeaſe, very little capable of cure, then when he had ſo farre reſolved, and ſlackned his ſinewes, that he could endure no poſture but his bed, he ſuffered himſelfe to be put to ſo many incommodities. It was good evidence of a ſtrength of faith in them, that they could beleeve that Chriſt would not reject them for that importunity of troubling him, and the congregation, in the midſt of a Sermon; That when they ſaw, that they who came onely to heare, could C not get neare the doore, they ſhould thinke to get in, with that load, that offenſive ſpectacle; That they ſhould ever conceive, or goe about to execute, or be ſuffered to execute ſuch a plot, as without the leave of Chriſt, (if Chriſt preached this Sermon in his owne houſe, as ſome take it to have been done) or without the Maſters leave, in whoſe houſe ſoever it was, they ſhould firſt untile or open, and then break through the floore, and ſo let downe, their miſerable burden: That they ſhould have an apprehenſion, that it was not fit for them to ſtay, till the Sermon were done, and the company parted, but that it was likelieſt to conduce to the glory of God, that Preaching, and working might goe together, this was evidence, this was argument of ſtrength of faith in them. Take therefore their example, not to defer that aſſiſtance, which thou art able to give to another. Ne dicas aſſiſtam cras, ſayes S. Gregory, doe not ſay, I will help thee to morrow; Ne quid inter propoſitum, & beneficium intercedat; Perchance that poore ſoule may not need D thee to morrow, perchance thou maiſt have nothing to give to morrow, perchance there ſhall be no ſuch day, as to morrow, and ſo thou haſt loſt that opportunity of thy charity, which God offered thee, to day: Vnica beneficentia eſt, quæ moram non admittit, onely that is charity, that is given preſently.

But yet, when all was done, when there was faith, and faith in them all, and faith declared in their outward works, yet Chriſt is not ſaid to have done this miracle, quia fides, but cum fides, not Becauſe he ſaw, but onely When he ſaw their faith. Let us transferre none of that, which belongs to God, to our ſelves: when we doe our duties, (but when doe we goe about to begin to doe any part of any of them?) we are unprofitable ſervants: When God does work in us, are we ſaved by that work, as by the cauſe, when there is another cauſe of the work it ſelfe? When the ground brings forth good corne, yet that ground becomes not fit for our food: When a man hath brought forth good E fruits, yet that man is not thereby made worthy of heaven. Not faith it ſelfe (and yet faith is of ſomewhat a deeper dye, and tincture, then any works) is any ſuch cauſe of our ſalvation. A beggars beleeving that I will give him an almes, is no cauſe of my charity: My beleeving that Chriſt will have mercy upon me, is no cauſe of Chriſts mercy; for what proportion hath my temporary faith, with my everlaſting ſalvation? But yet, though it work not as a cauſe, though it be not quia vidit, becauſe he ſaw it, yet cum videt, when Chriſt findes this faith, according to that gracious Covenant, and Contract which he hath made with us, that whereſoever, and whenſoever he findes faith, he will enlarge his mercy, finding that in this patient, he expreſſed his mercy, in that which conſtitutes our ſecond part, Fili confide, my ſon be of good cheare, thy ſins are forgiven thee.

Viſa.

2 Part.

Where we ſee firſt, our Saviour Chriſt opening the bowels of compaſſion to him, and receiving him ſo, as if he had iſſued out of his bowels, and from his loynes, in that gracious appellation, Fili, my Son. He does not call him brother; for greater enmity can be no where, then is often expreſſed to have beene betweene brethren; for in that degree, and diſtance, enmity amongſt men began in Cain, and Abel, and was purſued in many paires of brethren after, in Sacred and in ſecular ſtory. Hee does not call him friend; that name, even in Chriſts owne mouth, is not alwaies accompanied with good entertainment: Amice, quomodo intraſti, ſaies he, Friend, how came you in? and he bound him hand and foote, and caſt him into outer darkneſſe. He does not call him ſon of Abraham, which might give him an intereſt in all the promiſes, but he gives him a preſent Adoption, and ſo a preſent fruition of all, Fili, my Son. His Son, and not his Son in law; he loads him not with the encumbrances, and halfe-impoſſibilities of the Law, but he ſeales to him the whole Goſpell, in the remiſſion of ſinnes. His Son, and not his diſ-inherited ſon, as the Jewes were, but his Son, upon whom he ſetled his ancient Inheritance, his eternall election, and his new purchaſe, which he came now into the world to make with his blood. His Son, and not his prodigall ſon, to whom Chriſt impures no waſtfulneſſe of his former graces, but gives him a generall releaſe, and Quietus eſt, in the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes. All that Chriſt asks of his Sons, is, Fili damihi cor, My Son give me thy heart; and till God give us that, we cannot give it him; and therefore in this Son he creates a new heart, he infuſes a new courage, he eſtabliſhes a new confidence, in the next word, Fili confide, My Son be of good cheere.

Mat. 22. 12.

Confide.

Mat. 15. 22.

Chriſt then does not ſtay ſo long wraſtling with this mans faith, and ſhaking it, and trying whether it were faſt rooted, as he did with that Woman in the Goſpell, who came after him, in her daughters behalfe, crying, Have mercy upon me O Lord, thou Son of David, for Chriſt gave not that woman one word; when her importunity made his Diſciples ſpeake to him, he ſaid no more, but that he was not ſent to ſuch as ſhe; This was far, very far from a Confide filia, Daughter be of good cheere: But yet, this put her not off, but (as it followes) She followed, and worſhipped him, and ſaid, O Lord helpe me: And all this prevailed no farther with him, but to give ſuch an anſwer, as was more diſcomfortable, then a ſilence, It is not fit to take the childrens bread, and caſt it unto dogs. She denies not that, ſhe contradicts him not; ſhe ſaies, Truth Lord, It is not fit to take the childrens bread, and to caſt it unto dogs, and Truth Lord, I am one of thoſe dogs; but yet ſhe perſevers in her holy importunity, and in her good ill-manners, and ſaies, Yet the Dogs eate of the crums which fall from the Maſters table: And then, and not till then comes Jeſus to that, O Woman, great is thy faith, be it unto thee, even as thou wilt; and her Daughter was healed. But all this, at laſt, was but a bodily reſtitution, here was no Dimittuntur peccata in the caſe, no declaration of forgiveneſſe of ſinnes: But with this man in our Text, Chriſt goes farther, and comes ſooner to an end; He exerciſes him with no diſputation, he leaves no roome for any diffidence, but at firſt word eſtabliſhes him, and then builds upon him. Now beloved, which way ſoever of theſe two God have taken with thee, whether the longer, or the ſhorter way, bleſſe thou the Lord, praiſe him, and magnifie him for that. If God have ſetled and ſtrengthned thy faith early, early in thy youth heretofore, early at the beginning of a Sermon now, A day is as a thouſand yeares with God, a minute is as ſixe thouſand yeares with God, that which God hath not done upon the Nations, upon the Gentiles, in ſix thouſand yeares, never ſince the Creation, which is, to reduce them to the knowlege, and application of the Meſſias, Chriſt Jeſus, that he hath done upon thee, in an inſtant. If he have carried thee about the longer way, if he have expoſed thee to ſcruples, and perplexities, and ſtormes in thine underſtanding, or conſcience, yet in the midſt of the tempeſt, the ſoft ayre, that he is ſaid to come in, ſhall breath into thee; in the midſt of thoſe clouds, his Son ſhall ſhine upon thee; In the midſt of that flood he ſhall put out his Rainbow, his ſeale that thou ſhalt not drowne, his Sacrament of faire weather to come, and as it was to the Thiefe, thy Croſſe ſhall be thine Altar, and thy Faith ſhall be thy Sacrifice. Whether he accompliſh his worke upon thee ſoone or late, he ſhall never leave thee all the way, without this Confide fili, a holy confidence, that thou art his, which ſhall carry thee to the Dimittuntur peccata, to the peace of conſcience, in the remiſſion of ſins.

In which two words, we noted unto you, that Chriſt hath inſtituted a Catechiſme, an Inſtruction for this new Convertite, and adopted Son of his; in which, the firſt leſſon that

A that is therein implyed, is, Antequam rogetur, That God is more forward to give, then man to aske: It is not said that the sick man, or his company in his behalfe, said any thing to Christ, but Christ speakes first to them, If God have touched thee here, didst thou aske that at his hands? Didst thou pray before thou camest hither, that he would touch thy heart here? perchance thou didst: But when thou wast brought to thy Baptisme, didst thou ask any thing at Gods hands then? But those that brought thee, that presented thee, did; They did in thy Baptisme; but at thine election, then when God writing downe the names of all the Elect, in the book of Life, how camest thou in? who brought thee in then? Didst thou aske any thing at Gods hands then, when thou thy selfe wast not at all? Antequam rogetur.

Dat prius, that's the first lesson in this Catechisme, God gives before we aske, and then Dat meliora rogatis, God gives better things, then we aske; They intended to aske Meliora.
B but bodily health, and Christ gave spirituall, he gave Remission of sinnes. And what gain'd he by that? why, Beati quorum remissa iniquitates, Blessed are they, whose sinnes are forgiven. But what is Blessednesse? Any more then a confident expectation of a good state in the next world? Yes; Blessednesse includes all that can be asked or conceived in the next world, and in this too. Christ in his Sermon of blessednesse, saies first, Blessed are they, for theirs is the Kingdome of Heaven; and after, Blessed are they, for they shall inherit the earth; Againe, Blessed, for they shall obtaine mercy; and, Blessed for they shall be filled: Remission of sins is blessednesse, and as Godlinesse hath the promise of this world, and the next, so blessednesse hath the performance of both: He that hath peace in the remission of sinnes, is blessed already, and shall have those blessings infinitely multiplied in the world to come. The farthest that Christ goes in the expressing of the affections of a naturall Father here, is, That if his Son aske bread, he will not give him a stone; and if Mat. 5. 3. & 5.
C he aske a Fish, he will not give him a Scorpion; He will not give him worse then he ask'd; But it is the peculiar bounty of this Father, who adopted this Sonne, to give more, and better, spirituall for temporall. Luk. 11. 12.

Another lesson, which Christ was pleased to propose to this new Convertite, in this Catechisme, was, to informe him, That sins were the true causes of all bodily diseases. Diseases and bodily afflictions are sometimes inflicted by God Ad pœnam, non ad purgationem, Not to purge or purifie the soule of that man, by that affliction, but to bring him by the rack to the gallowes, through temporary afflictions here, to everlasting torments hereafter; As Iudas his hanging, and Herods being eaten with wormes, was their entrance into that place, where they are yet. Sometimes diseases and afflictions are inflicted Acts 12.
onely, or principally to manifest the glory of God, in the removing thereof; So Christ saies of that man, that was borne blinde, that neither he himselfe had sinned, nor bore John 9.
D the sinnes of his parents, but he was borne blinde to present an occasion of doing a miracle. Sometimes they are inflicted Ad humiliationem, for our future humiliation; So S. Paul saies of himselfe, That least he should be exalted above measure, by the abundance of 2 Cor. 12. 7.
Revelations, he had that Stimulum carnis, That vexation of the flesh, that messenger of Satan, to humble him. And then, sometimes they are inflicted for tryall, and farther declaration of your conformity to Gods will, as upon Iob. But howsoever there be divers particular causes, for the diseases and afflictions of particular men, the first cause of death, and sicknesse, and all infirmities upon mankinde in generall, was sin; and it would not be hard for every particular man, almost, to finde it in his owne case too, to assigne his fever to such a surfet, or his consumption to such an intemperance. And therefore to breake that circle, in which we compasse, and immure, and impriſon our selves, That as sinne begot diseases, so diseases begot more sinnes, impatience and murmuring at Gods cor-E rections, Christ begins to shake this circle, in the right way to breake it, in the right linke, that is, first to remove the sin, which occasioned the disease; for, till that be done, a man is in no better case, then, (as the Prophet expresses it) If he should flie from a Lion, and a Amos 5. 19.
Beare met him, or if he should leane upon a wall, and a Serpent bit him. What ease were it, to be delivered of a palsie, of slack and dissolv'd sinews, and remaine under the tyranny of a lustfull heart, of licentious eyes, of slacke and dissolute speech and conversation? What ease to be delivered of the putrefaction of a wound in my body, and meet a murder in my conscience, done, or intended, or desired upon my neighbour? To be delivered of a fever in my spirits, and to have my spirit troubled with the guiltinesse of an adultery? To be delivered of Cramps, and Coliques, and Convulsions in my joynts and sinewes, and suffer in my soule all these, from my oppressions, and extortions, by which I have ground the face of the poore. It is but lost labour, and cost, to give a man a precious cordiall, when he hath a thorne in his foote, or an arrow in his flesh; for, as long as the sinne, which is the cause of the sicknesse, remaines, Deterius sequetur, A worse thing will follow; we may be rid of a Fever, and the Pestilence will follow, rid of the Cramp, and a Gout will follow, rid of sicknesse, and Death, eternall death will follow. That which our Saviour prescribes is, Noli peccare amplius, sinne no more; first, non amplius, sinne no more sins, take heed of gravid sins, of pregnant sinnes, of sins of concomitance, and concatenation, that chaine and induce more sins after, as Davids idlenesse did adultery, and that murder, & the losse of the Lords Army, and Honor, in the blaspheming of his name, Noli amplius, sin no more, no such sin as induces more; And Noli amplius, sinne no more, that is, sin thy owne sin, thy beloved sin, no more times over; And still Noli amplius, sin not that sin which thou hast given over in thy practise, in thy memory, by a sinfull delight in remembring it; And againe, Noli amplius, sin not over thy former sins, by holding in thy possession, such things as were corruptly gotten, by any such former practises: for, Deterius sequetur, a worse thing will follow, A Tertian will be a Quartan, and a Quartan a Hectique, and a Hectique a Consumption, and a Consumption without a consummation, that shall never consume it selfe, nor consume thee to an unsensiblenesse of torment. A B

And then after these three lessons in this Catechisme, That God gives before we aske, That he gives better then we aske, That he informes us in the true cause of sicknesse, sinne, He involves a tacit, nay he expresses an expresse rebuke, and increpation, and in beginning at the Dimittuntur peccata, at the forgivenesse of sinnes, tels him in his eare, that his spirituall health should have beene prefer'd before his bodily, and the cure of his soule before his Palsie; that first the Priest should have beene, and then the Physitian might bee consulted. That which Christ does to his new adopted Sonne here, the Wiseman saies to his Son, My Son, in thy sicknesse be not negligent; But wherein is his diligence required, or to be expressed? in that, which followes, Pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole; But upon what conditions, or what preparations? Leave off from sin, order thy hands aright, and cleanse thy heart from all wickednesse. Is this all? needs there no declaration, no testimony of this? Yes, Give a sweet savour, and a memoriall of fine floure, and make a fat offering, as not beeing; that is, as though thou were dead: Give, and give that which thou givest in thy life time, as not beeing. And when all this is piously, and religiously done, thou hast repented, restor'd, amended, and given to pious uses, Then, saies he there, give place to the Physitian, for the Lord hath created him. For if we proceed otherwise, if wee begin with the Physitian, Physick is a curse; He that sinneth before his Maker, let him fall into the hands of the Physitian, saies the Wiseman there: It is not, Let him come into the hands of the Physitian, as though that were a curse, but let him fall, let him cast and throw himselfe into his hands, and rely upon naturall meanes, and leave out all consideration of his other, and worse disease, and the supernaturall Physick for that. Asa had had a great deliverance from God, when the Prophet Hanani asked him, Were not the Ethiopians, and the Lubins a huge Host? but because after this deliverance, he relied upon the King of Syria, and not upon God, the Judgement is, From henceforth thou shalt have wars: That was a sicknesse upon the State, & then he fell sick in his own person, and in that sicknesse, saies that story, He sought not to the Lord, but to the Physitian, and then he dyed. To the Lord and then to the Physitian had beene the right way; If to the Physitian and then to the Lord, though this had beene out of the right way, yet hee might have returned to it: But it was to the Physitian, and not to the Lord, and then he died. Omnipotenti medico nullus languor insanabilis, saies S. Ambrose, there is but one Almighty; and none but the Almighty can cure all diseases, because hee onely can cure diseases in the roote, that is, in the forgivenesse of sins. 2. Chron. 16.

Scribe & Pharisei.

We are almost at an end; when we had thus Catechised his Convertite, thus rectified his patient, hee turnes upon them, who beheld all this, and were scandaliz'd with his words, the Scribes and Pharisees; And because they were scandaliz'd onely in this, that he being but man, undertooke the office of God, to forgive sins, he declares himselfe to them, to be God. Christ would not leave, even malice it selfe unsatisfied; And therefore do not thou thinke thy selfe Christian enough, for having an innocence in thy selfe, but be content to descend to the infirmities, and to the very malice of other men, and to give

the

A the world ſatisfaction; Nec paratum habeas illud è trivio, (ſayes S. Hicrome) do not arm thy ſelf with that vulgar, and triviall ſaying, Sufficit mihi conſcientia mea, nec curo quid loquantur homines, It ſuffices me, that mine own conſcience is cleare, and I care not what all the world ſayes; thou muſt care what the world ſayes, and thinks; Chriſt himſelf had that reſpect even towards the Scribes, and Phariſees. For, firſt he declared himſelf to be God, in that he took knowledge of their thoughts; for they had ſaid nothing, and he ſayes to them, why reaſon you thus in your hearts? and they themſelves did not, could not deny, but that thoſe words of Solomon appertained only to God, Thou only knoweſt the hearts of the children of men, And thoſe of Ieremy, The heart is deceitfull above all things, and deſperately wicked, who can know it? I the Lord ſearch the heart, and I try the reines. Let the Schoole diſpute infinitely, (for he that will not content himſelf with means of ſalvation, till all Schoole points be reconciled, will come too late) let Scotus and his B Heard think, That Angels, and ſeparate ſoules have a naturall power to underſtand thoughts, though God for his particular glory reſtraine the exerciſe of that power in them, (as in the Romane Church, Prieſts have a power to forgive all ſins, though the Pope reſtraine that power in reſerved caſes; And the Cardinals by their Creation, have a voice in the Conſiſtory, but that the Pope for a certain time inhibites them to give voice) And let Aquinas preſent his arguments to the contrary, That thoſe ſpirits have no naturall power to know thoughts; we ſeek no farther, but that Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe thought it argument enough to convince the Scribes and Phariſees, and prove himſelfe God, by knowing their thoughts. Eadem Majeſtate & potentia, ſayes S. Hicrome, Since you ſee I proceed as God, in knowing your thoughts, why beleeve you not, that I may forgive his ſins as God too?

2 Chron. 6. 30. Jer. 17. 9.

And then, in the laſt act he joynes both together; he ſatisfies the patient, and he ſatisfies the beholders too: he gives him his firſt deſire, bodily health; He bids him take up his bed and walk, and he doth it; and he ſhewes them that he is God, by doing that, which (as it appears in the Story) was harder in their opinion, then remiſſion of ſins, which was, to cure and recover a diſeaſed man, only by his word, without any naturall, or ſecond means. And therefore ſince all the world ſhakes in a palſie of wars, and rumors of wars, ſince we are ſure, that Chriſts Vicar in this caſe will come to his Dimittuntur peccata, to ſend his Buls, and Indulgences, and Crociatars for the maintenance of his part, in that cauſe, let us alſo, who are to do the duties of private men, to obey and not to direct, by preſenting our diſeaſed and paralytique ſouls to Chriſt Jeſus, now, when he in the Miniſtery of his unworthieſt ſervant is preaching unto you, by untiling the houſe, by removing all diſguiſes, and palliations of our former ſins, by true confeſſion, and hearty deteſtation, let us endeavour to bring him to his Dimittuntur peccata, to forD give us all thoſe ſins, which are the true cauſes of all our palſies, and ſlackneſſes in his ſervice; and ſo, without limiting him, or his great Vicegerents, and Lieutenants, the way, or the time to beg of him, that he will imprint in them, ſuch counſels and ſuch reſolutions, as his wiſdome knows beſt to conduce to his glory, and the maintenance of his Goſpell. Amen.

SERMON XII.
Preached upon Candlemas day.

MAT. 5. 2.

Bleſſed are the pure in heart, for they ſhall ſee God.

THE Church, which is the Daughter of God, and Spouſe of Chriſt, celebrates this day, the Purification of the bleſſed Virgin, the Mother of God: And ſhe celebrates this day by the name, vulgarly, of Candlemas day. It is dies luminarium, the day of lights; The Church took the occaſion of doing ſo, from the Gentiles; At this time of the yeare, about the beginning of February, they celebrated the feaſt of Februus, which is their Pluto; And, becauſe that was the God of darkneſſe, they ſolemnized it, with a multiplicity of Lights. The Church of God, in the outward and ceremoniall part of his worſhip, did not diſdain the ceremonies of the Gentiles; Men who are ſo ſevere, as to condemne, and to remove from the Church, whatſoever was in uſe amongſt the Gentiles before, may, before they are aware, become Surveyors, and Controllers upon Chriſt himſelf, in the inſtitution of his greateſt ſeales: for Baptiſme, which is the Sacrament of purification by waſhing in water, and the very Sacrament of the Supper it ſelf, religious eating, and drinking in the Temple, were in uſe amongſt the Gentiles too. It is a perverſe way, rather to aboliſh Things and Names, (for vehement zeale will work upon Names as well as Things) becauſe they have been abuſed, then to reduce them to their right uſe. We dealt in the reformation of Religion, as Chriſt did in the inſtitution thereof; He found ceremonies amongſt the Gentiles, and he took them in, not becauſe he found them there, but becauſe the Gentiles had received them from the Jews, as they had their waſhings, and their religious meetings to eat and drink in the Temple, from the Jews Paſſeover. Chriſt borrowed nothing of the Gentiles, but he took his own where he found it: Thoſe ceremonies, which himſelf had inſtituted in the firſt Church of the Jews, and the Gentiles had purloined, and prophaned, and corrupted after, he returned to a good uſe againe. And ſo did we in the Reformation, in ſome ceremonies which had been of uſe in the Primitive Church, and depraved and corrupted in the Romane. For the ſolemnizing of this Day, Candlemas-day, when the Church did admit Candles into the Church, as the Gentiles did, it was not upon the reaſon of the Gentiles, who worſhipped therein the God of darkneſſe, Februus, Pluto; but becauſe he who was the light of the world, was this day preſented and brought into the Temple, the Church admitted lights. The Church would ſignifie, that as we are to walk in the light, ſo we are to receive our light from the Church, and to receive Chriſt, and our knowledge of him, ſo as Chriſt hath notified himſelf to us. So it is a day of purification to us, and a day of lights, and ſo our Text fits the Day, Bleſſed are the pure in heart, for they ſhall ſee God.

Diviſio. In theſe words we ſhall conſider firſt, Qui ſint, who they are, that are brought into conſideration, that are put into the balance, and they are munds corde, ſuch as are pure of heart; And ſecondly, Quid ſint, what they come to be, and it is Beati, bleſſed are the pure in heart; And laſtly, Vnde, from whence this bleſſednesſe accrews and ariſes unto them, and in what it conſiſts, and that is, Videbunt Deum, bleſſed are the pure in heart, for they ſhall ſee God. Ask me wherein theſe men differ from other men, and it is in this main difference, Mundi corde, that whereas every imagination of the thought of mans heart, is only evill continually, Gen. 6. 5. They are pure of heart. Ask me what they get by that, They get this main purchaſe, Beati, That which all the books of all the Philoſophers could never teach them ſo much as what it was, that is true Bleſſednesſe; That their pocket book, their Manuall, their boſome book, their conſcience, doth not only ſhew them, but give them, not only declare it to them, but poſſeſſe them of it. Ask me how long this Bleſſednesſe ſhall laſt,

A last, because all those Blessednesses which Philosophers have imagined, as honour, and health, and profit, and pleasure, and the like, have evaporated and vanished away, this shall last for ever; Videbunt Deum, they shall see God, and they shall no more see an end of their seeing God, then an end of his being God: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

These then are our three parts; first the Price, mundities cordis, cleanness, and cleanness of heart; Secondly, the Purchase, Beati, Blessedness, and present possession of blessedness, Blessed are they; And then thirdly, the Habendum, the term, Everlastingness, because it consists in the enjoying of him who is everlasting, They shall see God. These arise out of the Text; but from whence arises the Text it selfe? The Text it self is a piece of a Sermon, of that blessed Sermon of our Saviours, which is called the Sermon of Beatitudes. So that we shall make it a part apart, to consider the Sermon from
B which this Text is taken, before we dilate the Text it self into a Sermon: for there will arise some usefull observations, out of these three doubts, first Quæ concio, what this Sermon it self was; and then Quibus, to what Auditory it was preached; And lastly, Quomodo, in what manner Christ preached this Sermon: And these three, the Sermon, the Auditory, the disposition of the Preacher, will also be three branches of this, which we shall make our first part, before we come to the other three of the Text it self.

1 Part. First then, there is this doubt made of this Sermon altogether, whether this Sermon which S. Matthew records here, be the same Sermon which S. Luke mentions in his sixth Chapter, or whether they were preached at severall times; The greater part of the ancients (but yet not all) take them to be severall Sermons; The greater part of the later men (and yet not all neither) take them to be but one and the same Sermon. If it be so,
C if both be but one Sermon, this may be justly considered, that since S. Luke remembers but a few passages, and a few parts of that Sermon, in respect of S. Matthew, (for S. Matthews relation is large and particular, and S. Lukes more briefe and summary) they that come to heare Sermons, and would make benefit by them, by a subsequent meditation, must not think themselves frustrated of their purposes, if they do not understand all, or not remember all the Sermon. Scarce any Sermon is so preached, or so intended, as that all works upon all, or all belongs unto all. The Lord and his Spirit puts into the Preachers mouth, a judgement against oppression, against extortion, against usury, and he utters that judgement. But perchance thou hast no lands to rack tenants, no office to grinde suitors, no mony to devoure a debtor by usury, and so that passage of the Sermon, bent against oppression, or extortion, or usury, concernes not thee, affects not thee. But next to thee there may sit an oppressor, or extortioner, or usurer, and he needed that, and
D by Gods grace receives benefit by that, which found nothing to work upon in thee. And then thy turn comes after, and God speaks to thy soul, in a discovery of those sins to which thou art enclined; and then he gives thy neighbour (who was pinched, and brought to a remorse before) that refreshing which thou hadst before, that is, a thankfull acknowledgement, that though he be subject to other sins, yet God hath preserved him from that particular.

God directs the tongue of his Ministers, as he doth his showres of rain: They fall upon the face of a large compasse of earth, when as all that earth did not need that rain. The whole Congregation is, oftentimes, in common entendment, conformable, and well setled in all matters of Doctrine, and all matters of Discipline. And yet God directs us sometimes to extend our discourse (perchance with a zeale and a vehemence, which may seem unnecessary, and impertinent, because all in the Church are presumed to be of one minde) in the proofe of our doctrine against Papists, or of our discipline against Non-E conformitans. For, Gods eye sees, in what seat there sits, or in what corner there stands some one man that wavers in matters of Doctrine, and enclines to hearken after a Seducer, a Jesuit, or a Semi-Jesuit, a practising Papist, or a Sesqui-Jesuit, a Jesuited Lady; And Gods eye sees in what seat there sits, or in what corner there stands some weak soul that is scandalized, with some Ceremony, or part of our Discipline, and in danger of falling from the unity of the Church: And for the refreshing of that one span of ground, God lets fall a whole showre of rain; for the rectifying of that one soul, God poures out the Meditations of the Preacher, into such a subject, as perchance doth little concern the rest of the Congregation. S. Matthew relates Christs Sermon at large, and S. Luke but briefly, and yet S. Luke remembers some things that S. Matthew had left out. If thou thou remember not all that was preſented to thy faith, all the Citations of places of Scriptures, nor all that was preſented to thy reaſon, all the deducements, and inferences of the Schooles, nor all that was preſented to thy ſpirituall delight, all the ſentences of ornament produced out of the Fathers, yet if thou remember that which concerned thy ſin, and thy ſoul, if thou meditate upon that, apply that, thou haſt brought away all the Sermon, all that was intended by the Holy Ghoſt to be preached to thee. And if thou have done ſo, as at a donative at a Coronation, or other ſolemnity, when mony is throwne among the people, though thou light but upon one ſhilling of that money, thou canſt not think that all the reſt is loſt, but that ſome others are the richer for it, though thou beeſt not; ſo if thou remember, or apply, or underſtand but one part of the Sermon, doe not think all the reſt to have been idly, or unneceſſarily, or impertinently ſpoken, for thou broughteſt a feaver, and haſt had thy Julips, another brought a fainting, and a diffident ſpirit, and muſt have his Cordials. A

Thus then, if S. Lukes Sermon be the ſame that S. Matthews was, we ſee by S. Lukes manner of repeating it, That a Sermon may be well remembred, and well applyed, though all the parts thereof be not ſo. And then, if theſe were divers Sermons, and ſo preached by Chriſt, at ſeverall times, there ariſes alſo this conſideration, That Chriſt did not, and therefore we need not forbeare to preach the ſame particular Doctrines, or to handle the ſame particular points, which we, or others, in that place, have handled before: A preachers end is not a gathering of fame to himſelfe, but a gathering of ſoules to God; and his way is not novelty, but edification. If we conſider the Sermon in Saint Matthew, and the Sermon in S. Luke, the purpoſe and the ſcope of both, the matter and the forme of both, the body and the parts of both, the phraſe and the language of both, is for the moſt part the ſame, and yet Chriſt forbore not to preach it twice. B

This excuſes no mans ignorance, that is not able to preach ſeaſonably, and to break, and diſtribute the bread of life according to the emergent neceſſities of that Congregation, at that time; Nor it excuſes no mans lazineſſe, that will not employ his whole time upon his calling; Nor any mans vain-glory, and oſtentation, who having made a Pye of Plums, without meat, offers it to ſale in every Market, and having made an Oration of Flowres, and Figures, and Phraſes without ſtrength, ſings it over in every Pulpit: It excuſes no mans ignorance, nor lazineſſe, nor vain-glory, but yet it reproaches their itching and curious eares, to whom any repetition of the ſame things is irkſome and faſtidious. You may have heard an anſwer of an Epigrammatiſt applyable to this purpoſe; When he read his Epigrams in an Auditory, one of the hearers ſtopped him, and ſaid, Did not I heare an Epigram to this purpoſe from you, laſt yeare? Yes, ſayes he, it is like you did; but is not that vice ſtill in you this yeare, which laſt yeares Epigram reprehended? If your curioſity bring you to ſay to any Preacher, Did not I heare this Point thus handled in your Sermon, laſt yeare? Yes, muſt he ſay, and ſo you muſt next yeare againe, till it appeare in your amendment, that you did heare it. The Devill maintaines a Warre good cheap, if he may fight with the ſame ſword, and we may not defend with the ſame buckler; If he can tempt a Son with his Fathers covetouſneſſe, and a Daughter with her Mothers wantonneſſe, if he need not vary the ſin, nor the tentation, muſt wee vary our Doctrine? This is indeed to put new Wine into old veſſels, new Doctrine into eares, and hearts not diſburdened of old ſins. We ſay, as the Spouſe ſayes, Vetera & nova, we prepare old and new, all that may any way ſerve your holy taſte, and conduce to your ſpirituall nouriſhment; And he is not a Preacher ſufficiently learned, that muſt of neceſſity preach the ſame things againe, but he is not a Preacher ſufficiently diſcreet neither, that forbeares any thing therefore, becauſe himſelfe, or another in that place, hath handled that before. Chriſt himſelfe varied his Sermon very little, if this in S. Matthew, and that in S. Luke, were divers Sermons. C D E

Quibus.

The ſecond doubt which is made about this Sermon, and which miniſters to us occaſion of another kinde of obſervations, is the Auditory, to whom Chriſt preached this Sermon. For firſt, as this Euangeliſt reports it, it ſeemes to have been Concio ad Clerum, a Sermon Preached to them who had taken Degrees in Chriſts Schoole, and followed him, and not ad populum, to the promiſcuous, and vulgar people; for he ſayes, That Chriſt ſeeing the multitude, went up into a mountaine, and thither his Diſciples came, and to them he Preached. And then, as S. Luke reports, though the Sermon ſeeme principally to be directed to the Diſciples, yet it was in the preſence and hearing of all; for he ſayes,

V. 1.

Chriſt

A Christ came downe, and stood in the plaine, and a great multitude of people about him. Both must be done; we must preach in the Mountaine, and preach in the plaine too; preach to the learned, and preach to the simple too; preach to the Court, and preach to the Country too. Onely when we preach in the mountaine, they in the plaine must not calumniate us, and say, This man goes up to Jerusalem, he will be heard by none but Princes, and great persons, as though it were out of affectation, and not in discharge of our duty, that we doe preach there: And when we preach on the plaine, they of the mountaine must not say, This man may serve for a meane Auditory, for a simple Congregation, for a Country Church, as though the fitting of our selves to the capacity, and the edification of such persons, were out of ignorance, or lazinesse, and not a performance of our duties, as well as the other. Christ preached on the mountaine, and he preached in the plaine; he hath his Church in both; and they that preach in both, B or either, for his glory, and not their owne vain-glory, have his Example for their Action. Luke 6.17.

To make the like use of the other difficulty, arising out of the severall relation of this Sermon, which is Quomodo, in what manner, in what position of body Christ preached this Sermon, by this Euangelist it seemes that Christ preached fitting, and by the other, that he preached standing. Now, for the most part, Christ did preach fitting. When he preached in the Synagogue of Nazareth, and took that Text, out of Esay, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, &c. He stood up to reade, (sayes the story) and then he closed the Booke, and sate downe to preach. So also when he came downe from the Mount of Olives into the Temple, he sate downe there and taught them. And so Christ himselfe professes, that it was his ordinary custome to doe; For, when they came to apprehend him, he said, Are ye come out, as against a Thiefe? I sate daily with you, teaching in the Temple, and ye laid no hold on me. And according to this custome of his, they who came to great C place, and dignity in the Church, did ordinarily preach fitting too; and therefore their Churches were called Cathedrall, because they preached fitting in chaires. Quomodo. V.1. Luke 6.17. Luk.4.16. John 8.2. Mat.26.55.

Why then will such men, as in all actions of Divine Service, pretend to limit every thing precisely to the patterne of Christ himself, to doe just as he did, and no otherwise, why will they admit any other position of the body, in preaching, then sitting, since, ut plurimùm, at least, for the most part, Christ did preach sitting? Or if Christ did both sit, and stand, why will they not acknowledge, that all positions of the body, that are reverent, are indifferent in themselves, in the service of God; and being so, why will they not admit that position of the body, which being indifferent in it selfe, is by the just command of lawfull authority, made necessary to them, that is, kneeling at the Sacrament? They who refuse it, pretend but two Reasons; First, because Christ at the institution D thereof, did not use that position of kneeling, but sitting; Secondly, because they might scandalize others, or enter a false beleefe into others, who should see them kneele, that they kneeled in such adoration thereof, as the Papists doe.

But for the first, who referre all (in their desire) to the practise of Christ himselfe herein, it cannot be a cleare case, In what position of body Christ did institute this Sacrament. There was at that time, a civill Supper, the ordinary houshold Supper, and there was a legall Supper, the eating of the Passeover, and then this Sacramentall Supper, of a new institution; And it is cleare, that Christ did not continue one position all this while, but he arose and did some actions between; Neither could that position of body, which they used at the Table, for their civill Supper, and naturall refection, be properly called a sitting, for it was rather a lying, a reclining, a leaning upon a bed; And let it be exactly a sitting, and let that sitting run through all the three Suppers, yet how E will that position of sitting, justifie that Canon, which hath passed in a Synod amongst our neighbours, Liberum est stando, sedendo, eundo, cœnam celebrare, non autem geniculando? How will standing, or walking, be any more maintainable then kneeling, by Christs example? and yet they say, sitting, or walking, or standing, they may receive, but kneeling they must not: But this, I presume that particular Synod did not declare by way of Doctrine, to binde other Churches, but enjoyned a Discipline for their owne. Harmonia Synod. Belg. de Cœna, Art. 8.

Now, for the danger of scandalizing others, all that come to Church, and are of our profession in Religion, are sufficiently catechized, and informed of the reason of our kneeling, and that we are therein farre from the Adoration of the Romane Practise. It is a complaint often made, and often to be repeated, that one of the greatest illusions, and impostures impoſtures of the Romane Church, is, That the Book-Doctrine, of their learned men, and the ordinary practice of their people agree not. They know the people doe commit Idolatry, in their manner of adoring the Bread in the Sacrament, and they never preach againſt this error of the people, nor tell them wherein that Idolatry lies; It is true, that in their Bookes of Controverſies, which the people could not underſtand, if they might reade them, nor may reade them, if they could underſtand them, in thoſe bookes they proceed upon ſafer grounds; There they ſay, that when a man adores the Sacrament, he muſt be ſure, that he carry not his thoughts upon any thing that he ſees, not onely not upon Bread and Wine, (for, that they muſt not beleeve to be there, whatſoever they ſee or taſte) but not upon thoſe ſpecies and apparences of Bread and Wine, which they ſeem to ſee, but he muſt carry all his thoughts upon the perſon of Chriſt, who is there, though he ſee him not; for, otherwiſe, ſay they, if he ſhould adore that which he ſees, he ſhould commit Idolatry. Now, if the people were acquainted with this Doctrine, and could poſſibly obſerve it, the danger were not ſo great, in that Adoration of the Sacrament. Much leſſe is there in our kneeling, who, as we acknowledge, that God is preſent every where, yet otherwiſe preſent to us, when we throw our ſelves downe before him in devotion, and prayer in our Chamber, then he is in the Market, or in the ſtreet, and otherwiſe in the Congregation, at Publike prayer, then at private prayer in our Chamber; ſo we acknowledge, that he is otherwiſe preſent at the Sacrament, then at any other act of Divine Service. That which Chriſts Example left indifferent, the Authority of that Church, in which God hath given thee thy ſtation, may make neceſſary to thee; Though not abſolutely neceſſary, and Ratione medii, that none can be ſaved that doe not kneele at the Sacrament, therefore becauſe they doe not kneele, yet neceſſary Ratione præcepti, as it is enjoyned by lawfull authority, and to reſiſt lawfull authority, is a diſobedience, that may endanger any mans ſalvation.

2. Part. Now from this Sermon, which gave us our Text, we paſſe to the Text, which muſt give us our Sermon, the particular Branches of the Text it ſelfe, which we propoſed at firſt, for our ſecond part. And there, our firſt is, Qui ſint, who they be, that are brought into conſideration, Mundi corde, thoſe that are pure of heart; firſt pure, and then, pure of heart. In the pureſt times of the Primitive Church, there crept in falſe opinions of purity; we finde two ſorts of Puritanes then; The Cathariſts, and the Cathari; the Catharists were purifying Puritanes, and the Cathari were purified Puritanes: The firſt thought no creatures pure for mans uſe, till they were ſanctified by them; and thereupon they induced certain charmes, and formes of Purification, too deteſtable to be named amongſt Chriſtians. And then the Cathari, the purified Puritanes thought no men pure but themſelves, and themſelves ſo pure, as that they left out that petition out of the Lords prayer, Dimitte nobis, forgive us our treſpaſſes, for they thought they had treſpaſſed in nothing.

They have a third ſtate of Puritanes above theſe, in the Romane Church; where they ſay that a man come to ſuch a ſtate of purity in this life, as that he ſhall be abſtracted, not onely a paſſionibus, from all inordinateneſſe of affections and paſſions, but a phantaſmatibus, from apprehending any thing by thoſe lazy degrees of the ſenſes, and the phantaſie, and diſcourſe, and reading, and meditation, and converſation, but they ſhall come to ſuch a familiarity with God, as that they ſhall know all by immediate Revelation; They meane, (and, indeed, ſome of them ſay,) that a man come to that purity in this life, as that in this life, hee ſhall bee in poſſeſſion of that very Beatificall viſion, which is the ſtate of glory in heaven; In which purity, they ſay alſo, that a man may not onely be empty of all ſin, but he may be too full of Gods preſence, overfraighted with his grace, ſo farre, that (as they make Philip Nerius, the Founder of their laſt Order, their example) they ſhall be put to that exclamation, Recede à me Domine, O Lord depart farther from me, and withdraw ſome of this grace, which thou poureſt upon me.

And then beſides theſe three imaginary and illuſory purities, The Catharists that think no things pure, The Cathari that think no men pure but themſelves, and the Super-cathari, in the Romane Church, that think theſe men as pure, as the Saints, who are in poſſeſſion of the ſight of God in heaven, there is a true purity, which will not ſerve our turns, which is a partiall purity, that pureneſſe, that cleanneſſe, that innocency, to which David ſo often referres himſelf, in his religious and humble expoſtulations with God, Iudge me, and

A and deale with me, according to my righteousnesse, and mine innocency, and cleannesse of heart, and hands, saies David; that is, as I am innocent, and guiltlesse, in that particular, which Saul imputes to me, and persecutes me for. For, this pureneſſe, which is this marke of the Saints of God, is not partiall, but universall; it is not a fig-leafe, that covers one spot of nakednesse, but an intire garment, a cleannesse in all our actions.

We say sometimes, and not altogether improperly, that a man walks cleane, if in a foule way, he contract but a few spots of dirt; but yet this is not an absolute cleannesse. A house is not cleane, except Cobwebs be swept downe; A man is not cleane, except he remove the lightest and slightest occasions of provocation. It is the speech of the greatest to the greatest, of Christ to the Church, Capite vulpeculas, Take us the little Foxes, for they devoure the Vine. It is not a cropping, a pilling, a retarding of the growth of the Vine that is threatned, but a devouring, though but from little Foxes. It is not so desperate a state, to have thy soule attempted by that Lion, that seekes whom he may devoure, (for then, in great and apparant sinnes, thou wilt be occasioned to call upon the Lion of the tribe of Juda, to thine assistance) as it is to have thy soule eaten up by vermin, by the custome and habit of small sinnes. God punished the Egyptians with little things, with Hailestones, and Froggs, and Grashoppers; and Pharaohs Conjurers, that counterfaited all Moses greater workes, failed in the least, in the making of lice. A man may stand a great tentation, and satisfie himselfe in that, and thinke he hath done enough in the way of spirituall valour, and then fall as irrecoverably under the custome of small. I were as good lie under a milstone, as under a hill of sand; for howsoever I might have blowne away every graine of sand, if I had watched it, as it fell, yet when it is a hill, I cannot blow it, nor shove it away: and when I shall thinke to say to God, I have done no great sins, God shall not proceed with me, by waight, but by measure, nor aske how much, but C how long I have sinned.

And though I may have done thus much towards this purity, as that, for a good time, I have discontinued my sin, yet if my heart be still set upon the delight, and enjoying of that which was got by my former sins, though I be not that dog that returnes to his vomit, yet I am still that Sow, that wallowes in her mire; though I doe not thrust my hands into new dirt, yet the old dirt is still baked upon my hands; though mine owne cloathes doe not defile me againe, as Iob speakes, (though I do not relapse to the practise of mine old sin) yet I have none of Ieremies Nitre, and Sope, none of Iobs Snow-water, to wash me cleane, except I come to Restitution. As long as the heart is set upon things sinfully got, thou sinnest over those yeares sins, every day: thou art not come to the purity of this text, for it is pure, and pure in heart. Iob 2.22.

But can any man come to that pureneſſe? to have a heart pure from all foulenesse? Corde. can a man be borne so? Who can bring a cleane thing out of filthinesse, is Iobs unanswerable D question? can any man make it cleane, of himselfe? Who can say, I have made cleane my heart? is Solomons unanswerable question. Beloved, when such questions as these, are asked in the Scriptures, How can? who can doe this? Sometimes they import an absolute impossibility, It cannot be done by any meanes; And sometimes they import but a difficulty, It can hardly be done, it can be done but some one way. When the Prophet saies, Quid proderit sculptile? What good can an Idoll, or an Idolatrous Religion do us? It shall not helpe us in soule, in reputation, in preferment, it will deceive us every way, it is absolutely impossible, that an Idoll, or an Idolatrous Religion should doe us any good. But then when David saies, Domine quis habitabit, Lord who shall ascend to thy Tabernacle, and dwell in thy holy hill? David does not mean that there is no possibility of ascending thither, or dwelling there, though it be hard clambring thither, & hard holding there; And there- E fore when the Prophet saies, Quis sapiens, & intelliget hæc, Who is so wise as to finde out this way, he places this cleannesse, which we inquire after, in Wisdome. What is Wisdome? we may content our selves, with that old definition of Wisdome, that it is Rerum humanarum, & divinarum scientia; The Wisdome that accomplishes this cleannesse, is the knowledge, the right valuation of this world, and of the next; To be able to compare the joyes of heaven, and the pleasures of this world, and the gaine of the one, with the losse of the other, this is the way to this cleaneneſſe of the heart; because that heart that considers, and examines, what it takes in, will take in no foule, no infectious thing. God hath not called us to uncleannesse, but to holinesse, saies the Apostle. If we be in the waies of uncleannesse, God hath not called us thither: We may slip into them, by the infirmity of our nature; or we may run into them by a custome of sin; wee may bee drawne into them, by the inordinateness of our affections; or we may be driven into them, by feare of losing the favour of those great Persons, upon whom we depend, and so accompany, or assist them in their sins. A

So we may slip, and run, and be drawne, and be driven, but we are not called, not called by God, into any sin; not called by any Decree of God, not by any profession or calling; not by any complexion, or constitution, to a necessity of committing any sin; All sin is from our selves: But if we be in the waies of holinesse, it is God that call'd us thither, we have not brought our selves. God calls us by his Ordinance, and Ministery in the Church; But when God hath call'd us thither, we may see, what he expects from us, by that which the Apostle saies, Let us cleanse our selves from all filthinesse; that is, let us employ that faculty, that is in our selves, let us be appliable and supple, easie and ductile, in those waies, to which God hath called us. Since God, by breeding us in the Christian Church, and in the knowledge of his word, by putting that balance into our hand, to try heavenly, and earthly things, by which we may distinguish Lepram à non lepra, what is a leprous and sinfull, what is an indifferent, and cleane action, let us be content to put the ware, and the waights into the balance, that is, to bring all objects, and all actions to a consideration, and to an examination, by that tryall, before wee set our hearts upon them: for God leaves no man, with whom he hath proceeded so far, as to breed him in the Christian Church, without a power to doe that, to discerne his owne actions, if he do not winke. 2 Cor. 7. 1. B

Upon those word, Isaac digged the Wels of water, which they had digged in the daies of Abraham, and the Philistims had stopped, Origen extends this power far, though not very confidently; Fortè inuniuscuiusque nostrûm anima, saies he; perchance in every one of our soules, there is this Well of the water of Life, and this power to open it: whether Origens Nostrûm, our soule, be intended by him of us, as we are men, or of us, as wee are Christians, I pronounce not; but divide it; In all us, as we are naturall men, there is this Well of water of Life, Abraham digged it at first, The Father of the faithfull our heavenly Abraham, infused it into us all at first in Adam, from whom, as wee have the Image of God, though defaced, so we have this Well of water though stopped up; But then the Philistims having stopped this well, (Satan by sinne having barred it up) the power of opening it againe is not in the naturall man; but Isaac diggs them againe, Isaac who is Filius latitiæ, the Son of Joy, our Isaac, our Jesus, he opens them againe, to all that receive him according to his Ordinance in his Church, he hath given this power, of keeping open in themselves, this Well of Life, these meanes of Salvation: Peccata tua alios inducunt colores, saies Origen in the same place; Thy sinnes cover the Image of God with other Images, Images of Beauty, of Honour, of Pleasure, so that sometimes thou dost not discerne the Image of God, in thy soule, but yet there it is: sometimes thou fillest this Well with other waters, with teares of hypocrisie, to deceive, or teares of lamentation for worldly crosses, but yet such a Well, such a power to assist thine owne salvation, there is in thee: Mulier drachmam invenit, non extrinsecus, sed in domo, The Woman who had lost her peece of silver, found it not without doores, but within; It was In domo mundatâ, when her house was made cleane, but it was within the house, and within her owne house. Make cleane thy house, by the assistances, which Christ affords thee in his Church, and thou shalt never faile finding of that within thee, which shall save thee: Not that it growes in thee naturally, or that thou canst produce it of thy selfe; but that God hath bound himselfe by his holy Covenant, to perfect his work, in every man, that works with him. So then in repenting of former sins, in breaking off the practise of those sins, in restoring whatsoever was gotten by those sins, in precluding all relapses, by a diligent survay and examination of particular actions, this is this cleannesse, this purity of heart, which constitutes our first branch of this part; And the second is the Purchase, what we get by it, which is Blessednesse, Blessed are the pure in heart. Gen. 26. 18. Homil. 13. in Gen. C D E

In this, we make two steps, Blessednesse, and the present possession of this Blessednesse. Now, to this purpose, it is a good Rule that S. Bernard gives, and a good way that he goes: Cui quæque res sapiunt prout sunt, is sapiens est, saies he: He that tasts, and apprehends all things in their proper and naturall taste, he that takes all things aright as they are, Is sapiens est, nothing distasts him, nothing alters him, he is wise. If he take the riches of this world to be in their nature, indifferent, neither good, nor bad in themselves, but to Beatus.

receive their denomination in their uſe, If he take long life to be naturally an effect of a good conſtitution, and temperament of the body, and a good husbanding of that temper by temperance, If he take ſickneſſe to be a declination and diſorder thereof, and ſo other calamities to be the declination of their power, or their favour, in whoſe protection hee truſted, then he takes all theſe things, prout ſunt, as they are, in their right taſt, and Is ſapiens eſt, he that takes things ſo, is morally wiſe. But thus far, S. Bernard does but tell us, Quis ſapiens, who is wiſe; but then, Cui ipſa ſapientia ſapit, prout eſt, is beatus, He that taſts this Wiſdome it ſelfe aright, he onely is Bleſſed. Now to taſte this morall Wiſedome aright, to make the right uſe of that, is to direct all that knowledge upon heavenly things. To underſtand the wretchedneſſe of this world, is to be wiſe, but to make this wiſedome apprehend a happineſſe in the next world, that is to be bleſſed. If I can digeſt the want of Riches, the want of Health, the want of Reputation, out of this conſideration, that good men want theſe, as well as bad, this is morall Wiſedome, and a naturall man may be as wiſe, herein, as I. But if I can make this Wiſedome carry me to a higher contemplation, That God hath caſt theſe wants upon me, to draw me the more eaſily to him, and to ſee, that in all likelihood, my diſpoſition being conſidered, more wealth, more health, more preferment would have retarded me, and ſtackned my pace in his ſervice, then this Wiſdome, that is, this uſe of this morall Wiſdome, hath made me bleſſed; and to this Bleſſedneſſe, a naturall man cannot come.

This Bleſſedneſſe then, is Congeries bonorum, A concurrence, a confluence, an accumulation of all that is Good; And he that is Mundus corde, pure of heart, ſafe in a rectified conſcience, hath that. Not that every thing, that hath Aliquam rationem boni, any tincture, or name of Good in it, (as Riches, and Health, and Honour) muſt neceſſarily fall upon every man, that is, good, and pure of heart; (for, for the moſt part, ſuch men want theſe more then any other men.) But becauſe even thoſe things, which have in them, Aliquam rationem mali, ſome tincture, and name of ill, (as ſickneſſe of body, or vexation of ſpirit) ſhall be good to them, becauſe they ſhall advance them in their way to God; therefore are they bleſſed, as Bleſſedneſſe is Congeries bonorum, the accumulation of all that is good, becauſe nothing can put on the nature of ill, to them. And though Bleſſedneſſe ſeeme to be but an expectative, a reverſion reſerved to the next life, yet ſo bleſſed are they in this teſtimony of a rectified conſcience, which is this purity of heart, as that they have this bleſſedneſſe in a preſent poſſeſſion, Bleſſed are the pure in heart; they are now, they are already Bleſſed.

The fartheſt that any of the Philoſophers went in the diſcovery of Bleſſedneſſe, was but to come to that, Nemo ante obitum, to pronounce that no man could be called Bleſſed before his death; not that they had found what kind of better Bleſſedneſſe they went to after their death, but that ſtill till death they were ſhure, every man was ſubject to new miſeries, and interruptions of any thing which they could have called Bleſſedneſſe. The Chriſtian Philoſophy goes farther; It ſhowes us a perfecter Bleſſedneſſe then they conceived for the next life, and it imparts that Bleſſedneſſe to this life alſo: The pure in heart are bleſſed already, not onely comparatively, that they are in a better way of Bleſſedneſſe, then others are, but actually in a preſent poſſeſſion of it: for this world and the next world, are not, to the pure in heart, two houſes, but two roomes, a Gallery to paſſe thorough, and a Lodging to reſt in, in the ſame Houſe, which are both under one roofe, Chriſt Jeſus; The Militant and the Triumphant, are not two Churches, but this the Porch, and that the Chancell of the ſame Church, which are under one Head, Chriſt Jeſus; ſo the Joy, and the ſenſe of Salvation, which the pure in heart have here, is not a joy ſevered from the Joy of Heaven, but a Joy that begins in us here, and continues, and accompanies us thither, and there flowes on, and dilates it ſelfe to an infinite expanſion, (ſo, as if you ſhould touch one corne of powder in a traine, and that traine ſhould carry fire into a whole City, from the beginning it was one and the ſame fire) though the fulneſs of the glory therof be reſerved to that which is expreſſed in the laſt branch, Videbunt Deum, They ſhall ſee God; for, as S. Bernard notes, when the Church is highlieſt extolled for her Beauty, yet it is but Pulcherrima inter mulieres, The faireſt amongſt women, that is, ſaies he, Inter animas terrenas, non autem inter Angelicas beatitudines, She is not compared with her owne ſtate in Heaven, ſhe ſhall have a better ſtate in that State, then ſhe hath here; So when John Baptiſts Office is highlieſt extolled, that he is called The greateſt Prophet, it is but Inter natos mulierum, Amongſt the ſons of women, he is not compared pared with the Son of God. So this Bleſſednesse appropriated to the pure in heart, gives a preſent aſſurance of future joy, and a preſent inchoation of that now, though the plenary conſummation thereof be reſpited, till we ſee God.

Videbunt Deum. And firſt videbunt & non contremiſcent; This is a Bleſſednesse, they ſhall ſee God, and be glad to ſee him; ſee him in Judgement, and be able to ſtand in Judgement in his ſight; They ſhall ſee him, and never trouble the hils to fall upon them, nor call the mountains to cover them; upon them he ſhall not ſteal as a thiefe in the night, but becauſe he hath uſed to ſtand at their doore, and knock, and enter, they ſhall look for his comming, and be glad of it. Firſt they come to a true valuation of this world, in S. Pauls Omnia

Phil. 3. 8. ſtercora, I count all things but Dung, but loſſe, for the excellency of the knowledge of Chriſt Ieſus my Lord; When they have found the true value of worldly things, they will come to ſomething worth the getting, they will come to S. Pauls way of Gain, Mors lucrum,

Phil. 1. 21. that to die is gain and advantage: When they know that, they will conceive a religious covetouſneſſe of that, and ſo come to S. Pauls Cupio diſſolvi, to deſire to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt: When they have entertained that Deſire, they will declare it, make a petition, a ſuite for it, with a Veni Domine Ieſu, Come Lord Ieſu, come quickly; and they ſhall have a holy and modeſt, but yet an infallible aſſurance of this anſwer to their petition; Venite benedicti, Come ye bleſſed of my Father, inherite the Kingdome prepared for you

Mat. 26. 34. from the foundations of the world; So Videbunt & non contremiſcent, by this acquainting themſelves, and accuſtoming themſelves to his preſence, in all their actions, and meditations in this life, they ſhall ſee him, and be glad to ſee him, even in Judgement, in the next.

But the ſeeing of God principally intended in this place, is that Viſio beatifica, to ſee God ſo, as that that very ſeeing makes the ſeer Bleſſed, They are Bleſſed therefore, becauſe they ſee him; And that is videre Eſſentiam, to ſee the very Eſſence and nature of God. For, that we ſhall ſee God in his Eſſence, is evident enough by that place of the

1 John 3. 2. Apoſtle, Now we are the Sons of God, (that is, now by this purity of heart, and teſtimony of a rectified conſcience, we are ſo) And it doth not yet appeare what we ſhall be, (that is, there are degrees of glory reſerved for us, that yet do not appeare to our underſtanding, we cannot conceive them) But we know, that when he ſhall appeare, we ſhall be like him, (that is, receive incorruption and glory in our bodies, as he hath done) And then the reaſon given there, of that, is, For we ſhall ſee him, ſicuti eſt, as he is, in his Eſſence; All our Beatification, and Glorification in our bodies conſiſts in this, that we ſhall ſee him ſicuti

1 Cor. 13. 12. eſt, as he is, in his Eſſence. Then ſayes S. Paul, I ſhall know, even as I am knowne, Eſſentially. But whether then, in the reſurrection, and glorification of the body, God in his Eſſence be to be ſeen with thoſe eyes which the body ſhall then have, is yet, and hath been long a queſtion. The Scripture goes no farther, then to S. Iohns Sicuti eſt, I ſhall ſee him as he is, and to S. Pauls Cognoſcam, I ſhall know him as I am knowne; but with what eyes I ſhall ſee him, (without any perplexing curioſities) we will look a little into the Fathers, and into the School, and conclude ſo, as may beſt advance our edification.

For the Fathers, it may be ſufficient to inſiſt upon S. Auguſtine; not becauſe he is alwayes to be preferred before all, but becauſe in this point, he hath beſt collected all that were before him, and is beſt followed of all that come after. S. Auguſtine had written againſt a Biſhop who was of the Sect of the Anthropomorphits, whoſe Hereſie was that God had a Body; and in oppoſition of him, S. Auguſtine had ſaid, Iſtius corporis oculos nec videre Deum, nec viſuros, That God was ſo far from having a Body, that our bodily eyes, howſoever glorified, ſhould never ſee God. In that Treatiſe S. Auguſtine had been very bitter againſt that Biſhop, and being warned of it, in another Epiſtle to another Biſhop, Fortunatianus, he repents, and retracts his bitterneſſe, but his opinion, his doctrine, That our bodily eyes ſhould never ſee God, S. Auguſtine never retracted. He profeſſes ingenuouſly, Longè tolerabilius corpori arrogare, quàm Deo derogare, That he could be more eaſily brought to attribute ſo much too much to the body of man, as to ſay that with theſe bodily eyes he ſhould ſee God, then to derogate ſo much from God, as to ſay that he had a body that might be ſeen; but becauſe he ſaw that one might follow on the other, he denyed both, and did no more beleeve that mans eyes ſhould ſee God, then that God had a body to be ſeen.

And this negative opinion of his, S. Auguſtine builds upon S. Ambroſe, and upon S. Hierome too, who ſeem to deny that the Angels themſelves ſee the Eſſence of God; and upon

upon Athanasius, who, against the Arrians opinion, That God the Father only was invisible, but the Son, (who was not equall to the Father) and the Holy Ghost, (who was not equall to the Son) might be seen, argues and maintains, that the whole Trinity is equall in it self, and equally invisible to us. So doth he also assist himself with that of Nazianzen, Quando Deus visus, salva sua invisibilitate visus, howsoever God be said to have been seen, it is said in some such sense, as that even then when he was seen, he was invisible. He might have added Chrysostomes testimony too, Ipsum quod Deus est, nec Angeli viderunt, nec Archangeli; Neither Angel nor Archangel did ever see that Nature, which is the very Essence of God: And he might have added Areopagita too, who expresses it with equall elegancy and vehemency, Dei nec sententia est, nec ratio, nec opinio, nec sensus, nec phantasia: If we bring the very Nature and Essence of God into question, we can give no judgement upon it, (non sententia) we can make no probable discourse of it, (non ratio) we can frame no likely opinion, or conjecture in it, (non opinio) we cannot prepare our selves with any thing which hath fallen under our senses, (non sensus) nor with any thing which we can bring studiously, or which can fall easually into our fancy, or imagination, (non phantasia.) And upon the whole matter, and all the evidence, he joynes in this verdict with S. Hierome, Tunc cernitur, cum invisibilis creditur; God is best seen by us, when we confesse that he cannot be seen of us. S. Augustine denies not, That our eyes shall be spirituall eyes, but in what proportion spirituall, or to what particular use spirituall, he will not pretend to know: Vtrum in simplicitatem spiritus cedat, ita ut totus homo jam sit spiritus, whether the body of man shall be so attenuated and rarified, as that the whole man shall become spirit, Aut animam adjuvet corpus ad videndum, whether the body shall contribute and assist the faculties of the soul, as in this life it doth, Fateor me non alicubi legisse, quod existimarem sufficere, ad docendum, aut ad discendum, sayes that blessed and sober Father, I confesse I never read any thing that I thought sufficient to rectifie mine own judgement, much lesse to change anothers: But to all those places of Scripture, which are to this purpose, That the Angels see the face of God, and that we shall be like the Angels, and see God face to face, he answers well, Facies Dei ea est, qua Deus innotescit nobis, That is the face of God to us all, by which God is known and manifested to us; in which sense, Reason is the face of God to the naturall man, the Law to the Jew, and the Gospell to us; and such a sight of God, doth no more put such a power of seeing in our bodily eyes, then it puts a face upon God: We shall see God face to face, and yet God shall have no face to be seen, nor we bodily eyes to see him by: For, Non legi, That, I have not read, sayes he; This, sayes he, I have read, Regi incorruptibili, & invisibili, Vnto the King eternall, immortall, invisible, &c. Neither dare I, sayes S. Augustine, sever those things which the Spirit of God hath joyned, Vt dicam incorruptibilem quidem in sæcula sæculorum, invisibilem autem in hoc sæculo, I dare not say that God is immortall in this world, and in the next world too, but invisible in this world only, and visible in the next, for the Holy Ghost hath pronounced him invisible, as far as immortall. 1 Tim. 1. 17.

Si rogas, sayes he, if you presse me, Cannot God then be seen? Yes, I confesse he can. If you ask me, how? Cum vult, & sicuti vult, He may be seen when he will, and how he will. If you pursue it, can he not be seen in his Essence? yes, he can; If you proceed farther, and ask me how again? I can say no more, sayes he, then Christ sayes, Erimus sicut Angeli, we shall be like the Angels, and we shall see God, so as the Angels do, but they see him not with bodily eyes, nor as an object, which is that that S. Ambrose, and S. Hierome, and S. Chrysostome intend, when they deny that the Angels see the Essence of God, that is, they see him not otherwise then by understanding him. All agree in this resolution, Solus Deus videt cor, & solum cor videt Deum, Only God can see the heart of man, and only the heart of man can see God: For, in this world, our bodily eyes do not see bodies, they see but colours and dimensions, they see not bodies; much lesse shall our eyes, though spirituall, see spirits in heaven; least of all, that Spirit, in comparison of of whom, Angels, and our spirits are but grosse bodies.

So far the Fathers leade us towards a determination herein; and thus far the School; Nulla visio naturalis in terris; Here, in this life, neither the eyes, nor the minde of the most subtile, and most sanctified man can see the Essence of God: Nulla visio corporalis in cœlis, The bodily eyes of no man, in the highest state of glorification in heaven, can see the Essence of God: Nulla visio comprehensiva omnino, That faculty of man, which ſhall ſee the Eſſence of God in heaven, yet ſhall not comprehend that Eſſence; for to comprehend, is not to know a thing, as well as I can know it, but to know it as well as that thing can be knowen; and ſo only God himſelf can ſee, and know, that is, comprehend God. A

To end all, in the whole body of the Scriptures we have no light, that our bodily eyes ſhall be ſo enlightned in the Reſurrection, as to ſee the Eſſence of God; For, when Iob ſayes, In carne mea, In my fleſh I ſhall ſee God, and Oculi mei videbunt, Mine eyes ſhall ſee God, (if theſe words muſt neceſſarily be underſtood of the laſt Reſurrection, which ſome Expoſitors deny, and Calvin in particular, underſtands them of a particular reſurrection from that calamity which lay upon Iob at that time, and of his confidence that God would raiſe him again, even in this life) yet howſoever, and to which reſurrection ſoever you refer them, the words muſt be underſtood thus, In my fleſh, that is, when my ſoule ſhall re-aſſume this fleſh in the Reſurrection, In that fleſh I ſhall ſee God; he doth not ſay, That fleſh ſhall, but Hee, in that fleſh, ſhall. So when hee adds Oculi mei, Mine eyes ſhall do it, he intends Oculos internos, of which the Apoſtle ſpeaks, The eyes of your underſtanding being enlightned. So then, a faculty to ſee him ſo, in his Eſſence, with bodily eyes, we finde not in Scripture; But yet in the Scriptures we do finde, that we ſhall ſee him ſo; Sicuti eſt, As he is, in his Eſſence; How? It is a ſafe anſwer which S. Auguſtine gives in all ſuch queſtions, Melius affirmamus, de quibus minimè dubitamus, Only thoſe things are ſafely affirmed, and reſolved, which admit no doubt: This hath never admitted any doubt, but that our ſoule, and her faculties ſhall be ſo exalted in that ſtate of glory, as that in thoſe internall faculties of the ſoul, ſo exalted, we ſhall ſee the very Eſſence of God, which no meaſure of the light of grace, communicated to any, the moſt ſanctified man here, doth effect, but only the light of glory there ſhall. And therefore this being cleare, that in the faculties of our ſoules we ſhall ſee him, Reſtat ut de illa viſione ſecundum interiorem hominem certiſſimi ſimus, ſayes that bleſſed and ſober Father, As our reaſon is ſatisfied that the Saints in heaven ſhall ſee God ſo, ſo let our conſciences be ſatisfied, that we have an intereſt in that ſtate, and that we in particular ſhall come to that ſight of God; Et cor mundum ad illam viſionem praparemus, Let us not abuſe our ſelves with falſe aſſurances, nor reſt in any other, then this, that we have made clean, and pure our very hearts, for only ſuch ſhall ſee God. Omnis meridies diluculum habuit, (as the ſame Father continues this Meditation) The brighteſt noon had a faint twi-light, and break of day; The ſight of God which we ſhall have in heaven, muſt have a Diluculum, a break of day here; If we will ſee his face there, we muſt ſee it in ſome beames here: And to that purpoſe, Viſus per omnes ſenſus recurrit, (as S. Auguſtine hath collected out of ſeverall places of Scripture) Every ſenſe is called ſight, for there is Odora & vide, and Guſta & vide, Taſte and See how ſweet, and Smell and See what a ſavour of life the Lord is; So S. Iohn turned about, To ſee a voice, There Hearing was Sight; And ſo our Saviour Chriſt ſayes, Palpate & videte, and there Feeling is Seeing. All things concur to this Seeing, and therefore in all the works of your ſenſes, and in all your other faculties, See ye the Lord; Heare him in his word, and ſo ſee him; Speak to him in your prayers, and ſo ſee him; Touch him in his Sacrament, and ſo ſee him; Preſent holy and religious actions unto him, and ſo ſee him. Davids heart was towards Abſalon, ſayes that Story: Ioab ſaw that, and, as every man will be forward to further perſons growing in favour, (for ſo it ſhould be done to him, whom the King will honour) Ioab plotted and effected Abſalons return, but yet Abſalon ſaw not the Kings face in two yeares. Beloved in Chriſt Jeſus, the heart of your gracious God is ſet upon you; and we his ſervants have told you ſo, and brought you thus neare him, into his Court, into his houſe, into the Church, but yet we cannot get you to ſee his face, to come to that tenderneſſe of conſcience, as to remember and conſider, that all your moſt ſecret actions are done in his ſight and his preſence; Cæſars face, and Cæſars inſcription you can ſee; The face of the Prince in his coyne you can riſe before the Sun to ſee, and ſit up till mid-night to ſee; but if you do not ſee the face of God upon every piece of that mony too, all that mony is counterfeit; If Chriſt have not brought that fiſh to the hook, that brings the mony in the mouth, (as he did to Peter) that mony is ill fiſhed for; If nouriſhing of ſuits, and love of contention amongſt others, for your own gain have brought it, it is out of the way of that counſell, *Follow peace with all men, and holineſſe, without which no man ſhall ſee God. ſeek

A ſeeke him, that ſeek thy face, O Iacob; Innocens manibus, & mundus corde, either ſuch an innocence, as never fouled the hands, or ſuch an innocency as hath waſhed them cleane againe, ſuch an innocency as hath kept you from corrupt getting, or ſuch an innocency as hath reſtored us, by reſtoring that, which was corruptly got. It is teſtified of Solomon, That he exceeded all the Kings of the Earth, for Wiſedome, and for Riches, and all the Earth ſought the face of Solomon; A greater then Solomon is here, for Wiſedome, and Riches; your wiſedome is fooliſhneſſe, and your riches beggery, if you ſee not the face of this Solomon; If either you have ſtudied, or practiſed, or judged, when his back is towards you, that is, if you have not done all, as in his preſence. You are in his preſence now; goe not out of it, when you goe from hence. Amor rerum terrenarum, viſcus pennarum ſpiritualium; God hath given you the wings of Doves, and the eyes of Eagles to ſee him now, in this place; If in returning from this place, you returne to your former wayes of pleaſure or profit, B this is a breaking of thoſe Doves wings, and a cieling of thoſe Eagles eyes. Coge cor tuum cogitare divina, compelle, urge, ſayes that Father; Here, in the Church, thou canſt not chuſe but ſee God, and raiſe thy heart towards him: But when thou art returned to thy ſeverall diſtractions, that vanities ſhall pull thine eyes, and obtrectation, and libellous defamation of others ſhall pull thine eares, and profit ſhall pull thy hands, then Coge, compelle, urge, force and compell thy heart, and preſſe, even in that thruſt of tentations, to ſee God. What God is in his Eſſence, or what our ſight of the Eſſence of God ſhall be in the next world, diſpute not too curiouſly, determine not too peremptorily; Cogitans de Deo, ſi finiviſti, Deus non eſt, is excellently ſaid by S. Auguſtine: If thou begin to think, what the Eſſence of God is, and canſt bring that thought to an end, thou haſt miſtaken it; whenſoever thou canſt ſay, Deus eſt, this is God, or God is this, non eſt Deus, that is not God, God is not that, for he is more, infinitely more then that. But, non potes dicere, Deus C eſt, thou art not able to ſay, This is God, God is this; Saltem dicas, hoc Deus non eſt; Be able to ſay, This is not God, God is not this: The belly is not God; Mammon is not God; Mauzzim, the God of Forces, Oppreſſion, is not God; Belphegor, Licentiouſneſſe, is not God: Howſoever God ſees me, to my confuſion, yet I doe not ſee God, when I am ſacrificing to theſe, which are not Gods.

Let us begin at that which is neareſt us, within us, pureneſſe of heart, and from thence receive the teſtimony of Gods Privy Seale, the impreſſion of his Spirit, that we are Bleſſed; and that leads us to the Great Seale, the full fruition of all; we ſhall ſee God, there, where he ſhall make us drink of the Rivers of his pleaſures; There is fulneſſe, plenty; Pſal. 36. 8. but leſt it ſhould be a Feaſt of one day, or of a few, as it is ſaid, they are rivers, ſo it is added, with thee is the Fountaine of life; An abundant river, to convay, and a perpetuall ſpring, to feed, and continue that river: And then, wherein appeares all this? In this, D for in thy light we ſhall ſee light; In ſeeing God, we ſhall ſee all that concernes us, and ſee it alwayes; No night to determine that day, no cloud to overcaſt it. We end all, with S. Auguſtines devout exclamation, Deus bone, qui erunt illi oculi! Glorious God, what kinde of eyes ſhall they be! Quam decori! quam ſereni! How bright eyes, and how well ſet! Quam valentes! quam conſtantes! How ſtrong eyes, and how durable! Quid arbitremur? quid æſtimemus? quid loquemur? What quality, what value, what name ſhall we give to thoſe eyes? Occurrunt verba quotidiana & ſordidata viliſsimis rebus; I would ſay ſomething of the beauty and glory of theſe eyes, and can finde no words, but ſuch, as I my ſelfe have miſ-uſed in lower things. Our beſt expreſſing of it, is to expreſſe a deſire to come to it, for there onely we ſhall learne what to call it. That ſo, we may goe the Apoſtles way, to his end, That being made free from ſinne, and become ſervants to Rom. 6. 22. God, wee may have our fruit unto holineſſe, and then, the End, life everlaſting.

April 20. 1630.

IOB 16. v. 17, 18, 19.

Not for any injuſtice in my hands: Alſo my prayer is pure. O earth cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place. Alſo now behold, my Witneſſe is in heaven, and my Record is on high.

Iobs friends (as, in civility we are faine to call them, becauſe they came upon a civill pretence, to viſit him, and to comfort him) had now done ſpeaking. It was long before they would have done. Audivi frequenter talia, ſaies Iob to them, I have often heard ſuch things as you ſay, they are not new to me; and therefore, Oneroſi conſolatores, Miſerable comforters, troubleſome comforters are ye all, old and new. But, Numquid finem habebunt verba ventoſa, ſaies he, Shall your windy words, your empty, your aery, your frothy words have any end? Now they have an end. Eliphas ends his charge in the laſt, and in this Chapter Iob begins to anſwer for himſelfe. But how? By a middle way. Iob does not juſtifie himſelfe; but yet he does not prevaricate, he does not betray his Innocence neither. For there may be a puſillanimity even towards God; A man may over-clog his owne conſcience, and belie himſelfe in his confeſſions, out of a diſtempered jealouſie, and ſuſpition of Gods purpoſes upon him; Iob does not ſo. Many men have troubled themſelves more, how the ſoule comes into man, then how it goes out; They wrangle, whether it comes in by Infuſion from God, or by Propagation from parents, and never conſider, whether it ſhall returne to Him that made it, or to him that marr'd it, to Him that gave it, or to him that corrupted it. So, many of our Expoſitors upon this Booke of Iob, have ſpent themſelves upon the Perſon, and the Place, and the Time, who Iob was, when Iob was, where Iob was, and whether there were ever any ſuch perſon as Iob, or no; and have paſſed over too ſlightly the ſenſes, and doctrines of the Booke. S. Gregory hath, (to good uſe) given us many Morals, (as he cals them) upon this Booke, but, truly, not many Literals, for, for the moſt part, he bends all the ſufferings of Iob figuratively, myſtically upon Chriſt. Origen, who (except S. Gregory) hath written moſt of this Booke, and yet gone but a little way into the booke neither, doth never pretend much literalneſſe in his expoſitions, ſo that we are not to looke for that at Origens hands. We muſt not therefore refuſe the aſſiſtance of later men, in the expoſition of this Text, Not for any Injuſtice in my hands, &c. v. 2. v. 3.

In this Chapter, and before this text, we have Iobs Anatomy, Iobs Sceleton, the ruins to which he was reduced. In the eighth verſe he takes knowledge, That God had filled him with leanneſſe and wrinckles, and that thoſe wrinckles, and that leanneſſe were witneſſes againſt him, and, That they that hated him, had torne him in peeces, in the ninth verſe. In the eleventh verſe, That God had delivered him over to the ungodly, and, That God himſelfe had ſhaked him in peeces, and ſet him up as a marke to ſhoote at, in the twelfe verſe, That God had cleft his reins, and poured out his gall upon the ground, in the thirteenth verſe, and in the fourteenth, That he broke him, breach after breach, and run over him as a Giant, and at laſt, in the ſixteenth verſe, That foulenesſe was upon his face, and the ſhadow of death upon his eyelids. Now, let me aske in Iobs behalfe Gods queſtion to Ezekiel, Putaſnè vivent oſſa iſta? Ezek. 37.2. Doeſt thou beleeve that theſe bones can live? Can this Anatomy, this Sceleton, theſe ruines, this rubbidge of Iob ſpeake? It can, it does in this Text, Not for any Injuſtice in my hands, &c.

And, in theſe words, it delivers us, firſt, The confidence of a godly man; Doe God what he will, ſay ye what ye will, That becauſe I am more afflicted then other men, therefore I am guilty of more hainous ſins then other men, yet I know, that whatſoever Gods end be in this proceeding, It is not for any Injuſtice in my hands, Alſo my prayer is pure. Secondly, it delivers us that kinde of infirme anguiſh, and indignation, that halfe-diſtemper, that expoſtulation with God, which ſometimes comes to an exceſſe even in good and godly men, O earth cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place; I deſire not that any thing ſhould be concealed or diſguiſed, let all that ever I have done be written in my forehead, and read by all men. And then thirdly and laſtly, it delivers us the foundation of his confidence, and the recovery from this his infirmity, and from his exceſſe in the manner of expreſſing it, if he have beene over-bold therein, My Witneſſe is in heaven, and my Record is on high; God is his Witneſſe, that that which they charge him with, is falſe, That that which he ſaies in his owne diſcharge (in that ſenſe that he ſaies it) is true; And in theſe three, Iobs Proteſtation, Not guilty, Iobs Manifeſt, I would all the world knew all, Iobs Eſtabliſhment, and conſolidation, My Witneſſe is in Heaven; in theſe three branches, and in ſome fruits, which, in paſſing, we ſhall gather from them, we ſhall determine all that appertaines to theſe words.

1. Part. I remember S. Gregory, in handling one text, profeſſes, that he will endevour to handle it ſo, Vt ejus altitudo non ſic fieret neſcientibus cognita, ut eſſet ſcientibus onerosa; So, as that the weakeſt underſtanding might comprehend the higheſt points, and the higheſt underſtanding not be weary to heare ordinary doctrines ſo delivered. Indeed it is a good art, to deliver deepe points in a holy plainneſſe, and plaine points in a holy delightfulneſſe: for, many times, one part of our auditory underſtands us not, when we have done, and ſo they are weary; and another part underſtands us before we begun, and ſo they are weary. To day, my humble petition muſt be, That you will be content to heare plaine things plainly delivered. Of which, be this the firſt, That Iob found himſelfe under the oppreſſion, and calumny of that miſ-interpretation, that Kings themſelves, and States, and Churches have not eſcaped..

Luk. 13.4. The towre of Siloe fell and ſlew them, therefore they were the greater ſinners in Jeruſalem; this man proſpers not in the world, Therefore he proceeds not in the feare of God; the heire waſtes the eſtate, therefore the eſtate was ill gotten, are haſty concluſions in private affaires. Treaſures are empty, therefore there are unneceſſary waſtes; Diſcontented perſons murmure, therefore things are ill carried; our neigbours proſper by Action, therefore we periſh by not appearing, are haſtie concluſions in State affaires. This man is affected when he heares a blaſphemous oath; and when he lookes upon the generall liberty of ſinning; therefore he is a Puritan; That man loves the ancient formes, and Doctrines, and Diſciplines of the Church, and retaines, and delights in the reverend names of Prieſt, and Altar, and Sacrifice, therefore he is a Papiſt, are haſtie concluſions in Church affaires. When we doe fall under theſe miſ-interpretations, and ill applications of Gods proceedings, we may ſay with Iob, I alſo could ſpeake, as you doe; if your ſoule were in my ſoules ſtead, I could heape up words againſt you, and ſhake my head at you, conclude deſperately, ſpeake ſcornefully of you. But I will not; yet I will not betray my ſelfe, I will make my proteſtation, what end ſoever God propoſe to himſelfe in this his proceeding, It is not for any injuſtice in my hands, Alſo my prayer is pure.

V. 4.

Manus. In theſe two, cleanneſſe of hands, pureneſſe of Prayer, are all religious duties comprehended: for cleane hands denote juſtice and righteouſneſſe towards men, and pure prayer Devotion, and the ſervice and worſhip of God. Iob proteſts for both. Therefore does Origen ſay of Iob, Certè puto, quod & audeo dicere, I doe verily beleeve, and therefore may be bold to ſay, that for conſtancy and fidelity towards God, Iob did exceed, Non ſolum homines, ſed & ipſos Angelos, Not onely men, but Angels themſelves; for, ſaies Origen,

A Origen, Iob did not only ſuffer Abſq; culpa, without being guilty of thoſe things to which his afflictions were imputed, but he ſuffered Cum gratiarum actionibus, he ſaid grace when he had no meat, when God gave him Stones for Bread, and Scorpions for Fiſh; he praiſed God as much for the affliction it ſelf, as for his former, or his ſubſequent benefits and bleſſings. Not that Iob was meerly innocent, but that he was guilty of no ſuch things, as might confer thoſe concluſions, which, from his afflictions, his enemies raiſed. If I juſtifie my ſelf, ſayes Iob, Mine own mouth ſhall condemn me; Every ſelf-juſtification is a ſelf-condemnation; when I give judgement for my ſelf, I am therein a witneſſe againſt my ſelf. If I ſay I am perfect, ſayes he in the ſame place, even that proves me perverſe; If I ſay I never goe out of the way, I am out then, and therefore becauſe I ſay ſo: I have ſinned, ſayes he, What ſhall I do unto thee O thou preſerver of men? Iob felt the hand of deſtruction upon him, and he felt the hand of preſervation too; and it was all one hand; This B is Gods Method, and his alone, to preſerve by deſtroying. Men of this world do ſometimes repaire, and recompence thoſe men whom they have oppreſſed before, but this is an after recompence; Gods firſt intention even when he deſtroyes is to preſerve, as a Phyſitians firſt intention, in the moſt diſtaſtfull phyſick, is health; even Gods demolitions are ſuper-edifications, his Anatomies, his diſſections are ſo many re-compactings, ſo many reſurrections; God windes us off the Skein, that he may weave us up into the whole peece, and he cuts us out of the whole peece into peeces, that he may make us up into a whole garment. Job 9.20. Job 7.2.

But for all theſe humiliations, and confeſſions, Iob doth not wave his proteſtation; My righteouſneſſe I hold faſt, and my heart ſhall not reproach me as long as I live. Not that I ſhall never ſin, but never leave any ſin unrepented; And then, my heart cannot reproach me of a repented ſin, without reproaching God himſelf. The Sun muſt not ſet upon my anger; much C leſſe will I let the Sun ſet upon the anger of God towards me, or ſleep in an unrepēted ſin. Every nights ſleep is a Nunc dimittis; then the Lord lets his ſervant depart in peace. Thy lying down is a valediction, a parting, a taking leave, (ſhall I ſay ſo?) a ſhaking hands with God; and, when thou ſhakeſt hands with God, let thoſe hands be clean. Enter into thy grave, thy metaphoricall, thy quotidian grave, thy bed, as thou entredſt into the Church at firſt, by Water, by Baptiſme; Re-baptiſe thy ſelf every night, in Iobs Snow water, in holy tears that may cool the inordinate luſts of thy heart, and with-hold uncleane abuſes of thoſe hands even in that thy grave, thy Bed; And evermore remember Iobs feare and jealouſie in that place, That when he had waſhed himſelf in Snow water, Abominabuntur me veſtimenta mea, Mine own clothes will make me foul again. Thy fleſh is thy clothes; and to this miſchievous purpoſe of fouling thy hands with thine own clothes, thou haſt moſt clothes on when thou art naked; Then, in that nakednеſſe, thou art in moſt danger of fouling thy D hands with thine own clothes. Miſerable man! that couldeſt have no uſe of hands, nor any other organ of ſenſe, if there were no other creature but thy ſelf, & yet, if there were no other creature but thy ſelf, couldeſt ſin upon thy ſelf, and foule thy hands with thine own hands. How much more then, if thou ſtrike with thoſe hands, by oppreſſion in thy office, or ſhut up thoſe hands, and that which is due to another, in them? Sleep with cleane hands, either kept cleane all day, by integrity; or waſhed cleane, at night, by repentance; and whenſoever thou wakeſt, though all Iobs meſſengers thunder about thee, and all Iobs friends multiply miſ-interpretations againſt thee, yet Iobs proteſtation ſhall be thy proteſtation, what end ſoever God have in this proceeding, It is not for any injuſtice in my hands, and the other part of his proteſtation too, Alſo my prayer is pure. Ephes. 4.24. Job 9.30.

tion, and worſhip, and ſervice of God. For, we are of the houſhold of the faithfull, and E the ſervice which we are to doe, as his houſhold ſervants, is prayer; for, his houſe is the houſe of prayer. And therein onely is it poſſible to us, to fulfill that Commandement, pray continually, that continually, in all our familiar actions, we may ſerve God, glorifie God, (whether we eate or drink, we may doe it to his glory) and every glorifying, every thankſgiving, is prayer; there cannot be a more effectuall prayer for future, then a thankfull acknowledgement of former benefits. Petite, & dabitur; How often is that repeated in the Goſpell, and in the Epiſtles? Aske, and it ſhall be given yee; no grant without prayer, no deniall upon prayer.

It muſt be prayer, and my prayer; Alſo my prayer is pure. I muſt not rely upon the Oratio mea.
prayers of others; not of Angels; Though they be Miniſteriall ſpirits, and not onely to

God

God himſelfe, but between God and Man, and ſo, as they preſent our prayers, no doubt poure out their owne for us too, yet we muſt not rely upon the prayers of Angels. Nor of Saints; Though they have a more perſonall, and experimentall ſenſe of our miſeries then Angels have, we muſt not relie upon the prayers of Saints. No, nor upon the prayers of the Congregation, though we ſee, and heare them pray, except we make our ſelves parts of the Congregation, by true devotion, as well as by perſonall preſence. A

It muſt be mine own prayer, and no prayer is ſo truly, or ſo properly mine, as that that the Church hath delivered and recommended to me. In ſudden and unpremeditate prayer, I am not alwayes I; and when I am not my ſelf, my prayer is not my prayer. Paſſions and affections ſometimes, ſometimes bodily infirmities, and ſometimes a vain deſire of being eloquent in prayer, aliens me, withdraws me from my ſelf, and then that prayer is not my prayer. Though that prayer which Luther is ſaid to have ſaid upon his death-bed, Oremus pro Domino Deo noſtro Ieſu Chriſto, Let us pray for our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, may admit a good ſenſe, becauſe Chriſt being (as S. Auguſtine ſayes often) Caput & Corpus, both the Head and the Body, as he is the Body, the Church, ſubject to ſo many preſſures, he had need to be prayed for; yet, his ſtate being conſidered at that time, almoſt at the laſt gaſp, he being ſcarce he, that prayer can ſcarce be called his prayer. B

In that African Councell, in which S. Auguſtine was preſent, to remedy the abuſe of various formes of Prayers, which divers Churches aſſumed, it was decreed that no prayers ſhould be received in the Church, but ſuch as were compoſed, or approved by the Councell. We have proceeded ſo too; No prayers received for publique uſe, but thoſe that are delivered by publique authority; and ſo, they become My prayers. As the Law of the Land is my Law, and I have an inheritance in it, ſo the prayers of the Church are my prayers, and I have an intereſt in them, becauſe I am a Son of that family. My Baptiſme is mine, and my Abſolution is mine, becauſe the Church hath given them to me, and ſo are her prayers mine. You would ſcarce thank a man for an extemporall Elegy, or Epigram, or Panegyrique in your praiſe, if it coſt the Poet, or the Orator no paines. God will ſcarce hearken to ſudden, inconſidered, irreverent prayers. Men will ſtudy even for Complements; and Princes and Ambaſſadors will not ſpeak to one another, without thinking what they will ſay. Let not us put God to ſpeak to us ſo, (Preaching is Gods ſpeaking to us) Let not us ſpeak to God ſo, (Praying is our ſpeaking to God) not extemporally, unadviſedly, inconſiderately. Prayer muſt be my prayer; and Quid habeo quod non accepi? Even in this kinde, what have I that I have not received? I have received my prayer altogether, as a bundle of Myrrhe, in that prayer which I have received from my Saviour, and then I have received it appropriated to me, and apportioned to my particular neceſſities, and ſacrifices, by the piety and wiſdome of the Church; ſo it is my prayer, and, as Iobs prayer was, pure prayer, Alſo my prayer is pure. C D

Pura.

The Holy Ghoſt hath ſo marſhalled and diſpoſed the qualifications of Prayer in this place, as that there is no pure prayer without clean hands. The lifting up of hands was the geſture of prayer, even among the heathen, Manibus ſupplex orare ſupinis. Amongſt the Jews, Prayer, and the lifting up of hands, was one and the ſame thing, Let the lifting up of my hands be an evening Sacrifice; And, longer then Moſes hands were lifted up, his prayer had no effect. All this, perchance therefore eſpecially, that this lifting up of my hands, brings them into my ſight; then I can ſee them, and ſee whether they be clean, or no, and conſider, that if I ſee impurity in my hands, God ſees impurity in my Prayer. Can I think to receive eaſe from God with that hand that oppreſſes another? Mercy from God with that hand that exerciſes cruelty upon another? Or Bounty from God with that hand that with-holds right from another? Prayer is our hand, but it muſt be a cleane hand, pure prayer. E

Pſal. 141. 2. Exod. 17. 11.

That Emperour whom no religion would loſe, Conſtantine, (for, the heathen deified him, and the Chriſtians canonized him, They made him a god, and we came as neare as we could, we made him a Saint) that Emperour was coyned Praying. Other Emperours were coyned Triumphing, in Chariots, or preparing for Triumphs, in Battailes, and Victories, but he, Conſtantine, in that poſture, Kneeling, Praying. He knew his coyn would paſſe through every family; and to every family he deſired to be an example of piety; Every peece of ſingle money was a Catechiſme, and teſtified to every Subject all this, ſurely he will graciouſly receive my Petition, and look graciouſly upon me, when I kneele,

A kneele, for, behold he kneels to, and he exhibits petitions to that God, from whom he acknowledges, that he needs as much as I can from him. And yet this Symbolicall, and Catechisticall coyn of Constantines, was not so convincing, nor so irrefragable a testimony of his piety, (for Constantine might be coyned praying, and yet never pray) as when we see as great a Prince as he, actually, really, personally, daily, duly at prayer with us.

To end this branch, let not thy prayer be lucrative, nor vindicative, pray not for temporall superfluities, pray not for the confusion of them that differ from thee in opinion, or in manners, but condition thy prayer, inanimate thy prayer with the glory of God, and thine own everlasting happinesse, and the edification of others, and this prayer is Iobs prayer, pure prayer. And farther we enlarge not his Protestation, My hands are cleane, I do no man wrong; my prayer is pure, I mock not God. But because continuing under so great afflictions, men would not beleeve this, he proceeds, perchance to some excesse, B and inconsiderateneſſe, in desiring a manifestation of all his actions, O Earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

Difference of Expositions makes us stop here, upon this inquisition, in what affection Iob spake this. Whether this were meerly an adjuration of the earth, not to cover his blood, but that his miseries, and the cry thereof might passe, and be transferred over all the world; or whether it had the nature of an imprecation upon himself, That he wished, or admitted against himself, that which is against the nature of every man to admit, that is, to have all that ever he had done, published, declared, manifested to all the world. S. Gregory, according to his manner, through all this book, which is, to apply all Iobs sufferings to Christ, and to make Iob some kinde of type of Christ, makes no more of this, but that it is an adjuration of the earth, in the person and behalf of Christ, not to suck in, or smoother his blood, but that it might be notified, and communicated to C all the world. And truly, this is a good use, but it cannot be said to be a good sense of the place, because it cannot consist with the rest of the words. 2 Part.

Amongst our later men, Cajetan, (and he, from a Rabbi of the Jews, Aben Ezra) takes this to be an adjuration of the Earth, as Gregory does, but not, as Gregory does, in the person of Christ, but of Iob himselfe; That Iob adjures the earth, not to cover his blood, that is, not to cover the shedding of his blood, not to conspire with the malice of his enemies so much, as to deny him buriall when he was dead, that they which trod him downe alive, might not triumph over him after his death, or conclude that God did certainly forsake him alive, since he continued these declarations against him, when he was dead. And this also may have good use, but yet it is too narrow, and too shallow, to bee the sense of this phrase, this elegancy, this vehemency of the Holy Ghost, in the mouth of Iob.

D S. Chrysostome, I think, was the first that gave light to the sense of this place. He saies, that such men, as are (as they thinke) over-punished, have naturally a desire, that the world knew their faults; that so, by comparing their faults with their punishments, there might arise some pitty and commiseration of their state. And, surely, this, that Chrysostome sayes, is true, and naturall; for, if two men were to be executed together, by one kinde of death, the one for stealing a Sheep, (perchance in hunger) the other for killing his Father, certainly, he that had but stollen the Sheep, would be sorry the world should think their cases alike, or that he had killed a Father too. And in such an affection Iob sayes, I am so far from being guilty of those things that are imputed to me, that I would be content, that all that ever I have done, were knowne to all the world.

This light, which S. Chrysost. gave to this place, shined not out, (I think) till the Reformation; for, I have not observed any Author, between Chrysostome and the Reformation, that hath taken knowledge of this interpretation, nor any of the Reformation, as E from him, from Chrysostome. But, since our Authors of the Reformation, have somewhat generally pursued that sense, (Calvin hath done so, and so Tremellius, and so Piscator, and many, many more) now, one Author of the Romane Church, (one as curious and diligent in interpreting obscure places of Scripture, as any amongst them, and then more bold and confident in departing from their vulgar, and frivolous, and impertinent interpretations of Scriptures, then any amongst them) the Capuchin Bolduc, hath also pursued that sense. That sense is, that in this adjuration, or imprecation, O Earth cover not thou my blood, Blood is not literally bodily blood, but spirituall blood, the blood of the soule, exhausted by many, and hainous sins, such as they insimulated Iob of. For, in this this ſignification, is that word, Blood, often taken in the Scriptures. When God ſayes, when you ſtretch forth your hands, they are full of blood, there blood is all manner of rapine, of oppreſſion, of concuſſion, of violence. When David prayes to be delivered from blood-guiltineſſe, it is not intended onely, of an actuall ſhedding of blood, for, it is in the Originall, à ſanguinibus, in the plurall; other crimes then the actuall ſhedding of blood, are bloody crimes. Therefore, ſayes one Prophet, the land is full of bloody crimes; And, another, blood toucheth blood, whom the Chalde Parapraſe expreſſes aright, Aggregant peccata peccatis, blood toucheth blood, when ſin induces ſin. Which place of Hoſea, S. Gregory interprets too, then blood touches blood, cum ante oculos Dei, adjunctis peccatis cruentatur anima; Then God ſees a ſoule in her blood, when ſhe wounds and wounds her ſelfe againe, with variation of divers, or iteration of the ſame ſins.

Eſay 1.15. Pſal. 51.14. Ezech. 7.23. Hoſea 4.2.

This then being thus eſtabliſhed, that blood in this Text, is the blood of the ſoule, exhauſted by ſin, (for every ſin is an inciſion of the ſoule, a Lancination, a Phlebotomy, a letting of the ſoule blood, and then, a delight in ſin, is a going with open veines into a warme bath, and bleeding to death) This will be the force of Iobs Admiration, or Imprecation, O Earth cover not thou my blood, I am content to ſtand as naked now, as I ſhall doe at the day of Judgement, when all men ſhall ſee all mens actions, I deſire no diſguiſe, I deny, I excuſe, I extenuate nothing that ever I did, I would mine enemies knew my worſt, that they might ſtudy ſome other reaſon of Gods thus proceeding with me, then thoſe hainous ſinnes, which, from theſe afflictions, they will neceſſarily conclude againſt me.

But had Iob been able to have ſtood out this triall? Was Iob ſo innocent, as that he need not care, though all the world knew all? Perchance there may have been ſome exceſſe, ſome inordinateneſſe in his manner of his expreſſing it; we cannot excuſe the vehemence of ſome holy men, in ſuch expreſſions. We cannot ſay, that there was no exceſſe in Moſes his Dele me, Pardon this people, or blot my name out of thy booke; or that there was no exceſſe in S. Pauls Anathema pro fratribus, That he wiſhed to be accurſed, to be ſeparated from Chriſt for his brethren. But for Iob, we ſhall not need this excuſe; for, either we may reſtraine his words to thoſe ſins, which they imputed to him, and then they have but the nature of that proteſtation, which David made ſo often to God, Iudge me, O Lord, according to my righteouſneſſe, according to mine innocency, according to the cleanneſſe of my hands; which was not ſpoken by David ſimply, but reſpectively, not of all his ſins, but of thoſe which Saul purſued him for: Or, if we enlarge Iobs words generally to all his ſins, we muſt conſider them to be ſpoken after his repentance, and reconciliation to God thereupon; If they knew, (may Iob have ſaid) how it ſtood between God and my ſoule, how earneſtly I have repented, how fully he hath forgiven, they would never ſay, theſe afflictions proceeded from thoſe ſins.

And truly, ſo may I, ſo may every ſoule ſay, that is rectified, refreſhed, reſtored, reeſtabliſhed by the ſeales of Gods pardon, and his mercy, ſo the world would take knowledge of the conſequences of my ſins, as well as of the ſins themſelves, and read my leafes on both ſides, and heare the ſecond part of my ſtory, as well as the firſt; ſo the world would look upon my temporall calamities, the bodily ſickneſſes, and the penuriouſneſſe of my fortune contracted by my ſins, and upon my ſpirituall calamities, dejections of ſpirit, ſadneſſe of heart, declinations towards a diffidence and diſtruſt in the mercy of God, and then, when the world ſees me in this agony and bloody ſweat, in this agony and bloody ſweat would alſo ſee the Angels of heaven miniſtring comforts unto me, ſo they would conſider me in my Peccavi, and God in his Tranſtulit, Me in my earneſt Confeſſions, God in his powerfull Abſolutions, Me drawne out of one Sea of blood, the blood of mine owne ſoule, and caſt into another Sea, the bottomleſſe Sea of the blood of Chriſt Jeſus; ſo they would know as well what God hath done for my ſoule, as what my ſoule and body have done againſt my God; ſo they would reade me throughout, and look upon me altogether, I would joyne with Iob, in his confident adjuration, O Earth cover not thou my blood; Let all the world know all the ſins of my youth, and of mine age too, and I would not doubt, but God ſhould receive more glory, and the world more benefit, then if I had never ſinned. This is that that exalts Iobs confidence, he was guilty of nothing, that is, no ſuch thing as they concluded upon, of nothing abſolutely, becauſe he had repented all. And from this, his confidence riſes to a higher pitch then this, Nec clamor, O Earth cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

What

A What meanes Iob in this? Doubtfull Expoſitors make us doubt too. Some have ſaid, that Iob deſires his cry might have no place, that is, no termination, no reſting place, but that his juſt complaint might be heard over all the world; Stuñnica the Auguſtinian interprets it ſo. Some have ſaid, that he intends by his cry, his crying ſins, that they might have no place, that is, no hiding place, but that his greateſt ſins, and ſecret ſins might be brought to light; Bolduc the Capuchin interprets it ſo; according to that uſe of the word Clamor, God looked for righteouſneſſe, & ecce clamorem, behold a cry; that is, ſins crying in the eares of God. But there is more then ſo, in this phraſe, in this elegancy, in this vehemency of the Holy Ghoſt in Iobs mouth, Let my cry have no place. Clamor. Eſay 5. 7.

In the former part, (Iobs Proteſtation) he conſidered God and man; righteouſneſſe towards man in cleane hands, and, in pure prayers, devotion towards God. In this part, (his Manifeſt) he purſues the ſame method, he conſiders man, and God; Though men B knew all my ſins, that ſhould not trouble me, ſayes he, (and that we have conſidered) yea, though my cry finde no place, no place with God, that ſhould not trouble me; I ſhould be content that God ſhould ſeeme not to heare my prayers, but that hee laid me open to that ill interpretation of wicked men, Tuſh, he prayes, but the Lord heares him not, he cries, but God relieves him not. And yet, when wilt thou relieve me, O thou reliever of men, if not upon my cries, upon my prayers? Yet, S. Auguſtine hath repeated that, more then once, more then twice, Non eſt magnum exaudiri ad voluntatem, non eſt magnum; Be not over-joyed when God grants thee thy prayer. Exauditi ad voluntatem Dæmones, ſayes that Father, The Devill had his prayer granted, when he had leave to enter into the Heard of Swine; And ſo he had (ſayes he, exemplifying in our preſent example) when he obtained power from God againſt Iob. But all this aggravated the Devils puniſhment; ſo may it doe thine, to have ſome prayers granted. And, as that muſt not C over-joy thee, if it be, ſo if thy prayer be not granted, it muſt not deject thee. God ſuffered S. Paul to pray, and pray and pray, yet, after his thrice praying, granted him not that he prayed for. God ſuffered that ſi poſſibile, if it be poſſible, and that Tranſeat calix, Let this Cup paſſe, to paſſe from Chriſt himſelfe, yet he granted it not.

But, in many of theſe caſes, a man does eaſilier ſatisfie his owne minde, then other men. If God grant me not my prayer, I recover quickly, and I lay hold upon the hornes of that Altar, and ride ſafely at that Anchor, God ſaw that that which I prayed for, was not ſo good for him, nor ſo good for me. But when the world ſhall come to ſay, Where is now your Religion, where is your Reformation? doe not all other Rivers, as well as the Tiber, or the Poe, does not the Seine, and the Rhene, and the Mæne too, begin to ebbe back, and to empty it ſelfe in the Sea of Rome? why ſhould not your Thames doe ſo, as well as theſe other Rivers? Where is now your Religion, your Reformation? D Were not you as good run in the ſame channell as others doe? This is a ſhrewd tentation, and induces opprobrious concluſions from malicious enemies, when our cries have no place, our religious ſervice no preſent acceptation, our prayers no ſpeedy return from God. But yet becauſe even in this, God may propoſe farther glory to himſelfe, more benefit to me, and more edification even to them, at laſt, who, at firſt, made ill conſtructions of his proceedings, I admit, as Iob admits, O Earth cover not thou my blood, (let all the world ſee all my faults) and let my cry have no place, (let them imagine that God hath forſaken me, and does not heare my prayers;) my ſatisfaction, my acquieſcence ariſes not out of their opinion, and interpretation, that muſt not be my triall, but teſtis in cœlis, My witneſſe is in heaven, and my record is on high, which is our third, and laſt Conſideration.

E We muſt doe in this laſt, as we have done in our former two parts, crack a ſhell, to taſt the kernell, cleare the words, to gaine the Doctrine. I am ever willing to aſſiſt that obſervation, That the books of Scripture are the eloquenteſt books in the world, that every word in them hath his waight and value, his taſte and verdure. And therefore muſt not blame thoſe Tranſlators, nor thoſe Expoſitors, who have, with a particular elegancy, varied the words in this laſt clauſe of the Text, my witneſſe, and my record. The oldeſt Latine Tranſlation received this variation, and the laſt Latine, even Tremellius himſelfe, (as cloſe as he ſticks to the Hebrew) retaines this variation, Teſtis, and Conſcius. And that collection, which hath been made upon this variation, is not without uſe, that conſcius may be ſpoken de interno, that God will beare witneſſe to my inward conſcience; and teſtis, de externo, that God will, in his time, teſtifie to the world in my behalfe. But other 3 Part.

places of Scripture will more advance that obſervation of the elegancy thereof, then this; for in this, the two words ſignifie but one and the ſame thing, it is but witneſſe, and witneſſe, and no more. Not that it is eaſie to finde in Hebrew (nor, perchance, in any language) two words ſo abſolutely Synonymous, as to ſignifie the ſame thing, without any difference, but that the two words in our Text are not both of one language, not both Hebrew. For, the firſt word, Gned, is an Hebrew word, but the other, Sahad, is Syriaque; Levit. 5. 1. and both ſignifie alike, and equally, teſtem, a witneſſe. He that heares the voyce of ſwearing, and is a witneſſe, ſayes Moſes, in the firſt word of our Text; and then the Chalde Paraphraſe, intending the ſame thing, expreſſes it in the other word, Sahad. So in the contract between Laban and Jacob, Laban calls that heap of ſtones, which he had erected, Gen. 31. 47. Iegar-Sehadutha, by an extraction from the laſt word of our Text, Sahad; Jacob calls it, by the firſt word: And the reaſon is given in the body of the Text it ſelfe, in the vulgar Edition, (though how it got thither, we know not, for, in the Originall it is not) Vterq; juxta proprietatem linguæ ſuæ; Laban ſpake in his language, Syriaque, Jacob ſpake in his, Hebrew, and both called that heape of ſtones, a witneſſe. B

Now, our beſtowing this little time upon the clearing of the words, hath ſaved us much more time; for, by this meanes we have ſhortned this clauſe of our Text, and all that we are to conſider, is but this, My witneſſe is in heaven. And truly, that is enough; I care not though all the world knew all my faults, I care not what they conclude of Gods not granting my prayers, my witneſſe is in heaven. To be condemned unjuſtly amongſt men, to be ill interpreted in the acts of my Religion, is a heavy caſe; but yet, I have a relieſe in all this, my witneſſe is in heaven.

Quia in Cœlis. The firſt comfort is, Quia in Cœlis, becauſe he, whom I rely upon, is in heaven. For, that is the foundation and Baſis upon which our Saviour erects that prayer, which he hath recommended unto us, Qui es in cœlis, Our Father, which art in heaven; when I lay hold upon him there, in heaven, I purſue cheerefully and confidently all the other petitions, for daily bread, for forgiveneſſe of ſins, for deliverance from tentations; from, and for all. Eſt in cœlis, he is in heaven, and then Sedet in cœlis, he ſits in heaven; That as I ſee him in that poſture that Stephen ſaw him, ſtanding at the right hand of the Father, and ſo, Pſal. 2. 4. Acts 7. 56. in procinctu, in a readineſſe, in a willingneſſe to come to my ſuccour, ſo I might contemplate him in a judiciary poſture, in a poteſtative, a ſoveraigne poſture, ſitting, and conſider him as able, as willing to relieve me. He is in heaven, and he ſits in heaven, and then Pſal. 113. 5. habitat in cœlis, he dwels in heaven, he is, and he is alwayes there. Baals Prieſts could not alwaies finde him at home; Iobs God, and our God is never abroad. He dwels in the heavens, and, (as it is expreſſed there) In excelſis, he dwels on high; ſo high, that, (as it is there added) God humbles himſelfe, to behold the things that are in heaven. With what amazedneſſe muſt we conſider the humiliation of God, in deſcending to the earth, lower then ſo, to hell, when even his deſcending unto heaven, is a humiliation? God humbles himſelfe, when he beholds any thing lower then himſelfe, though Cherubins, though Seraphins, though the humane nature, the body of his owne, and onely eternall Son; and yet he beholds, conſiders, ſtudies us, wormes of the earth, and no men. D

Teſtis. This then is Iobs, and our firſt comfort, Quia in cœlis, becauſe he is in heaven, and ſits in heaven, and dwels in heaven, in the higheſt heaven, and ſo, ſees all things. But then, if God ſee, and ſay nothing, David apprehends that for a moſt dangerous condition; and therefore he ſayes, Be not ſilent, O Lord, leſt if thou be ſilent, I periſh. And againe, Hold not Pſal. 28. 1. Pſal. 109. 1. thy peace, O God of my praiſe, for the mouth of the wicked is opened againſt me: And, Lord, let thy mercy be as forward as their malice. And therefore, as God, from that heighth, ſees all, (and the ſtricteſt examination that we put upon any Witneſſe, is, that if he pretend to teſtifie any thing upon his knowledge, we aske, how he came by that knowledge, and if he be oculatus teſtis, a Witneſſe that ſaw it, this is good evidence) as God is to this purpoſe, all eye, and ſees all, ſo for our farther comfort, he deſcends to the office of being a Witneſſe, There is a Witneſſe in heaven. E

Teſtis meus. But then, God may be a Witneſſe, and yet not my Witneſſe, and in that, there is ſmall comfort, if God be a Witneſſe on my adverſaries ſide, a Witneſſe againſt me. Even I Jer. 29. 22. know, and am a Witneſſe, ſaith the Lord; that is, a Witneſſe of the ſins, which I know by Job 10. 17. thee. And that is that which Iob, with ſo much tenderneſſe apprehended, Thou reneweſt thy witneſſes againſt me; Thou ſent'ſt a witneſſe againſt me, in the Sabæans, upon my ſervants; and then, thou renewedſt that witneſſe in the Caldæans upon my cattell; and then, thou

renewedſt that, in thy ſtormes and tempeſts, upon my children. All this while God was a Witneſſe, but not his witneſſe, but a witneſſe on his adverſaries ſide. Now, if our own heart, our owne conſcience condemne us, this is ſhrewd evidence, ſaies S. Iohn; for mine owne conſcience, ſingle, is a thouſand witneſſes againſt me. But then, (ſaies the Apoſtle there) God is greater then the heart; for, (ſaies he) he knowes all things; He knowes circumſtances of ſinne, as well as ſubſtance; and, that, we ſeldome know, ſeldome take knowledge of. If then mine owne heart be a thouſand, God, that is greater, is ten thouſand witneſſes, if he witneſſe againſt me. But if he be my Witneſſe, a Witneſſe for me, as he alwaies multiplies in his waies of mercy, he is thouſands of thouſands, millions of millions of witneſſes in my behalfe, for there is no condemation, no poſſible condemnation, to them that are in him; not, if every graine of duſt upon the earth were an Achitophel, and gave counſell againſt me, not if every ſand upon the ſhoare were a Rabſhakeh, and railed againſt me, not if every atome in the ayre were a Satan, an Adverſary, an Accuſer, not if every drop in the Sea, were an Abaddon, an Apollyon, a Deſtroyer, there could be no condemnation, if he be my Witneſſe. If he be my Witneſſe, he proceeds thus in my behalfe, his Spirit beares witneſſe with my ſpirit, for mine inward aſſurance, that I ſtand eſtabliſhed in his favour, and, either by an actuall deliverance, or by ſome ſuch declaration, as ſhall preſerve me from fainting, if I be not actually delivered, he gives a farther teſtimony in my behalfe. For, he is in Heaven, and he ſits in Heaven, and he dwels in Heaven, in the higheſt Heaven, and ſees all, and is a Witneſſe, and my Witneſſe; there is the largeneſſe of our comfort.

1 Iohn 5. 20.

Rom. 8. 1.

But will all this come home to Iobs end and purpoſe; That he need not care though all men knew all his faults, he need not care though God paſſed over his prayers, becauſe God is his Witneſſe, what declarations ſoever he had in himſelfe, would the world beleeve, that God teſtified in his behalfe, when they ſaw his calamities multiplied upon him, and his prayers neglected? If they will not, herein lyes his, and our finall comfort, That he that is my Witneſſe, is in the higheſt Heaven, there is no perſon above him, and therefore He that is my Witneſſe, is my Judge too. I ſhall not be tried by an arbitrary Court, where it may be wiſdome enough, to follow a wiſe leader, and think as he thinks. I ſhall not be tried by a Jury, that had rather I ſuffered, then they faſted, rather I loſt my life, then they loſt a meale. Nor tryed by Peeres, where Honour ſhall be the Bible. But I ſhall be tryed by the King himſelfe, then which no man can propoſe a Nobler tryall, and that King ſhall be the King of Kings too: for, He, who in the firſt of the Revelation, is called The faithfull Witneſſe, is, in the ſame place, called The Prince of the Kings of the earth; and, as he is there produced as a Witneſſe, ſo, He is ordained to be the Iudge of the quick and the dead, and ſo, All Iudgement is committed to him. He that is my Witneſſe, is my Judge, and the ſame perſon is my Jeſus, my Saviour, my Redeemer; He that hath taken my nature, He that hath given me his blood. So that he is my Witneſſe, in his owne cauſe, and my Judge, but of his owne Title, and will, in me, preſerve himſelfe; He will not let that nature, that he hath inveſted, periſh, nor that treaſure, which he hath poured out for me, his blood, be ineffectuall. My Witneſſe is in Heaven, my Judge is in Heaven, my Redeemer is in Heaven, and in them, who are but One, I have not onely a conſtant hope, that I ſhall be there too, but an evident aſſurance, that I am there already, in his Perſon.

Iudex.

Acts 10. 42. Iohn 5. 22.

Go then in this peace, That you alwaies ſtudy to preſerve this teſtification of the Spirit of God, by outward evidences of Sanctification. You are naturally compoſed of foure Elements, and three of thoſe foure are evident, and unqueſtioned, The fourth Element, the element of Fire, is a more litigious element, more problematicall, more diſputable. Every good man, every true Chriſtian, in his Metaphyſicks, (for, in a regenerate man, all is Metaphyſicall, ſupernaturall) hath foure Elements alſo; and three of thoſe foure are declared in this text. Firſt, a good Name, the good opinion of good men, for honeſt dealing in the world, and religious diſcharge of duties towards God, That there be no injuſtice in our hands, Alſo that our prayer be pure. A ſecond Element is a good conſcience in my ſelfe, That either a holy warineſſe before, or a holy repentance after, ſettle me ſo in God, as that I care not though all the world knew all my faults. And a third element is, my Hope in God, that my Witneſſe which is in Heaven, will teſtifie for me, as a witneſſe in my behalfe, here, or acquit me, as a mercifull Judge, hereafter. Now, there may be a fourth Element, an Infallibility of finall perſeverance, grounded upon upon the eternall knowledge of God; but this is, as the Element of fire, which may be, but is not, at leaſt, is not ſo diſcernable, ſo demonſtrable as the reſt. And therefore, as men argue of the Element of fire, that whereas the other elements produce creatures in ſuch abundance, The Earth ſuch heards of Cattell, the Waters ſuch ſhoales of Fiſh, the Aire ſuch flocks of Birds, it is no unreaſonable thing, to ſtop upon this conſideration, whether there ſhould be an element of fire, more ſpacious, and comprehenſive then all the reſt, and yet produce no Creatures; ſo, if thy pretended Element of Infallibility produce no creatures, no good works, no holy actions, thou maiſt juſtly doubt there is no ſuch element in thee. In all doubts that ariſe in thee, ſtill it will be a good rule, to chooſe that now, which thou wouldſt chooſe upon thy death-bed. If a tentation to Beauty, to Riches, to Honour, be propoſed to thee, upon ſuch, and ſuch conditions, conſider whether thou wouldſt accept that, upon thoſe conditions, upon thy death-bed, when thou muſt part with them, in a few minutes. So, when thou doubteſt, in what thou ſhouldſt place thy aſſurance in God, thinke ſeriouſly, whether thou ſhalt not have more comfort then, upon thy death-bed, in being able to ſay, I have finiſhed my courſe, I have fought a good fight, I have fulfilled the ſufferings of Chriſt in my fleſh, I have cloathed him when he was naked, and fed him when he was poore, then in any other thing, that thou maieſt conceive God to have done for thee; And doe all the way, as thou wouldſt do then; prove thy element of fire, by the creatures it produces, prove thine election by thy ſanctification; for that is the right method, and ſhall deliver thee over, infallibly, to everlaſting glory at laſt, Amen.

SERMON XIV.
Preached at VVhite-hall, March 3. 1619.

AMOS 5. 18.

Woe unto you, that deſire the day of the Lord: what have yee to doe with it? the day of the Lord is darkneſſe and not light.

FOr the preſenting of the woes and judgements of God, denounced by the Prophets againſt Judah and Iſrael, and the extending and applying them to others, involved in the ſame ſins as Judah and Iſrael were, Solomon ſeemes to have given us ſomewhat a cleare direction; Reprove not a ſcorner leſt he hate thee, Rebuke a wiſe man and he will love thee. Prov. 9. 8. But how if the wiſeman and this ſcorner bee all in one man, all one perſon? If the wiſeman of this world bee come to take S. Paul ſo literally at his word, as to thinke ſcornefully that preaching is indeed but the fooliſhneſſe of preaching, and that as the Church is within the State, ſo preaching is a part of State government, flexible to the preſent occaſions of time, appliable to the preſent diſpoſitions of men; This fell upon this Prophet in this prophecie, Amaſias the Prieſt of Bethel informed the King that Amos medled with matters of State, and that the Land was not able to beare his words, Amos 7. 10. and to Amos himſelfe he ſaies, Eate thy bread in ſome other place, but prophecy here no more, for this is the Kings Chappell, and the Kings Court; Amos 13. Amos replies, I was no Prophet nor the ſon of a Prophet, but in an other courſe, and the Lord tooke me and ſaid unto me, Goe and Prophecie to my People. Though we finde no Amaſiah no miſ-interpreting Prieſt here, (wee are farre from that, becauſe we are far from having a Ieroboam to our King as he had, eaſie to give eare, eaſie to give credit to falſe informations) yet every man that comes with Gods Meſſage hither, brings a little Amaſiah of his owne, in his owne boſome, a little wiſperer in his owne heart, that tels him, This is the Kings Chappell, and it is the Kings Court, and theſe woes and judgements, and the denouncers and proclaimers of them are not ſo acceptable here. But we muſt have our owne Amos, aſwell as our Amaſias, this anſwer to this ſuggeſtion, I was no Prophet, and the Lord tooke me and bad me prophecy. What ſhall I doe?

And

A And besides, since the woe in this Text is not S. Iohns wo? his iterated, his multiplied wo, Væ, væ, væ habitantibus terram, a woe of desolation upon the whole world (for God loves this world, as the worke of his owne hands, as the subject of his providence, as the Scene of his glory, as the Garden-plot that is watered by the Blood of his Son:) Since the Woe in this Text is not Esaies wo, Væ genti peccatrici, an increpation and commination upon our whole Nation (for God hath not come so neare to any Nation, and dealt so well with any Nation as with ours:) Since the Woe in this Text is not Ezekiels Woe, Væ Civitati sanguinum, an imputation of injustice or oppression, and consequently of a malediction laid upon the whole City (for God hath carried his woes upon other Cities, Væ Chorasin, væ Bethsaida; God hath laid his heavy hand of warre and other calamities upon other Cities, that this City might see her selfe and her calamities long before in that glasse, and so avoid them:) Since the Woe in this Text, is not the Prophets other woe, B Væ domui, not a woe upon any family (for when any man in his family comes to Iosua's protestation, Ego & domus mea, As for me and my house we will serve the Lord, the Lord comes to his protestation, In mille generationes, I will shew mercy to thee and thy house for a thousand generations:) Since the Woe in this Text, is not Esaies woe againe, Væ Coronæ, (for, the same Prophet tels us of what affection they are, that they are Idolaters, persons inclin'd to an idolatrous and superstitious Religion, and fret themselves, and curse the King and their God; we know that the Prophets Væ Coronæ in that place is Væ Coronæ superbiæ, and the crowne and heighth of Pride is in him, who hath set himselfe above all that is called God. Christian Princes know that if their Crownes were but so as they seeme (all gold) they should bee but so much the heavier for being all gold; but they are but Crownes of thornes gilded, specious cares, glorious troubles, and therefore no subject of pride:) To contract this, since the Woe in this Text, is no State woe, nor Church C woe, for it is not Ezechiels Væ Pastoribus insipientibus, which cannot feed their flock, nor Ieremies Væ Pastoribus dispergentibus, Woe unto those lazie Shepheards, which doe not feed their flock but suffer them to scatter: Since the Woe in this Text is not a woe upon the whole World, nor upon the whole Nation, nor upon the whole City, nor upon any whole Family, nor upon any whole ranke or calling of men, when I have asked with Solomon, Cui væ? to whom belongs this woe? I must answer with S. Paul, Væ mihi, woe unto me if I doe not tell them to whom it belongs. And therefore since in spirituall things especially charity begins with it selfe, I shall transferre this Væ from my selfe, by laying it upon them, whom your owne conscience shall find it to belong unto; Væ desiderantibus diem Domini; Woe be unto them that desire the day of the Lord, &c.

But yet if these words can be narrow in respect of persons, it is strange, for in respect of the sins that they are directed upon, they have a great compasse; they reach from that D high sin of Presumption, and contempt, and deriding the day of the Lord, the judgements of God, and they passe through the sin of Hypocrisie, when we make shift to make the world, and to make our selves beleeve that we are in good case towards God, and would be glad that the day of the Lord, the day of judgement would come now; and then they come downe to the deepest sin, the sin of Desperation, of an unnaturall valuing of this life, when overwhelmed with the burden of other sins, or with Gods punishment for them, men grow to a murmuring wearinesse of this life, and to an impatient desire, and perchance to a practise of their owne ends: In the first acceptation, the day of the Lord is the day of his Judgements and afflictions in this life; In the second, the day of the Lord is the day of the generall judgement; And in the third, the day of the Lord, is that Crepusculum that twilight betweene the two lives, or rather that Meridies noctis, as the Poet cals it, that noone of night, the houre of our death and transmigration out of this world. E And if any desire any of these daies of the Lord, out of any of these indispositions, out of presumption, out of hypocrisie, out of desperation, he fals within the compasse of this Text, and from him we cannot take off this Væ desiderantibus.

First then the Prophet directs himself most literally upon the first sin of Presumption. They were come to say, that in truth whatsoever the Prophet declaimed in the streets, there was no such thing as Dies Domini, any purpose in God to bring such heavy judgements upon them; to the Prophets themselves they were come to say, You your selves live parched and macerated in a starved and penurious fortune, and therefore you cry out that all we must die of famine too, you your selves have not a foot of land among all the Tribes, & therfore you cry out that all the Tribes must be carried into another ther Land in Captivity. That which you call the Day of the Lord is come upon you, beggery, and nakednesse, and hunger, contempt, and affliction, and imprisonment is come upon you, and therefore you will needs extend this day upon the whole State, but desideramus, we would fain see any such thing come to passe, we would fain see God goe about to do any such thing, as that the State should not be wise enough to prevent him. To see a Prophet neglected, because he will not flatter, to see him despised below, because he is neglected above, to see him injured, insulted upon, and really damnified, because he is despised, All this is dies mundi, and not dies Domini, it is the ordinary course of the world, and no extraordinary day of the Lord, but that there should be such a stupor and consternation of minde and conscience as you talk of, and that that should be so expressed in the countenance, that they which had been purer then snow, whiter then milk, redder then Rubies, smoother then Saphirs, should not only be, as in other cases, pale with a sudden feare, but blacker in face then a coale, as the Prophet sayes there, that they should not be able to set a good face upon their miseries, nor disguise them with a confident countenance, that there should be such a consternation of countenance and conscience, and then such an excommunication of Church and State, as that the whole body of the children of Israel should be without King, without Sacrifice, without Ephod, without Terafim, Desideramus, We would fain see such a time, we would fain see such a God as were so much too hard for us.

Hos. 3. 4.

They had seen such a God before, they had known that that God had formerly brought all the people upon the face of the earth so neare to an annihilation, so neare to a new creation, as to be but eight persons in the generall flood, they had seen that God to have brought their own numerous, and multitudinous Nation, their 600000. men that came out of Ægypt to that paucity, as that but two of them are recorded to enter into the land of promise, And could they doubt what that God could do, or would do upon them? Or as Ieremy saith, Could they belie the Lord, and say it is not he? neither shall evill come upon us, or shall we see sword and famine? God expressed his anger thrice upon this people, in their State, in their form of government, First he expresst it in giving them a King, for though that be the best form of government in it self, yet for that people at that time, God saw it not to be the fittest, and so it was extorted from him, and he gave them their King in anger. Secondly, he expressed his anger in giving them two Kings in the desection of the ten Tribes, and division of the two Kingdomes. Thirdly, he expresst his anger in leaving them without any King after this Captivity which was prophesied here.

Jer. 12.

Now of those 6000. yeares, which are vulgarly esteemed to be the age and terme of this world, 3000. were past before the division of the Kingdome, and presently upon the division, they argued à divisibili ad corruptibile, what soever may be broken and divided may come to nothing. It is the devils way to come to destruction by breaking of unions. There was a contract between God and Iob, because Iob loved and feared him, and there the devill attempts to draw away the head from the union, God from Iob, with that suggestion, Doth Iob serve thee for nothing? Doest thou get any thing by this union? or doth not Iob serve himself upon thee? There was a naturall, an essentiall, an eternall union between the Father and the Son in the Trinity, and the devill sought to break that. If he could break the union in the Godhead, he saw not why he might not destroy the Godhead. The devill was Logician good enough, Omne divisibile corruptibile, whatsoever may be broken, may be annihilated. And the devill was Papist good enough, Schisma æquipollet hæresi, Whosoever is a Schismatick, departed from the obedience of the Romane Church, is easily brought within compasse of heresie too, because it is a matter of faith to affirm a necessity of such an obedience. And therefore the devil attempts to make that Schisme in the Trinity, with that, Si filius Dei es, Make these stones bread, If thou beest the Son of God, cast thy self down from this Pinnacle, that is, do something of thy self, exceed thy commission, and never attend so punctually all thy directions from thy Father. In Iobs case he would draw the head from the union; In Christs case he would alienate the Son from the Father, because division is the fore-runner (and alas, but a little way the fore-runner) of destruction. And therefore assoon as that Kingdome was come to a division between ten and two Tribes, between a King of Judah, and a King of Israel, presently upon it, and in the compasse of a very short time arose all those Prophets that prophesied of a destruction; assoon as they saw a division, they foresaw a destruction. And therefore when God had shewed before what he could doe, and declared by his

Prophets

A Prophets then what he would doe, Va desiderantibus, Woe unto them that say, Let him make speed and hasten his work, that we may see it: That is, that are yet confident that no such thing shall fall upon us, and confident with a scorn, and fulfill that which the Apostle saith, There shall come in the latter daies scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of his comming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning at the Creation. But God shall answer their scorn with scorn, as in Ezekiel, Son of man, What is that Proverb which you have in the Land of Israel, saying, The dayes are prolonged, and every vision failes? That is, the Prophets talk of great calamities, but we are safe enough, Tell them (sayes the Lord) I will make their proverb to cease, I will speak and it shall come to passe; in your dayes, O rebellious house, will I say the word, and per-form it. Esay 5.18. 2 Pet. 3.4. Ezek. 12.22.

And therefore ut quid vobis? what should you pretend to desire that day? what can ye get by that day? Because you have made a covenant with death, and are at an agreement with hell, B when that Invadens flagellum, (as the Prophet with an elegant horrot, if they can consist, expresses it) when that over-flowing scourge shall passe through, shall it not come to you? Why? who are you? have you thought of it before hand, considered it, digested it, and resolved, that in the worst that can fall, your vocall constancy, and your humane valour shall sustaine you from all dejection of spirit? what judgement of God soever shall fall upon you, whensoever this dies Domini shall break out upon you, you have light in your selves, and by that light you shall see light, and passe through all incommodities. Be not deceived, this day of the Lord is darknesse and not light, the first blast, the first breath of his indignation blowes out thy candle, extinguishes all thy Wisedome, all thy Counsells, all thy Philosophicall sentences, disorders thy Seneca, thy Plutarch, thy Tacitus, and all thy premeditations; for the sword of the Lord is a two-edged sword, it cuts bodily, and it cuts ghostly, it cuts temporally, and it cuts spiritually, it cuts off all worldly reliefe from others, C and it cuts off all Christian patience, and good interpretation of Gods correction in thine owne heart. Esay 10.15.

Vt quid vobis? what can you get by that day? can you imagine that though you have beene benighted under your owne obduration and security before, yet when this day of the Lord, the day of affliction shall come, afflictio dabit intellectum, the day will bring light of it selfe, the affliction will give understanding, and it will be time enough to see the danger and the remedy both at once, and to turne to God by that light, which that affliction shall give? Be not deceived, dies Domini tenebræ, this day of the Lord will be darknesse and not light. God hath made two great lights for man, the Sun, and the Moone; God doth manifest himselfe two waies to man, by prosperity, and adversity; but if there were no Sun, there would be no light in the Moone neither; If there be no sense of God in thy greatnesse, in thy abundance, it is a dark time to seek him in the clouds D of affliction, and heavinesse of heart. Experience teacheth us, that if we be reading any book in the evening, if the twilight surprise us, and it growes dark, yet we can reade longer in that book which we were in before, then if we took a new book of another subject into our hands: If we have been accustomed to the contemplation of God in the Sunshine of prosperity, we shall see him better in the night of misery, then if we began but then, Va desiderantibus. If you seem to desire that day of the Lord, because you doe not beleeve that that day will come, or because you beleeve that when that day comes, it will be time enough to rectifie your selves, then, Vt quod vobis? this day shall be good for nothing to either of you, for to both you it shall be darknesse, and not light.

The dayes which God made for man were darknesse, and then light, still the evening and the morning made up the day. The day which the Lord shall bring upon secure and carnall men, is darknesse without light, judgements without any beames of mercy shine E through them, such judgements, as if we will consider the vehemency of them, we shall finde them expressed in such an extraordinary heighth, as scarce any where else in Jeremy, Men shall ask one of another if they be in labour, whether they travell with childe. Wherefore do I see every man with his hands on his loines, as a woman in travell? Alas, because that day is great, and none is like it. This is the unexpected and unconsidered strangenesse of that day, if we consider the vehemency, and if we consider the suddennesse, the speed of bringing that day upon secure man. That is intimated very sufficiently in another story of the same Prophet, that when he had said to the Prophet Hananiah, That he should die within a year, when God saith, his judgements shall come shortly, if then we consider the vehemency, or the nearnesse of the day of the Lord, the day of his visitation, we shall be glad Jer. 30.7. Jer 28.16.

Ier. 17. 16. glad to ſay with that Prophet, As for me I have not deſired that woefull day thou knoweſt, that is, I have neither doubted but that there ſhall be ſuch a day, nor I have not put off my repentance to that day, for what can that do good to either of thoſe diſpoſitions, when to them it ſhall be darkneſſe, and not light? A

2 Part. Now this Woe of this Prophet thus denounced againſt contemptuous ſcorners of the day of the Lord, as that day ſignifies afflictions in this life, have had no ſubject to work upon this congregation (as by Gods grace there is none of that diſtemper here) it is a piece of a Sermon well loſt; and God be bleſſed that it hath had no uſe, that no body needed it. But as the Woe is denounced in the ſecond acceptation againſt Hypocrites, ſo it is a chain-ſhot, and in every congregation takes whole rankes, and here Dies Domini is the laſt day of Judgement, and the deſire in the Text is not, as before, a denying that any ſuch day ſhould be, but it is an hypocriticall pretence, that we have ſo well performed our duties, as that we ſhould be glad if that day would come, and then the darkneſſe of the Text is everlaſting condemnation. B

For this day of the Lord then, the laſt day of judgement, conſider only, or reflect only upon theſe three circumſtances: Firſt, there is Lex violata, a law given to thee and broken by thee. Secondly, there is Teſtis prolatus, Evidence produced againſt thee, and confeſſed by thee. And then there is Sententia lata, A judgement given againſt thee, and executed upon thee.

For the Law firſt, when that Law is To love God with all thy power, not to ſcatter thy love upon any other creature, when the Law is not to do, not to covet any ill, wilt thou ſay this Law doth not concern me, becauſe it is impoſſible in it ſelf, for this coveting, this firſt concupiſcence is not in a mans own power? Why, this Law was poſſible to man, when it was given to man, for it was naturally imprinted in the heart of man, when man was in his ſtate of innocency, and then it was poſſible, and the impoſſibility that is grown into it ſince, is by mans own fault. Man by breaking the Law, hath made the Law impoſſible, and himſelf inexcuſable; wilt thou ſay with that man in the Goſpell, Omnia hæc à juventute, I have kept all this Law from my youth? From thy youth? remember thy youth well, and what Law thou keptſt then, and thou wilt finde it to be another Law, Lex in membris, A Law of the fleſh warring againſt the Law of the minde, nay thou wilt finde that thou didſt never maintain a war againſt that Law of the fleſh, but waſt glad that thou cameſt to the obedience of that Law ſo ſoon, and art ſorry thou canſt follow that Law no longer. C

This is the Law, and wilt thou put this to triall? Wilt thou ſay who can prove it? Who comes in to give evidence againſt me? All thoſe whom thy ſollicitations have overcome, and who have overcome thy ſollicitations, good and bad, friends and enemies, Wives and Miſtreſſes, perſons moſt incompatible, and contrary, here ſhall joyne together, and be of the Jury. If S. Pauls caſe were ſo far thy caſe, as that thou wert in righteouſneſſe unblameable, no man, no woman able to teſtifie againſt thee, yet when the records of all thoughts ſhall be laid open, and a retired and obſcure man ſhall appeare to have been as ambitious in his Cloiſter, as a pretending man at the Court, and a retired woman in her chamber, appeare to be as licentious as a proſtitute woman in the Stews, when the heart ſhall be laid open, and this laid open too, that ſome ſins of the heart are the greateſt ſins of all (as Infidelity, the greateſt ſin of all, is rooted in the heart) and ſin produced to action, is but a dilatation of that ſin, and all dilatation is ſome degree of extenuation, (The body ſometimes grows weary of acting ſome ſin, but the heart never grows weary of contriving of ſin.) D

When this ſhall be that Law, and this the Evidence, what can be the Sentence, but that, Ite maledicti, Goe accurſed into everlaſting fire? where it is not as in the form of our judgement here, You ſhall be carried to the place of execution, but Ite, Goe, our own conſciences ſhall be our executioners, and precipitate us into that condemnation. It is not a Captivity of Babylon for 70. yeares, (and yet 70. yeares is the time of mans life, and why might not ſo many yeares puniſhment, expiate ſo many yeares ſinfull pleaſure?) but it is 70. millions of millions of generations, for they ſhall live ſo long in hell, as God himſelf in heaven; It is not an impriſonment during the Kings pleaſure, but during the Kings diſpleaſure, whom nothing can pleaſe nor reconcile, after he ſhall have made up that account with his Son, and told him, Theſe be all you dyed for, theſe be all you purchaſed, theſe be all whom I am bound to ſave for your ſake, for the reſt, their portion is everlaſting deſtruction. E

Under

A Under this law, under this evidence, under this ſentence, væ deſiderantibus, woe to them that pretend to deſire this day of the Lord, as though by their owne outward righteouſneſſe, they could ſtand upright in this judgement. Woe to them that ſay, Let God come when he will, it ſhall goe hard, but he ſhall finde me at Church, I heare three or foure Sermons a week; he ſhall finde me in my Diſcipline and Mortification, I faſt twice a week; he ſhall finde me in my Stewardſhip and Diſpenſation, I give tithes of all that I poſſeſſe. When Ezechias ſhewed the Ambaſſadors of Babylon all his Treaſure and his Armour, the malediction of the Prophet fell upon it, that all that Treaſure and Armour which he had ſo glorioufly ſhewed, ſhould be tranſported to them, to whom he had ſhewed it, into Babylon. He that publiſhes his good works to the world, they are carried into the world, and that is his reward. Not that there is not a good uſe of letting our light ſhine before men too, for when S. Paul ſayes, If I yet pleaſe men, I ſhould not be the ſervant of Gal. 1. 10.
B Chriſt; and when he ſaith, I doe pleaſe all men in all things: S. Auſtine found no difficulty in reconciling thoſe two; Navem quæro, ſayes he, ſed & patriam, When I goe to the Haven to hire a Ship, it is for the love I have to my Country; When I declare my faith by my works to men, it is for the love I beare to the glory of God; but if I deſire the Lords day upon confidence in theſe works, væ ſcirpo, as Iob expreſſes it, woe unto me poore ruſh, Job 8. 16.
for (ſayes he) the ruſh is greene till the Sun come, that is, ſayes Gregory upon that place, donec divina diſtrictio in judicio candeat, till the fire of the judgement examine our works, they may have ſome verdure, ſome colour, but væ deſiderantibus, woe unto them that put themſelves unto that judgement for their works ſake.

For ut quid vobis? to what end is it for you? If your hypocriticall ſecurity could hold out to the laſt, if you could delude the world at the laſt gaſp, if thoſe that ſtand about you then could be brought to ſay, he went away like a Lambe, alas the Lambe of God went
C not away ſo, the Lamb of God had his collactations, diſputations, expoſtulations, apprehenſions of Gods indignation upon him then: This ſecurity, call it by a worſe name, ſtupidity, is not a lying down like a Lamb, but a lying down like Iſſachers Aſſe between two burdens, for two greater burdens cannot be, then ſin, and the ſenſleſneſſe of ſin. Ut quid vobis? what will ye doe at that day, which ſhall be darkneſſe and not light? God dwels in luce inacceſſibili, in ſuch light as no man by the light of nature can comprehend 1 Tim. 6. 16.
here, but when that light of grace which was ſhed upon thee here, ſhould have brought thee at laſt to that inacceſſible light, then thou muſt be caſt in tenebras exteriores, into Mat. 8. 12.
darkneſſe, and darkneſſe without the Kingdome of heaven. And if the darkneſſe of this world, which was but a darkneſſe of our making, could not comprehend the light, when Chriſt in his perſon, brought the light and offered repentance, certainly in that outward darkneſſe of the next world, the darkneſſe which God hath made for puniſhment, they
D ſhall ſee nothing, neither intramittendo, nor extramittendo, neither by receiving offer of grace from heaven, nor in the diſpoſition to pray for grace in hell. For as at our inanimation in our Mothers womb, our immortall ſoule when it comes, ſwallowes up the other ſoules of vegetation, and of ſenſe, which were in us before, ſo at this our regeneration in the next world, the light of glory ſhall ſwallow up the light of grace. To as many as ſhall be within, there will need no grace to ſupply defects, nor eſchew dangers, becauſe there we ſhall have neither defects nor dangers. There ſhall be no night, no need of candle, Apoc. 22. 5.
nor of Sun, for the Lord ſhall give them light, and they ſhall raigne for ever and ever. There ſhall be no ſuch light of grace, as ſhall worke repentance to them that are in the light of glory; neither could they that are in outward darkneſſe, comprehend the light of grace, if it could flow out upon them. Firſt, you did the works of darkneſſe, ſayes the Apoſtle, Rom. 13. 12.
and then that cuſtome, that practice brought you to love darkneſſe better then light; and E then as the Prince of darkneſſe delights to transforme himſelfe into an Angell of light; Iohn 3.
ſo by your hypocriſie you pretend a light of grace, when you are darkneſſe it ſelfe, and therefore, ut quid vobis? what will you get by that day which is darkneſſe and not light?

Now as this Woe and commination of our Prophet had one aime, to beat down their ſcorne which derided the judgements of God in this world, and a ſecond aime to beat downe their confidence, that thought themſelves of themſelves able to ſtand in Gods judgements in the next world; ſo it hath a third mark better then theſe two, it hath an aime upon them in whom a wearineſſe of this life, when Gods corrections are upon them, or ſome other miſtaking of their owne eſtate and caſe, works an over-haſty and impatient 3. desire of death, and in this sense and acceptation, the day of the Lord is the day of our death and transmigration out of this world, and the darknesse is still everlasting darknesse. A

Iob.7.1. Now for this we take our lesson in Iob, Vita militia, mans life is a warfare; man might have lived at peace, he himselfe chose a rebellious warre, and now quod volens expetiit nolens portat, that warre which he willingly embarked himselfe in at first, though it be against his will now, he must goe through with. In Iob we have our lesson, and in S. Paul we have

Greg.

Eph 6 3. our Law, Take ye the whole armour of God, that ye may be able having done all to stand; that is, that having overcome one temptation, you may stand in battle against the next, for it is not adolescentia militia, but vita; that we should think to triumph if we had overcome the heat and intemperance of youth, but we must fight it out to our lives end. And then we have the reward of this lesson, and of this law limited, nemo coronatur, no man is crowned, except he fight according to this law that is, he persever to the end. And as we have our

2 Tim. 2. 5. lesson in Iob, our rule and reward in the Apostle, who were both great Commanders in the B

Mat. 26. 38. warfare; so we have our example in our great Generall, Christ Jesus, Who though his soul were heavy, and heavy unto death, though he had a baptisme to be baptised with, & coarctabatur, he was straightned, and in paine till it were accomplished, and though he had power to lay

Iohn 10. 18. down his soul, and take it up againe, and no man else could take it from him, yet he sought it out to the last houre, and till his houre came, he would not prevent it, nor lay downe his soule. Va desiderantibus, woe unto them that desire any other end of Gods correction, but what he hath ordained and appointed, for ut quid vobis? what shall you get by choosing your owne wayes? Tenebræ & non lux; They shall passe out of this world, in this inward darknesse of melancholy, and dejection of spirit, into the outward darknesse, which is an everlasting exclusion from the Father of lights, and from the Kingdome of joy; their case is well expressed in the next verse to our Text, they shall flie from a Lyon, and a Beare shall meet them, they shall leane on a wall, and a Serpent shall bite them; they shall end this life by a miserable C and hasty death, and out of that death shall grow an immortall life in torments, which no wearinesse, nor desire, nor practice can ever bring to an end.

And here in this acceptation of these words, this va falls directly upon them who colouring and apparelling treason in martyrdome, expose their lives to the danger of the Scribanius. Law, & embrace death; these of whom one of their own society saith, that the Scevolaes, the Caves, the Porciaes, the Cleopatraes of the old time, were nothing to the Jesuites, for saith he, they could dye once, but they lacked courage ad multas mortes; perchance hee meanes, that after those men were once in danger of the Law, and forfeited their lives by one comming, they could come again and again, as often as the plentifull mercy of their King would send them away, Rapiunt mortem spontanea irruptione, sayes he to their glory, they are voluntary and violent pursuers of their own death, and as he expresses it, Crederes morbo adesos, you would think that the desire of death is a disease in them; A graver

Baron. Martyrol. 29. Decemb. man then he mistakes their case and cause of death as much, you are (saith he, incouraging those of our Nation to the pursuit of death) in sacris septis ad martyrium saginati, fed up and fatned here for martyrdome, & Sacramento sanguinem sponsondistis, they have taken an oath that they will be hanged, but that he in whom (as his great patterne God himselfe) mercy is above all his works, out of his abundant sweetnesse makes them perjured when they have so sworne and vowed their owne ruine. But those that send them, give not the lives of these men so freely, so cheaply as they pretend. But as in dry Pumps, men poure in a little water, that they may pump up more; so they are content to drop in a little blood of imaginary, but traiterous Martyrs, that, by that at last they may draw up at last the royall blood of Princes, and the loyall blood of Subjects; va desiderantibus, woe to them that are made thus ambitious of their owne ruine, ut quid vobis? Tenebræ & non lux, you are kept in darknesse in this world, and sent into darknesse from heaven into the next, and so your ambition, ad multas mortes, shall be satisfied, you dye more then one death, morte moriemini, this death delivers you to another, from which you shall never be delivered. E

Conclusion. We have now past through these three acceptations of these words, which have falne into the contemplation, and meditation of the Ancients in their Expositions of this Text; as this dark day of the Lord, signifies his judgements upon Atheisticall scorners in this world, as it signifies his last irrevocable, and irremediable judgements upon hypocriticall relyers upon their own righteousnesse in the next world, and between both, as it signifies their uncomfortable passage out of this life, who bring their death inordinately upon themselves; and we shall shut up all with one signification more of the Lords day, That,

A that is the Lords day, of which the whole Lent is the Vigil, and the Eve. All this time of mortification, and our often meeting in this place to heare of our mortality, and our immortality, which are the two reall Texts, and Subjects of all our Sermons; All this time is the Eve of the Resurrection of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. That is the Lords day, when all our mortification, and dejection of spirit, and humbling of our soules, shall be abundantly exalted in his resurrection, and when all our fasts and abstinence shall be abundantly recompenced in the participation of his body & his bloud in the Sacrament; Gods Chancery is alwayes open, and his seale works alwaies; at all times remission of sins may be sealed to a penitent soule in the Sacrament. That clause which the Chancellors had in their Patents under the Romane Emperours, Vt prærogativam gerat conscientiæ nostræ, is in our commission too, for God hath put his conscience into his Church, & whose sins are remitted there, are remitted in heaven at all times, but yet dies Domini, the Lords
B resurrection is as the full Terme, a more generall application of this seale of reconciliation: But væ desiderantibus, woe unto them that desire that day, only because they would have these dayes of preaching, and prayer, and fasting, and troublesome preparation, part and gone. Væ desiderantibus, woe unto them who desire that day, onely, that by receiving the Sacrament day, that they might delude the world, as though they were not of a contrary religion in their heart, væ desiderantibus, woe unto them who present themselves that day without such a preparation as becomes so fearful and mysterious an action, upon any carnall or collaterall respects. Before that day of the Lord comes, comes the day of his crucifying; before you come to that day, if you come not to a crucifying of your selves to the world, and the world to you, at quid vobis? what shall you get by that day? you shall prophane that day, and the Author of it, as to make that day of Christs triumph, the triumph of Satan, and to make even that body and bloud of Christ Jesus, Vehiculum Satanæ, his Chariot to enter into you, as he did into Iudas.
C That day of the Lord will be darknesse and not light, and that darknesse will be, that you shall not discerne the Lords body, you shall scatter all your thoughts upon wrangling and controversies, de modo, how the Lords body can be there, and you shall not discerne by the effects, nor in your owne conscience, that the Lords body is there at all. But you shall take it to be onely an obedience to civill or Ecclesiasticall constitutions, or onely a testimony of outward conformity, which should be signaculum & viaticum, a seale of pardon for past sins, and a provision of grace against future. But he that is well prepared for this, strips himselfe of all these væ desiderantibus, of all these comminations that belong to carnall desires, and he shall be as Daniel was, vir desideriorum, a man of chast and heavenly desires onely; hee shall desire that day of the Lord, as that day signifies affliction here, with David, Bonum est mihi quòd humiliasti me, I am mended by my sicknesse, enriched by my poverty, and
D strengthened by my weaknesse; and with S. Bern. desire, Irascaris mihi Domine, O Lord be angry with me, for if thou chidest me not, thou considerest me not, if I taste no bitternesse, I have no Physick; If thou correct me not, I am not thy son: And he shall desire that day of the Lord, as that day signifies, the last judgement, with the desire of the Martyrs under the Altar, Vsquequo Domine? How long, O Lord, ere thou execute judgement? And he shall desire this day of the Lord, as this day is the day of his own death, with S. Pauls desire, Cupio dissolvi, I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ. And when this day of the Lord, as it is the day of the Lords resurrection shall come, his soule shall be satisfied as with marrow, and with fatnesse, in the body and bloud of his Saviour, and in the participation of all his merits, as intirely, as if all that Christ Jesus hath said, and done, and suffered, had beene said, and done, and suffered for his soule alone. Enlarge our daies, O Lord, to that blessed day, prepare us before that day, seale to us at that day, ratifie to us after that day, all the E daies of our life, an assurance in that Kingdome, which thy Son our Saviour hath purchased for us, with the inestimable price of his incorruptible bloud, To which glorious Son of God, &c.

SERMON XV.

Preached at VVhite-hall, March 8. 1621.

1 COR. 15. 26.

The laſt Enemie that ſhall be deſtroyed, is Death.

THis is a Text of the Reſurrection, and it is not Eaſter yet; but it is Eaſter Eve; All Lent, is but the Vigill, the Eve of Eaſter: to ſo long a Feſtivall as never ſhall end, the Reſurrection, wee may well begin the Eve betimes. Forty yeares long was God grieved for that Generation which he loved; let us be content to humble our ſelves forty daies, to be fitter for that glory which we expect. In the Booke of God there are many Songs; there is but one Lamentation: And that one Song of Solomon, nay ſome one of Davids hundred and fiftie Pſalmes, is longer then the whole booke of Lamentations. Make way to an everlaſting Eaſter by a ſhort Lent, to an undeterminable glory, by a temporary humiliation. You muſt weepe theſe teares, teares of contrition, teares of mortification, before God will wipe all teares from your eyes; You muſt dye this death, ~~this~~ death of the righteous, the death to ſin, before this laſt enemy, Death, ſhalbe deſtroyed in you, and you made partakers of everlaſting life in ſoule and body too.

Diviſo. Our diviſion ſhall be but a ſhort, and our whole exerciſe but a larger paraphraſe upon the words. The words imply firſt, That the Kingdome of Chriſt, which muſt be perfected, muſt be accompliſhed, (becauſe all things muſt be ſubdued unto him) is not yet perfected, not accompliſhed yet. Why? what lacks it? It lacks the bodies of Men, which yet lie under the dominion of another. When we ſhall alſo ſee by that Metaphor which the Holy Ghoſt chooſeth to expreſſe that in, which is that there is Hoſtis, and ſo Militia, an enemie, and a warre, and therefore that Kingdome is not perfected, that he places perfect happineſſe, and perfect glory, in perfect peace. But then how far is any State conſiſting of many men, how far the ſtate, and condition of any one man in particular, from this perfect peace? How truly a warfare is this life, if the Kingdome of Heaven it ſelfe, have not this peace in perfection? And it hath it not, Quia hoſtis, becauſe there is an enemy: though that enemy ſhall not overthrow it, yet becauſe it plots, and workes, and machinates, and would overthrow it, this is a defect in that peace.

Who then is this enemy? An enemy that may thus far thinke himſelfe equall to God, that as no man ever ſaw God, and lived; ſo no man ever ſaw this enemy and lived, for it is Death; And in this may thinke himſelfe in number ſuperiour to God, that many men live who ſhall never ſee God; But Quis homo, is Davids queſtion, which was never anſwered, Is there any man that lives, and ſhall not ſee death? An enemie that is ſo well victualled againſt man, as that he cannot want as long as there are men, for he feeds upon man himſelfe. And ſo well armed againſt Man, as that he cannot want Munition, while there are men, for he fights with our weapons, our owne faculties, nay our calamities, yea our owne pleaſures are our death. And therefore he is Noviſſimus hoſtis, ſaith the Text, The laſt enemy.

We have other Enemies; Satan about us, ſin within us; but the power of both thoſe, this enemie ſhall deſtroy; but when they are deſtroyed, he ſhall retaine a hoſtile, and triumphant dominion over us. But Vſque quo Domine? How long O Lord? for ever? No, Abolebitur: wee ſee this Enemy all the way, and all the way we feele him; but we ſhall ſee him deſtroyed; Abolebitur. But how? or when? At, and by the reſurrection of our bodies: for as upon my expiration, my tranſmigration from hence, as ſoone as my ſoule enters into Heaven, I ſhall be able to ſay to the Angels, I am of the ſame ſtuffe as you, ſpirit, and ſpirit, and therefore let me ſtand with you, and looke upon the face of your God, and my God; ſo at the Reſurrection of this body, I ſhall be able to ſay to the Angel of

A of the great Councell, the Son of God, Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe, I am of the ſame ſtuffe as you, Body and body, Fleſh and fleſh, and therefore let me ſit downe with you, at the right hand of the Father in an everlaſting ſecurity from this laſt enemie, who is now deſtroyed, death. And in theſe ſeven ſteps we ſhall paſſe apace, and yet cleerely through this paraphraſe.

Veſtig. 1. Quia deſunt Corpora.

We begin with this; That the Kingdome of Heaven hath not all that it muſt have to a conſummate perfection, till it have bodies too. In thoſe infinite millions of millions of generations, in which the holy, bleſſed, and glorious Trinity enjoyed themſelves one another, and no more, they thought not their glory ſo perfect, but that it might receive an addition from creatures; and therefore they made a world, a materiall world, a corporeall world, they would have bodies. In that noble part of that world which Moſes cals the Firmament, that great expanſion from Gods chaire to his footſtoole, from Heaven
B to earth, there was a defect, which God did not ſupply that day, nor the next, but the fourth day, he did; for that day he made thoſe bodies, thoſe great, and lightſome bodies, the Sunne, and Moone, and Starres, and placed them in the Firmament. So alſo the Heaven of Heavens, the Preſence Chamber of God himſelfe, expects the preſence of our bodies.

No State upon earth, can ſubſiſt without thoſe bodies, Men of their owne. For men that are ſupplied from others, may either in neceſſity, or in indignation, be withdrawne, and ſo that State which ſtood upon forraine legs, ſinks. Let the head be gold, and the Dan. 2. 31.
armes ſilver, and the belly braſſe, if the feete be clay, Men that may ſlip, and molder away, all is but an Image, all is but a dreame of an Image: for forraine helps are rather crutches then legs. There muſt be bodies, Men, and able bodies, able men; Men that
C eate the good things of the land, their owne figges and olives; Men not macerated with extortions: They are glorified bodies that make up the kingdome of Heaven, bodies that partake of the good of the State, that make up the State. Bodies, able bodies, and laſtly, bodies inanimated with one ſoule: one vegetative ſoule, all muſt be ſenſible and compaſſionate of one anothers miſerie; and eſpecially the Immortall ſoule, one ſupreame ſoule, one Religion. For as God hath made us under good Princes, a great example of all that, Abundance of Men, Men that live like men, men united in one Religion, ſo wee need not goe farre for an example of a ſlippery, and uncertaine being, where they muſt ſtand upon others Mens men, and muſt over-load all men with exactions, and diſtortions, and convulſions, and earthquakes in the multiplicity of Religions.

The Kingdome of Heaven muſt have bodies; Kingdomes of the earth muſt have them; and if upon the earth thou beeſt in the way to Heaven, thou muſt have a body too, a body of thine owne, a body in thy poſſeſſion: for thy body hath thee, and not
D thou it, if thy body tyrannize over thee. If thou canſt not withdraw thine eye from an object of tentation, or withhold thy hand from ſubſcribing againſt thy conſcience, nor turne thine eare from a popular, and ſeditious Libell, what haſt thou towards a man? Thou haſt no ſoule, nay thou haſt no body: There is a body, but thou haſt it not, it is not thine, it is not in thy power. Thy body will rebell againſt thee even in a ſin: It will not performe a ſin, when, and where thou wouldſt have it. Much more will it rebell againſt any good worke, till thou have imprinted Stigmata Ieſu, The Markes of the Lord Gal. 6. 17.
Ieſus, which were but exemplar in him, but are eſſentiall, and neceſſary to thee, abſtinencies, and ſuch diſcreete diſciplines, and mortifications, as may ſubdue that body to thee, and make it thine: for till then it is but thine enemy, and maintaines a warre againſt thee; and war, and enemie is the Metaphore which the holy Ghoſt hath taken here to expreſſe a want, a kind of imperfectneſſe even in Heaven it ſelfe. Bellum Symbolum mali.
E As peace is of all goodneſſe, ſo warre is an embleme, a Hieroglyphique, of all miſery; And that is our ſecond ſtep in this paraphraſe.

Veſtig. 2. Pax & bellum.

If the feete of them that preach peace, be beautifull, (And, O how beautifull are the feete of them that preach peace? The Prophet Iſaiah askes the queſtion, 52. 7. And the Prophet Nahum askes it, 1. 15. and the Apoſtle S. Paul askes it, Rom. 10. 15. They all aske it, but none anſwers it) who ſhall anſwer us, if we aske, How beautifull is his face, who is the Author of this peace, when we ſhall ſee that in the glory of Heaven, the Center of all true peace? It was the inheritance of Chriſt Jeſus upon the earth, he had it at his birth, he brought it with him, Glory be to God on high, peace upon earth. It was his purchaſe upon Luke 2. 14.
earth, He made peace (indeed he bought peace) through the blood of his Croſſe. It was his Coloſ. 1. 20.

Iohn 14.27. Teſtament, when he went from earth; Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you. Divide with him in that bleſſed Inheritance, partake with him in that bleſſed Purchaſe, enrich thy ſelfe with that bleſſed Legacy, his Peace. A

Let the whole world be in thy conſideration as one houſe; and then conſider in that, in the peacefull harmony of creatures, in the peacefull ſucceſſion, and connexion of cauſes, and effects, the peace of Nature. Let this Kingdome, where God hath bleſſed thee with a being, be the Gallery, the beſt roome of that houſe, and conſider in the two walls of that Gallery, the Church and the State, the peace of a royall, and a religious Wiſedome; Let thine owne family be a Cabinet in this Gallery, and finde in all the boxes thereof, in the ſeverall duties of Wife, and Children, and ſervants, the peace of vertue, and of the father and mother of all vertues, active diſcretion, paſſive obedience; and then laſtly, let thine owne boſome be the ſecret box, and reſerve in this Cabinet, and then the beſt Jewell in the beſt Cabinet, and that in the beſt Gallery of the beſt houſe that can be had, peace with the Creature, peace in the Church, peace in the State, peace in thy houſe, peace in thy heart, is a faire Modell, and a lovely deſigne even of the heavenly Jeruſalem which is Viſio pacis, where there is no object but peace. B

And therefore the holy Ghoſt to intimate to us, that happy perfectneſſe, which wee ſhall have at laſt, and not till then, chooſes the Metaphor of an enemy, and enmity, to avert us from looking for true peace from any thing that preſents it ſelfe in the way. Neither truly could the holy Ghoſt imprint more horror by any word, then that which intimates war, as the word enemy does. It is but a little way that the Poet hath got in deſcription of war, Iam ſeges eſt, that now, that place is ploughed where the great City ſtood: for it is not ſo great a depopulation to tranſlate a City from Merchants to huſbandmen, from ſhops to ploughes, as it is from many Husbandmen to one Shepheard, and yet that hath beene often done. And all that, at moſt, is but a depopulation, it is not a devaſtation, that Troy was ploughed. But, when the Prophet Iſaiah comes to the devaſtation, to the extermination of a war, he expreſſes it firſt thus; Where there were a thouſand Vineyards at a cheape rate, all the land become briars and thornes: That is much; but there is more, The earth ſhall be removed out of her place; that Land, that Nation, ſhall no more be called that Nation, nor that Land: But, yet more then that too; Not onely, not that people, but no other ſhall ever inhabit it. It ſhall never be inhabited from generation to generation, neither ſhall Shepheards be there; Not onely no Merchant, nor Husbandman, but no depopulator: none but Owles, and Oſtriches, and Satyres, Indeed God knowes what, Ochim, and Ziim, words which truly we cannot tranſlate. C

Eſay 7.23. Eſay 13.13. Eſay 13.19.

In a word, the horror of War is beſt diſcerned in the company he keeps, in his aſſociates. And when the Prophet Gad brought War into the preſence of David, there came with him Famine, and Peſtilence. And when Famine entred, we ſee the effects; It brought Mothers to eat their Children of a ſpan long; that is, as ſome Expoſitors take it, to take medicines to procure abortions, to caſt their Children, that they might have Children to eate. And when War's other companion, the Peſtilence entred, we ſee the effects of that too: In leſſe then half the time that it was threatned for, it devoured threeſcore and ten thouſand of Davids men; and yet for all the vehemence, the violence, the impetuouſneſſe of this Peſtilence, David choſe this Peſtilence rather then a War. Militia and Malitia, are words of ſo neare a ſound, as that the vulgat Edition takes them as one. For where the Prophet ſpeaking of the miſeries that Hieruſalem had ſuffered, ſayes, Finita militia ejus, Let her warfare be at an end, they reade, Finita malitia ejus, Let her miſery be at an end; War and Miſery is all one thing. But is there any of this in heaven? Even the Saints in heaven lack ſomething of the conſummation of their happineſſe, Quia hoſtis, becauſe they have an enemy. And that is our third and next ſtep. D E

2 Sam. 24.13. Eſay 40.2. Veſt. 3. Quia Hoſtis.

Michael and his Angels fought againſt the devill and his Angels; though that war ended in victory, yet (taking that war, as divers Expoſitors doe, for the fall of Angels) that Kingdome loſt ſo many inhabitants, as that all the ſoules of all that ſhall be ſaved, ſhall but fill up the places of them that fell, and ſo make that Kingdome but as well as it was before that war: So ill effects accompany even the moſt victorious war. There is no war in heaven, yet all is not well, becauſe there is an enemy; for that enemy would kindle a war again, but that he remembers how ill he ſped laſt time he did ſo. It is not an enemy that invades neither, but only detaines: he detaines the bodies of the Saints which are in heaven, and therefore is an enemy to the Kingdome of Chriſt; He that detaines taines the ſoules of men in Superſtition, he that detaines the hearts and allegeance of Subjects in an hæſitation, a vacillation, an irreſolution, where they ſhall fix them, whether upon their Soveraign, or a forraigne power, he is in the notion, and acceptation of enemy in this Text; an enemy, though no hoſtile act be done. It is not a war, it is but an enemy; not an invading, but a detaining enemy; and then this enemy is but one enemy, and yet he troubles, and retards the conſummation of that Kingdome.

Antichriſt alone is enemy enough; but never carry this conſideration beyond thy ſelf. As long as there remaines in thee one ſin, or the ſinfull gain of that one ſin, ſo long there is one enemy, and where there is one enemy, there is no peace. Gardners that husband their ground to the beſt advantage, ſow all their ſeeds in ſuch order, one under another, that their Garden is alwayes full of that which is then in ſeaſon. If thou ſin with that providence, with that ſeaſonableneſſe, that all thy ſpring, thy youth be ſpent in wantonneſſe, all thy Summer, thy middle-age in ambition, and the wayes of preferment, and thy Autumne, thy Winter in indevotion and covetouſneſſe, though thou have no farther taſte of licentiouſneſſe, in thy middle-age, thou haſt thy ſatiety in that ſin, nor of ambition in thy laſt yeares, thou haſt accumulated titles of honour, yet all the way thou haſt had one enemy, and therefore never any perfect peace. But who is this one enemy in this Text? As long as we put it off, and as loath as we are to look this enemy in the face, yet we muſt, though it be Death. And this is Veſtigium quartum, The fourth and next ſtep in this paraphraſe.

Surge & deſcende in domum figuli, ſayes the Prophet Ieremy, that is, ſay the Expoſitors, to the conſideration of thy Mortality. It is Surge, deſcende, Ariſe and go down: A deſcent with an aſcenſion: Our grave is upward, and our heart is upon Iacobs Ladder, in the way, and nearer to heaven. Our daily Funerals are ſome Emblemes of that; for though we be laid down in the earth after, yet we are lifted up upon mens ſhoulders before. We riſe in the deſcent to death, and ſo we do in the deſcent to the contemplation of it. In all the Potters houſe, is there one veſſell made of better ſtuffe then clay? There is his matter. And of all formes, a Circle is the perfecteſt, and art thou loath to make up that Circle, with returning to the earth again?

Thou muſt, though thou be loath. Fortaſſe, ſayes S. Auguſtine, That word of contingency, of caſualty, Perchance, In omnibus ferme rebus, præterquam in morte locum habet: It hath roome in all humane actions excepting death. He makes his example thus: ſuch a man is married; where he would, or at leaſt where he muſt, where his parents, or his Gardian will have him; ſhall he have Children? Fortaſſe, ſayes he, They are a yong couple, perchance they ſhall: And ſhall thoſe Children be ſons? Fortaſſe, they are of a ſtrong conſtitution, perchance they ſhall: And ſhall thoſe ſons live to be men? Fortaſſe, they are from healthy parents, perchance they ſhall: And when they have lived to be men, ſhall they be good men? Such as good men may be glad they may live? Fortaſſe, ſtill; They are of vertuous parents, it may be they ſhall: But when they are come to that Morientur, ſhall thoſe good men die? here, ſayes that Father, the Fortaſſe vaniſhes; here it is omnino, certè, ſine dubitatione; infallibly, inevitably, irrecoverably they muſt die. Doth not man die even in his birth? The breaking of priſon is death, and what is our birth, but a breaking of priſon? Aſſoon as we were clothed by God, our very apparell was an Embleme of death. In the ſkins of dead beaſts, he covered the ſkins of dying men. Aſſoon as God ſet us on work, our very occupation was an Embleme of death; It was to digge the earth; not to digge pitfals for other men, but graves for our ſelves. Hath any man here forgot to day, that yeſterday is dead? And the Bell tolls for to day, and will ring out anon; and for as much of every one of us, as appertaines to this day. Quotidiè morimur, & tamen nos eſſe æternos putamus, ſayes S. Hierome; We die every day, and we die all the day long; and becauſe we are not abſolutely dead, we call that an eternity, an eternity of dying: And is there comfort in that ſtate? why, that is the ſtate of hell it ſelf, Eternall dying, and not dead.

But for this there is enough ſaid, by the Morall man; (that we may reſpite divine proofes, for divine points anon, for our ſeverall Reſurrections) for this death is meerly naturall, and it is enough that the morall man ſayes, Mors lex, tributum, officium mortalium. Firſt it is lex, you were born under that law, upon that condition to die: ſo it is a rebellious thing not to be content to die, it oppoſes the Law. Then it is Tributum, an impoſition which nature the Queen of this world layes upon us, and which ſhe will take, when

when and where ſhe liſt; here a yong man, there an old man, here a happy, there a miſerable man; And ſo it is a ſeditious thing not to be content to die, it oppoſes the prerogative. And laſtly, it is Officium, men are to have their turnes, to take their time, and then to give way by death to ſucceſſors; and ſo it is Incivile, inofficioſum, not to be content to die, it oppoſes the frame and form of government. It comes equally to us all, and makes us all equall when it comes. The aſhes of an Oak in the Chimney, are no Epitaph of that Oak, to tell me how high or how large that was; It tels me not what flocks it ſheltered while it ſtood, nor what men it hurt when it fell. The duſt of great perſons graves is ſpeechleſſe too, it ſayes nothing, it diſtinguiſhes nothing: As ſoon the duſt of a wretch whom thou wouldeſt not, as of a Prince whom thou couldeſt not look upon, will trouble thine eyes, if the winde blow it thither; and when a whirle-winde hath blowne the duſt of the Church-yard into the Church, and the man ſweeps out the duſt of the Church into the Church-yard, who will undertake to ſift thoſe duſts again, and to pronounce, This is the Patrician, this is the noble flowre, and this the yeomanly, this the Plebeian bran. So is the death of Ieſabel (Ieſabel was a Queen) expreſſed; They ſhall not ſay, this is Ieſabel; not only not wonder that it is, nor pity that it ſhould be, but they ſhall not ſay, they ſhall not know, This is Ieſabel. It comes to all, to all alike; but not alike welcome to all. To die too willingly, out of impatience to wiſh, or out of violence to haſten death, or to die too unwillingly, to murmure at Gods purpoſe revealed by age, or by ſickneſſe, are equall diſtempers; and to harbour a diſobedient loathneſſe all the way, or to entertain it at laſt, argues but an irreligious ignorance; An ignorance, that death is in nature but Expiratio, a breathing out, and we do that every minute; An ignorance that God himſelf took a day to reſt in, and a good mans grave is his Sabbath; An ignorance that Abel the beſt of thoſe whom we can compare with him, was the firſt that dyed. Howſoever, whenſoever, all times are Gods times: Vocantur boni ne diutiùs vexentur à noxiis, mali ne diutiùs bonos perſequantur, God cals the good to take them from their dangers, and God takes the bad to take them from their triumph. And therefore neither grudge that thou goeſt, nor that worſe ſtay, for God can make his profit of both; Aut ideo vivit ut corrigatur, aut ideo ut per illum bonus exerceatur; God reprieves him to mend him, or to make another better by his exerciſe; and not to exult in the miſery of another, but to glorifie God in the wayes of his juſtice, let him know, Quantumcunq; ſerò, ſubitò ex hac vita tollitur, qui finem prævidere neſcivit: How long ſoever he live, how long ſoever he lie ſick, that man dies a ſudden death, who never thought of it. If we conſider death in S. Pauls Statutum eſt, It is decreed that all men muſt die, there death is indifferent; If we conſider it in his Mori lucrum, that it is an advantage to die, there death is good; and ſo much the vulgat Edition ſeemes to intimate, when (Deut. 30. 19.) whereas we reade, I have ſet before you life and death, that reades it, Vitam & bonum, Life and that which is good. If then death be at the worſt indifferent, and to the good, good, how is it Hoſtis, an enemy to the Kingdome of Chriſt? for that alſo is Veſtigium quintum, the fift and next ſtep in this paraphraſe.

Sap. 1. 13.

Firſt God did not make death, ſaies the Wiſeman, And therefore S. Auguſtine makes a reaſonable prayer to God, Ne permittas Domine quod non feciſti, dominari Creaturæ quam feciſti; Suffer not O Lord, death, whom thou didſt not make, to have dominion over me whom thou didſt. Whence then came death? The ſame Wiſeman hath ſhewed us the father, Through envy of the devill, came death into the world; and a wiſer then he, the holy Ghoſt himſelfe hath ſhewed us the Mother, By ſin came death into the world. But yet if God have naturalized death, taken death into the number of his ſervants, and made Death his Commiſſioner to puniſh ſin, and he doe but that, how is Death an enemy? Firſt, he was an enemy in invading Chriſt, who was not in his Commiſſion, becauſe he had no ſin; and ſtill he is an enemie, becauſe ſtill he adheres to the enemy. Death hangs upon the edge of every perſecutors ſword; and upon the ſting of every calumniators, and accuſers tongue. In the Bull of Phalaris, in the Bulls of Baſan, in the Buls of Babylon, the ſhrewdeſt Buls of all, in temporall, in ſpirituall perſecutions, ever ſince God put an enmity between Man, and the Serpent, from the time of Cain who began in a murther, to the time of Antichriſt, who proceeds in Maſſacres, Death hath adhered to the enemy, and ſo is an enemy.

Sap. 2. ult.

Rom. 5. 12.

Death hath a Commiſſion, Stipendium peccati mors eſt, The reward of ſin is Death, but where God gives a Superſedeas, upon that Commiſſion, Vivo Ego, nolo mortem, As I live

Auguſt.

Gregor.

A live ſaith the Lord, I would have no ſinner dye, not dye the ſecond death, yet Death proceeds to that execution: And whereas the enemy, whom he adheres to, the Serpent himſelfe, hath power but In calcaneo, upon the heele, the lower, the mortall part, the body of man, Death is come up into our windowes, ſaith the Prophet, into our beſt lights, our underſtandings, and benights us there, either with ignorance, before ſin, or with ſenſeleſneſſe after: And a Sheriffe that ſhould burne him, who were condemned to be hanged, were a murderer, though that man muſt have dyed: To come in by the doore, by the way of ſickneſſe upon the body, is, but to come in at the window by the way of ſin, is not deaths Commiſſion; God opens not that window. Jer. 9. 21.

So then he is an enemy, for they that adhere to the enemy are enemies: And adhering is not only a preſent ſubminiſtration of ſupply to the enemy (for that death doth not) but it is alſo a diſpoſition to aſſiſt the enemy, then when he ſhall be ſtrong enough to make
B benefit of that aſſiſtance. And ſo death adheres; when ſin and Satan have weakned body and minde, death enters upon both. And in that reſpect he is Vltimus hoſtis, the laſt enemy, and that is Sextum veſtigium, our ſixth and next ſtep in this paraphraſe.

Death is the laſt, and in that reſpect the worſt enemy. In an enemy, that appeares at firſt, when we are or may be provided againſt him, there is ſome of that, which we call Honour: but in the enemie that reſerves himſelfe unto the laſt, and attends our weake eſtate, there is more danger. Keepe it, where I intend it, in that which is my ſpheare, the Conſcience: If mine enemie meet me betimes in my youth, in an object of tentation, (ſo Ioſephs enemie met him in Putifars Wife) yet if I doe not adhere to this enemy, dwell upon a delightfull meditation of that ſin, if I doe not fuell, and foment that ſin, aſſiſt and encourage that ſin, by high diet, wanton diſcourſe, other provocation, I ſhall have reaſon on my ſide, and I ſhall have grace on my ſide, and I ſhall have the Hiſtory of a thouſand
C that have periſhed by that ſin, on my ſide; Even Spittles will give me ſouldiers to fight for me, by their miſerable example againſt that ſin; nay perchance ſometimes the vertue of that woman, whom I ſollicite, will aſſiſt me. But when I lye under the hands of that enemie, that hath reſerved himſelfe to the laſt, to my laſt bed, then when I ſhall be able to ſtir no limbe in any other meaſure then a Feaver or a Palſie ſhall ſhake them, when everlaſting darkneſſe ſhall have an inchoation in the preſent dimneſſe of mine eyes, and the everlaſting gnaſhing in the preſent chattering of my teeth, and the everlaſting worme in the preſent gnawing of the Agonies of my body, and anguiſhes of my minde, when the laſt enemie ſhall watch my remedileſſe body, and my diſconſolate ſoule there, there, where not the Phyſitian, in his way, perchance not the Prieſt in his, ſhall be able to give any aſſiſtance, And when he hath ſported himſelfe with my miſery upon that ſtage, my death-bed, ſhall ſhift the Scene, and throw me from that bed, into the grave, and there
D triumph over me, God knowes, how many generations, till the Redeemer, my Redeemer, the Redeemer of all me, body, aſwell as ſoule, come againe; As death is Noviſſimus hoſtis, the enemy which watches me, at my laſt weakneſſe, and ſhall hold me, when I ſhall be no more, till that Angel come, Who ſhall ſay, and ſweare that time ſhall be no more, in that conſideration, in that apprehenſion, he is the powerfulleſt, the fearefulleſt enemy; and yet even there this enemy Abolebitur, he ſhall be deſtroyed, which is, Septimum veſtigium, our ſeventh and laſt ſtep in this paraphraſe. Noviſſimus hoſtis.

This deſtruction, this abolition of this laſt enemy, is by the Reſurrection; for the Text is part of an argument for the Reſurrection. And truly, it is a faire intimation, and teſtimony of an everlaſting end in that ſtate of the Reſurrection (that no time ſhall end it) that we have it preſented to us in all the parts of time; in the paſt, in the preſent, and in the future. We had a Reſurrection in prophecy; we have a Reſurrection in the preſent
E working of Gods Spirit; we ſhall have a Reſurrection in the finall conſummation. The Prophet ſpeaks in the future, He will ſwallow up death in victory, there it is Abolebit: All the Euangeliſts ſpeak hiſtorically, of matter of fact, in them it is Abolevit. And here in this Apoſtle, it is in the preſent, Aboletur, now he is deſtroyed. And this exhibites unto us a threefold occaſion of advancing our devotion, in conſidering a threefold Reſurrection; Firſt, a Reſurrection from dejections and calamities in this world, a Temporary Reſurrection; Secondly, a Reſurrection from ſin, a Spirituall Reſurrection; and then a Reſurrection from the grave, a finall Reſurrection. Abolebitur. Eſay 25. 8.

A calamitate; When the Prophets ſpeak of a Reſurrection in the old Teſtament, for the moſt part their principall intention is, upon a temporall reſtitution from calamities that 1. A calamitate.

that oppreſſe them then. Neither doth Calvin carry thoſe emphaticall words, which are A Job 19.25. ſo often cited for a proofe of the laſt Reſurrection: That he knows his Redeemer lives, that he knows he ſhall ſtand the laſt man upon earth, that though his body be deſtroyed, yet in his fleſh and with his eyes he ſhall ſee God, to any higher ſenſe then ſo, that how low ſoever he bee brought, to what deſperate ſtate ſoever he be reduced in the eyes of the world, yet he aſſures himſelf of a Reſurrection, a reparation, a reſtitution to his former bodily health, and worldly fortune which he had before. And ſuch a Reſurrection we all know Iob had.

In that famous, and moſt conſiderable propheticall viſion which God exhibited to Ezekiel, where God ſet the Prophet in a valley of very many, and very dry bones, and invites the ſeverall joynts to knit again, tyes them with their old ſinews, and ligaments, clothes them in their old fleſh, wraps them in their old skin, and cals life into them again, Gods principall intention in that viſion was thereby to give them an aſſurance of a Reſur- B rection from their preſent calamity, not but that there is alſo good evidence of the laſt Reſurrection in that viſion too; Thus far God argues with them à re nota; from that which they knew before, the finall Reſurrection, he aſſures them that which they knew not till then, a preſent Reſurrection from thoſe preſſures: Remember by this viſion that which you all know already, that at laſt I ſhall re-unite the dead, and dry bones of all men in a generall Reſurrection: And then if you remember, if you conſider, if you look upon that, can you doubt, but that I who can do that, can alſo recollect you, from your preſent deſperation, and give you a Reſurrection to your former temporall happineſſe? And this truly ariſes pregnantly, neceſſarily out of the Prophets anſwer; God asks him there, Son of man, can theſe bones live? And he anſwers, Domine tu nôſti, O Lord God thou knoweſt. The Prophet anſwers according to Gods intention in the queſtion. If that had been for their living in the laſt Reſurrection, Ezekiel would have anſwered God as C
John 11.24. Martha anſwered Chriſt, when he ſaid, Thy brother Lazarus ſhall riſe again; I know that he ſhall riſe again at the Reſurrection at the laſt day; but when the queſtion was, whether men ſo macerated, ſo ſcattered in this world, could have a Reſurrection to their former temporall happineſſe here, that puts the Prophet to his Domine tu nôſti, It is in thy breaſt to propoſe it, it is in thy hand to execute it, whether thou do it, or do it not, thy name be glorified; It fals not within our conjecture, which way it ſhall pleaſe thee to take for this Reſurrection, Domine tu nôſti, Thou Lord, and thou only knoweſt; Which is alſo
Heb.11.35. the ſenſe of thoſe words, Others were tortured, and accepted not a deliverance, that they might obtain a better Reſurrection: A preſent deliverance had been a Reſurrection, but to be the more ſure of a better hereafter, they leſſe reſpected that; According to that of Mat.10.39. our Saviour, He that findes his life, ſhall loſe it; He that fixeth himſelf too earneſtly upon this Reſurrection, ſhall loſe a better. D

This is then the propheticall Reſurrection for the future, but a future in this world; That if Rulers take counſell againſt the Lord, the Lord ſhall have their counſell in deriſi-
Pſal.2.4. on; If they take armes againſt the Lord, the Lord ſhall break their Bows, and cut their Speares in ſunder; If they hiſſe, and gnaſh their teeth, and ſay, we have ſwallowed him up; If we be made their by-word, their parable, their proverb, their libell, the theame and burden of their ſongs, as Iob complaines, yet whatſoever fall upon me, damage, diſtreſſe, ſcorn, or Hoſtis ultimus, death it ſelf, that death which we conſider here, death of poſſeſſions, death of eſtimation, death of health, death of contentment, yet Abolebitur, it ſhall be deſtroyed in a Reſurrection, in the return of the light of Gods countenance upon me even in this world. And this is the firſt Reſurrection.

2. But this firſt Reſurrection, which is but from temporall calamities, doth ſo little con-
A peccatis. cerne a true and eſtabliſhed Chriſtian, whether it come or no, (for ſtill Iobs Baſis is his Baſis, and his Centre, Etiamſi occiderit, though he kill me, kill me, kill me, in all theſe ſeverall deaths, and give me no Reſurrection in this world, yet I will truſt in him) as that, as though this firſt reſurrection were no reſurrection, not to be numbred among the reſur-
Apoc.20.6. rections, S. Iohn calls that which we call the ſecond, which is from ſin, the firſt reſurrection: Bleſſed and holy is he, who hath part in the firſt reſurrection: And this reſurrection,
John 5.25. Chriſt implies, when he ſaies, Verely, verely, I ſay unto you, the houre is comming, and now is, when the dead ſhall heare the voyce of the Son of God; and they that heare it ſhall live: That is, by the voyce of the word of life, the Goſpell of repentance, they ſhall have a ſpirituall reſurrection to a new life.

S. Auſtine

A S. Auſtine and Lactantius both were ſo hard in beleeving the roundneſſe of the earth, that they thought that thoſe homines penſiles, as they call them, thoſe men that hang upon the other cheek of the face of the earth, thoſe Antipodes, whoſe feet are directly againſt ours, muſt neceſſarily fall from the earth, if the earth be round. But whither ſhould they fall? If they fall, they muſt fall upwards, for heaven is above them too, as it is to us. So if the ſpirituall Antipodes of this world, the Sons of God, that walk with feet oppoſed in wayes contrary to the ſons of men, ſhall be ſaid to fall, when they fall to repentance, to mortification, to a religious negligence, and contempt of the pleaſures of this life, truly their fall is upwards, they fall towards heaven. God gives breath unto the people upon the earth, ſayes the Prophet, Et ſpiritum his, qui calcant illam. Our Tranſlation Eſay 45.5.
carries that no farther, but that God gives breath to people upon the earth, and ſpirit to them
B that walk thereon; But Irenæus makes a uſefull difference between afflatus and ſpiritus, that God gives breath to all upon earth, but his ſpirit onely to them, who tread in a religious ſcorne upon earthly things.

Is it not a ſtrange phraſe of the Apoſtle, Mortifie your members; fornication, uncleaneſſe, inordinate affections? Col.3.5.
He does not ſay, mortifie your members againſt thoſe ſins, but he calls thoſe very ſins, the members of our bodies, as though we were elemented and compacted of nothing but ſin, till we come to this reſurrection, this mortification, which is indeed our vivification; Till we beare in our body, the dying of our Lord Ieſus, that 2 Cor.4.10.
the life alſo of Ieſus may be made manifeſt in our body. God may give the other reſurrection from worldly miſery, and not give this. A widow may be reſcued from the ſorrow and ſolitarineſſe of that ſtate, by having a plentifull fortune; there ſhe hath one reſurrection; but the widow that liveth in pleaſure, is dead while ſhe lives; ſhee hath no ſecond 1 Tim.5.6.
reſurrection; and ſo in that ſenſe, even this Chappell may be a Church-yard, men may
C ſtand, and ſit, and kneele, and yet be dead; and any Chamber alone may be a Golgotha, a place of dead mens bones, of men not come to this reſurrection, which is the renunciation of their beloved ſin.

It was inhumanely ſaid by Vitellius, upon the death of Otho, when he walked in the field of carcaſſes, where the battle was fought; O how ſweet a perfume is a dead enemy! But it is a divine ſaying to thy ſoule, O what a ſavor of life, unto life, is the death of a beloved ſin! What an Angelicall comfort was that to Ioſeph and Mary in Ægypt, after the death of Herod, Ariſe, for they are dead, that ſought the childes life! And even that Mat.2.20.
comfort is multiplied upon thy ſoul, when the Spirit of God ſaies to thee, Ariſe, come to this reſurrection: for that Herod, that ſin, that ſought the life, the everlaſting life of this childe, the childe of God, thy ſoule, is dead, dead by repentance, dead by mortification. The higheſt cruelty that ſtory relates, or Poets imagine, is when a perſecutor will not
D afford a miſerable man death, not be ſo mercifull to him, as to take his life. Thou haſt made thy ſin, thy ſoule, thy life; inanimated all thy actions, all thy purpoſes with that ſin. Miſerere animæ tuæ, be ſo mercifull to thy ſelfe, as to take away that life by mortification, by repentance, and thou art come to this Reſurrection: and though a man may have the former reſurrection, and not this, peace in his fortune, and yet not peace in his conſcience, yet whoſoever hath this ſecond, hath an infallible ſeale of the third reſurrection too, to a fulneſſe of glory in body, as well as in ſoule. For Spiritus maturam efficit carnem, & capacem incorruptelæ; this reſurrection by the ſpirit, mellowes the body of Irenæus.
man, and makes that capable of everlaſting glory, which is the laſt weapon, by which the laſt enemy death, ſhall be deſtroyed; A morte.

Upon that pious ground that all Scriptures were written for us, as we are Chriſtians, 3. that all Scriptures conduce to the proofe of Chriſt, and of the Chriſtian ſtate, it is the or- A morte.
E dinary manner of the Fathers to make all that David ſpeaks hiſtorically of himſelfe, and all that the Prophet ſpeaks futurely of the Jews, if thoſe places may be referred to Chriſt, to referre them to Chriſt primarily, and but by reflection, and in a ſecond conſideration upon David, or upon the Jews. Thereupon doe the Fathers (truly I think more generally more unanimely then in any other place of Scripture) take that place of Ezekiel which we ſpake of before, to be primarily intended of the laſt reſurrection, & but ſecundarily of the Jews reſtitution. But Gaſper Sanctius a learned Jeſuit, (that is not ſo rare, but an ingenuous Jeſuit too) though he be bound by the Councel of Trent, to interpret Scriptures according to the Fathers, yet he here acknowledges the whole truth, that Gods purpoſe was to prove, by that which they did know, which was the generall reſurrection, that which they

they knew not, their temporall reſtitution. Tertullian is vehement at firſt, but after, more ſupple. Allegoricæ Scripturæ, ſaies he, reſurrectionem ſubradiant alia, alia determinant: Some figurative places of Scripture doe intimate a reſurrection, and ſome manifeſt it; and of thoſe manifeſt places he takes this viſion of Ezekiel to be one. But he comes after to this, Sit & corporum, & rerum, & meâ nihil intereſt; let it ſignifie a temporall reſurrection, ſo it may ſignifie the generall reſurrection of our bodies too, ſaies he, and I am well ſatisfied; and then the truth ſatisfies him, for it doth ſignifie both. It is true that Tertullian ſayes, De vacuo ſimilitudo non competit; If the viſion be but a compariſon, if there were no ſuch thing as a reſurrection, the compariſon did not hold. De nullo parabola non convenit, ſaies he, and truly; If there were no reſurrection to which that Parable might have relation, it were no Parable. All that is true; but there was a reſurrection alwaies knowne to them, alwaies beleeved by them, and that made their preſent reſurrection from that calamity, the more eaſie, the more intelligible, the more credible, the more diſcernable to them.

Let therefore Gods method, be thy method; fixe thy ſelf firmly upon that beliefe of the generall reſurrection, and thou wilt never doubt of either of the particular reſurrections, either from ſin, by Gods grace, or from worldly calamities, by Gods power. For that laſt reſurrection is the ground of all. By that Verè victa mors, ſaies Irenæus, this laſt enemy, death, is truly deſtroyed, becauſe his laſt ſpoile, the body, is taken out of his hands. The ſame body, eadem ovis, (as the ſame Father notes) Chriſt did not fetch another ſheep to the flock, in the place of that which was loſt, but the ſame ſheep: God ſhall not give me another, a better body at the reſurrection, but the ſame body made better; for Si non haberet caro ſalvari, neutiquam verbum Dei caro factum fuiſſet, If the fleſh of man were not to be ſaved, the Anchor of ſalvation would never have taken the fleſh of man upon him.

Idem.

Gen. 3. 17. The puniſhment that God laid upon Adam, In dolore & in ſudore, In ſweat, and in ſorrow ſhalt thou eate thy bread, is but Donec reverteris, till man returne to duſt: but when Man is returned to duſt, God returnes to the remembrance of that promiſe, Awake and Eſay 26. 19. ſing ye that dwell in the duſt. A mercy already exhibited to us, in the perſon of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, in whom, Per primitias benedixit campo, (ſaies S. Chryſoſtome) as God by taking a handfull for the firſt Fruits, gave a bleſſing to the whole field; ſo he hath ſealed the bodies of all mankind to his glory, by pre-aſſuming the body of Chriſt to that glory.

Bernard. For by that there is now Commercium inter Cœlum & terram; there is a Trade driven, a Staple eſtabliſhed betweene Heaven and earth; Ibi caro noſtra, hic Spiritus ejus; Thither have we ſent our fleſh, and hither hath he ſent his Spirit.

This is the laſt abolition of this enemy, Death; for after this, the bodies of the Saints he cannot touch, the bodies of the damned he cannot kill, and if he could, hee were not therein their enemy, but their friend. This is that bleſſed and glorious State, of which, when all the Apoſtles met to make the Creed, they could ſay no more, but Credo Reſurrectionem, I beleeve the Reſurrection of the body; and when thoſe two Reverend Fathers, to whom it belongs, ſhall come to ſpeake of it, upon the day proper for it, in this place, and if all the Biſhops that ever met in Councels ſhould meet them here, they could but ſecond the Apoſtles Credo, with their Anathema, We beleeve, and woe be unto them that doe not beleeve the Reſurrection of the body; but in going about to expreſſe it, the lips of an Angell would be uncircumciſed lips, and the tongue of an Archangell would ſtammer. I offer not therefore at it: but in reſpect of, and with relation to that bleſſed State, according to the doctrine, and practiſe of our Church, we doe pray for the dead, for the militant Church upon earth, and the triumphant Church in Heaven, and the whole Catholique Church in Heaven, and earth; we doe pray that God will be pleaſed to haſten that Kingdome, that we with all others departed in the true Faith of his holy Name, may have this perfect conſummation, both of body and ſoule, in his everlaſting glory, Amen.

Ieſus wept.

I Am now but upon the Compaſſion of Chriſt. There is much difference betweene his Compaſſion and his Paſſion, as much as between the men that are to handle them here. But Lacryma paſſionis Chriſti eſt vicaria: A great perſonage may ſpeake of his Paſſion, of his blood; My vicarage is to ſpeake of his Compaſſion and his teares. Let me chafe the wax, and melt your ſoules in a bath of his Teares now, Let him ſet to the great Seale of his effectuall paſſion, in his blood, then. It is a Common place I know to ſpeake of teares: I would you knew as well, it were a common practiſe, to ſhed them. Though it be not ſo, yet bring S. Bernards patience, Libenter audiam, qui non ſibi plauſum, ſed mihi planctum moveat; be willing to heare him, that ſeeks not your acclamation to himſelfe, but your humiliation to his and your God; not to make you praiſe with them that praiſe, but to make you weepe with them that weepe, And Ieſus wept. Auguſt.

The Maſorites (the Maſorites are the Critiques upon the Hebrew Bible, the Old Teſtament) cannot tell us, who divided the Chapters of the Old Teſtament into verſes; Neither can any other tell us, who did it in the New Teſtament. Whoever did it ſeemes to have ſtopped in an amazement in this Text, and by making an intire verſe of theſe two words, Ieſus wept, and no more, to intimate that there needs no more for the exalting of our devotion to a competent height, then to conſider, how, and where, and when, and why Ieſus wept. There is not a ſhorter verſe in the Bible, nor a larger Text. There is another as ſhort; Semper gaudete, Rejoyce evermore, and of that holy Joy, I may have leave to ſpeake here hereafter, more ſeaſonably, in a more Feſtivall time, by my ordinary ſervice. This is the ſeaſon of generall Compunction, of generall Mortification, and no man priviledged, for Ieſus wept. 1 Theſ. 5. 16.

Diviſio.

In that Letter which Lentulus is ſaid to have written to the Senate of Rome, in which he gives ſome Characters of Chriſt, he ſaies, That Chriſt was never ſeene to laugh, but to weepe often. Now in what number he limits his often, or upon what teſtimony he grounds his number, we know not. We take knowledge that he wept thrice. Hee wept here, when he mourned with them that mourned for Lazarus; He wept againe, when he drew neare to Jeruſalem, and looked upon that City; And he wept a third time in his Paſſion. There is but one Euangeliſt, but this, S. Iohn, that tells us of theſe firſt teares, the reſt ſay nothing of them; There is but one Euangeliſt, S. Luke, that tells us of his ſecond teares, the reſt ſpeake not of thoſe; There is no Euangeliſt, but there is an Apoſtle that tells us of his third teares, S. Paul ſaies, That in the daies of his fleſh, he offered up prayers with ſtrong cries, and teares; And thoſe teares, Expoſitors of all ſides referre to his Paſſion, though ſome to his Agony in the Garden, ſome to his Paſſion on the Croſſe; and theſe in my opinion moſt fitly; becauſe thoſe words of S. Paul belong to the declaration of the Prieſthood, and of the Sacrifice of Chriſt; and for that function of his, the Croſſe was the Altar; and therefore to the Croſſe we fixe thoſe third teares. The firſt were Humane teares, the ſecond were Propheticall, the third were Pontificall, appertaining to the Sacrifice. The firſt were ſhed in a Condolency of a humane and naturall calamity fallen upon one family; Lazarus was dead: The ſecond were ſhed in Contemplation of future calamities upon a Nation; Jeruſalem was to be deſtroyed: The third, in Contemplation of ſin, and the everlaſting puniſhments due to ſin, and to ſuch ſinners, as would make no benefit of that Sacrifice, which he offered in offering himſelfe. His friend was dead, and then Jeſus wept; He juſtified naturall affections and ſuch offices of piety: Luke 19. 41. Heb. 5. 7.

Jeruſalem

Jeruſalem was to be deſtroyed, and then Jeſus wept; He commiſerated publique and nationall calamities, though a private perſon: His very giving of himſelfe for ſin, was to become to a great many ineffectuall; and then Jeſus wept; He declared how indelible the naturall ſtaine of ſin is, that not ſuch ſweat as his, ſuch teares, ſuch blood as his could abſolutely waſh it out of mans nature. The teares of the text are as a Spring, a Well, belonging to one houſhold the Siſters of Lazarus: The teares over Jeruſalem, are as a River belonging to a whole Country: The teares upon the Croſſe, are as the Sea belonging to all the world; and though literally there fall no more into our text, then the Spring, yet becauſe the Spring flowes into the River, and the River into the Sea, and that whereſoever we find that Jeſus wept, we find our Text, (for our Text is but that, Ieſus wept) therefore by the leave and light of his bleſſed Spirit, we ſhall looke upon thoſe lovely, thoſe heavenly eyes, through this glaſſe of his owne teares, in all theſe three lines, as he wept here over Lazarus, as he wept there over Jeruſalem, as he wept upon the Croſſe over all us. For ſo often Jeſus wept.

1 Part. Humanitus.

First then, Jeſus wept Humanitus, he tooke a neceſſary occaſion to ſhew that he was true Man. He was now in hand with the greateſt Miracle that ever he did, the raiſing of Lazarus, ſo long dead. Could we but do ſo in our ſpirituall raiſing, what a bleſſed harveſt were that? What a comfort to finde one man here to day, raiſed from his ſpirituall death, this day twelve-month? Chriſt did it every yeare, and every yeare he improved his Miracle. In the firſt yeare, he raiſed the Governours Daughter: ſhe was newly dead, and as yet in the houſe. In the beginning of ſin, and whilſt in the houſe, in the houſe of God, in the Church, in a glad obedience to Gods Ordinances and Inſtitutions there, for the reparation and reſuſcitation of dead ſoules, the worke is not ſo hard. In his ſecond yeare, Chriſt raiſed the Widows Son; and him he found without, ready to be buried. In a man growne cold and ſtiffe in ſin, impenetrable, inflexible by denouncing the Judgements of God, almoſt buried in a ſtupidity, and inſenſibleneſſe of his being dead; there is more difficultie. But in his third yeare, Chriſt raiſed this Lazarus, he had been long dead, and buried, and in probability, putrified after foure daies.

Mat. 9. 25.

Luke 7. 15.

This Miracle Chriſt meant to make a pregnant proofe of the Reſurrection, which was his principall intention therein. For, the greateſt arguments againſt the Reſurrection, being for the moſt part of this kinde, when a Fiſh eates a man, and another man eates that fiſh, or when one man eates another, how ſhall both theſe men riſe againe? when a body is reſolv'd in the grave to the firſt principles, or is paſſed into other ſubſtances, the caſe is ſomewhat neere the ſame; and therefore Chriſt would worke upon a body neare that ſtate, a body putrified. And truly, in our ſpirituall raiſing of the dead, to raiſe a ſinner putrified in his owne earth, reſolv'd in his owne dung, eſpecially that hath paſſed many transformations, from ſhape to ſhape, from ſin to ſin, (he hath beene a Salamander and lived in the fire, in the fire ſucceſſively, in the fire of luſt in his youth, and in his age in the fire of Ambition; and then he hath beene a Serpent, a Fiſh, and lived in the waters, in the water ſucceſſively, in the troubled water of ſedition in his youth, and in his age in the cold waters of indevotion) how ſhall we raiſe this Salamander and this Serpent, when this Serpent and this Salamander is all one perſon, and muſt have contrary muſique to charme him, contrary phyſick to cure him? To raiſe a man reſolv'd into diverſe ſubſtances, ſcattered into diverſe formes of ſeverall ſinnes, is the greateſt worke. And therefore this Miracle (which implied that) S. Baſil calls Miraculum in Miraculo, a pregnant, a double Miracle. For here is Mortuus redivivus, A dead man lives; that had been done before; but Alligatus ambulat, ſaies Baſil; he that is fettered, and manacled, and tyed with many difficulties, he walks.

And therfore as this Miracle raiſed him moſt eſtimation, ſo (for they ever accompany one another) it raiſed him moſt envy: Envy that extended beyond him, to Lazarus himſelfe, who had done nothing; and yet, The chiefe Prieſts conſulted how they might put Lazarus to death, becauſe by reaſon of him, many beleeved in Ieſus. A diſeaſe, a diſtemper, a danger which no time ſhall ever be free from, that whereſoever there is a coldneſſe, a diſ-affection to Gods Cauſe, thoſe who are any way occaſionally inſtruments of Gods glory, ſhall finde cold affections. If they killed Lazarus, had not Chriſt done enough to let them ſee that he could raiſe him againe? for Caeca ſævitia, ſi aliud videtur mortuum, aliud occiſus; It was a blinde malice, if they thought, that Chriſt could raiſe a man naturally dead, and could not if he were violently killed. This then being his greateſt Miracle, racle, preparing the hardeſt Article of the Creed, the Reſurrection of the body; as the Miracle it ſelfe declared ſufficiently his Divinity, that nature, ſo in this declaration that he was God, he would declare that he was man too, and therefore Ieſus wept.

He wept as man doth weepe, and he wept as a man may weepe; for theſe teares were Teſtes naturæ, non Indices diffidentiæ, They declared him to be true man, but no diſtruſtfull, no inordinate man. In Iob there is a queſtion ask'd of God, Haſt thou eyes of fleſh, and doeſt thou ſee, as man ſees? Let this queſtion be directed to God manifeſted in Chriſt, and Chriſt will weepe out an anſwer to that queſtion, I have eyes of fleſh, and I do weep as man weepes. Not as ſinfull man, not as a man, that had let fall his bridle, by which he ſhould turne his horſe: Not as a man that were caſt from the rudder, by which he ſhould ſteere his Ship: Not as a man that had loſt his intereſt and power in his affections, and paſſions; Chriſt wept not ſo. Chriſt might goe farther that way, then any other man: Chriſt might ungirt himſelfe, and give more ſcope and liberty to his paſſions, then any other man: both becauſe he had no Originall ſin within, to drive him, no inordinate love without to draw him, when his affections were moved; which all other men have.

Non inordinatè. Bernard. Iob 10.4.

God ſayes to the Jews, That they had wept in his eares; God had heard them weep: but for what, and how? they wept for fleſh. There was a tincture, there was a deep dye of murmuring in their tears. Chriſt goes as far in the paſſion, in his agony, and he comes to a paſſionate deprecation, in his Triſtis anima, and in the Si poſſibile, and in the Tranſeat calix. But as all theſe paſſions were ſanctified in the roote, from which no bitter leafe, no crooked twig could ſpring, ſo they were inſtantly waſhed with his Verumtamen, a preſent and a full ſubmitting of all to Gods pleaſure, Yet not my will O Father, but thine be done. It will not be ſafe for any man to come ſo neare an exceſſe of paſſions, as he may finde ſome good men in the Scriptures to have done: That becauſe he heares Moſes ſay to God, Dele me, Blot my name out of the book of life, Therefore he may ſay, God damne me, or I renounce God. It is not ſafe for a man to expoſe himſelf to a tentation, becauſe he hath ſeen another paſſe through it. Every man may know his own Byas, and to what ſin that diverts him: The beauty of the perſon, the opportunity of the place, the importunity of the party, being his Miſtreſſe, could not ſhake Ioſephs conſtancy. There is one ſuch example, of one that reſiſted a ſtrong tentation: But then there are in one place, two men together, that ſinned upon their own bodies, Her and Onan, then when no tentation was offered, nay when a remedy againſt tentation was miniſtred to them.

Numb. 11.18.

Gen. 46.12.

Some man may be chaſter in the Stews, then another in the Church; and ſome man will ſin more in his dreams, then another in his diſcourſe. Every man muſt know how much water his own veſſell draws, and not to think to ſaile over, whereſoever he hath ſeen another (he knows not with how much labour) ſhove over: No nor to adventure ſo far, as he may have reaſon to be confident in his own ſtrength: For though he may be ſafe in himſelf, yet he may ſin in another, if by his indiſcreete, and improvident example, another be ſcandalized. Chriſt was alwayes ſafe; He was led of the Spirit: of what ſpirit? his own Spirit: Led willingly into the wilderneſſe, to be tempted of the devill. No other man might do that; but he who was able to ſay to the Sun, Siſte ſol, was able to ſay to Satan, Siſte Lucifer. Chriſt in another place gave ſuch ſcope to his affections, and to others interpretations of his actions, that his friends and kinsfolks thought him mad, beſides himſelf: But all this while, Chriſt had his own actions, and paſſions, and their interpretations in his own power: he could do what he would. Here in our Text, Jeſus was troubled, and he groaned; and vehemently, and often, his affections were ſtirred: but as in a clean glaſſe, if water be ſtirred and troubled, though it may conceive a little light froth, yet it contracts no foulneſſe in that clean glaſſe, the affections of Chriſt were moved, but ſo: in that holy veſſell they would contract no foulneſſe, no declination towards inordinateneſſe. But then every Chriſtian is not a Chriſt; and therefore as he that would faſt forty dayes, as Chriſt did, might ſtarve; and he that would whip Merchants out of the Temple, as Chriſt did, might be knockt downe in the Temple; So he knowing his owne inclinations, or but the generall ill inclination of all mankind, as he is infected with Originall ſin, ſhould converſe ſo much with publicans and ſinners, might participate of their ſins. The rule is, we muſt avoid inordinateneſſe of affections; but when we come to examples of that rule, our ſelves well underſtood by our ſelves, muſt be our owne examples; for it is not alwaies good to go too far, as ſome good men have gone before.

Mat. 4.1.

Non Apathes.

Now though Chriſt were farre from both, yet he came nearer to an exceſſe of paſſion, then to an Indolencie, to a ſenſeleſneſſe, to a privation of naturall affections. Inordinateneſſe of affections may ſometimes make ſome men like ſome beaſts; but indolencie, abſence, emptineſſe, privation of affections, makes any man at all times, like ſtones, like dirt. In noviſſimis, ſaith S. Peter, In the laſt, that is, in the worſt dayes, in the dregs, and lees, and tartar of ſin, then ſhall come men, lovers of themſelves; and that is ill enough in man; for that is an affection peculiar to God, to love himſelfe. Non ſpeciale vitium, ſed radix omnium vitiorum, ſaies the Schoole in the mouth of Aquinas: ſelfe-love cannot be called a diſtinct ſin, but the roote of all ſins. It is true that Juſtin Martyr ſaies, Philoſophanti finis eſt Deo aſſimilari, The end of Chriſtian Philoſophy is to be wiſe like God; but not in this, to love our ſelves; for the greateſt ſin that ever was, and that upon which even the blood of Chriſt Jeſus hath not wrought, the ſin of Angels was that, Similis ero Altiſſimo, to be like God. To love our ſelves, to be ſatisfied in our ſelves, to finde an omni-ſufficiency in our ſelves, is an intruſion, an uſurpation upon God: And even God himſelfe who had that omni-ſufficiency in himſelfe, conceived a conveniency for his glory, to draw a Circumference about that Center, Creatures about himſelfe, and to ſhed forth lines of love upon all them, and not to love himſelfe alone. Selfe-love in man ſinks deep: but yet you ſee, the Apoſtle in his order, caſts the other ſin lower, that is, into a worſe place, To be without naturall affections.

S. Auguſtine extends theſe naturall affections, to Religious affections, becauſe they are naturall to a ſupernaturall man, to a regenerate man, who naturally loves thoſe, that are of the houſhold of the faithfull, that profeſſe the ſame truth of Religion: and not to be affected with their diſtreſſes, when Religion it ſelfe is diſtreſſed in them, is impietie. He extends theſe affections to Morall affections; the love of Eminent and Heroicall vertues in any man: we ought to be affected with the fall of ſuch men. And he extends them to civill affections, the love of friends; not to be moved in their behalfe, is argument enough that we doe not much love them.

For our caſe in the Text, Theſe men whom Jeſus found weeping, and wept with them, were none of his kindred: They were Neighbours, and Chriſt had had a converſation, and contracted a friendſhip in that Family; He loved Martha, and her ſiſter, and Lazarus, ſaies the Storie: and he would let the world ſee that he loved them: for ſo the Jewes argued that ſaw him weepe, Behold how he loved them; without outward declarations, who can conclude an inward love? to aſſure that, Jeſus wept.

V. 36.

Lacryma.

To an inordinateneſſe of affections it never came; to a naturall tenderneſſe it did; and ſo far as to teares; and then who needs be aſhamed of weeping? Look away far from me, for I will weep bitterly, ſayes Hieruſalem in Eſay. But look upon me, ſayes Chriſt in the Lamentations, Behold and ſee if ever there were any ſorrow, any teares like mine: Not like his in value, but in the roote as they proceeded from naturall affection, they were teares of imitation, and we may, we muſt weepe teares like his teares. They ſcourged him, they crowned him, they nailed him, they pierced him, and then blood came; but he ſhed teares voluntarily, and without violence: The blood came from their ill, but the teares from his owne good nature: The blood was drawne, the teares were given. We call it a childiſh thing to weepe, and a womaniſh; and perchance we meane worſe in that then in the childiſh; for therein we may meane falſhood to be mingled with weakneſſe. Chriſt made it an argument of his being man, to weepe, for though the lineaments of mans bodie, eyes and eares, hands and feet, be aſcribed to God in the Scriptures, though the affections of mans mind be aſcribed to him, (even ſorrow, nay Repentance it ſelfe, is attributed to God) I doe not remember that ever God is ſaid to have wept: It is for man. And when God ſhall come to that laſt Act in the glorifying of Man, when he promiſes, to wipe all teares from his eyes, what ſhall God have to doe with that eye that never wept?

He wept out of a naturall tenderneſſe in generall; and he wept now out of a particular occaſion. What was that? Quia mortuus, becauſe Lazarus was dead. We ſtride over many ſteps at once; waive many ſuch conſiderable circumſtances as theſe; Lazarus his friend was dead, therefore he wept, Lazarus, the ſtaffe and ſuſtentation of that family was dead, he upon whom his Siſters relied, was dead, therefore he wept. But I ſtop onely upon this one ſtep, Quia mortuus, that he was dead. Now a good man is not the worſe for dying, that is true and capable of a good ſenſe, becauſe he is eſtabliſhed in a better

A better world: but yet when he is gone out of this world he is none of us, he is no longer a man. The ſtronger opinion in the Schoole, is, That Chriſt himſelfe, when he lay dead in the grave, was no man. Though the Godhead never departed from the Carcaſſe, (there was no divorce of that Hypoſtaticall union) yet becauſe the Humane ſoule was departed from it, he was no man. Hugo de S. Victor. who thinks otherwiſe, that Chriſt was a man then, thinkes ſo upon a weak ground: He thinkes, that becauſe the ſoule is the form of man, the ſoul is man; and that therefore the ſoul remaining, the man remaines. But it is not the ſoule, but the union of the ſoul, that makes the man. The Maſter of the Sentences, Peter Lombard, that thinks ſo too, that Chriſt was then a man, thinkes ſo upon as weak a ground: He thinkes that it is enough to conſtitute a man, that there be a ſoul and body, though that ſoul and body be not united; but ſtill it is the union that makes the man: And therefore when he is diſunited, dead, he is none of us, he
B is no man; and therefore we weep how well ſoever he be. Abraham was loath to let go his wife, though the King had her: A man hath a naturall lothneſſe to let go his friend, though God take him to him.

S. Auguſtine ſayes, that he knew well enough, that his mother was in heaven; and S. Ambroſe, that he knew wel enough that his maſter Theodoſius the Emperor was in heaven, but becauſe they ſaw not in what ſtate they were, they thought that ſomething might be asked at Gods hands in their behalf; and ſo out of a humane and pious officiouſneſſe, in a devotion perchance indigeſted, uncocted, and retaining yet ſome crudities, ſome irreſolutions, they ſtrayed into prayers for them after they were dead. Lazarus his ſiſters made no doubt of their brothers ſalvation; they beleeved his ſoul to be in a good eſtate: And for his body, they told Chriſt, Lord we know that he ſhall riſe at the laſt day: And yet they wept.

C Here, in this world, we who ſtay, lack thoſe who are gone out of it: we know they ſhall never come to us; and when we ſhall go to them, whether we ſhall know them or no, we diſpute. They who think that it conduces to the perfection of happineſſe in heaven, that we ſhould know one another, think piouſly if they think we ſhall. For, as for the maintenance of publique peace, States, and Churches, may think diverſly in points of Religion, that are not fundamentall, and yet both be true and Orthodoxall Churches; ſo for the exaltation of private devotion in points that are not fundamentall, divers men may think diverſly, and both be equally good Chriſtians. Whether we ſhall know them there, or no, is problematicall and equall; that we ſhall not till then, is dogmaticall and certain: Therefore we weep. I know there are Philoſophers that will not let us weep, nor lament the death of any: And I know that in the Scriptures there are rules, and that there are inſtructions convayed in that example, that David left mourning as D ſoon as the childe was dead; And I know that there are Authors of a middle nature, above the Philoſophers, and below the Scriptures, the Apocryphall books, and I know it is ſaid there, Comfort thy ſelfe, for thou ſhalt do him no good that is dead, Et teipſum peſsimabis (as the vulgat reads it) thou ſhalt make thy ſelf worſe and worſe, in the worſt degree. But yet all this is but of inordinate lamentation; for in the ſame place, the ſame Wiſe man ſayes, My Son, let thy tears fall down over the dead; weep bitterly and make great moane, as he is worthy. When our Saviour Chriſt had uttered his conſummatum eſt, all was finiſhed, and their rage could do him no more harm, when he had uttered his In manus tuas, he had delivered and God had received his ſoul, yet how did the whole frame of nature mourn in Eclipſes, and tremble in earth-quakes, and diſſolve and ſhed in pieces in the opening of the Temple, Quia mortuus, becauſe he was dead. Eccluſ. 38. 6.

Truly, to ſee the hand of a great and mighty Monarch, that hand that hath governE ed the civill ſword, the ſword of Juſtice at home, and drawn and ſheathed the forraigne ſword, the ſword of war abroad, to ſee that hand lie dead, and not be able to nip or fillipaway one of his own wormes (and then Quis homo, what man, though he be one of thoſe men, of whom God hath ſaid, Ye are gods, yet Quis homo, what man is there that lives, and ſhall not ſee death?) To ſee the brain of a great and religious Counſellor (and God bleſſe all from making, all from calling any great that is not religious) to ſee that brain that produced means to becalme guſts at Councell tables, ſtormes in Parliaments, tempeſts in popular commotions, to ſee that brain produce nothing but ſwarmes of wormes and no Proclamation to diſperſe them; To ſee a reverend Prelate that hath reſiſted Heretiques & Schiſmatiques all his life, fall like one of them by death, & perchance be called one of them when he is dead. To re-collect all, to see great men made no men, to be sure that they shall never come to us, not to be sure, that we shall know them when we come to them, to see the Lieutenants and Images of God, Kings, the sinews of the State, religious Counsellors, the spirit of the Church, zealous Prelates, And then to see vulgar, ignorant, wicked, and facinorous men thrown all by one hand of death, into one Cart, into one common Tide-boate, one Hospitall, one Almeshouse, one Prison, the grave, in whose dust no man can say, This is the King, this is the Slave, this is the Bishop, this is the Heretique, this is the Counsellor, this is the Foole, even this miserable equality of so unequall persons, by so foule a hand, is the subject of this lamentation, even Quia mortuus, because Lazarus was dead, Iesus wept. A

He wept even in that respect, Quia mortuus, and he wept in this respect too, Quia non adhibita media, because those means which in appearance might have saved his life, by his default were not used, for when he came to the house, one sister, Martha sayes to him, Lord if thou hadst been here, my brother had not dyed; and then the other sister, Mary sayes so too, Lord if thou hadst been here, my brother had not dyed: They all cry out, that he who only, only by comming, might have saved his life, would not come. Our Saviour knew in himself that he abstained to better purpose, and to the farther glory of God: for when he heard of his death, he said to his Disciples, I am glad for your sakes that I was not there. Christ had certain reserved purposes which conduced to a better establishing of their faith, and to a better advancing of Gods Kingdome, the working of that miracle. But yet because others were able to say to him, it was in you to have saved him, and he did not, even this Quia non adhibita media, affected him; and Iesus wept. B

Etsi quatriduanus.

He wept, Etsi quatriduanus, though they said unto him, He hath been foure dayes dead, and stinkes. Christ doth not say, there is no such matter, he doth not stink; but though he do, my friend shall not lack my help. Good friends, usefull friends, though they may commit some errors, and though for some misbehaviours they may stink in our nostrils, must not be derelicted, abandoned to themselves. Many a son, many a good heire, findes an ill ayre from his Father; his Fathers life stinkes in the nostrils of all the world, and he heares every where exclamations upon his Fathers usury, and extortion, and oppression: yet it becomes him by a better life, and by all other means to rectifie and redeem his Fathers fame. Quatriduanus est, is no plea for my negligence in my family; to say, My son, or my servant hath proceeded so far in ill courses, that now it is to no purpose to go about to reform him, because Quatriduanus est. Quatriduanus est, is no plea in my pastorall charge, to say that seducers, and practisers, and perswaders, and sollicitors for superstition, enter so boldly into every family, that now it is to no purpose to preach religious wariness, religious discretion, religious constancy. Quatriduanus est, is no plea for my Usury, for my Simony; to say, I do but as all the world doth, and hath used to do a long time. To preach there where reprehension of growing sin is acceptable, is to preach in season; where it is not acceptable, it is out of season; but yet we must preach in season, and out of season too. And when men are so refractary, as that they forbeare to heare, or heare and resist our preaching, we must pray; and where they dispise or forbid our praying, we must lament them, we must weep: Quatriduanus erat, Lazarus was far spent, yet Iesus wept. C D

Etsi suscitandus.

He wept, Etsi suscitandus; Though he knew that Lazarus were to be restored, and raised to life again: for as he meant to declare a great good will to him at last, so he would utter some by the way; he would do a great miracle for him, as he was a mighty God; but he would weep for him too, as he was a good natured man. Truly it is no very charitable disposition, if I give all at my death to others, if I keep all all my life to my self. For how many families have we seen shaked, ruined by this distemper, that though the Father mean to alien nothing of the inheritance from the Son at his death, yet because he affords him not a competent maintenance in his life, he submits his Son to an encumbring of his fame with ignominious shiftings, and an encumbring of the estate with irrecoverable debts. I may mean to feast a man plentifully at Christmas, and that man may starve before in Lent: Great persons may think it in their power to give life to persons and actions by their benefits, when they will, and before that will be up and ready, both may become incapable of their benefits. Jesus would not give this family, whom hee pretended to love, occasion of jealousie, of suspition, that he neglected them; and therefore though he came not presently to that great worke, which hee intended E

And ſo (that we may reſerve ſome minutes for the reſt) we end this part, applying to every man that bleſſed exclamation of S. Ambroſe, Ad monumentum hoc digneris accedere Domine Ieſu, Lord Jeſus be pleaſed to come to this grave, to weep over this dead Lazarus, this ſoule in this body: And though I come not to a preſent riſing, a preſent deliverance from the power of all ſin, yet if I can feele the dew of thy teares upon me, if I can diſcern the eye of thy compaſſion bent towards me, I have comfort all the way, and that comfort will flow into an infallibility in the end.

And be this the end of this part, to which we are come by theſe ſteps. Ieſus wept, That as he ſhewed himſelf to be God, he might appeare to be man too: he wept not inordinately; but he came nearer exceſſe then indolency: He wept becauſe he was dead; and becauſe all means for life had not been uſed; he wept, though he were far ſpent; and
B he wept, though he meant to raiſe him again.

We paſſe now from his humane to his propheticall teares, from Jeſus weeping in contemplation of a naturall calamity fallen upon one family, Lazarus was dead, to his weeping in contemplation of a Nationall calamity foreſeen upon a whole people; Jeruſalem was to be deſtroyed. His former teares had ſome of the ſpirit of prophecy in them; for therefore ſayes Epiphanius, Chriſt wept there, becauſe he foreſaw how little uſe the Jews would make of that miracle, his humane teares were propheticall, and his propheticall teares are humane too, they riſe from good affections to that people. And therefore the ſame Author ſayes, That becauſe they thought it an uncomely thing for Chriſt to weep for any temporall thing, ſome men have expunged and removed that verſe out of S. Lukes Goſpell, That Jeſus when he ſaw that City, wept: But he is willing to be propoſed, and to ſtand for ever for an example of weeping in contemplation of pub-
C lique calamities; Therefore Ieſus wept. 2 Part.

He wept firſt, Inter acclamationes, in the midſt of the congratulations and acclamations of the people, then when the whole multitude of his Diſciples cried out, Vivat Rex, Bleſſed be the King, that comes in the name of the Lord, Jeſus wept. When Herod tooke to himſelfe the name of the Lord, when he admitted that groſſe flattery, It is a God and not a man that ſpeakes, It was no wonder that preſent occaſion of lamentation fell upon him. But in the beſt times, and under the beſt Princes, (firſt, ſuch is the naturall mutability of all worldly things; and then (and that eſpecially) ſuch is the infiniteneſſe, and enormouſneſſe of our rebellious ſin) then is ever juſt occaſion of feare of worſe, and ſo of teares. Every man is but a ſpunge, and but a ſpunge filled with teares: and whether you lay your right hand or your left upon a full ſpunge, it will weep. Whether God lay his left hand, temporall calamities, or his right hand, temporall proſperity; even that temporall pro-
D ſperity comes alwaies accompanied with ſo much anxiety in our ſelves, ſo much uncertainty in it ſelfe, and ſo much envy in others, as that that man who abounds moſt, that ſpunge ſhall weep. Inter acclamationes. Luke 19.38.

Jeſus wept, Inter acclamationes, when all went well enough with him; to ſhew the ſlipperineſſe of worldly happineſſe, and then he wept Inter judicia; then when himſelfe was in the act of denouncing judgements upon them, Jeſus wept; To ſhew with how ill a will he inflicted thoſe judgements, and that themſelves, and not he, had drawne thoſe judgements upon them. How often doe the Prophets repeat that phraſe, Onus viſionis, O the burden of the judgements that I have ſeene upon this, and this people! It was a burden that preſſed teares from the Prophet Eſay, I will water thee with my teares, Eſay 16.9.
O Heſhbon: when he muſt pronounce judgements upon her, he could not but weep over
E her. No Prophet ſo tender as Chriſt, nor ſo compaſſionate, and therefore he never takes rod into his hand, but with teares in his eyes. Alas, did God lack a footſtoole, that he ſhould make man only to tread and trample upon? Did God lack glory, and could have it no other way, but by creating man therefore, to afflict him temporally here, and eternally hereafter? whatſoever Chriſt weeps for in the way of his mercy, it is likely he was diſpleaſed with it in the way of his Juſtice: If he weep for it, he had rather it were not ſo. If then thoſe judgements upon Jeruſalem were only from his owne primary, and poſitive, and abſolute Decree, without any reſpect to their ſins, could he be diſpleaſed with his owne act, or weep and lament that which onely himſelfe had done? would God ask that queſtion of Iſrael, Quare moriemini domus Iſrael? why will you dye O houſe of Iſrael? if God lay open to that anſwer, We die therefore, becauſe you have killed us, Jeruſalem ſalem would not judge her ſelfe, therefore Chriſt judged her; Jeruſalem would not weep for her ſelf, and therefore Jeſus wept; but in thoſe teares of his, he ſhewed, that he had rather her own teares had averted, and waſhed away thoſe judgements. A

Cum appropinquavit. He wept, cum appropinquavit, ſayes the Text there, when Ieſus came near the City and ſaw it, then he wept; not till then. If we will not come neare the miſeries of our brethren, if we will not ſee them, we will never weep over them, never be affected towards them. It was cum ille, not cum illi, when Chriſt himſelfe, not when his Diſciples, his followers, who could doe Jeruſalem no good, tooke knowledge of it. It was not cum illi, nor it was not cum illa, not when thoſe judgements drew neare; It is not ſaid ſo; neither is there any time limited in the Text, when thoſe judgements were to fall upon Jeruſalem; it is onely ſaid generally, indefinitely, theſe dayes ſhall come upon her. And yet Chriſt did not eaſe himſelfe upon that, that thoſe calamities were remote and farre off, but though they were ſo, and not to fall till after his death, yet he lamented future calamities then, then Jeſus wept. Many ſuch little Brookes as theſe fall into this River, the conſideration of Chriſts Propheticall teares; but let it be enough to have ſprinkled theſe drops out of the River; That Jeſus, though a private perſon, wept in contemplation of publique calamities; That he wept in the beſt times, fore-ſeeing worſe; That he wept in their miſeries, becauſe he was no Author of them: That he wept not till he tooke their miſeries into his conſideration: And he did weep a good time, before thoſe miſeries fell upon them. There remaine yet his third teares, his pontificall teares, which accompany his ſacrifice; Thoſe teares we called the Sea, but a Sea which muſt now be bounded with a very little ſand. B

Non cum illi.

3. Part. To ſaile apace through this Sea; theſe teares, the teares of his Croſſe, were expreſſed by that ineſtimable waight, the ſinnes of all the world. If all the body were eye, argues the Apoſtle in another place; why, here all the body was eye; every pore of his body made an eye by teares of blood, and every inch of his body made an eye by their bloody ſcourges. And if Chriſts looking upon Peter, made Peter weep, ſhall not his looking upon us here, with teares in his eyes, ſuch teares in ſuch eyes, ſprings of teares, rivers of teares, ſeas of teares make us weep too? Peter who wept under the waight of his particular ſin, wept bitterly: how bitterly wept Chriſt under the waight of all the ſins of all the world? In the firſt teares, Chriſts humane teares (thoſe we called a ſpring) we fetched water at one houſe, we condoled a private calamity in another; Lazarus was dead. In his ſecond teares, his Propheticall teares, wee went to the condoling of a whole Nation, and thoſe we called a River. In theſe third teares, his pontificall teares, teares for ſin, for all ſins (thoſe we call a Sea) here is Mare liberum, a Sea free and open to all; Every man may ſaile home, home to himſelfe, and lament his own ſins there. C

I am farre from concluding all to be impenitent, that doe not actually weep and ſhed teares; I know there are conſtitutions, complexions, that doe not afford them. And yet the worſt Epithet, which the beſt Poet could fixe upon Pluto himſelfe, was to call him Illachrymabilis, a perſon that could not weep. But to weep for other things, and not to weep for ſin, or if not to teares, yet not to come to that tenderneſſe, to that melting, to that thawing, that reſolving of the bowels which good ſoules feele; this is a ſponge (I ſaid before, every man is a ſponge) this is a ſponge dried up into a Pumice ſtone; the lightneſſe, the hollowneſſe of a ſponge is there ſtill; but (as the Pumice is) dried in the Ætnaes of luſt, of ambition, of other flames in this world. D

I have but three words to ſay of theſe teares of this weeping. What it is, what it is for, what it does; the nature, the uſe, the benefit of theſe teares, is all. And in the firſt, I forbeare to inſiſt upon S. Baſils Metaphor, Lachryma ſudor animi male ſani; Sin is my ſickneſſe, the blood of Chriſt Jeſus is my Bezar, teares is the ſweat that that produceth. I forbeare Greg. Nyſſens Metaphor too, Lachryma ſanguis cordis defæcatus; Teares are our beſt blood, ſo agitated, ſo ventilated, ſo purified, ſo rarified into ſpirits, as that thereby I become Idem ſpiritus, one ſpirit with my God. That is large enough, and imbraces all, which S. Gregory ſayes, That man weeps truly, that ſoul ſheds true teares, that conſiders ſeriouſly, firſt, ubi fuit in innocentia, the bleſſed ſtate which man was in, in his integrity at firſt, ubi fuit; and then conſiders, ubi eſt in tentationibus, the weak eſtate that man is in now, in the midſt of tentations, where, if he had no more, himſelf were tentation too much, ubi eſt; and yet conſiders farther, ubi erit, in gehenna, the inſupportable, and for all that, the inevitable, the irreparable, and for all that, undeterminable torments of hell, E

A ubi erit; and laſtly, ubi non erit, in cœlis, the unexpreſſible joy and glory which he loſes in heaven, ubi non erit, where he ſhall never be. Theſe foure to conſider ſeriouſly, where man was, where he is, where he ſhall be, where he ſhall never be, are foure ſuch Rivers, as conſtitute a Paradiſe. And as a ground may be a weeping ground, though it have no running River, no conſtant ſpring, no gathering of waters in it; ſo a ſoule that can poure out it ſelf into theſe religious conſiderations, may be a weeping ſoule, though it have a dry eye: This weeping then is but a true ſorrow, (that was our firſt) and then, what this true ſorrow is given us for, and that is our next Conſideration.

As water is in nature a thing indifferent, it may give life, (ſo the firſt living things that were, were in the water) and it may deſtroy life, (ſo all things living upon the earth, were deſtroyed in the water) but yet though water may, though it have done good and bad, yet water does now one good office, which no ill quality that is in it can equall, it waſhes our ſoules in Baptiſme; ſo though there be good teares and bad teares, teares that waſh away ſin, and teares that are ſin, yet all teares have this degree of good in them, that they are all ſome kinde of argument of good nature, of a tender heart; and the Holy Ghoſt loves to work in Waxe, and not in Marble. I hope that is but meerly Poeticall which the Poet ſaies, Diſcunt lachrymare decenter; that ſome ſtudy to weep with a good grace; Quoq; volunt plorant tempore, quoq; modo, they make uſe and advantage of their teares, and weep when they will. But of thoſe who weep not when they would, but when they would not, do half imploy their teares upon that for which God hath given them that ſacrifice upon ſin. God made the Firmament, which he called Heaven, after it had divided the waters: After we have diſtinguiſhed our teares, naturall from ſpirituall, worldly from heavenly, then there is a Firmament eſtabliſhed in us, then there is a heaven opened to us: and truly, to caſt Pearles before Swine, will ſcarce be better reſembled, then to ſhed teares which reſemble pearles for worldly loſſes. Ad quid.

C Are there examples of men paſſionately enamored upon age? or if upon age, upon deformity? If there be examples of that, are they not examples of ſcorn too? doe not all others laugh at their teares? and yet ſuch is our paſſionate doting upon this world. Mundi facies, ſayes S. Auguſtine, (and even S. Auguſtine himſelfe hath ſcarce ſaid any thing more pathetically) tanta rerum tabi contrita, ut etiam ſpeciem ſeductionis amiſerit: The face of the whole world is ſo defaced, ſo wrinkled, ſo ruined, ſo deformed, as that man might be truſted with this world, and there is no jealouſie, no ſuſpition that this world ſhould be able to miniſter any occaſion of tentation to man: Speciem ſeductionis amiſit. And yet, Qui in ſeipſo aruit, in nobis floret, ſayes S. Gregory, as wittily as S. Auguſtine, (as it is eaſie to be witty, eaſie to extend an Epigram to a Satyre, and a Satyre to an Invective, in declaiming againſt this world) that world which findes it ſelfe truly in an Autumne, in it

D ſelfe, findes it ſelfe in a ſpring, in our imaginations. Labenti haremus, ſayes that Father; Et cum labentem ſiſtere non poſſumus, cum ipſo labimur; The world paſſes away, and yet wee cleave to it; and when wee cannot ſtay it from paſſing away, wee paſſe away with it.

To mourne paſſionately for the love of this world, which is decrepit, and upon the deathbed, or immoderately for the death of any that is paſſed out of this world, is not the right uſe of teares. That hath good uſe which Chryſologus notes, that when Chriſt was told of Lazarus death, he ſaid he was glad; when he came to raiſe him to life, then hee wept: for though his Diſciples gained by it, (they were confirmed by a Miracle) though the family gained by it, (they had their Lazarus againe) yet Lazarus himſelfe loſt by it, by being re-impriſoned, re-committed, re-ſubmitted to the manifold incommodities of this world. When our Saviour Chriſt forbad the women to weepe for him, it was be-

E cauſe there was nothing in him, for teares to worke upon; no ſin: Ordinem flendi docuit, ſaies S. Bernard, Chriſt did not abſolutely forbid teares, but regulate and order their teares, that they might weepe in the right place, firſt for ſin. David wept for Abſolon; He might imagine, that he died in ſin, he wept not for the Child by Bathſheba, he could not ſuſpect ſo much danger in that. Exitus aquarum, ſaies David, Rivers of waters ran downe from mine eyes, why? Quia illi, Becauſe they, who are they? not other men, as it is ordinarily taken; but Quia illi, Becauſe mine owne eyes (ſo Hilary, and Ambroſe, and Auguſt. take it) have not kept thy Lawes: As the calamities of others, ſo the ſins of others may, but our owne ſins muſt be the object of our ſorrow. Thou ſhalt offer to me, ſaies God, the firſt of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors, as our Tranſlation hath it: The word in the Originall Pſal. 119. 136. Exod. 22. 29.

ginall is Vedingnacha, lachrymarum, and of thy teares: Thy first teares must be to God for sin: The second and third may be to nature and civility, and such secular offices. But Liquore ad lippitudinem apto quisquamne ad pedes lavandos abutetur? It is S. Chrysostomes exclamation and admiration, will any wash his feet in water for sore eyes? will any man embalme the Carcasse of the world, which he treads under foote, with those teares which should embalme his soule? Did Ioseph of Arimathea bestow any of his perfumes (though he brought a superfluous quantity, a hundred pound waight for one body) yet did he bestow any upon the body of either of the Thieves? Teares are true sorrow, that you heard before; True sorrow is for sin, that you have heard now; All that remaines is how this sorrow works, what it does. A

Quid operantur. The Fathers have infinitely delighted themselves in this descant, the blessed effect of holy teares. He amongst them that remembers us, that in the old Law all Sacrifices were washed, he meanes, That our best sacrifice, even prayer it selfe, receives an improvement, a dignity, by being washed in teares. He that remembers us, that if any roome of our house be on fire, we run for water, meanes that in all tentations, we should have recourse to teares. He that tels us, that money being put into a bason, is seene at a farther distance, if there be water in the bason, then if it be emptie, meanes also, that our most pretious devotions receive an addition, a multiplication by holy teares. S. Bernard meanes all that they all meane in that, Cor lachrymas nesciens durum, impurum, A hard heart is a foule heart. Would you shut up the devill in his owne channell, his channell of brimstone, and make that worse? S. Hierom tels the way, Plus tua lachryma, &c. Thy teares torment him more then the fires of hell; will you needs have holy water? truly, true teares are the holiest water. And for Purgatory, it is liberally confessed by a Jesuit, Non minùs efficax, &c. One teare will doe thee as much good, as all the flames of Purgatory. We have said more then once, that man is a spunge; And in Codice scripta, all our sins are written in Gods Booke, saies S. Chrysostome: If there I can fill my spunge with teares, and so wipe out all my sins out of that Book, it is a blessed use of the Spunge. Mend ezz. in 1. Sam.

I might stand upon this, the manifold benefits of godly teares, long: so long, as till you wept, and wept for sin; and that might be very long. I contract all to this one, which is all: To how many blessednesses must these teares, this godly sorrow reach by the way, when as it reaches to the very extreme, to that which is opposed to it, to Joy? for godlie sorrow is Joy. The words in Iob are in the Vulgat, Dimitte me ut plangam dolorem meum: Lord spare me a while that I may lament my lamentable estate: and so ordinarily the Expositors that follow that Translation, make their use of them. But yet it is in the Originall, Lord spare me a while, that I may take comfort: That which one cals lamenting, the other calls rejoycing: To conceive true sorrow and true joy, are things not onely contiguous, but continuall; they doe not onely touch and follow one another in a certaine succession, Joy assuredly after sorrow, but they consist together, they are all one, Joy and Sorrow. My teares have beene my meat day and night, saies David: not that he had no other meate, but that none relisht so well. It is a Grammaticall note of a Jesuit, (I doe not tell you it is true; I have almost told you that it is not true, by telling you whose it is, but that it is but a Grammaticall note) That when it is said Tempus cantus, The time of singing is come, it might as well be rendred out of the Hebrew, Tempus plorationis, The time of weeping is come; And when it is said, Nomini tuo cantabo, Lord I will sing unto thy Name, it might be as well rendred out of the Hebrew, Plorabo, I will weepe, I will sacrifice my teares unto thy Name. So equall, so indifferent a thing is it, when we come to godly sorrow, whether we call it sorrow or joy, weeping or singing. D

To end all, to weep for sin is not a damp of melancholy, to sigh for sin, is not a vapour of the spleene, but as Monicaes Confessor said still unto her, in the behalfe of her Son S. Augustine, filius istarum lachrymarum, the son of these teares cannot perish; so wash thy selfe in these three examplar bathes of Christs teares, in his humane teares, and be tenderly affected with humane accidents, in his Propheticall teares, and avert as much as in thee lieth, the calamities imminent upon others, but especially in his pontificall teares, teares for sin, and I am thy Confessor, non ego, sed Dominus; not I, but the spirit of God himself is thy Confessor, and he absolves thee, filius istarum lachrymarum, the soule bathed in these teares cannot perish: for this is trina immersio, that threefold dipping which was used in the Primitive Church in baptisme. And in this baptisme, thou takest a new Christian name, thou who wast but a Christian, art now a regenerate Christian; and as E

MAT. 19. 17.

And he ſaid unto him, Why calleſt thou me Good? There is none Good but One; that is, God.

C THat which God commanded by his Word, to be done at ſome times (that we ſhould humble our ſoules by faſting) the ſame God commands by his Church, to be done now: In the Scriptures you have Præceptum, The thing it ſelf, What; In the Church, you have the Nunc, The time, When. The Scriptures are Gods Voyce; The Church is his Eccho; a redoubling, a repeating of ſome particular ſyllables, and accents of the ſame voice. And as we harken with ſome earneſtneſſe, and ſome admiration at an Eccho, when perchance we doe not underſtand the voice that occaſioned that Eccho; ſo doe the obedient children of God apply themſelves to the Eccho of his Church, when perchance otherwiſe, they would leſſe underſtand the voice of God, in his Scriptures, if that voice were not ſo redoubled unto them. This faſting then, thus enjoyned by God, for the generall, in his Word, and
D thus limited to this Time, for the particular, in his Church, is indeed but a continuation of a great Feaſt: Where, the firſt courſe (that which we begin to ſerve in now) is Manna, food of Angels, plentifull, frequent preaching; but the ſecond courſe, is the very body and blood of Chriſt Jeſus, ſhed for us, and given to us, in that bleſſed Sacrament, of which himſelfe makes us worthy receivers at that time. Now, as the end of all bodily eating, is Aſſimilation, that after all other concoctions, that meat may be made Idem corpus, the ſame body that I am; ſo the end of all ſpirituall eating, is Aſſimilation too, That after all Hearing, and all Receiving, I may be made Idem ſpiritus cum Domino, the ſame ſpirit, that my God is: for, though it be good to Heare, good to Receive, good to Meditate, yet, (if we ſpeake effectually, and conſummatively) why call we theſe good? there is nothing good but One, that is, Aſſimilation to God; In which perfect and conſummative ſenſe, Chriſt ſaies to this Man, in this Text, Why calleſt thou me good? there is E none good but one, that is God.

The words are part of a Dialogue, of a Conference, betweene Chriſt, and a man who Diviſio.
propoſed a queſtion to him; to whom Chriſt makes an anſwer by way of another queſtion, Why calleſt thou me good, &c. In the words, and by occaſion of them, we conſider the Text, the Context, and the Pretext: Not as three equall parts of the Building; but the Context, as the ſituation and Proſpect of the houſe, The Pretext, as the Acceſſe and entrance to the houſe, And then the Text it ſelfe, as the Houſe it ſelfe, as the body of the building: In a word, In the Text, the Words; In the Context, the Occaſion of the words; In the Pretext, the Pretence, the purpoſe, the diſpoſition of him who gave the occaſion.

We

1 Part. Context.

We begin with the Context; the ſituation, the proſpect; how it ſtands, how it is butted, how it is bounded; to what it relates, with what it is connected. And in that, we are no farther curious, but onely to note this, that the Text ſtands in that Story, where a man comes to Chriſt, inquires the way to Heaven, beleeves himſelfe to be in that way already, and (when he heares of nothing, but keeping the Commandements) beleeves himſelfe to be far gone in that way; But when he is told alſo, that there belongs to it a departing with his Riches, his beloved Riches, he breakes off the conference, he ſeparates himſelfe from Chriſt; for, (ſaies the Story) This Man had great poſſeßions. And to this purpoſe, (to ſeparate us from Chriſt) the pooreſt amongſt us, hath great poſſeſſions. He that ſtarves, as well as he that ſurfets, he that lies in the ſpitting places, and excrementall corners of the ſtreets, as well as he that ſits upon carpets, in the Region of perfumes, he that is ground and trod to durt, with obloquie, and contempt, as well as he that is built up every day, a ſtory and ſtory higher with additions of Honour, Every man hath ſome ſuch poſſeſſions as poſſeſſe him, ſome ſuch affections as weigh downe Chriſt Jeſus, and ſeparate him from Him, rather then from thoſe affections, thoſe poſſeſſions. Scarce any ſinner but comes ſometimes to Chriſt, in the language of the man in this Text, Good Maſter what good thing ſhall I do, that I may have eternall life? And if Chriſt would go no farther with ſuch men, but to ſay to the Adulterer, Do not thou give thy money to uſury; no more to the penurious Uſurer, but, Do not thou waſt thy ſelfe in ſuperfluous and expenſive feaſting; If Chriſt would proceed no farther, but to ſay to the needy perſon, that had no money, Do not thou buy preferment; or to the ambitious perſon that ſoares up after all, Do not thou forſake thy ſelfe, deject thy ſelfe, undervalue thy ſelfe, In all theſe caſes, the Adulterer and the Uſurer, The needy and the ambitious man, would all ſay with the man in the Text, All theſe things have we done from our youth. But when Chriſt proceeds to a Vade, & vende, to depart with their poſſeſſions, that which they poſſeſſe, that which poſſeſſes them, this changes the caſe.

There are ſome ſins ſo rooted, ſo riveted in men, ſo incorporated, ſo conſubſtantiated in the ſoule, by habituall cuſtome, as that thoſe ſins have contracted the nature of Ancient poſſeſſions. As men call Manners by their names, ſo ſins have taken names from men, and from places; Simon Magus gave the name to a ſin, and ſo did Gehazi, and Sodom did ſo: There are ſins that run in Names, in Families, in Blood; Hereditary ſins, entailed ſins; and men do almoſt prove their Gentry by thoſe ſins, and are ſcarce beleeved to be rightly borne, if they have not thoſe ſins; Theſe are great poſſeſſions, and men do much more eaſily part with Chriſt, then with theſe ſins. But then there are leſſe ſins, light ſins, vanities; and yet even theſe come to poſſeſſe us, and ſeparate us from Chriſt. How many men neglect this ordinary meanes of their Salvation, the comming to theſe Exerciſes, not becauſe their undoing lyes on it, or their diſcountenancing; but meerely out of levity, of vanity, of nothing; they know not what to do elſe, and yet do not this. You heare of one man that was drowned in a veſſell of Wine; but how many thouſands in ordinary water? And he was no more drowned in that precious liquor, then they in that common water. A gad of ſteele does no more choake a man, then a feather, then a haire; Men periſh with whiſpering ſins, nay with ſilent ſins, ſins that never tell the conſcience they are ſins, as often as with crying ſins: And in hell there ſhall meet as many men, that never thought what was ſin, as that ſpent all their thoughts in the compaſſing of ſin; as many, who in a ſlack inconſideration, never caſt a thought upon that place, as that by ſearing their conſcience, overcame the ſenſe and feare of the place. Great ſins are great poſſeſſions; but levities and vanities poſſeſſe us too; and men had rather part with Chriſt, then with any poſſeſſions; which is all we will note out of this firſt part, The Context, the ſituation, and proſpect of the houſe, the coherence and connexion of the Text.

2 Part. Pretext.

The ſecond part, is the pretext; that is the pretenſe, the purpoſe, the diſpoſition of him that moved this queſtion to Chriſt, and occaſioned this anſwer. Upon which we make this ſtop, becauſe it hath been variouſly apprehended by the Expoſitors; for ſome think he came in an humble diſpoſition to learn of Chriſt, and others think he came in a Phariſaicall confidence in himſelf, with which Epiphanius firſt, and then S. Ierome charge him. But in ſuch doubtful caſes in other mens actions, when it appeares not evidently, whether it were well, or ill done, where the balance is eaven, alwayes put you in your charity, and that will turne the ſcale the beſt way. Things which are in themſelves, but miſ-interpretable, doe not you preſently miſ-interpret, you allow ſome graines to your gold, before you

A you call it light: allow ſome infirmities to any man, before you call him ill. For this man in the Text, venit, ſayes this Euangeliſt, he came to Chriſt, he came of himſelfe. S. Peter himſelf came not ſo, S. Peter came not, till his brother Andrew brought him: none of the twelve Apoſtles came to Chriſt ſo, they came not, till Chriſt called them: Here, we heare of no calling, no inviting, no mention of any motion towards him, no intimation of any intimation to him, and yet he came. Bleſſed are they that come to Chriſt Jeſus, before any collaterall reſpects draw them, before the Laws compell them, before calamities drive them to him: He onely comes hither, that comes voluntarily, and is glad he is here; He that comes ſo, as that he had rather he were away, is not here. Venit, ſayes our Euangeliſt, of this man: And then, ſayes S. Mark, handling the ſame ſtory, Venit procurrens, He came running. Nicodemus came not ſo, Nicodemus durſt not avow his comming, and therefore he came creeping, and he came ſoftly, and he came ſeldome, B and he came by night. Mark. 10. 17.

Bleſſed are they who make haſte to Chriſt, and publiſh their zeale to the encouragement of others: For, let no man promiſe himſelf a religious conſtancy in the time of his triall, that doth not his part in eſtabliſhing the religious conſtancy of other men. Of all proofes, Demonſtration is the powerfulleſt: when I have juſt reaſon to think my ſuperiours would have it thus, this is Muſique to my ſoul; When I heare them ſay they would have it thus, this is Rhetorique to my ſoule; When I ſee their Laws enjoyne it to be thus, this is Logick to my ſoul; but when I ſee them actually, really, clearely, conſtantly do thus, this is a Demonſtration to my ſoule, and Demonſtration is the powerfulleſt proofe: The eloquence of inferiours is in words, the eloquence of ſuperiours is in action.

He came to Chriſt; hee ran to him; and when he was come, as S. Mark relates it, He fell upon his knees to Chriſt. He ſtood not then Phariſaically upon his own legs, his C own merits, though he had been a diligent obſerver of the Commandements before. Bleſſed are they, who bring the teſtimony of a former zeale to Gods ſervice, and yet make that no excuſe for their preſent, or future ſlacknеſſe; The benefit of our former goodneſſe is, that that enables us to be the better ſtill: For, as all example is powerfull upon us, ſo our own example moſt of all; in this caſe we are moſt immediately bound by our ſelves; ſtill to be ſo good, as we our ſelves have been before: There was a time when I was nothing; but there ſhall never be any time, when I ſhall be nothing; and therefore I am moſt to reſpect the future. The good ſervices that a man hath done to God by pen, or ſword, are wings, and they exalt him if he would go forward; but they are waights and depreſſe him, and aggravate his condemnation, if his preſumption upon the merit of thoſe former ſervices, retard him for the future. This man had done well, but he ſtood not upon that; he kneeled to Chriſt, and he ſaid to him, Magiſter bone, D Good maſter. He was no ignorant man, and yet he acknowledged that he had ſomewhat more to learn of Chriſt, then he knew yet. Bleſſed are they that inanimate all their knowledge, conſummate all in Chriſt Jeſus. The Univerſity is a Paradiſe, Rivers of knowledge are there, Arts and Sciences flow from thence. Counſell Tables are Horti concluſi, (as it is ſaid in the Canticles) Gardens that are walled in, and they are Fontes ſignati, Wells that are ſealed up; bottomleſſe depths of unſearchable Counſels there. But thoſe Aquæ quietudinum, which the Prophet ſpeaks of, The waters of reſt, they flow à magiſtro bono, from this good maſter, and flow into him again; All knowledge that begins not, and ends not with his glory, is but a giddy, but a vertiginous circle, but an elaborate and exquiſite ignorance. He would learn of him, and what? Quid boni faciam, What good thing ſhall I do? Still he refers to the future; to do as well as to have done: and ſtill to be doing ſo. Bleſſed are they that bring their knowledge into practiſe; and bleſſed again, E that crown their former practiſe with future perſeverance.

This was his diſpoſition that came; His, though he were a yong man; (for ſo he is ſaid to be, in the 22. ver.) and yong men are not often ſo forward in ſuch wayes. I remember one of the Panegyriques celebrates & magnifies one of the Romane Emperors for this, That he would marry when he was yong; that he would ſo ſoon confine and limit his pleaſures, ſo ſoon determine his affections in one perſon. When a yong man comes to Chriſt, Chriſt receives him with an extraordinary welcome; well intimated in that, that that diſciple whom Chriſt loved moſt, came to him yongeſt. He came though he were yong; and he came though he were Vnus è principibus, (for ſo he is qualified in S. Luke) A principall man, a great man; as we tranſlate it, One of the Rulers: Luke 18. 18.

for ſo he is a reall and a perſonall anſwer and inſtance to that ſcornfull queſtion of the Phariſees, Nunquid è principibus, Do any of the Rulers, any great men, beleeve in Chriſt? A 1 Cor. 1. 26. It is true that the Holy Ghoſt doth ſay, Non multi nobiles, few noble men come to heaven. Not out of Panigorola, the Biſhop of Aſti, his reaſon, Pauci quia pauci, There cannot come many noble men to heaven, becauſe there are not many upon earth; for many times there are many. In calme and peaceable times, the large favours of indulgent Princes, in active and ſtirring times, the merit and the fortune of forward men, do often enlarge the number. But ſuch is often the corrupt inordinateneſſe of greatneſſe, that it only carries them ſo much beyond other men, but not ſo much nearer to God; It only ſets men at a farther, not God at a nearer diſtance to them; but becauſe they are come to be called gods, they think they have no farther to go to God, but to themſelves. But

Our converſation ſhould be in heaven; and if we look upon the men of this world, as from heaven, as if we looked upon this world it ſelf, from thence, the hils would be no hils, but all one flat and equall plain; ſo are all men, one kinde of duſt. Records of nobility are only from the book of Life, and your preferment is your intereſt in a place at the right hand of God. But yet, when thoſe men whom God hath raiſed in this world, take him in their armes, and raiſe him too, though God cannot be exalted above himſelf, yet he is content to call this a raiſing, and to thank them for it. Therefore when this man, a man of this rank
Mar. 10. 21. came to him, Ieſus beheld him, ſayes the Goſpell, and he loved him, and he ſaid, One thing thou lackeſt; God knows, he lacked many things; but becauſe he had that one, zeale to him, Chriſt doth not reproach to him his other defects: God pardons great men many errors, for that one good affection, a generall zeale to his glory, and his cauſe. C

His diſpoſition then, (though it have ſeemed ſuſpitious, and queſtionable to ſome) was ſo good, as that it hath afforded us theſe good conſiderations. If it were not ſo good as theſe circumſtances promiſe, yet it affords us another as good conſideration, That how bad ſoever it were, Chriſt Jeſus refuſed him not, when he came to him. When he enquired of Chriſt after ſalvation, Chriſt doth not ſay, There is no ſalvation for thee, thou Viper, thou Hypocrite, thou Phariſee, I have locked an iron doore of predeſtination between ſalvation and thee; when he enquired of him, what he ſhould do to be ſure of heaven, Chriſt doth not ſay, There is no ſuch art, no ſuch way, no ſuch aſſurance here; but you muſt look into the eternall decree of Election firſt, and ſee whether that ſtand for you or no: But Chriſt teaches him the true method of this art: for, when he ſayes to him, Why calleſt thou me good? There is none good but God, he only directs him in the way to that end, which he did indeed, or pretended to ſeek. And this direction of his, this D method is our third part; In which, (having already ſeen in the firſt, the Context) the ſituation and proſpect of the houſe, that is, the coherence and occaſion of the words, And in the ſecond, (the Pretext) the acceſſe and entrance to the houſe, that is, the pretenſe and purpoſe of him that occaſioned the words, you may now be pleaſed to look farther into the houſe it ſelf, and to ſee how that is built; that is, by what method Chriſt builds up, and edifies this new diſciple of his; which is the principall ſcope and intention of the Text, and that, to which all the reſt did ſomewhat neceſſarily prepare the way.

3. Part. Our Saviour Chriſt thus undertaking the farther rectifying of this thus diſpoſed diſciple, by a faire method leads him to the true end; Good ends, and by good wayes, conſummate goodneſſe. Now Chriſts anſwer to this man is diverſly read: We reade it, (as you have heard) why calleſt thou me good? The vulgat Edition in the Romane Church, reads it thus, Quid me interrogas de bono? Why doſt thou queſtion me concerning goodneſſe? E
Which is true? That which anſwers the Originall; and it can admit no queſtion, but that ours doth ſo. But yet, Origen, to be ſure, in his eighth Tractate upon this Goſpell, reads it both wayes: And S. Auguſtine, in his 63. Chap. of the ſecond book De conſenſu Evangeliſtarum, thinks it may very well be beleeved, that Chriſt did ſay both: That when this man called him good maſter, Chriſt ſaid then, There was none good but God; and that when this man asked him, what good thing he ſhould do, then Chriſt ſaid, Why doſt thou ask me, me whom thou thinkeſt to be but a meere man, what is goodneſſe? There is none good but God; If thou look to underſtand goodneſſe from man, thou muſt look out ſuch a man as is God too. So that this was Chriſts method, by theſe holy inſinuations,

A ſinuations, by theſe approaches, and degrees, to bring this man to a knowledge, that he was very God, and ſo the Meſſias that was expected. Nihil eſt falſitas, niſi cum eſſe putatur, quod non eſt: All error conſiſts in this, that we take things to be leſſe or more, other then they are. Chriſt was pleaſed to redeem this man from this error, and bring him to know truly what he was, that he was God. Chriſt therefore doth not rebuke this man, by any denying that he himſelf was good; for Chriſt doth aſſume that addition to himſelf, I am the good Shepheard. Neither doth God forbid, that thoſe good parts which are in men, ſhould be celebrated with condigne praiſe. We ſee that God, as ſoon as he ſaw that any thing was good, he ſaid ſo, he uttered it, he declared it, firſt of the Light, and then of other creatures: God would be no author, no example of ſmothering the due praiſe of good actions. For, ſurely that man hath no zeale to goodneſſe in himſelf, that affords no praiſe to goodneſſe in other men. Auguſt.

B But Chriſts purpoſe was alſo, that this praiſe, this recognition, this teſtimony of his goodneſſe, might be carried higher, and referred to the only true author of it, to God. So the Prieſts and the Elders come to Iudith, and they ſay to her, Thou art the exaltation of Jeruſalem, thou art the great glory of Iſrael, thou art the rejoycing of our Nation, thou haſt done all theſe things by thy hand; And all this was true of Iudith, and due to Iudith; and ſuch recognitions, and ſuch acclamations God requires of ſuch people, as have received ſuch benefits by ſuch inſtruments: For as there is Treaſon, and petty-treaſon, ſo there is Sacriledge, and petty-ſacriledge; and petty-ſacriledge is to rob Princes and great perſons of their juſt praiſe. But then, as we muſt confer this upon them, ſo muſt they, and we, and all transfer all upon God: for ſo Iudith proceeds there, with her Prieſts and Elders, Begin unto my God, with Timbrels, ſing unto the Lord with Cymbals, exalt him, and call upon his name. So likewiſe Elizabeth magnifies the bleſſed Judith 15.8.

C Virgin Mary, Bleſſed art thou amongſt women: And this was true of her, and due to her; and ſhe takes it to her ſelf, when ſhe ſayes there, From henceforth all Generations ſhall call me bleſſed; but firſt, ſhe had carried it higher, to the higheſt, My ſoule doth magnifie the Lord, and my ſpirit doth rejoyce in God my Saviour. In a word, Chriſt forbids not this man to call him good, but he directs him to know in what capacity that attribute of goodneſſe belonged to him, as he was God: That when this man beleeved before that Chriſt was good, and learnt from him now, that none was good but God, he might by a farther concoction, a farther rumination, a farther meditation of this, come in due time to know that Chriſt was God; And this was his Method. Luke 1.42.

Now this leads us into two rich and fragrant fields; this ſets us upon the two Hemiſpheares of the world; the Weſtern Hemiſpheare, the land of Gold, and Treaſure, and the Eaſtern Hemiſpheare, the land of Spices and Perfumes; for this puts us upon both

D theſe conſiderations, firſt, That nothing is Eſſentially good, but God, (and there is the land of Gold, centricall Gold, viſcerall Gold, gremiall Gold, Gold in the Matrice and womb of God, that is, Eſſentiall goodneſſe in God himſelf) and then upon this conſideration too, That this Eſſentiall goodneſſe of God is ſo diffuſive, ſo ſpreading, as that there is nothing in the world, that doth not participate of that goodneſſe; and there is the land of Spices and Perfumes, the dilatation of Gods goodneſſe. So that now both theſe propoſitions are true, Firſt, That there is nothing in this world good, and then this alſo, That there is nothing ill: As, amongſt the Fathers, it is in a good ſenſe, as truly ſaid, Deus non eſt Ens, Deus non eſt ſubſtantia, God is no Eſſence, God is no ſubſtance, (for feare of impriſoning God in a predicament) as it is ſaid by others of the Fathers, that there is no other Eſſence, no other Subſtance but God.

Firſt then, there is nothing good but God: neither can I conceive any thing in God,

E that concerns me ſo much as his goodneſſe; for, by that I know him, and for that I love him. I know him by that, for, as Damaſcen ſayes, primarium Dei nomen, Bonitas, Gods firſt name, that is, the firſt way by which God notified himſelf to man, was Goodneſs; for out of his goodneſſe he made him. His name of Jehova we admire with a reverence; but we cannot expreſſe that name: not only not in the ſignification of it, but not confidently, not aſſuredly in the ſound thereof; we are not ſure that we ſhould call it Jehova; not ſure that any man did call it Jehova a hundred yeares agoe. But, ineffabili dulcedine teneor cum audio, Bonus Dominus; I am, not tranſported with aſtoniſhment, as at his name of Jehova, but repleniſhed with all ſweetneſſe, eſtabliſhed with all ſoundneſſe, when I hear of my God in that name, my good God. By that I know him, and for that I love him: For, Auguſt.

the object of my understanding is truth; but the object of my love, my affection, my desire, is goodnesse. If my understanding be defective, in many cases, faith will supply it; if I beleeve it, I am as well satisfied, as if I knew it; but nothing supplies, nor fills, nor satisfies the desire of man, on this side of God; Every man hath something to love, and desire, till he determine it in God; because God only hath Imminuibilem bonitatem, as they render Dyonisius the Areopagite, an inexhaustible goodnesse; a sea that no land can suck in, a land that no sea can swallow up, a forrest that no fire can waste, a fire that no water can quench. He is so good, goodnesse so, as that he is Causa bonorum, & qua in nos, & qua in nobis, the cause of all good either received by us, or conceived in us; of all, either prepared externally for us, or produced internally in us. In a word, he is Bonum cætera bona colorans, & amabilia reddens, it is his goodnesse, that gilds and enamels all the good persons, or good actions in this world. There is none good but God; and quale bonum ille, sayes that Father, what kinde of goodnesse God is, this doth sufficiently declare, Quòd nulli ab eo recedenti bene sit, That no man that ever went from him, went by good way, or came to good end; There is none good but God; there is centricall, viscerall, gremiall gold, goodnesse in the roote, in the tree of goodnesse, God.

Aug.

Idem.

Now, Arbor bona, bonos fructus, sayes Christ; If the tree be good, the fruit is good too. The tree is God; What are the fruits of this tree? What are the off-spring of God? S. Ambr. tells us, Angeli & homines, & virtutes eorum; Angels and men, and the good parts, and good actions of Angels and men, are the fruit of this tree, they grow from God. Angels, as they fell, Adam, as he fell, the sins of Angels and men, are not fruits of this tree, they grow not radically, not primarily from God. Nihil in se habet Deus semi-plenum, saies Damascen: God is no half-god, no fragmentary God; he is an intire God, and not made of remnants; not good only so, as that he hath no roome for ill in himself, but good so too, as that he hath no roome for any ill will towards any man; no mans damnation, no mans sin, growes radically from this tree. When God had made all, sayes Tertullian, he blessed all; Maledicere non norat, quia nec malefacere, saies he: God could no more meane ill, then doe ill; God can no more make me sin, then sin himself. It is the foole that saies, There is no God, saies David; And it is the other foole, sayes S. Basil, that saies, God produces any ill; par precii scelus, quia negat Deum bonum; It is as impiously done, to deny God to be intirely good, as to deny him to be God. For, we see the Manichees, and the Marcionites, and such other Heretiques in the Primitive Church, would rather admit, and constitute two Gods, a good God, and a bad God, then be drawn to think, that he that was the good God indeed, could produce any ill of himself, or meane any ill to any man, that had done none.

And therefore even from Plato himself, some Christians might learn more moderation in expressing themselves in this point; Plato sayes, Creavit quia bonus, therefore did God create us, that he might be good to us; and then he addes, Bono nunquam inest invidia, certainly that God, that made us out of his goodnesse, does not now envy us that goodnesse which he hath communicated to us; certainly he does not wish us worse, that so he might more justly damne us, and therefore compell us, by any positive decree, to sin, to justifie his desire of damning us: Much lesse did this good God hate us, or meane ill to us, before he made us, and made us only therefore, that he might have glory in our destruction. There is nothing good but God, there is nothing but goodnesse in God.

How abusively then doe men call the things of this world, Goods? They may as well call them (so they do in their hearts) Gods, as Goods: for there is none good but God. But how much more abusively do they force the world, that call them Bona quia beant, Goods because they make us good, blessed, happy? In which sense, Seneca uses the word shrewdly, Insolens malum beata uxor, a good wife, a blessed wife, sayes he, that is, a wife that brings a great estate, is an insolent mischiefe. If we doe but cast our eye upon that title in the Law, Bonorum, and De bonis, of Goods, we shall easily see, what poor things they make shift to cal Goods. And if we consider (if it deserve a consideration) how great a difference their Lawyers make (Baldus makes that, and others with him) between Bonorum possessio, and possessio bonorum, that one should amount to a right and propriety in the goods, and the other but to a sequestration of such goods, we may easily see, that they can scarce tell what to call, or where to place such Goods. Health, and strength, and stature, and comelinesse, must be called Goods, though but of the body; The body it self is in the substance it self, but dust; these are but the accidents of that dust, and yet they must be Goods. Land, and

Money,

A Money, & honor muſt be called Goods, though but of fortune; Fortune her ſelf, is but ſuch an Idol, as that S. Aug. was aſhamed ever to have named her in his works, and therefore repents it in his Retractations; her ſelf is but an Idol, and an Idol is nothing, theſe; but the accidents of that nothing, and yet they muſt be Goods. Are they ſuch Goods, as make him neceſſarily good that hath them? Or ſuch, as no man can be good, that is without them? How many men make themſelves miſerable, becauſe they want theſe Goods? And how many men have been made miſerable by others, becauſe they had them? Except thou ſee the face of God upon all thy money, as well as the face of the King, the hand of God to all thy Patents, as well as the hand of the King, Gods Amen, as well as the Kings fiat, to all thy creatiõs, all theſe reach not to the title of Goods, for there is none good but God.

Nothing in this world; not if thou couldſt have it all; carry it higher, to the higheſt, to heaven; heaven it ſelf were not good, without God. For, in the Schoole, very many
B and very great men, have thought and taught; That the humane nature of Chriſt, though united Hypoſtatically to the Divine Nature, was not meerly by that Union, impeccable, but might have ſinned, if beſides that Union, God had not infuſed, and ſuper-induced other graces, of which other graces, the Beatificall viſion, the preſent ſight of the face and Eſſence of God, was one: Becauſe, (ſay they) Chriſt had from his Conception, in his Humane Nature, that Beatificall Viſion of God, which we ſhall have in the ſtate of Glory, therefore he could not ſin. This Beatificall Viſion, ſay they, which Chriſt had here, and which, (as they ſuppoſe, and not improbably, in the problematicall way of the Schoole) God, of his abſolute power, might have with-held, and yet the Hypoſtaticall Union have remained perfect; (for, ſay they, the two Natures, Humane & Divine, might have been ſo united, and yet the Humane not have ſo ſeen the Divine) This Beatificall Viſion, this ſight of God, was the Cauſe, or Seal, or Conſummation of Chriſts Perfecti-
C on, and impeccability in his Humane Nature. Much more is this Beatificall Viſion, this ſight of God in Heaven, the Cauſe or Conſummation of all the joyes and glory which we ſhall receive in that place: for howſoever they diſpute, whether that kinde of Bleſſednеſſe conſiſt in ſeeing God, formaliter, or cauſaliter, that is, whether I ſhall ſee all things in God, as in a glaſſe, in which the ſpecies of all things are, or whether I ſhall ſee all things, by God, as by the benefit of a light, which ſhall diſcover all things to me, yet they all agree, (though they differ de modo, of the manner, how) that howſoever it be, the ſubſtance of the Bleſſednеſſe is in this, that I ſhall ſee God: Bleſſed are the pure in heart, ſayes Chriſt, for they ſhall ſee God; If they ſhould not ſee God, they were not bleſſed. And therefore they who place children that die unbapriſed, in a roome, where though they feele no torment, yet they ſhall never ſee God, durſt never call that roome a part of heaven, but of hell rather; Though there be no torment, yet, if they ſee not God, it is hell. There is
D nothing good in this life, nothing in the next, without God, that is, without ſight and fruition of the face, and preſence of God; which is that, which S. Auguſtine intends, when he ſayes, Secutio Dei eſt appetitus Beatitatis, conſecutio Beatitas; our looking towards God, is the way to Bleſſednеſſe, but Bleſſednеſſe it ſelf is only the ſight of God himſelf.

That therefore thou maiſt begin thy heaven here, put thy ſelf in the ſight of God, put God in thy ſight, in every particular action. We cannot come to the body of the Sun, but we can uſe the light of the Sun many waies: we cannot come to God himſelf here, but yet here we can ſee him by many manifeſtations: ſo many, as that S. Auguſtine, in his 20. Chapt. De moribus Eccleſiæ Catholicæ, hath collected aright places of Scripture, where every one of our ſenſes is called a Seeing; there is a Guſtate & videte, and audite, and palpate; taſting, and hearing, and feeling, and all, to this purpoſe, are called ſeeing; In all our ſenſes, in our faculties, we may ſee God if we will: God ſees us at midnight; he ſees us, then,
E when we had rather he looked off. If we ſee him ſo, it is a bleſſed interview. How would he that were come abroad at mid-night, to doe a miſchiefe, ſneak away, if he ſaw the watch? what a damp muſt it neceſſarily caſt upon any ſinner, in the neareſt approach to his ſin, if he can ſee God? See him before thou ſinneſt; then he looks lovingly: After the ſin, remember how fain Adam would have hid himſelf from God: He that goes one ſtep out of Gods ſight, is loath to come into it againe: If you will ſit at the right hand of God hereafter, you muſt walk with God here; So Abraham, ſo Enoch walked with God, Gen. 5. 25.
and God took him. God knowes, God takes not every man that dies: God ſayes to the rich ſecure man, Foole, this night they ſhall fetch away thy ſoule; but he does not tell him who. That then you be no ſtrangers to God then, ſee him now; and remember, that his last judgement is expreſſed in that word, Neſcio vos, I know you not; not to be known by God, is damnation; and God knows no man there, with whom he was not acquainted here. There is none good but God; the fruition of that God, is in ſeeing him; The way to ſee him there, is to look towards him here. And ſo we have gone as far as the firſt of our two propoſitions carried us, That in this world there is nothing good.

The other that remains, is, That there is nothing ill; that this goodneſſe of God is ſo ſpread over all, (all actions, all perſons) as that there is nothing ill. Seneca, whom Tertullian calls ſtill Senecam noſtram, our Seneca, that is, that Chriſtian Seneca, as though he had read that of S Paul, (between whom and him, it hath been thought, there paſſed Epiſtles) Quid habes quod non accepiſti? what haſt thou, that thou haſt not received from God? and meant to ſay more then that, ſayes quid non dedit? what is there, that were good for thee, that God hath not given thee? And he, whom they call ſo often Platonem Hebræorum, the Jews Plato, that is, Philo Iudæus, ſayes well, Nihil boni ſterile creavit Deus; God hath made nothing, in which he hath not imprinted, and from which he hath not produced ſome good: He follows it ſo far, (and juſtly) as to ſay, that God does good, where that good does no good: He takes his examples from Gods raining in the Sea; that rain does no good in the Sea: And from Gods producing freſh ſprings in the deſart Land, where, not only no beaſts come to drink, but where the very ſalt tide overflows the freſh ſpring. He might have added an example from Paradiſe, that God would plant ſuch a garden, for ſo few houres; that God would provide man ſuch a dwelling, when he knew he would not dwell a day in it. And he might have added an example from the Light too; That God would create light, and ſay it was good, then when it could be good for nothing, for there was nothing made to ſee it, nor to be ſeen by it: ſo forward, ſo early was God, in diffuſing his goodneſſe. Of every particular thing God ſaid it was good, and of all together, that it was very good, there was, there is nothing ill. For, when it is ordinarily inquired in the Schoole, whether any thing be eſſentially good, it is ſafely anſwered there, that if by eſſentially we mean independantly, ſo good as that it can ſubſiſt of it ſelf, without dependance upon, or relation to any other thing, ſo there is nothing eſſentially good: But if by eſſentially good, we mean that whoſe eſſence, and beeing is good, ſo every thing is eſſentially good. And therefore when the Manichees preſſed S. Auguſt. with that, Vnde malum? If there be not an ill God, as wel as a good, unde malum, from whom, or from whence proceed all that ill that is in the world? S. Aug. ſaies, Vnde malum? Quid malum? From whence comes evill? Why, what is there, that you can call evill? I know no ſuch thing; ſo that, if there be ſuch a God, that God hath no creature. For, as poiſons conduce to Phyſick, and diſcord to Muſick, ſo thoſe two kinds of evill, into which we contract all others, are of good uſe, that is, malum pœnæ, the evill of puniſhment, affliction, adverſity, and malum culpæ, even ſin it ſelfe, from which, the puniſhment flowes.

Be pleaſed to ſtop a little, upon each of theſe. Firſt, malum pœnæ, affliction, poverty, ſickneſſe, impriſonment, baniſhment, and ſuch, are not evill. The blood of Chriſt Jeſus only is my cordiall; that reſtores me, repaires me; but affliction is my Phyſick; that purges, that cleanſes me. Hoſtiliter ſe opponit medicus, ſaies Tertullian, The Phyſitian comes in like an enemy, with a knife to launce, with fire to cauterize, but opponit ſe morbo, he is but an enemy to the diſeaſe, he means the patient no harm; no more does God to me, in all his medicinall corrections. But how if theſe afflictions hang long upon me? If they do ſo, that is Clem. Alex. Ægrotantium animarum dieta, God enters into another courſe of Phyſick, and finds it better for me to ſpend my diſeaſe by a diet; and long ſickneſſes are ſuch diets: God will recover my ſoul by a conſumption of the body, and eſtabliſh everlaſting health, by long ſickneſſe. Howſoever, let Gods corrections go as high as they can go in this world, Etſi novum videtur, quod dicere volo, ſaies Origen, dicam tamen; Though it be ſtrange that I will ſay, I wil ſay it, Etiam bonitas Dei eſt, qui dicitur furor ejus; That which we cal the anger of God, the wrath of God, the fury of God, is the goodneſſe of God. Correct me not O Lord, in thy wrath, ſaies David; but, rather then leave me uncorrected, correct me any way. We call God, Juſt, and we call him Mercifull, according to our preſent taſte of God, and uſe of Cyril. Alex. God, Cum unicam habeat affectionem Deus, nempe bonitatem, when as God hath but one affection in himſelf, that is, goodneſſe, nor but one purpoſe upon us, that is, to doe us good.

So then, this which we call Malum pœnæ, Affliction, Adverſity, is not evill; That which occaſions this, Malum culpæ, ſin it ſelf, is not evill; not evill ſo, as that it ſhould make us incapable of this diffuſive goodneſſe of God. You know, I preſume, in what

ſenſe

A ſenſe we ſay in the Schoole, Malum nihil, and Peccatum nihil, that evill is nothing, ſin is nothing; that is, it hath no reality, it is no created ſubſtance, it is but a privation, as a ſhadow is, as ſickneſſe is; ſo it is nothing. It is wittily argued by Boethius, God can do all things; God cannot ſin; Therefore ſin is nothing. But it is ſtrongly argued by S. Auguſtin, If there be any thing naturally evill, it muſt neceſſarily be contrary to that which is naturally good; and that is God. Now, Contraria æqualia, ſaies he; whatſoever things are contrary to one another, are equall to one another; ſo, if we make any thing naturally evill, we ſhall ſlide into the Manichees error, to make an Evill God. So farre doth the Schoole follow this, as that there, one Archbiſhop of Canterbury, out of another, that is, Bradwardin out of Anſelme, pronounces it Hæreticum eſſe dicere, Malum eſſe aliquid, To ſay that any thing is naturally evill, is an hereſie.

B But if I cannot finde a foundation for my comfort, in this ſubtilty of the Schoole, That ſin is nothing, (no ſuch thing as was created or induced by God, much leſſe forced upon me by him, in any coactive Decree) yet I can raiſe a ſecond ſtep for my conſolation in this, that be ſin what it will in the nature thereof, yet my ſin ſhall conduce and cooperate to my good. So Ioſeph ſaies to his Brethren, You thought evill againſt me, but God meant it unto good: which is not onely good to Ioſeph, who was no partaker in the evill, but good even to them, who meant nothing but evill. And therefore, as Origen ſaid, Etſi novum, Though it be ſtrangely ſaid, yet I ſay it, That Gods anger is good; ſo ſaies S. Auguſtine, Audeo dicere, Though it be boldly ſaid, yet I muſt ſay it, Vtile eſſe cadere in aliquod manifeſtum peccatum, Many ſinners would never have beene ſaved, if they had not committed ſome greater ſin at laſt, then before; for, the puniſhment of that ſin, hath brought them to a remorſe of all their other ſins formerly neglected. If neither of theſe will ſerve my turne, neither that ſin is nothing in it ſelfe, and therefore not put upon me Gen. 51. 20.

C by God, nor that my ſin, having occaſioned my repentance, hath done me good, and eſtabliſhed me in a better ſtate with God, then I was in before that ſin, yet this ſhall fully rectifie me, and aſſure my conſolation, that in a pious ſenſe I may ſay, Chriſt Jeſus is the ſinner, and not I. For, though in the two and twentieth Seſſion of the Councell of Baſil, that propoſition were condemned as ſcandalous, in the mouth of a Biſhop of Nazareth, Auguſtinus de Roma, Chriſtus quotidie peccat, That Chriſt does ſin every day, yet Gregory Nazianzen expreſſes the ſame intention, in equivalent termes, when he ſaies, Quamdiu inobediens ego, tamdiu, quantum ad me attinet, inobediens Chriſtus: As long as I ſin, for ſo much as concernes me, me, who am incorporated in Chriſt, me, who by my true repentance have diſcharged my ſelfe upon Chriſt, Chriſt is the ſinner, even in the ſight, and juſtice of his Father, and not I.

D And as this conſideration, That the goodneſſe of God, in Chriſt, is thus ſpread upon all perſons, and all actions, takes me off from my aptneſſe to miſ-interpret other mens actions, not to be haſty to call indifferent things, ſins, not to call hardneſſe of acceſſe in great Perſons, pride, not to call ſociableneſſe of converſation in women, proſtitution, not to call accommodation of Civill buſineſſes in States, prevarication, or dereliction and abandoning of God, and toleration of Religion; as it takes me off from this miſ-interpreting of others; ſo, for my ſelfe, it puts me upon an ability, to chide, and yet to cheare my ſoule, with thoſe words of David, O my Soule, why art thou ſo ſad? why art thou ſo diſquieted within me? Since ſin is nothing, no ſuch thing as is forced upon thee by God, by which thy damnation ſhould be inevitable, or thy reconciliation impoſſible, ſince of what nature ſoever ſin be in it ſelfe, thy ſins being truly repented, have advanced, and emproved thy ſtate in the favour of God, ſince thy ſin, being by that repentance diſcharged upon Chriſt, Chriſt is now the ſinner, and not thou, O my Soule, why art thou ſo

E ſad? why art thou diſquieted within me? And this conſideration of Gods goodneſſe, thus derived upon me, and made mine in Chriſt, ratifies and eſtabliſhes ſuch a holy confidence in me, as that all the morall conſtancy in the world, is but a bulruſh, to this bulwark; and therefore, we end all, with that hiſtoricall, but yet uſefull note, That that Duke of Burgundy, who was ſirnamed Carolus Audax, Charles the Bold, was Son to that Duke, who was ſirnamed Bonus, The Good Duke; A Good one produced a Bold one: True confidence proceeds onely out of true Goodneſſe: for, The wicked ſhall flye, when no man purſueth, but the righteous are bold as a Lion. This conſtancy, and this confidence, and upon this ground, Holy courage in a holy feare of him, Almighty God infuſe and imprint in you all, for his Son Chriſt Jeſus ſake. And to this glorious Son of God, &c. Prov. 28. 1.

Preached at S. Pauls, in the Evening, upon Easter-day. 1623.

ACTS 2. 36.

Part of the second Lesson of that Evening Prayer.

Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, That God hath made that same Iesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord, and Christ.

THe first word of the Text, must be the last part of the Sermon, Therefore; Therefore let all know it. Here is something necessary to be knowne, And the Meanes by which we are to know it; And these will be our two parts; Scientia, & Modus, Knowledge, and the way to it; For, Qui testatur de scientia, testatur de modo scientiæ, is a good rule in all Laws, He that will testifie any thing upon his knowledge, must declare how he came by that knowledge. So then, what we must conclude, and upon what premisses, what we must resolve, and what must lead us to that resolution, are our two stages, our two resting places: And to those two, our severall steps are these; In the first, Let all the house of Israel know, &c. we shall consider first, The Manner of S. Peter, (for the Text is part of a Sermon of S. Peters) in imprinting this Knowledge in his Auditory; which is, first, in that Compellation of love and honour, Domus Israel, The house of Israel: But yet, when hee hath raised them to a sense of their dignity, in that attribute, he doth not pamper them with an over-value of them, he lets them know their worst, as well as their best, Though you be the house of Israel, yet it is you that have crucified Christ Jesus, That Iesus, whom ye have crucified; And from this his Manner of preparing them, we shall passe to the Matter that he proposes to them: When he had remembred them what God had done for them (You are the house of Israel) and what they had done against God, (You have crucified that Iesus) He imparts a blessed message to them all, Let all know it: Let them know it, and know it assuredly; He exhibits it to their reason, to their naturall understanding; And what? The greatest mystery, the entire mystery of our salvation, That that Iesus is both Lord, and Christ; But he is made so; Made so by God; Made both; Made Christ, that is, anointed, embalmed, preserved from corruption, even in the grave, And made Lord by his triumph, and by being made Head of the Church, in the Resurrection, and in the Ascension: And so, that which is the last step of our first stage, (That that Iesus is made Lord, as well as he is made Christ) enters us upon our second stage, The meanes by which we are to know, and prove all this to our selves; Therefore, sayes the Text, let all know it; wherefore? why, because God hath raised him, after you had crucified him; Because God hath loosed the bands of death, because it was impossible that he should be holden by death; Because Davids prophecy of a deliverance from the grave is fulfilled in him, Therefore let all know this to be thus. So that the Resurrection of Christ is argument enough to prove, that Christ is made Lord of all; And if he be Lord, he hath Subjects, that do as he does; And so his Resurrection is become an argument, and an assurance of

of our Reſurrection too; and that is as far as we ſhall go in our ſecond part, That firſt Chriſts Reſurrection is proofe enough to us of his Dominion, if he be riſen, he is Lord, and then his Dominion is proofe enough to us of our Reſurrection, if he be Lord, Lord of us, we ſhall riſe too: And when we have paced, and paſſed through all theſe ſteps, we ſhall in ſome meaſure have ſolemnized this day of the Reſurrection of Chriſt; and in ſome meaſure have made it the day of our Reſurrection too. A

1. Part. Domus Iſrael.

Firſt then, the Apoſtle applies himſelf to his Auditory, in a faire, in a gentle manner; he gives them their Titles, Domus Iſrael, The houſe of Iſrael. We have a word now denizened, and brought into familiar uſe amongſt us, Complement; and for the moſt part, in an ill ſenſe; ſo it is, when the heart of the ſpeaker doth not anſwer his tongue; but God forbid but a true heart, and a faire tongue might very well conſiſt together: As vertue it ſelf receives an addition, by being in a faire body, ſo do good intentions of the heart, by being expreſſed in faire language. That man aggravates his condemnation, that gives me good words, and meanes ill; but he gives me a rich Jewell, and in a faire Cabinet, he gives me precious wine, and in a clean glaſſe, that intends well, and expreſſes his good intentions well too. If I beleeve a faire ſpeaker, I have comfort a little while, though he deceive me, but a froward and peremptory refuſer, unſaddles me at firſt. I remember a vulgar Spaniſh Author, who writes, the Ioſephina, the life of Ioſeph, the husband of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, who moving that queſtion, why that Virgin is never called by any ſtyle of Majeſty, or Honour in the Scriptures, he ſayes, That if after the declaring of her to be the Mother of God, he had added any other Title, the Holy Ghoſt had not been a good Courtier, (as his very word is) nor exerciſed in good language, and he thinks that had been a defect in the Holy Ghoſt in himſelf. He meanes ſurely the ſame that Epiphanius doth, That in naming the Saints of God, and eſpecially the bleſſed Virgin, we ſhould alwayes give them the beſt Titles that are applyable to them; Quis unquam auſus, (ſaies he) proferre nomen Mariæ, & non ſtatim addidit virgo? Who ever durſt utter the name of that Mary, without that addition of incomparable honour, The Virgin Mary? B

Epiphan. Hæreſ. 78. C

That Spaniſh Author need not be ſuſpitious of the Holy Ghoſt in that kinde, that he is no good Courtier ſo; for in all the books of the world, you ſhall never reade ſo civill language, nor ſo faire expreſſions of themſelves to one another, as in the Bible: When Abraham ſhall call himſelf duſt, and aſhes, (and indeed if the Son of God were Abrahams and no man, what was Abraham?) If God ſhall call this Abraham, this Duſt, this Worme of the duſt, The friend of God, (and all friendſhip implyes a parity, an equality in ſomething;) when David ſhall call himſelf a flea, and a dead dog, even in reſpect of Saul, and God ſhall call David, A man according to his own heart, when God ſhall call us, The Apple of his own eye, The Seale upon his own right hand, who would go farther for an Example, or farther then that example for a Rule, of faire acceſſes, of civill approaches, of ſweet and honourable entrances into the affections of them with whom they were to deale? Eſpecially is this manner neceſſary in men of our profeſſion; Not to break a bruiſed reed, nor to quench ſmoaking flaxe, not to avert any, from a will to heare, by any frowardneſſe, any morolity, any defrauding them of their due praiſe, and due titles; but to accompany this bleſſed Apoſtle, in this way of his diſcreet, and religious inſinuation, to call them Men of Iudea, ver. 14. and Men of Iſrael, ver. 22. and Men and Brethren, ver. 29. and here Domus Iſrael, the ancienteſt houſe, the honourableſt houſe, the laſtingeſt houſe in the world, The houſe of Iſrael. D

Accuſat tamen.

He takes from them nothing that is due, that would but exaſperate; He is civill, but his civility doth not amount to a flattery, as though the cauſe of God needed them, or God muſt be beholding to them, or God muſt pay for it, or ſmart for it, if they were not pleaſed. And therefore, though he do give them their titles, Apertè illis imputat crucifixionem Chriſti, ſayes S. Chryſoſtome, Plainly and without diſguiſe he imputes and puts home to them, the crucifying of Chriſt; how honourably ſoever they were deſcended, he layes that murder cloſe to their Conſciences, You, you houſe of Iſrael have crucified the Lord Ieſus. There is a great deale of difference between Shimeis vociferations againſt David; Thou man of blood, thou man of Belial, And Nathans proceeding with David; and yet Nathan forbore not to tell him, Thou art the man, Thou haſt deſpiſed the Lord, Thou haſt killed Vriah, Thou haſt taken his wife. It is one thing to ſow pillows under the elbows of Kings, (flatterers do ſo) another thing to pull the chaire from under the King, and popular and ſeditious men do ſo. Where Inferiours inſult over their Superiours, E

we

A we tell them, Chriſti Domini, they are the Lords anointed, and the Lord hath ſaid, Touch not mine anointed; And when ſuch Superiours inſult over the Lord himſelfe, and think themſelves Gods without limitation, as the God of heaven is, when they doe ſo, we muſt tell them they doe ſo, Etſi Chriſti Domini, though you be the Lords anointed, yet you crucifie the anointed Lord: for this was S. Peters method, though his ſucceſſor will not be bound by it.

When he hath carried the matter thus evenly betweene them, (I doe not deny, but you are the Houſe of Iſrael, you cannot deny but you have crucified the Lord Jeſus; you are heires of a great deale of honour, but you are guilty of a ſhrewd fault too) ſtand or fall to your Maſter, your Maſter hath dealt thus mercifully with you all, that to you all, all, he ſends a meſſage, Sciant omnes, Let all the houſe of Iſrael know this. Needs the houſe of Iſrael know any thing? Needs there any learning in perſons of Honour? We know, B this characterizes, this diſtinguiſhes ſome whole Nations; In one Nation it is almoſt a ſcorn for a gentleman to be learned, in another almoſt every gentleman, is conveniently, and in ſome meaſure, learned. But I enlarge not my ſelf, I pretend not to comprehend Nationall vertues, or Nationall vices. For this knowledge, which is proclaimed here, which is, the knowledge that the true Meſſias is come, and that there is no other to bee expected, is ſuch a knowledge, as that even the houſe of Iſrael it ſelf, is without a Foundation, if it be without this knowledge. Is there any houſe, that needs no reparations? Is there a houſe of Iſrael, (let it be the Library, tho depoſitary of the Oracles of God, a true Church, that hath the true word of the true God, let it be the houſe fed with Manna, that hath the true adminiſtration of the true Sacraments of Chriſt Jeſus) is there any ſuch houſe, that needs not a farther knowledge, that there are alwaies thieves about that houſe, that would rob us of that Word, and of thoſe Sacraments?

C The Holy Ghoſt is a Dove, and the Dove couples, paires, is not alone; Take heed of ſingular, of ſchiſmatical opinions; & what is more ſingular, more ſchiſmaticall, then when all Religion is confined in one mans breaſt? The Dove is animal ſociale, a ſociable creature, and not ſingular; and the Holy Ghoſt is that; And Chriſt is a Sheep, animal gregale, they flock together: Embrace thou thoſe truths, which the whole flock of Chriſt Jeſus, the whole Chriſtian Church, hath from the beginning acknowledged to be truths, and truths neceſſary to ſalvation; for, for other Traditionall, and Conditionall, and Occaſionall, and Collaterall, and Circumſtantiall points, for Almanack Divinity, that changes with the ſeaſon, with the time, and Meridionall Divinity, calculated to the heighth of ſuch a place, and Lunary Divinity, that ebbes and flowes, and State Divinity, that obeyes affections of perſons, Domus Iſrael, the true Church of God, had need of a continuall ſucceſſion of light, a continall aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God, and of her own induſtry, to D know thoſe things that belong to her peace.

And therefore let no Church, no man, think that he hath done enough, or knowes enough. If the Devill thought ſo too, we might the better think ſo: but ſince we ſee, that he is in continuall practiſe againſt us, let us be in a continuall diligence, and watchfulneſſe, to countermine him. We are domus Iſrael, the houſe of Iſrael, and it is a great meaſure of knowledge, that God hath afforded us; but if every Paſtor look into his Pariſh, and every Maſter into his own Family, and ſee what is practiſing there, ſciat domus Iſrael, let all our Iſrael know, that there is more knowledge, and more wiſdome neceſſary; Be every man farre from calumniating his Superiours, for that mercy which is uſed towards them that are fallen, but be every man as far from remitting, or ſlackning his diligence, for the preſerving of them, that are not fallen.

The wiſeſt muſt know more, though you be domus Iſrael, the houſe of Iſrael already; and Crucifixiſtis. E then, Etſi Crucifixiſtis, though you have crucified the Lord Jeſus, you may know it, ſciant omnes, let all know it. S. Paul ſaies once, If they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of life; but he never ſaies, if they have crucified the Lord of life, they are excluded from knowledge. I meane no more, but that the mercy of God in manifeſting and applying himſelf to us, is above all our ſins. No man knowes enough; what meaſure of tentations ſoever he have now, he may have tentations, through which, this knowledge, and this grace, will not carry him; and therefore he muſt proceed from grace to grace. So no man hath ſinned ſo deeply, but that God offers himſelf to him yet; Sciant omnes, the wiſeſt man hath ever ſomething to learn, he muſt not preſume; the ſinfulleſt man hath God ever ready to teach him, he muſt not deſpaire.

Omnes.

Now

Sciant. Now the universality of this mercy, hath God enlarged, and extended very farre, in that he proposes it, even to our knowledge, Sciant, let all know it. It is not only credant, let all beleeve it; for the infusing of faith, is not in our power: but God hath put it in our power to satisfie their reason, and to chafe that waxe, to which he himself vouchsafes to set to the great seale of faith. And that S. Hierome takes to be most properly his Commission, Tentemus animas, quæ deficiunt a fide, naturalibus rationibus adjuvare; Let us indevour to assist them, who are weak in faith, with the strength of reason. And truly it is very well worthy of a serious consideration, that whereas all the Articles of our Creed, are objects of faith, so, as that we are bound to receive them de fide, as matters of faith, yet God hath left that, out of which, all these Articles are to be deduced, and proved, (that is, the Scripture) to humane arguments; It is not an Article of the Creed, to beleeve these, and these Books, to be, or not to be Canonicall Scripture; but our arguments for the Scripture are humane arguments, proportioned to the reason of a naturall man. God does not seale in water, in the fluid and transitory imaginations, and opinions of men; we never set the seale of faith to them; But in Waxe, in the rectified reason of man, that reason that is ductile, and flexible, and pliant, to the impressions that are naturally proportioned unto it, God sets to his seale of faith. They are not continuall, but they are contiguous, they flow not from one another, but they touch one another, they are not both of a peece, but they enwrap one another, Faith and Reason. Faith it self, by the Prophet Esay is called knowledge; By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justifie many, sayes God of Christ; that is, by that knowledge, that men shall have of him. So Zechary expresses it at the Circumcision of Iohn Baptist, That hee was to give knowledge of salvation, for the remission of sins.

Esay 53. 11.

Luke 1. 77.

As therefore it is not enough for us, in our profession to tell you, Qui non crediderit, damnabitur, Except you beleeve all this, you shall be damned, without we execute that Commission before, Ite prædicate, go and preach, work upon their affections, satisfie their reason; so it is not enough for you, to rest in an imaginary faith, and easinesse in beleeving, except you know also what, and why, and how you come to that beliefe. Implicite beleevers, ignorant beleevers, the adversary may swallow; but the understanding beleever, he must chaw, and pick bones, before he come to assimilate him, and make him like himself. The implicite beleever stands in an open field, and the enemy will ride over him easily; the understanding beleever, is in a fenced town, and he hath out-works to lose, before the town be pressed; that is, reasons to be answered, before his faith be shaked, and he will sell himself deare, and lose himself by inches, if he be sold or lost at last; and therefore sciant omnes, let all men know, that is, endeavour to informe themselves, to understand.

Iesum. That particular, that generall particular, (if we may so say, for it includes all) which all were to know, is, that the same Jesus, whom they Crucified, was exalted above them all.

Suppose an impossibility; (S. Paul does so, when he sayes to the Galatians, If an Angell from heaven should preach any other Gospell; for that is impossible;) If we could have been in Paradise, and seen God take a clod of red earth, and make that wretched clod of contemptible earth, such a body as should be fit to receive his breath, an immortall soule, fit to be the house of the second person in the Trinity, for God the Son to dwel in bodily; fit to be the Temple for the third person, for the Holy Ghost, should we not have wondred more, then at the production of all other creatures? It is more, that the same Jesus, whom they had crucified, is exalted thus, to sit in that despised flesh, at the right hand of our glorious God; that all their spitting should but macerate him, and dissolve him to a better mold, a better plaister; that all their buffetings should but knead him, and presse him into a better forme; that all their scoffes, and contumelies should be prophesies; that that Ecce Rex, Behold your King; and that Rex Iudæorum, This is the King of the Iews, which words, they who spoke them, thought to be lies, in their own mouthes, should become truths, and he be truly the King, not of the Jews only, but of all Nations too; that their nayling him upon the Crosse, should be a setling of him upon an everlasting Throne; and their lifting him up upon the Crosse, a waiting upon him, so farre upon his way to heaven, that this Jesus, whom they had thus evacuated, thus crucified, should bee thus exalted, was a subject of infinite admiration, but mixt with infinite confusion too.

Wretched

A Wretched Blaſphemer of the name of Jeſus, that Jeſus, whom thou crucifieſt, and treadeſt under thy feet, in that oath, is thus exalted. Uncleane Adulterer, that Jeſus, whom thou crucifieſt, in ſtretching out thoſe forbidden armes in a ſtrange bed, thou that beheadeſt thy ſelf, caſteſt off thy Head, Chriſt Jeſus, that thou mightſt make thy body, the body of a Harlot, that Jeſus, whom thou defileſt there, is exalted. Let ſeverall ſinners paſſe this through their ſeverall ſins, and remember with wonder, but with confuſion too, that that Jeſus, whom they haue crucified, is exalted above all.

How farre exalted? Three ſteps, which carry him above S. Pauls third heaven: He is Lord, and he is Chriſt, and he is made ſo by God; God hath made him both Lord and Chriſt. We return up theſe ſteps, as they lie, and take the loweſt firſt: Fecit Deus, God made him ſo: Nature did not make him ſo, no, not if we conſider him in that Nature, wherein he conſiſts of two Natures, God, and Man. We place in the Schoole, (for the moſt part) the infinite Merit of Chriſt Jeſus (that his one act of dying once, ſhould be a ſufficient ſatisfaction to God, in his Juſtice, for all the ſins of all men) we place it, I ſay, rather in pacto, then in perſona, rather that this contract was thus made between the Father, and the Son, then that, whatſoever that perſon, thus conſiſting of God and Man, ſhould doe, ſhould, onely in reſpect of the perſon, bee of an infinite value, and extention, to that purpoſe; for then, any act of his, his Incarnation, his Circumciſion, any had been ſufficient for our Redemption, without his death. But fecit Deus, God made him that, that he is; The contract between the Father and him, that all that he did, ſhould be done ſo, and to that purpoſe, that way, and to that end, this is that, that hath exalted him, and us in him. Factus.

If then, not the ſubtilty, and curioſity, but the wiſedome of the Schoole, and of the Church of God, have juſtly found it moſt commodious, to place all the myſteries of our Religion, in pacto, rather then in perſona, in the Covenant, rather then in the perſon, though a perſon of incomprehenſible value, let us alſo, in applying to our ſelves thoſe myſteries of our Religion, ſtill adhærere pactis, and not perſonis, ſtill rely upon the Covenant of God, with man, revealed in his word, and not upon the perſon of any man: Not upon the perſons of Martyrs, as if they had done more then they needed for themſelves, and might relieve us, with their ſupererogations; for, if they may work for us, they may beleeve for us; and Iuſtus fide ſua vivet, ſayes the Prophet, The righteous ſhall live by his owne faith. Not upon that perſon, who hath made himſelf ſupernumerary, and a Controller upon the three perſons in the Trinity, the Biſhop of Rome; not upon the conſideration of accidents upon perſons, when God ſuffers ſome to fall, who would have advanced his cauſe, and ſome to be advanced, who would have thrown downe his cauſe, but let us ever dwell in pacto, and in the fecit Deus, this Covenant God hath made in his word, and in this we reſt. Habak. 2. 4.

It is God then, not nature, not his nature that made him; And what? Chriſt; Chriſt is anointed: And then Mary Magdalen made him Chriſt, for ſhe anointed him before his death; And Ioſeph of Arimathea made him Chriſt, for he anointed him, and embalmed him, after his death. But her anointing before, kept him not from death, nor his anointing after, would not have kept him from putrefaction in the grave, if God had not in a farre other manner, made him Chriſt, anointed him præ conſortibus, above his fellows. God hath anointed him, embalmed him, enwrapped him in the leaves of the Prophets, That his fleſh ſhould not ſee corruption in the grave, That the flames of hell ſhould not take hold of him, nor ſindge him there; ſo anointed him, as that, in his Humane nature, He is aſcended into heaven, and ſet downe at the right hand of God; For, de eo quod ex Maria eſt, Petrus loquitur, ſayes S. Baſil, That making of him Chriſt, that is, that anointing which S. Peter ſpeakes of in this place, is the dignifying of his humane nature, that was anointed, that was conſecrated, that was glorified in heaven. Chriſtus.

But he had a higher ſtep then that; God made this Ieſus, Chriſt, and he made him Lord; He brought him to heaven, in his own perſon, in his humane nature; ſo he ſhall all us; but when we ſhall be all there, he onely ſhall be Lord of all. And if there ſhould be no other bodies in heaven, then his, yet, yet now he is Lord of all, as he is Head of the Church. Aske of me, ſayes his Father, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermoſt parts of the Earth for thy poſſeſſion. And, as it is added, ver. 6. I have ſet my King upon my holy hill of Sion; So he hath made him Lord, Head of the Jews, and of the Gentiles too, of Sion, and of the Nations alſo; Hee hath conſecrated his perſon, raiſed his Dominus. pſal. 2. 8.

humane nature, to the glorious region of blessed Spirits, to Heaven, and he hath dignified him with an office, made him Lord, Head of the Church, not only of Jews, and Gentiles upon earth, but of the Militant and Triumphant Church too. A

2. Part. Our two generall parts were Scientia, & modus, what we must all know, and by what we must know it. Our knowledge is, this Exaltation of Jesus; and our meanes is implied,

Therefore. in the first word of the Text, Therefore, Therefore because he is raised from the Dead; for to that Resurrection, expressed in three, or foure severall phrases before the Text, is this Text, and this Exaltation referred; Christ was delivered for our sins, raised for our justification, and upon that depends all. Christs descending into hell, and his Resurrection, in our Creed, make but one Article, and in our Creed we beleeve them both alike: Quis nisi Infidelis negaverit, apud inferos fuisse Christum? saies S. Augustine; Who but an Infidell, will deny Christs descending into hell? And if he beleeve that to be a limme of the article of the Resurrection, His descent into hell, must rather be an inchoation of B his triumph, then a consummation of his Exinanition, The first step of his Exaltation there, rather then the last step of his Passion upon the Crosse: But the Declaration, the Manifestation, that which admits no disputation, was his Resurrection. Factus, id est, declaratus per Resurrectionem, saies S. Cyrill, He was made Christ, and Lord, that is, declared

1 Cor. 1. 20. evidently to be so, by his Resurrection; As there is the like phrase, in S. Paul, God hath made the wisdome of this world, foolishnesse, that is, declared it to be so. And therefore it is

Heb. 6. 6. imputed to be a crucifying of the Lord Jesus againe, Non credere eum, post mortem, immortalem, Not to beleeve, that now after his having overcome death in his Resurrection, he is in an immortall, and in a glorious state in heaven. For when the Apostle argues

1 Cor. 15. 14. thus, If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching in vaine, and your faith in vaine, he implies the contrary too, If you beleeve the Resurrection, we have preached to good purpose:

August. Mortuum esse Christum, pagani credunt; resurrexisse propria fides Christianorum: The C Heathen confesse Christs death; To beleeve his Resurrection, is the proper character of a Christian: for the first stone of the Christian faith, was laid in this article of the Resurrection; In the Resurrection onely was the first promise performed; Ipse conteret, He shall bruise the Serpents head; for, in this, he triumphed over Death, and Hell; And the last stone of our faith, is laid in the same article too, that is, the day of Judgement; of a day of Acts 17. 31. Judgement God hath given an assurance unto all men (saies S. Paul at Athens) In that he hath raised Christ Iesus from the dead. In this Christ makes up his circle; in this he is truly Alpha and Omega, His comming in Paradise in a promise, his comming to Judgement in the clouds, are tied together in the Resurrection: And therefore all the Gospell, all our preaching, is contracted to that one text, To beare witnesse of the Resurrection; onely for

Acts 1. 22. that, was there need of a new Apostle, There was a necessity of one to be chosen in Iudas roome, to be a witnesse of the Resurrection; Non ait caterorum, sed tantùm Resurrectionis, saies D S. Chrysostome, He does not say, to beare witnesse of the other articles, but onely of the Resurrection; he charges him with no more instructions, he needs no more, in his Com-

Athan. mission, but to preach the Resurrection: for in that, Trophaum de morte excitavit, & indubitatum reddidit corruptionem deletam: Here is a retreat from the whole warfare, here is a Trophee erected upon the last enemy; The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death, and here is the death of that enemy, in the Resurrection.

And therefore, to all those who importuned him for a signe, Christ still turnes upon

John 2. 18. Mat. 12. 38. the Resurrection. The Jewes pressed him in generall, Quod signum, What signe shewest thou unto us? and he answers, Destroy this Temple, (this body) and in three dayes I will raise it. In another place, the Scribes and the Pharisees joyne, Master we would see a signe from thee, and he tels them, There shall be no signe, but the signe of the Prophet Ionas; who was a type of the Resurrection. And then the Pharisees, and Sadduces joyn; now they were bitter E enemies to one another; but, as Tertullian saies, Semper inter duos latrones crucifixus Christus, It was alwaies Christs case to be crucified betweene two Thieves; So these, though enemies joyne in this vexation, They aske a signe, as the rest, and, as to the rest, Christ gives that answer of Ionas. So that Christ himselfe determines all, summes up all in this one Article, the Resurrection.

Nos. Now, if the Resurrection of this Jesus, have made him, not onely Christ, Anointed and consecrated in Heaven, in his owne person, but made him Lord, then he hath Subjects, upon whom that dominion, and that power works, and so we have assurance of a resurrection in him too. That he is made Lord of us by his Resurrection, is rooted in prophecie;

A cie; It pleased the Lord to bruise him, saies the Prophet Esay; But he shall see his seed, and he shall prolong his daies; that is, he shall see those that are regenerate in him, live with him, for ever. It is rooted in prophecy, and it spreads forth in the Gospell. To this end, saies the Apostle, Christ died, and rose, that he might be Lord of the dead, and of the living. Now, what kinde of Lord, if he had no subjects? Cum videmus caput super aquas, when the head is above water, will any imagine the body to be drowned? What a perverse consideration were it, to imagine a live head, and dead members? Or, consider our bodies in our selves, and Our bodies are Temples of the Holy Ghost; and shall the Temples of the holy Ghost lye for ever, for ever, buried in their rubbidge? They shall not; for, the day of Judgement, is the day of Regeneration, as it is called in the Gospell; Quia caro nostra ita generabitur per incorruptionem, sicut anima per fidem: Because our bodie shall be regenerated by glory there, as our soules are by faith here. Therefore, Tertul. cals the Resurrection, Exemplum spei nostræ, The Originall, out of which we copy out our hope; and Clavem sepulchrorũ nostrorum, How hard soever my grave be locked, yet with that key, with the application of the Resurrection of Christ Jesus, it will open; And they are all names, which expresse this well, which Tertullian gives Christ, Vadem, obsidem, fidejussorem resurrectionis nostræ, That he is the pledge, the hostage, the surety of our Resurrection: So doth that also which is said in the Schoole, Sicut Adam forma morientium, ita Christus forma resurgentium; Without Adam, there had beene no such thing as death, without Christ, no such thing as a Resurrection: But ascendit ille effractor, (as the Prophet speaks) The breaker is gone up before, and they have passed through the gate, that is, assuredly, infallibly, they shall passe.

Esay 53.10. Rom. 14.9. Gregor. Mat. 19.28. August. Theoph. Mich. 2.13.

But what needs all this heat, all this animosity, all this vehemence, about the Resurrection? May not man be happy enough in heaven, though his body never come thither? upon what will ye ground the Resurrection? upon the Omnipotence of God? Asylum hæreticorum est Omnipotentia Dei, (which was well said, and often repeated amongst the Ancients) The Omnipotence of God, hath alwaies been the Sanctuary of Heretiques, that is, alwaies their refuge, in all their incredible doctrines, God is able to do it, can do it. You confesse, the Resurrection is a miracle; And miracles are not to be multiplied, nor imagined without necessity; and what necessity of bodies in Heaven?

Beloved, we make the ground and foundation of the Resurrection, to be, not meerely the Omnipotency of God, for God will not doe all, that he can doe: but the ground is, Omnipotens voluntas Dei revelata, The Almighty will of God revealed by him, to us: And therefore Christ joynes both these together, Erratis, Te erre, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God; that is, not considering the power of God, as it is revealed in the Scriptures: for there is our foundation of this Doctrine: we know, out of the Omnipotence of God, it may be; and we know out of the Scriptures it must be: That works upon our faith, this upon our reason; That it is man that must be saved, man that must be damned; and to constitute a man, there must be a body, as well as a soule. Nay, the Immortality of the soule, will not so well lie in proofe, without a resuming of the body. For, upon those words of the Apostle, If there were no Resurrection, we were the miserablest of all men, the Schoole reasons reasonably; Naturally the soule and body are united, when they are separated by Death, it is contrary to nature, which nature still affects this union; and consequently the soule is the lesse perfect, for this separation; and it is not likely, that the perfect naturall state of the soule, which is, to be united to the body, should last but three or foure score yeares, and, in most, much lesse, and the unperfect state, that in the separation, should last eternally, for ever: so that either the body must be beleeved to live againe, or the soule beleeved to die.

Mat. 22.29.

Never therefore dispute against thine own happinesse; never say, God asks the heart, that is, the soule, and therefore rewards the soule, or punishes the soule, and hath no respect to the body; Nec auferamus cogitationes a collegio carnis, saies Tertullian, Never go about to separate the thoughts of the heart, from the colledge, from the fellowship of the body; Siquidem in carne, & cum carne, & per carnem agitur, quicquid ab anima agitur, All that the soule does, it does in, and with, and by the body. And therefore, (saies he also) Caro abluitur, ut anima emaculetur, The body is washed in baptisme, but it is that the soule might be made cleane; Caro ungitur, ut anima consecretur, In all unctions, whether that which was then in use in Baptisme, or that which was in use at our transmigration, and passage out of this world, the body was anointed, that the soule might be consecrated;

Caro ſignatur, (ſaies Tertullian ſtill) ut anima muniatur; The body is ſigned with the Croſſe, that the ſoule might be armed againſt tentations; And againe, Caro de Corpore Chriſti veſcitur, ut anima de Deo ſaginetur; My body received the body of Chriſt, that my ſoule might partake of his merits. He extends it into many particulars, and ſummes up all thus, Non poſſunt in mercede ſeparari, quæ opera conjungunt, Theſe two, Body, and Soule, cannot be ſeparated for ever, which, whilſt they are together, concurre in all that either of them doe. Never thinke it preſumption, ſaies S. Gregory, Sperare in te, quod in ſe exhibuit Deus homo, To hope for that in thy ſelfe, which God admitted, when he tooke thy nature upon him. And God hath made it, ſaies he, more eaſie then ſo, for thee, to beleeve it, becauſe not onely Chriſt himſelfe, but ſuch men, as thou art, did riſe at the Reſurrection of Chriſt. And therefore when our bodies are diſſolved and liquefied in the Sea, putrified in the earth, reſolv'd to aſhes in the fire, macerated in the ayre, Velut in vaſa ſua transfunditur caro noſtra, make account that all the world is Gods cabinet, and water, and earth, and fire, and ayre, are the proper boxes, in which God laies up our bodies, for the Reſurrection. Curiouſly to diſpute againſt our owne Reſurrection, is ſeditiouſly to diſpute againſt the dominion of Jeſus; who is not made Lord by the Reſurrection, if he have no ſubjects to follow him in the ſame way. Wee beleeve him to be Lord, therefore let us beleeve his, and our Reſurrection.

Tertull. A B

Ille. This bleſſed day, which we celebrate now, he roſe: he roſe ſo, as none before did, none after, ever ſhall riſe; He roſe; others are but raiſed: Deſtroy this Temple, ſaies he, and I will raiſe it; I, without imploying any other Architect. I lay downe my life, ſaies he: the Jewes could not have killed him, when he was alive; If he were alive here now, the Jeſuits could not kill him here now; except his being made Chriſt, and Lord, an anointed King, have made him more open to them. I have a power to lay it downe, ſaies he, and I have a power to take it up againe.

Iohn 2.19. Iohn 10.17.

C

Nos. This day, we celebrate his Reſurrection; this day let us celebrate our owne: Our own, not our one Reſurrection, for we need many. Upon thoſe words of our Saviour to Nicodemus, Oportet denuo naſci, ſpeaking of the neceſſity of Baptiſme, Non ſolum denuo, ſed tertiò naſci oportet, ſaies S. Bernard, He muſt be born againe, and againe; againe by baptiſme, for Originall ſin, and for actuall ſin, againe by repentance; Infœlix homo ego, & miſerabilis caſus, ſaies he, cui non ſufficit una regeneratio! Miſerable man that I am, and miſerable condition that I am fallen into, whom one regeneration will not ſerve! So is it a miſerable death that hath ſwallowed us, whom one Reſurrection will ſerve. We need three, but if we have not two, we were as good be without one. There is a Reſurrection from worldly calamities, a reſurrection from ſin, and a reſurrection from the grave.

Iohn 2.3.

First, from calamities; for, as dangers are called death, (Pharaoh cals the plague of Locuſts, a death, Intreat the Lord your God, that he may take from me, this death onely, And ſo S. Paul ſaies, in his dangers, I dye daily) So is the deliverance from danger called a Reſurrection: It is the hope of the wicked upon the godly, Now that he lieth, he ſhall riſe no more; that is, Now that he is dead in miſery, he ſhall have no reſurrection in this world. Now, this reſurrection God does not alwaies give to his ſervants, neither is this reſurrection the meaſure of Gods love of man, whether he do raiſe him from worldly calamities or no.

Exod. 10.17. 1 Cor. 15.31. Pſal. 41.8. D

Apoc. 20.5. The ſecond is the reſurrection from ſin; and therefore, this S. Iohn calls The firſt Reſurrection, as though the other, whether we riſe from worldly calamities, or no, were not to be reckoned. Anima ſpiritualiter cadit, & ſpiritualiter reſurget, ſaies S. Auguſtine, Since we are ſure, there is a ſpirituall death of the ſoule, let us make ſure a ſpirituall reſurrection too. Audaciter dicam, ſaies S. Hierome, I ſay confidently, Cum omnia poſſet Deus, ſuſcitare Virginem poſt ruinam, non poteſt; Howſoever God can do all things, he cannot reſtore a Virgin, that is fallen from it, to virginity againe. He cannot do this in the body, but God is a Spirit, and hath reſerved more power, upon the ſpirit and ſoule, then upon the body, and therefore Audaciter dicam, I may ſay, with the ſame aſſurance, that S. Hierome does, No ſoule hath ſo proſtituted her ſelfe, ſo multiplied her fornications, but that God can make her a virgin againe, and give her, even the chaſtity of Chriſt himſelfe. Fulfill therefore that which Chriſt ſaies, The houre is comming, and now is, when the dead ſhall heare the voyce of the Son of God, and they that heare ſhall live: Be this that houre, be this thy firſt Reſurrection. Bleſſe Gods preſent goodneſſe, for this now; and attend Gods leaſure, for the other Reſurrection hereafter. He that is the firſt fruits of them that ſlept, Chriſt Jeſus

Iohn 5.25. 1 Cor. 15.20.

Jesus is awake; he dyes no more, he sleepes no more. Sacrificium pro te fuit, sed à te accepit, quod pro te obtulit: He offered a Sacrifice for thee, but he had that from thee, that he offered for thee: Primitiæ fuit, sed tuæ primitiæ; He was the first fruits, but the first fruits of thy Corne: Spera in te futurum, quod præcessit in primitiis tuis: Doubt not of having that in the whole Croppe, which thou hast already in thy first fruits; that is, to have that in thy self, which thou hast in thy Saviour. And what glory soever thou hast had in this world, Glory inherited from noble Ancestors, Glory acquired by merit and service, Glory purchased by money, and observation, what glory of beauty and proportion, what glory of health and strength soever thou hast had in this house of clay, The glory of the later house, shall be greater then of the former. To this glory, the God of this glory, by glorious or inglorious waies, such as may most advance his own glory, bring us in his time, for his Son Christ Jesus sake. Amen. August. APOC. 20. 6.

Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first Resurrection.

IN the first book of the Scriptures, that of Genesis, there is danger in departing from the letter; In this last book, this of the Revelation, there is as much danger in adhering too close to the letter. The literall sense is alwayes to be preserved; but the literall sense is not alwayes to be discerned: for the literall sense is not alwayes that, which the very Letter and Grammer of the place presents, as where it is literally said, That Christ is a Vine, and literally, That his flesh is bread, and literally, That the new Jerusalem is thus situated, thus built, thus furnished: But the literall sense of every place, is the principall intention of the Holy Ghost, in that place: And his principall intention in many places, is to expresse things by allegories, by figures; so that in many places of Scripture, a figurative sense is the literall sense, and more in this book then in any other. As then to depart from the literall sense, that sense which the very letter presents, in the book of Genesis, is dangerous, because if we do so there, we have no history of the Creation of the world in any other place to stick to; so to binde our selves to such a literall sense in this book, will take from us the consolation of many spirituall happinesses, and bury us in the carnall things of this world.

The first error of being too allegoricall in Genesis, transported divers of the ancients beyond the certain evidence of truth, and the second error of being too literall in this book, fixed many, very many, very ancient, very learned, upon an evident falshood; which was, that because here is mention of a first Resurrection, and of raigning with Christ a thousand years after that first Resurrection, There should be to all the Saints of God, a state of happinesse in this world, after Christs comming, for a thousand yeares; In which happy state, though some of them have limited themselves in spirituall things, that they should enjoy a kinde of conversation with Christ, and an impeccability, and a quiet serving of God without any reluctations, or cõcupiscences, or persecutions; yet others have dreamed on, and enlarged their dreames to an enjoying of all these worldly happinesses, which they, being formerly persecuted, did formerly want in this world, and then should have them for a thousand yeares together in recompence. And even this branch of that error, of possessing the things of this world, so long, in this world, did very many, and very good, and very great men, whose names are in honour, and justly in the Church of God, in those first times stray into; and flattered themselves with an imaginary intimation of ſome ſuch thing, in theſe words, Bleſſed and holy is he, that hath part in the firſt Reſurrection. A

Diviſio. Thus far then the text is literall, That this Reſurrection in the text, is different from the generall Reſurrection. The firſt differs from the laſt: And thus far it is figurative, allegoricall, myſticall, that it is a ſpirituall Reſurrection, that is intended. But wherein ſpirituall? or of what ſpirituall Reſurrection? In the figurative expoſition of thoſe places of Scripture, which require that way oft to be figuratively expounded, that Expoſitor is not to be blamed, who not deſtroying the literall ſenſe, propoſes ſuch a figurative ſenſe, as may exalt our devotion, and advance our edification; And as no one of thoſe Expoſitors did ill, in propoſing one ſuch ſenſe, ſo neither do thoſe Expoſitors ill, who with thoſe limitations, that it deſtroy not the literall ſenſe, that it violate not the analogy of faith, that it advance devotion, do propoſe another and another ſuch ſenſe. So doth that preacher well alſo, who to the ſame end, and within the ſame limit, makes his uſe of both, of all thoſe expoſitions; becauſe all may ſtand, and it is not evident in ſuch figurative ſpeeches, which is the literall, that is, the principall intention of the Holy Ghoſt. B

Of theſe words of this firſt Reſurrection (which is not the laſt, of the body, but a ſpirituall Reſurrection) there are three expoſitions authorized by perſons of good note in the Church. Alcazar. First, that this firſt Reſurrection, is a Reſurrection from that low eſtate, to which perſecution had brought the Church; and ſo it belongs to this whole State, and Church, and Bleſſed are we who have our part in this firſt Reſurrection. Auguſt. & noſtri. Secondly, that it is a Reſurrection from the death of ſin, of actuall, and habituall ſin; ſo it belongs to every particular penitent ſoul; and Bleſſed art thou, bleſſed am I, if we have part in this firſt Reſurrection. And then thirdly, becauſe after this Reſurrection, it is ſaid, That we ſhall raign with Chriſt a thouſand yeares, (which is a certain for an uncertain, a limited, for a long time) Ribera. it hath alſo been taken for the ſtate of the ſoul in heaven, after it is parted from the body by death; for though the ſoul cannot be ſaid properly to have a Reſurrection, becauſe properly it cannot die, yet to be thus delivered from the danger of a ſecond death, by future ſin, to be removed from the diſtance, and latitude, and poſſibility of tentations in this world, is by very good Expoſitors called a Reſurrection; and ſo it belongs to all them who are departed in the Lord; Bleſſed and holy is he that hath part in this firſt Reſurrection. And then the occaſion of the day, which we celebrate now, being the Reſurrection of our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, invites me to propoſe a fourth ſenſe, or rather uſe of the words; not indeed as an expoſition of the words, but as a convenient exaltation of our devotion; which is, that this firſt Reſurrection ſhould be the firſt fruits of the dead; The firſt Riſing, is the firſt Riſer, Chriſt Jeſus; for as Chriſt ſayes of himſelf, that He is the Reſurrection, ſo he is the firſt Reſurrection, the root of the Reſurrection. He upon whom our Reſurrection, all ours, all our kindes of Reſurrections are founded; and ſo it belongs to State and Church, and particular perſons, alive, and dead; Bleſſed and holy is he that hath part in this firſt Reſurrection. C D

And theſe foure conſiderations of the words; A Reſurrection from perſecution, by deliverance; a Reſurrection from ſin, by grace; a Reſurrection from tentation to ſin, by the way of death, to the glory of heaven; and all theſe, in the firſt Reſurrection, in him that is the roote of all, in Chriſt Jeſus, Theſe foure ſteps, theſe foure paſſages, theſe foure tranſitions will be our quarter Clock, for this houres exerciſe.

1. Part. From perſecution. Firſt then, we conſider this firſt Reſurrection, to be a Reſurrection from a perſecution for religion, for the profeſſion of the Goſpell, to a forward glorious paſſage of the Goſpell. And ſo a learned Expoſitor in the Romane Church carries the expoſition of this whole place (though not indeed the ordinary way, yet truly not incommodiouſly, not improperly) upon that deliverance, which God afforded his Church, from thoſe great perſecutions, which had otherwiſe ſupplanted her, in her firſt planting, in the primitive times. Then ſayes he (and in part well towards the letter of the place) The devill was chained for a thouſand yeares, and then we began to raign with Chriſt for a thouſand yeares, reckoning the time from that time, when God deſtroyed Idolatry more fully, and gave peace and reſt, and free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion, under the Chriſtian Emperours, till Antichriſt in the height of his rage ſhall come, and let this thouſand yeares priſoner Satan looſe, and ſo interrupt our thouſand yeares raign with Chriſt, with new perſecutions. In that perſecution was the death of the Church, in the eye of the world; E

A In that deliverance by Christian Emperours was the Resurrection of the Church; And in Gods protecting her ever since is the chaining up of the devill, and our raigning with Christ for those thousand yeares.

And truly, beloved, if we consider the low, the very low estate of Christians in those persecutions, tryed ten times in the fire, ten severall and distinct persecutions, in which ten persecutions, God may seem to have had a minde to deale eavenly with the world, and to lay as much upon his people whom he would try then, as he had laid upon others, for his people before, and so to equall the ten plagues of Ægypt, in ten persecutions, in the primitive Church; if we consider that low, that very low estate, we may justly call their deliverance a Resurrection. For as God said to Jerusalem, I found thee in thy blood, and washed thee, so Christ Jesus found the Church, the Christian Church in her blood, and washed her, and wiped her; washed her in his own blood, which washes white, and
B wiped her with the garments of his own righteousnesse, that she might be acceptable in the sight of God, and then wiped all teares from her eyes, took away all occasions of complaint, and lamentation, that she might be glorious in the eyes of man, and chearefull in her own; such was her Resurrection.

We wonder, and justly, at the effusion, at the pouring out of blood, in the sacrifices of the old Law; that that little countrey scarce bigger then some three of our Shires, should spend more cattle in some few dayes sacrifice at some solemnities, and every yeare in the sacrifices of the whole yeare, then perchance this kingdome could give to any use. Seas of blood, and yet but brooks, tuns of blood, and yet but basons, compared with the sacrifices, the sacrifices of the blood of men, in the persecutions of the Primitive Church. For every Oxe of the Jew, the Christian spent a man, and for every Sheep and Lamb, a Mother and her childe; and for every heard of cattle, sometimes a towne
C of Inhabitants, sometimes a Legion of Souldiers, all martyred at once; so that they did not stand to fill their Martyrologies with names, but with numbers, they had not roome to say, such a day, such a Bishop, such a day, such a Generall, but the day of 500. the day of 5000. Martyrs, and the martyrdome of a City, or the Martyrdome of an Army; This was not a red Sea, such as the Jews passed, a Sinus, a Creek, an Arm, an Inlet, a gut of a Sea, but a red Ocean, that overflowed, and surrounded all parts; and from the depth of this Sea God raised them; and such was their Resurrection. Such, as that they which suffered, lay, and bled with more ease, then the executioner stood and sweat; and embraced the fire more fervently, then he blew it; and many times had this triumph in their death, that even the executioner himself, was in the act of execution converted to Christ, and executed with them; such was their Resurrection.

When the State of the Jews was in that depression, in that conculcation, in that con-
D sternation, in that extermination in the captivity of Babylon, as that God presents it to the Prophet in that Vision, in the field of dry bones, so, Fili hominis, Son of man, as thou art a reasonable man, dost thou think these bones can live, that these men can ever be re-collected to make up a Nation? The Prophet saith, Domine tu scis, Lord thou knowest; which is, not only thou knowest whether they can, or no, but thou knowest clearly they can; thou canst make them up of bones again, for thou madest those bones of earth before. If God had called in the Angels to the making of man at first, and as he said to the Prophet, Fili hominis, Son of man, as thou art a reasonable man, so he had said to them, Filii Dei, as you are the Sons of God, illumined by his face, do you think, that this clod of red earth can make a man, a man that shall be equall to you, in one of his parts, in his soul, and yet then shall have such another part, as that he, whom all you worship, my es-
E sentiall Son shall assume, and invest that part himself, can that man made of that body, and that soul, be made of this clod of earth? Those Angels would have said, Domine tu scis, Lord thou must needs know, how to make as good creatures as us of earth, who madest us of that which is infinitely lesse then earth, of nothing, before. To induce, to facilitate these apprehensions, there were some precedents, some such thing had been done before. But when the Church was newly conceived, and then lay like the egge of a Dove, and a Gyants foot over it, like a worm, like an ant, and hill upon hill whelmed upon it, nay, like a grain of corn between the upper and lower Mill-stone, ground to dust between Tyrans and Heretiques, when as she bled in her Cradle, in those children whom Herod slew, so she bled upon her crutches, in those decrepit men whom former persecutions and tortures had creepled before, when East and West joyned hands to crush her, and hands, and brains, joyned execution to consultation to annihilate her; in this wane of the Moon, God gave her an instant fulnesse; in this exinanition, instant glory; in this grave, an instant Resurrection. A

But beloved, the expressing the pressing of their depressions, does but chafe the Wax; the Printing of the seale, is the reducing to your memory, your own case: and not that point in your case, as you were for a few yeares under a sensible persecution of fire, and prisons; that was the least part of your persecution; for it is a cheap purchase of heaven, if we may have it for dying; To sell all we have to buy that field where we know the treasure is, is not so hard, as not to know it; To part with all, for the great Pearle, not so hard a bargaine, as not to know that such a Pearle there might have beene had; we could not say heaven was kept from us, when we might have it for a Fagot, and when even our enemies helpt us to it: but your greater affliction was, as you were long before, in an insensibleness, you thought your selves well enough, and yet were under a worse persecution of ignorance, and of superstition, when you, in your Fathers, were so farre from expecting a resurrection, as that you did not know your low estate, or that you needed a Resurrection; And yet God gave you a Resurrection from it, a reformation of it. Mat. 13. 44. B

Now, who have their parts in this first resurrection? or upon what conditions have you it? We see in the fourth verse, They that are beheaded for the witnesse of Iesus; that is, that are ready to be so, when the glory of Jesus shall require that testimony. In the meane time, as it followes there, They that have not worshipped the Beast; that is, not applied the Honour, and the Allegiance due to their Soveraign, to any forraign State; nor the Honor due to God, that is, infallibility, to another Prelate; That have not worshipped the Beast, nor his Image, sayes the Text; that is, that have not been transported with vain imaginations of his power, and his growth upon us here, which hath been so diligently Painted, and Printed, and Preached, and set out in the promises, and practises of his Instruments, to delude slack, and easie persons: And then, as it is added there, That have not received his mark upon their foreheads; That is, not declared themselves Romanists apparently; nor in their hands, sayes the Text; that is, which have not under-hand sold their secret endeavours, though not their publique profession, to the advancement of his cause. These men, who are ready to be beheaded for Christ, and have not worshipped the Beast, nor the Image of the Beast, nor received his mark upon their foreheads, nor in their hands, these have their parts in this first resurrection. These are blessed, and holy, sayes our Text; Blessed, because they have meanes to be holy, in this resurrection; For the Lamb hath unclaspt the book; the Scriptures are open; which way to holinesse, our Fathers lacked; And then, our blessednesse is, that we shall raigne a thousand yeares with Christ; Now since this first resurrection, since the reformation we have raigned so with Christ, but 100. yeares: But if we persist in a good use of it, our posterity shall adde the Cypher, and make that 100. 1000. even to the time, when Christ Jesus shall come againe, and as he hath given us the first, so shall give us the last resurrection; and to that come Lord Jesus, come quickly; and till that, continue this. C D

2 Part. A peccato. Aug. Gregor. This is the first resurrection, in the first acceptation, a resurrection from persecution, and a peaceable enjoying of the Gospell: And in a second, it is a resurrection from sin; and so it hath a more particular appropriation to every person. So S. Augustine takes this place, and with him many of the Fathers, and with them, many of the sons of the Fathers, better sons of the Fathers, then the Romane Church will confesse them to be, or then they are themselves. The Expositors of the Reformed Church: They, for the most part, with S. Augustine, take this first resurrection, to be a resurrection from sin. Inter abjectos abjectissimus peccator: No man falls lower, then he that falls into a course of sin; Sin is a fall; It is not onely a deviation, a turning out of the way, upon the right, or the left hand, but it is a sinking, a falling: In the other case, of going out of the way, a man may stand upon the way, and inquire, and then proceed in the way, if he be right, or to the way, if he be wrong; But when he is fallen, and lies still, he proceeds no farther, inquires no farther. To be too apt to conceive scruples in matters of religion, stops, and retards a man in the way; to mistake some points in the truth of religion, puts a man for that time in a wrong way; But to fall into a course of sin, this makes him unsensible of any end, that he hath to goe to, of any way that he hath to goe by. God hath not removed man, not with-drawne man from this Earth; he hath not given him the Aire to E

flie

A flie in, as to Birds, nor Spheares to move in, as to Sun and Moone; he hath left him upon the Earth; and not onely to tread upon it, as in contempt, or in meere Dominion, but to walk upon it, in the discharge of the duties of his calling; and so to be conversant with the Earth, is not a falling. But as when man was nothing but earth, nothing but a body, he lay flat upon the earth, his mouth kissed the earth, his hands embraced the earth, his eyes respected the earth; And then God breathed the breath of life into him, and that raised him so farre from the earth, as that onely one part of his body, (the soles of his feet) touches it, And yet man, so raised by God, by sin fell lower to the earth againe, then before, from the face of the earth, to the womb, to the bowels, to the grave; So God, finding the whole man, as low as he found Adams body then, fallen in Originall sin, yet erects us by a new breath of life, in the Sacrament of Baptisme, and yet we fall lower then before we were raised, from Originall into Actuall, into Habituall sins; So low, as that we think
B not, that we need, know not, that there is a resurrection; and that is the wonderfull, that is the fearfull fall.

Though those words, Quomodo cecidisti de Cœlo, Lucifer, How art thou fallen from heaven O Lucifer, the Son of the morning? be ordinarily applied to the fall of the Angels, yet it is evident, that they are literally spoken of the fall of a man: It deserves wonder, more then pity, that man, whom God had raised, to so Noble a heighth in him, should fall so low from him. Man was borne to love; he was made in the love of God; but then man falls in love; when he growes in love with the creature, he falls in love: As we are bid to honour the Physitian, and to use the Physitian, but yet it is said in the same Chapter, He that sinneth before his Maker, let him fall into the hands of the Physitian; It is a blessing to use him, it is a curse to rely upon him, so it is a blessing to glorifie God, in the right use of his creatures, but to grow in love with them, is a fall: For we love nothing
C that is so good as our selves; Beauty, Riches, Honour, is not so good as man; Man capable of grace here, of glory hereafter. Nay as those things, which we love, in their nature, are worse then we which love them, so in our loving them, we endeavour to make them worse then they in their own nature are; by over-loving the beauty of the body, we corrupt the soule, by overloving honour, and riches, we deflect, and detort these things, which are not in their nature ill, to ill uses, and make them serve our ill purposes: Man falls, as a fall of waters, that throwes downe, and corrupts all that it embraces. Nay beloved, when a man hath used those wings, which God hath given him, and raised himselfe to some heighth in religious knowledge, and religious practise, as Eutichus, out of a desire to hear Paul preach, was got up into a Chamber, and up into a window of that Chamber, and yet fallingasleep, fell downe dead; so we may fall into a security of our present state, into a pride of our knowledge, or of our purity, and so fall lower, then D they, who never came to our heighth. So much need have we of a resurrection.

So sin is a fall, and every man is affraid of falling, even from his temporall station; more affraid of falling, then of not beeing raised. And Qui peccat, quatenus peccat, fit seipso deterior: In every sin a man falls from that degree which himselfe had before; In every sin, he is dishonoured, he is not so good a man, as he was; impoverished, he hath not so great a portion of grace as hee had; Infatuated, hee hath not so much of the true wisedome of the feare of God, as he had; disarmed, he hath not that interest and confidence in the love of God, that he had: and deformed, he hath not so lively a representation of the Image of God, as before. In every sin, we become prodigals, but in the habit of sin, we become bankrupts, affraid to come to an account. A fall is a fearfull thing, that needs a raising, a help; but sin is a death, and that needs a resurrection; and a resurrection is as great a work, as the very Creation it selfe. It is death in semine, in the roote, it produces,
E it brings forth death; It is death in arbore, in the body, in it selfe; death is a divorce, and so is sin; and it is death in fructu, in the fruit thereof; sin plants spirituall death, and this death produces more sin, Obduration, Impenitence, and the like.

Be pleased to returne, and cast one halfe thought upon each of these: Sin is the roote of death; Death by sin entred, and death passed upon all men, for all men have sinned. It is death because we shall dye for it. But it is death in it selfe, We are dead already, dead in it; Thou hast a name, that thou livest, and art dead, was spoken to a whole Church. It is not evidence enough, to prove that thou art alive, to say, I saw thee at a Sermon; that spirit, that knowes thy spirit, he that knowes whether thou went moved by a Sermon, melted by a Sermon, mended by a Sermon, he knows whether thou be alive or no.

That

Mort. Clem. Alex.

Rom. 5.12.

Apoc. 3.1.

That which had wont to be ſaid, That dead men walked in Churches, is too true; Men walk out a Sermon, or walk out after a Sermon, as ill as they walked in; they have a name that they live, and are dead: But the houre is come, and now is, when the dead ſhall heare the voyce of the Son of God: That is, at theſe houres they may heare, if they will, and till they doe heare, they are dead. Sin is the root of death, the body of death, and then it is the fruit of death. S. Auguſtine confeſſes of himſelfe, that he was Alliſus intra parietes in celebritate ſolemnitatum tuarum, that in great meetings upon ſolemne dayes, in the Church, there, within the walls of Gods houſe, Egit negotium procurandi fructus mortis, he was not buying and ſelling doves, but buying and ſelling ſoules, by wanton lookes, cheapning and making the bargaine of the fruits of death, as himſelfe expreſſes it. Sin is the root, and the tree, and the fruit of death; The mother of death, death it ſelfe, and the daughter of death; and from this death, this threefold death, death paſt in our paſt ſins, preſent death in our preſent inſenſibleneſſe of ſin, future death in thoſe ſins, with which ſins God will puniſh our former, and preſent ſins, (if he proceed meerly in juſtice) God affords us this firſt reſurrection.

Reſurrectio. How? Thus. Death is the Divorce of body and ſoule; Reſurrection is the Re-union of body and ſoule: And in this ſpirituall death, and reſurrection, which we conſider now, and which is all determined in the ſoule it ſelfe, Grace is the ſoule of the ſoule, and ſo the departing of grace, is the death, and the returning of grace is the reſurrection of this ſinfull ſoule. But how? By what way, what meanes? Conſider Adam; Adam was made to enjoy an immortality in his body; He induced death upon himſelfe: And then, as God having made Marriage for a remedy againſt uncleanneſſe, intemperate men make even Marriage it ſelfe an occaſion of more uncleanneſſe, then if they had never married; ſo man having induced and created death, by ſin, God takes death, and makes it a means of the glorifying of his body, in heaven. God did not induce death, death was not in his purpoſe; but veluti medium opportunum, quo vas confractum rurſus fingeretur, As a means, whereby a broken veſſell might be made up againe, God tooke death, and made it ſerve for that purpoſe, That men by the grave might be tranſlated to heaven.

Cyril. Alex.

So then, to the reſurrection of the body, there is an ordinary way, The grave; To the reſurrection of the ſoule, there is an ordinary way too, The Church. In the grave, the body that muſt be there prepared for the laſt reſurrection, hath wormes that eat upon it: In the Church, the ſoule that comes to this firſt reſurrection, muſt have wormes, The worme, the ſting, the remorſe, the compunction of Conſcience; In thoſe that have no part in this firſt reſurrection, the worme of conſcience ſhall never die, but gnaw on, to deſperation; but thoſe that have not this worme of conſcience, this remorſe, this compunction, ſhall never live. In the grave, which is the furnace, which ripens the body for the laſt reſurrection, there is a putrefaction of the body, and an ill ſavour: In the Church, the wombe where my ſoule muſt be mellowed for this firſt reſurrection, my ſoul, which hath the ſavour of death in it, as it is leavened throughout with ſin, muſt ſtink in my noſtrils, and I come to a deteſtation of all thoſe ſins, which have putrified her. And I muſt not be afraid to accuſe my ſelfe, to condemne my ſelfe, to humble my ſelfe, leſt I become a ſcorne to men; Nemo me derideat ab eo medico ægrum ſanari, à quo ſibi præſtitum eſt ne ægrotaret, Let no man deſpiſe me, or wonder at me, that I am ſo humbled under the hand of God, or that I fly to God as to my Phyſitian when I am ſick, ſince the ſame God that hath recovered me as my Phyſitian when I was ſick, hath been his Phyſitian too, and kept him from being ſick, who, but for that Phyſitian, had been as ill as I was: At leaſt he muſt be his Phyſitian, if ever he come to be ſick, and come to know that he is ſick, and come to a right deſire to be well. Spirituall death was before bodily; ſinne before the wages of ſin; God hath provided a reſurrection for both deaths, but firſt for the firſt; This is the firſt reſurrection, Reconciliation to God, and the returning of the ſoule of our ſoule, Grace, in his Church, by his Word, and his ſeales there.

Auguſt.

Now every repentance is not a reſurrection; It is rather a waking out of a dreame, then a riſing to a new life: Nay it is rather a ſtartling in our ſleep, then any awaking at all, to have a ſudden remorſe, a ſudden flaſh, and no conſtant perſeverance. Awake thou that ſleepeſt, ſayes the Apoſtle, out of the Prophet: Firſt awake, come to a ſenſe of thy ſtate; and then ariſe from the dead, ſayes he, from the practiſe of dead works; and then, Chriſt ſhall give thee light: life, and ſtrength to walk in new wayes. It is a long work, and hath many ſteps; Awake, ariſe, and walke, and therefore ſet out betimes; At the laſt day, in thoſe

Ephes. 5. 14. Eſay 60. 1.

A those, which shall be found alive upon the earth, we say there shall be a sudden death, and a sudden resurrection; In raptu, in transitu, in ictu oculi, In an instant, in the twinckling of an eye; but do not thou trust to have this first Resurrection In raptu, in transitu, in ictu oculi, In thy last passage upon thy death-bed, when the twinckling of the eye, must be the closing of thine eyes: But as we assign to glorified bodies after the last Resurrection, certaine Dotes, (as we call them in the Schoole) certaine Endowments, so labour thou to finde those endowments, in thy soule here, if thou beest come to this first Resurrection.

Amongst those Endowments we assigne Subtilitatem, Agilitatem; The glorified bodie is become more subtile, more nimble, not encumbred, not disable for any motion, that it would make; So hath that soule, which is come to this first Resurrection, by grace, a spirituall agility, a holy nimblenesse in it, that it can slide by tentations, and passe
B through tentations, and never be polluted; follow a calling, without taking infection, by the ordinary tentations of that calling. So have those glorified bodies Claritatem, a brightnesse upon them, from the face of God; and so have these soules, which are come to this first resurrection, a sun in themselves, an inherent light, by which they can presently distinguish betweene action and action, what must, what may, what must not bee done. But of all the endowments of the glorified body, we consider most, Impassibilitatem, That that body shall suffer nothing; and is sure that it shall suffer nothing. And that which answers that endowment of the body most in this soule, that is come to this first resurrection, is as the Apostle speaks, That neither persecution, sickenesse, nor death, shall separate her from Christ Iesus. In Heaven we doe not say, that our bodies shall devest their mortality, so, as that naturally they could not dye, for they shall have a composition still; and every compounded thing may perish: but they shal be so assured, and with such a pre-
C servation, as they shall alwaies know they shall never dye. S. Augustine saies well, Assit motio, absit fatigatio, assit potestas vescendi, absit necessitas esuriendi; They have in their nature a mortality, and yet be immortall; a possibility and an impossibility of dying, with those two divers relations, one to nature, the other to preservation, will consist together. So in this soule, that hath this first Resurrection from sin, by grace, a conscience of her owne infirmity, that she may relapse, and yet a testimony of the powerfulnesse of Gods Spirit, that easily she shall not relapse, may consist well together. But the last seale of this holy confidence is reserved for that, which is the third acceptation of this first Resurrection; not from persecutions in this world, nor from sin in this world, but from all possibility of falling back into sin, in the world to come; and to this, have divers Expositors referred these words, this first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he, that hath part in this first Resurrection.

D Now, a Resurrection of the soule, seemes an improper, an impertinent, an improbable, an impossible forme of speech; for, Resurrection implies death, and the soule does not dye in her passage to Heaven. And therefore Damascen makes account, that he hath sufficiently proved the Resurrection of the body (which seems so incredible) if he could prove any Resurrection; if there be any Resurrection at all, saies he, it must be of the body, for the soule cannot dye, therefore not rise. Yet have not those Fathers, nor those Expositors, who have in this text, acknowledged a Resurrection of the soule, mistaken nor miscalled the matter. Take Damascens owne definition of Resurrection: Resurrectio est ejus quod cecidit secunda surrectio: A Resurrection is a second rising to that state, from which any thing is formerly fallen. Now though by death, the soule do not fall into any such state, as that it can complaine, (for what can that lack, which God fils?) yet by death, the soule fals from that, for which it was infused, and poured into man at first, that is,
E to be the forme of that body, the King of that Kingdome; and therefore, when in the generall Resurrection, the soule returnes to that state, for which it was created, and to which it hath had an affection, and a desire, even in the fulnesse of the Joyes of Heaven, then, when the soule returnes to her office, to make up the man, because the whole man hath, therefore the soule hath a Resurrection; not from death, but from a deprivation of her former state; that state, which she was made for, and is ever enclined to.

But that is the last Resurrection, and so the soule hath part even in that last Resurrection; But we are in hand with the first Resurrection of the soule; and that is, when that soule, which was at first breath'd from God, and hath long suffered a banishment, a close imprisonment in this body, returnes to God againe; The returning of the soule to him, from from whom it proceeded at firſt, is a Reſurrection of the ſoule. Here then eſpecially, I feele the ſtraitneſſe of time; two conſiderations open themſelves together, of ſuch a largeneſſe, as all the time from Moſes his In principio, when time began, to the Angels Affidavit, in this booke, That ſhall ſay and ſweare, that time ſhall be no more, were too narrow to contemplate theſe two Hemiſpheares of Man, this Evening, and Morning of Mans everlaſting day; The miſeries of man, in this baniſhment, in this empriſonment, in this grave of the ſoule, the body, And the glory, and exaltation of that ſoule in her Reſurrection to Heaven. That ſoule, which being borne free, is made a ſlave to this body, by comming to it; It muſt act, but what this body will give it leave to act, according to the Organs, which this body affords it; and if the body be lame in any limme, the ſoule muſt be lame in her operation, in that limme too; It muſt doe, but what the body will have it doe, and then it muſt ſuffer, whatſoever that body puts it to, or whatſoever any others will put that body to: If the body oppreſſe it ſelfe with Melancholy, the ſoule muſt be ſad; and if other men oppreſſe the body with injury, the ſoule muſt be ſad too; Conſider, (it is too immenſe a thing to conſider it) reflect but one thought, but upon this one thing in the ſoule, here, and hereafter, In her grave, the body, and in her Reſurrection in Heaven; That is the knowledge of the ſoule. A

Here ſaies S. Auguſtine, when the ſoule conſiders the things of this world, Non veritate certior, ſed conſuetudine ſecurior; She reſts upon ſuch things as ſhe is not ſure are true, but ſuch as ſhe ſees, are ordinarily received and accepted for truths: ſo that the end of her knowledge is not Truth, but opinion, and the way, not Inquiſition, but eaſe: But ſaies he, when ſhe proceeds in this life, to ſearch into heavenly things, Verberatur luce veritatis, The beames of that light are too ſtrong for her, and they ſink her, and caſt her downe, Et ad familiaritatem tenebrarum ſuarum, non electione ſed fatigatione convertitur; and ſo ſhe returnes to her owne darkneſſe, becauſe ſhe is moſt familiar, and beſt acquainted with it; Non electione, not becauſe ſhe loves ignorance, but becauſe ſhe is weary of the trouble of ſeeking out the truth, and ſo ſwallowes even any Religion to eſcape the paine of debating, and diſputing; and in this lazineſſe ſhe ſleeps out her leaſe, her terme of life, in this death, in this grave, in this body. B C

But then in her Reſurrection, her meaſure is enlarged, and filled at once; There ſhe reads without ſpelling, and knowes without thinking, and concludes without arguing; ſhe is at the end of her race, without running; In her triumph, without fighting; In her Haven, without ſayling: A free-man, without any prentiſhip; at full yeares, without any wardſhip; and a Doctor, without any proceeding: She knowes truly, and eaſily, and immediately, and entirely, and everlaſtingly; Nothing left out at firſt, nothing worne out at laſt, that conduces to her happineſſe. What a death is this life? what a reſurrection is this death? For though this world be a ſea, yet (which is moſt ſtrange) our Harbour is larger then the ſea; Heaven infinitely larger then this world. For, though that be not true, which Origen is ſaid to ſay, That at laſt all ſhall be ſaved, nor that evident, which Cyril of Alexandria ſaies, That without doubt the number of them that are ſaved, is far greater then of them that periſh, yet ſurely the number of them, with whom we ſhall have communion in Heaven, is greater then ever lived at once upon the face of the earth: And of thoſe who lived in our time, how few did we know? and of thoſe whom we did know, how few did we care much for? In Heaven we ſhall have Communion of Joy and Glory with all, alwaies; Vbi non intrat inimicus, nec amicus exit, Where never any man ſhall come in that loves us not, nor go from us that does. D

Aug.

Beloved, I thinke you could be content to heare, I could be content to ſpeake of this Reſurrection, our glorious ſtate, by the low way of the grave, till God by that gate of earth, let us in at the other of precious Stones. And bleſſed and holy is he, who in a rectified conſcience deſires that reſurrection now. But we ſhall not depart far from this conſideration, by departing into our laſt branch, or concluſion, That this firſt Reſurrection may alſo be underſtood to be the firſt riſer Chriſt Jeſus; and Bleſſed and holy is he that hath part in that firſt Reſurrection. E

4 Part.

This firſt Reſurrection is then without any detorting, any violence, very appliable to Chriſt himſelf, who was Primitiæ dormientium, in that, that action, That he roſe again, he is become (ſayes the Apoſtle) the firſt fruits of them that ſleep: He did riſe, and riſe firſt; others roſe with him, none before him: for S. Hierome taking the words as he finds them in that Euangeliſt, makes this note, That though the graves were opened, at the inſtant

of

A of Christs death, (death was overcome, the City opened the gates) yet the bodies did not rise till after Christs Resurrection. For, for such Resurrections as are spoken of, That women received their dead raised to life again, and such as are recorded in the old and new Testament, they were all unperfect and temporary resurrections, such, as S. Hierome sayes of them all, Resurgebant iterum morituri; They were but reprieved, not pardoned; They had a Resurrection to life, but yet a Resurrection to another death. Christ is the first Resurrection; others were raised; but he only rose; they by a forraine, and extrinsique, he by his owne power. Heb. 11. 35. Hier.

But we call him not the first, in that respect onely; for so he was not onely the first, but the onely; he alone arose by his owne power; but with relation to all our future Resurrections, he is the first Resurrection. First, If Christ be not raised, your faith is in vaine, saies the Apostle; You have a vaine faith if you beleeve in a dead man. He might be 1 Cor. 15. 17.

B true Man, though he remained in death; but it concernes you to beleeve, that he was the Son of God too; And he was declared to be the Son of God, by the Resurrection from the dead. That was the declaration of himselfe, his Justification; he was justified by the Spirit, when he was proved to be God, by raising himselfe. But thus our Justification is also in his Resurrection. For, He was raised from the dead, for our Justification: how for ours? That we should be also in the likenesse of his Resurrection. What is that? that he hath told us before; Our Resurrection in Christ is, that we should walke in newnesse of life. Rom. 4. Rom. 4. ult. Rom. 6. 4.

So that then Christ is the first Resurrection, first, Efficiently, the onely cause of his owne Resurrection; First, Meritoriously, the onely cause of our Resurrection; first, Exemplarily, the onely patterne, how we should rise, and how we should walke, when we are up; and therefore, Blessed and happy are we, if we referre all our resurrections to this first Resurrection Christ Jesus. For as Iob said of Comforters, so miserable Resurrections

C are they all without him.

If therefore thou need and seeke this first Resurrection, in the first acceptation, a Resurrection from persecutions, and calamities, as they oppresse thee here, have thy recourse to him, to Christ. Remember that at the death of Christ, there were earthquakes; the whole earth trembled; There were rendings of the Temple; Schismes, Convulsions, distractions in the Church will be: But then, the graves opened in the midst of those commotions; Then when thou thinkest thy selfe swallowed, and buried in affliction, as the Angell did his, Christ Jesus shall remove thy grave stone, and give thee a resurrection; but if thou thinke to remove it by thine owne wit, thine owne power, or the favour of potent Friends, Digitus Dei non est hic, The hand of God is not in all this, and the stone shall lye still upon thee, till thou putrifie into desperation, and thou shalt have no part in this first Resurrection.

D If thou need, and seek this first resurrection, in the second acceptation, from the fearfull death of hainous sin, have thy recourse to him, to Christ Jesus, & remember the waight of the sins that lay upon him: All thy sins, and all thy Fathers, and all thy childrens sins, all those sins that did induce the first flood, and shall induce the last fire upon this world; All those sins, which that we might take example by them to scape them, are recorded, and which, lest we should take example by them, to imitate them, are left unrecorded; all sins, of all ages, all sexes, all places, al times, all callings, sins heavy in their substance, sins aggravated by their circumstances, all kinds of sins, and all particular sins of every kind, were upon him, upon Christ Jesus; and yet he raised his holy Head, his royall Head, though under thornes, yet crowned with those thornes, and triumphed in this first Resurrection: and his body was not left in the Grave, nor his soule in Hell. Christs first tongue was a tongue that might be heard, He spoke to the Shepheards by Angels; His second

E tongue was a Star, a tongue which might be seene; He spoke to the Wisemen of the East by that. Hearken after him these two waies; As he speakes to thine eare, (and to thy soul, by it) in the preaching of his Word, as he speakes to thine eye, (and so to thy soule by that) in the exhibiting of his Sacraments: And thou shalt have thy part in this first Resurrection. But if thou thinke to overcome this death, this sense of sin, by diversions, by worldly delights, by mirth, and musique, and society, or by good works, with a confidence of merit in them, or with a relation to God himselfe, but not as God hath manifested himselfe to thee, not in Christ Jesus, The stone shall lye still upon thee, till thou putrifie into desperation, and then hast thou no part in this first Resurrection.

If thou desire this first Resurrection in the third acceptation, as S. Paul did, To be disſolved, and to be with Chriſt, go Chriſts way to that alſo. He deſired that glory that thou doeſt; and he could have laid down his ſoul when he would; but he ſtaid his houre, ſayes the Goſpel. He could have aſcended immediatly, immediatly in time, yet he ſtaid to deſcend into hell firſt; and he could have aſcended immediatly of himſelf, by going up, yet he ſtaid till he was taken up. Thou haſt no ſuch power of thine own ſoul and life, not for the time, not for the means of comming to this firſt Reſurrection by death; Stay therefore patiently, ſtay chearfully Gods leaſure till he call; but not ſo over-chearfully, as to be loath to go when he cals. Reliefe in perſecution by power, reconciliation in ſin by grace, diſſolution, and tranſmigration to heaven by death, are all within this firſt Reſurrection: But that which is before them all, is Chriſt Jeſus.

And therefore, as all that the naturall man promiſes himſelf without God, is impious, ſo all that we promiſe our ſelves, though by God, without Chriſt, is frivolous. God, who hath ſpoken to us by his Son, works upon us by his Son too; He was our Creation, he was our Redemption, he is our Reſurrection. And that man trades in the world without money, and goes out of the world without recommendation, that leaves out Chriſt Jeſus. To be a good Morall man, and refer all to the law of Nature in our hearts, is but Diluculum, The dawning of the day; To be a godly man, and refer all to God, is but Crepuſculum, A twylight; But the Meridionall brightneſſe, the glorious noon, and heighth, is to be a Chriſtian, to pretend to no ſpirituall, no temporall bleſſing, but for, and by, and through, and in our only Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus; for he is this firſt Reſurrection, and Bleſſed and holy is he, that hath part in this firſt Reſurrection.

Preached at S. Pauls, in the Evening, upon Eaſter-day. 1625.

JOHN 5. 28, 29.

Marvell not at this; for the houre is comming, in the which, all that are in the graves, ſhall heare his voice; And ſhall come forth, They that have done good, unto the Reſurrection of Life; And they that have done evill, unto the Reſurrection of Damnation.

AS the Sun works diverſly, according to the diverſe diſpoſition of the ſubject, (for the Sun melts wax, and it hardens clay) ſo do the good actions of good men: upon good men they work a vertuous emulation, a noble and a holy deſire to imitate, upon bad men they work a vicious, and impotent envy, a deſire to diſgrace, and calumniate. And the more the good is that is done, and the more it works upon good men, the more it diſaffects the bad: for ſo the Phariſees expreſſe their rancor and malignity againſt Chriſt, in this Goſpel, If we let him thus alone, all men will beleeve in him; And that they foreſaw would deſtroy them in their reputation. And therefore they enlarged their malice, beyond Chriſt himſelfe, to him, upon whom Chriſt had wrought a Miracle, to Lazarus, They conſulted to put him to death, becauſe by reaſon of him, many beleeved in Ieſus. Our Text leads us to another example of this impotency in envious men; Chriſt, in this Chapter had, by his only word, cured a man that had been eight and thirty yeares infirm; and he had done this work upon the Sabbath. They envyed the work in the ſubſtance, but they quarrell the circumſtance; And they envy Chriſt, but they turn upon the man, who was more obnoxious to them; and they tell him, That it was not lawfull for him to carry his bed that day. He diſcharges himſelf upon Chriſt; I diſpute not with you concerning the Law; This ſatisfies me, He that made me whole, bad me take up my bed and walk. Thereupon they put him to finde out Jeſus; And when he could not finde Jeſus, Jeſus found him, and in his behalf offers himſelf to the Phariſees. Then they direct themſelves upon him, and (as the Goſpell ſayes,

Ver. 11.

A sayes) They sought to slay him, because he had done this upon the Sabbath: And, as the patient had discharged himself upon Christ, Christ discharges himself upon his Father; doth it displease you that I work upon the Sabbath? be angry with God, be angry with the Father, for the Father works when I work. And then this they take worse then his working of Miracles, or his working upon the Sabbath, That he would say, that God was his Father; And therfore in the averring of that, that so important point, That God was his Father, Christ grows into a holy vehemence, and earnestnesse, and he repeats his usuall oath, Verily, verily, three severall times: First, ver. 19. That whatsoever the Father doth, He, the Son, doth also, And then ver. 24. He that beleeveth on me, and him that sent me, hath life everlasting. And then again, ver. 25. The houre is comming, and now is, when the dead shall heare the voice of the Son of God, and they that heare it shall live. At this, that the dead should live, they marvelled; But becausе he knew that they were men more affected B with things concerning the body, then spirituall things, as in another story, when they wondered that he would pretend to forgive sins, becausе he knew, that they thought it a greater matter to bid that man that had the Palsie, take up his bed and walk, then to forgive him his sins, therefore he took that way which was hardest in their opinion, he did bid him take up his bed and walk; So here, when they wondred at his speaking of a spirituall Resurrection, to heare him say, that at his preaching, the dead (that is, men spiritually dead in their sins) should rise again, to them who more respected the body, and did lesse beleeve a reall Resurrection of the body, then a figurative Resurrection of the soul, he proceeds to that which was, in their apprehension, the more difficult, Marvell not at this, sayes he, here in our Text; not at that spirituall Resurrection by preaching, for the houre is comming, in the which, all that are in the graves, &c. and so he establishes the Resurrection of the body.

V. 16. V. 17. V. 18.

C That then which Christ affirmes and avows, is, That he is the Son of God; and that is the first thing, that ever was done in Heaven, The eternall generation of the Son: that, by which, he proves this, to these men, is, That by him, there shall be a resurrection of the body; and that is the last thing, that shall be done in Heaven, for, after that, there is nothing, but an even continuance in equall glory. Before that, saies he, that is, before the resurrection of the body, there shall be another resurrection, a spirituall resurrection of the soule from sin; but that shall be, by ordinary meanes, by Preaching, and Sacraments, and it shall be accomplished every day; but fix not upon that, determin not your thoughts upon that, marvaile not at that, make that no cause of extraordinary wonder, but make it ordinary to you, feele it, and finde the effect thereof in your soules, as often as you heare, as often as you receive, and thereby provide for another resurrection, For, the houre is comming, in which, all that are in their graves, &c.

Divisio.

D Where we must necessarily make thus many steps, though but short ones. First, the dignity of the Resurrection, marvaile at nothing so much, as at this, nothing is so marvailous, so wonderfull as this; And secondly, the approach of the Resurrection, The houre is comming; And thirdly, The generality, All that are in the graves; And then the instrument of the resurrection, The voice of Christ, that shall be heard; And lastly, the diverse end of the resurrection, They shall come forth, they that have done good, &c. God hath a care of the Body of man, that is first; And he defers it not, that is next; And he extends it to all, that is a third; And a fourth is, That he does that last act, by him, by whom he did the first, The Creation, and all betweene, the Redemption, that is, by his Son, by Christ; And then the last is, that this is an everlasting separation and divorce of the good and the bad, The bad shall never be able to receive good from the Good, nor to doe harme to the Good, after that.

E First then, Christ saies, Ne miremini, Marvaile not at this, not at your spirituall resurrection, not that a Sermon should worke upon man, not that a Sacrament should comfort a man, make it not a miracle, nor an extraordinary thing, by hearing to come to repentance, and so to such a resurrection. For though S. Augustine say, That to convert a man from sin, is as great a miracle, as Creation, yet S. August. speaks that of a mans first conversion, in which the man himselfe does nothing, but God all; Then he is made of nothing; but after God hath renewed him, and proposed ordinary meanes in the Church still to worke upon him, he must not looke for miraculous working, but make Gods ordinary meanes, ordinary to him. This is Panis quotidianus, The daily bread which God gives you, as often as you meet here, according to his Ordinances; Ne miremini, stand not not to wonder, as though you were not ſure, but come to enjoy Gods goodneſſe, in his ordinary way here. A

Hoc. But it is, Ne miremini hoc, Wonder not at this; but yet, there are things, which we may wonder at. Nil admirari, is but the Philoſophers wiſdome; He thinks it a weakneſſe, to wonder at any thing, That any thing ſhould be ſtrange to him: But Chriſtian Philoſophy that is rooted in humility, tels us, in the mouth of Clement of Alexand. Principium veritatis eſt res admirari, The firſt ſtep to faith, is to wonder, to ſtand, and conſider with a holy admiration, the waies and proceedings of God with man: for, Admiration, wonder, ſtands as in the midſt, betweene knowledge and faith, and hath an eye towards both. If I know a thing, or beleeve a thing, I do no longer wonder: but when I finde that I have reaſon to ſtop upon the conſideration of a thing, ſo, as that I ſee enough to induce admiration, to make me wonder, I come by that ſtep, and God leads me by that hand, to a knowledge, if it be of a naturall or civill thing, or to a faith, if it be of a ſupernaturall, and ſpirituall thing. B

And therefore be content to wonder at this, That God would have ſuch a care to dignifie, and to crown, and to aſſociate to his own everlaſting preſence, the body of man. God himſelf is a Spirit, and heaven is his place; my ſoul is a ſpirit, and ſo proportioned to that place; That God, or Angels, or our Soules, which are all Spirits, ſhould be in heaven, Ne miremini, never wonder at that. But ſince we wonder, and juſtly, that ſome late Philoſophers have removed the whole earth from the Center, and carried it up, and placed it in one of the Spheares of heaven, That this clod of earth, this body of ours ſhould be carried up to the higheſt heaven, placed in the eye of God, ſet down at the right hand of God, Miremini hoc, wonder at this; That God, all Spirit, ſerved with Spirits, aſſociated to Spirits, ſhould have ſuch an affection, ſuch a love to this body, this earthly body, this deſerves this wonder. The Father was pleaſed to breathe into this body, C at firſt, in the Creation; The Son was pleaſed to aſſume this body himſelf, after, in the Redemption; The Holy Ghoſt is pleaſed to conſecrate this body, and make it his Temple, by his ſanctification; In that Faciamus hominem, Let us, all us, make man, that conſultation of the whole Trinity in making man, is exerciſed even upon this lower part of man, the dignifying of his body. So far, as that amongſt the ancient Fathers, very many of them, are very various, and irreſolved, which way to pronounce, and very many of them cleare in the negative, in that point, That the ſoule of man comes not to the preſence of God, but remaines in ſome out-places till the Reſurrection of the body: That obſervation, that conſideration of the love of God, to the body of man, withdrew them into that error, That the ſoul it ſelf ſhould lack the glory of heaven, till the body were become capable of that glory too.

They therefore oppoſe God in his purpoſe of dignifying the body of man, firſt, who D violate, and mangle this body, which is the Organ in which God breathes; And they alſo which pollute and defile this body, in which Chriſt Jeſus is apparelled; and they likewiſe who prophane this body, which the Holy Ghoſt, as the high Prieſt, inhabites, and conſecrates.

Trangreſſors in the firſt kinde, that put Gods Organ out of tune, that diſcompoſe, and teare the body of man with violence, are thoſe inhumane perſecutors, who with racks, and tortures, and priſons, and fires, and exquiſite inquiſitions, throw downe the bodies of the true Gods true ſervants, to the Idolatrous worſhip of their imaginary Gods; that torture men into hell, and carry them through the inquiſition into damnation. S. Auguſtine moves a queſtion, and inſtitutes a diſputation, and carries it ſomewhat problematically, whether torture be to be admitted at all, or no. That preſents a faire probability, which he ſayes againſt it: we preſume, ſayes he, that an innocent man ſhould be able to E hold his tongue in torture; That is no part of our purpoſe in torture, ſayes he, that hee that is innocent, ſhould accuſe himſelfe, by confeſſion, in torture. And, if an innocent man be able to doe ſo, why ſhould we not thinke, that a guilty man, who ſhall ſave his life, by holding his tongue in torture, ſhould be able to doe ſo? And then, where is the uſe of torture? Res fragilis, & periculoſa quæſtio, ſayes that Lawyer, who is eſteemed the law, alone, Vlpian: It is a ſlippery triall, and uncertaine, to convince by torture: For, many times, ſayes S. Auguſtine againe, Innocens luit pro incerto ſcelere certiſſimas pœnas; He that is yet but queſtioned, whether he be guilty or no, before that he knowne, is, without all queſtion, miſerably tortured. And whereas, many times, the paſſion of the Judge,

and

A and the covetouſneſſe of the Judge, and the ambition of the Judge, are calamities heavy enough, upon a man, that is accuſed, in this caſe of torture, Ignorantia Iudicis eſt calamitas plerumque innocentis, ſayes that Father, for the moſt part, even the ignorance of the Judge, is the greateſt calamity of him that is accuſed: If the Judge knew that he were innocent, he ſhould ſuffer nothing; If he knew he were guilty, he ſhould not ſuffer torture; but becauſe the Judge is ignorant, and knowes nothing, therefore the Priſoner muſt bee racked, and tortured, and mangled, ſayes that Father.

There is a whole Epiſtle in S. Hierome, full of heavenly meditation, and of curious expreſſions: It is his forty ninth Epiſtle, Ad Innocentium: where a young man tortured for ſuſpition of adultery with a certaine woman, ut compendio cruciatus vitaret, ſayes he, for his eaſe, and to abridge his torment, and that he might thereby procure and compaſſe a preſent death, confeſſed the adultery, though falſe: His confeſſion was made
B evidence againſt the woman: and ſhee makes that proteſtation, Tu teſtis Domine Ieſu, Thou Lord Jeſus be my Witneſſe, Non ideo me negare velle, ne peream, ſed ideo mentiri nolle, ne peccem: I doe not deny the fact for feare of death, but I dare not belie my ſelfe, nor betray mine innocence, for feare of ſinning, and offending the God of Truth; And, as it followes in that ſtory, though no torture could draw any Confeſſion, any accuſation from her, ſhe was condemned; and one Executioner had three blowes at her with a Sword, and another foure, and yet ſhe could not be killed.

And therefore, becauſe Storie abounds with Examples of this kinde, how uncertaine a way of tryall, and conviction, torture is, though S. Auguſtine would not ſay, that torture was unlawfull, yet he ſayes, It behoves every Judge to make that prayer, Erue me Domine à neceſſitatibus meis, If there bee ſome caſes, In which the Judge muſt neceſſarily proceed to torture; O Lord, deliver me, from having any ſuch caſe brought
C before me.

But what uſe ſoever there may be for torture, for Confeſſion, in the Inquiſition they torture for a deniall, for the deniall of God, and for the renouncing of the truth of his Goſpell: As men of great place, think it concernes their honour, to doe above that which they ſuffer, to make their revenges, not only equall, but greater then their injuries; ſo the Romane Church thinks it neceſſary to her greatneſſe, to inflict more tortures now, then were inflicted upon her in the Primitive Church; as though it were a juſt revenge, for the tortures ſhe received then, for being Chriſtian, to torture better Chriſtians then her ſelfe, for being ſo. In which tortures, the Inquiſition hath found one way, to eſcape the generall clamour of the world againſt them, which is to torture to that heighth, that few ſurvive, or come abroad after, to publiſh, how they have been tortured. And theſe, firſt, oppoſe Gods purpoſe, in the making, and preſerving, and dignifying the body
D of man.

Tranſgreſſors herein, in the ſecond kinde, are they, that defile the garment of Chriſt Jeſus, the body in which he hath vouchſafed to inveſt and enwrap himſelfe, and ſo apparell a Harlot in Chriſts cloathes, and make that body, which is his, hers. That Chriſt ſhould take my body, though defiled with fornication, and make it his, is ſtrange; but that I, in fornication, ſhould take Chriſts body, and make it hers, is more. Know ye not, 1 Cor. 6. 15.
ſayes the Apoſtle, that your bodies are the members of Chriſt? And againe, Know you not, V. 16.
that he that is joyned to a harlot, is one body? Some of the Romane Emperours, made it treaſon, to carry a Ring, that had their picture engraved in it, to any place in the houſe, of low Office. What Name can we give to that ſin, to make the body of Chriſt, the body of a harlot? And yet, the Apoſtle there, as taking knowledge, that we loved our ſelves better then Chriſt, changes the edge of his argument, and argues thus, ver. 18.
E He that committeth fornication, ſinneth againſt his own body; If ye will be bold with Chriſts body, yet favour your own: No man ever hated his own body; and yet, no outward enemy is able ſo to macerate our body, as our owne licentiouſneſſe. Chriſt, who tooke all our bodily infirmities upon him, Hunger, and Thirſt, and Sweat, and Cold, tooke no bodily deformities upon him, he tooke not a lame, a blinde, a crooked body; and we, by our intemperance, and licentiouſneſſe, deforme that body which is his, all theſe wayes. The licentious man, moſt of any, ſtudies bodily handſomeneſſe, to be comely, and gracious, and acceptable, and yet, ſooneſt of any, deformes, and deſtroyes it, and makes that loathſome to all, which all his care was to make amiable: And ſo they oppoſe Gods purpoſe of dignifying the body.

Transgreſſors in a third kinde are they, that ſacrilegiouſly prophane the Temple of the Holy Ghoſt, by neglecting the reſpect and duties, belonging to the dead bodies of Gods Saints, in a decent and comely accompanying them to convenient Funerals. Heires and Executors are oftentimes defective in theſe offices, and pretend better employments of that, which would be, (ſay they) vainly ſpent ſo. But remember you, of whom (in much ſuch a caſe) that is ſaid in S. Iohn, This he ſaid, not becauſe he cared for the poore, but becauſe he was a Thiefe, and had the bagge, and bore that which was put therein: This Executors ſay, not becauſe they intend pious uſes, but becauſe they beare, and beare away the bagges. Generally, thy opinion muſt be no rule for other mens actions; neither in theſe caſes of Funerals, muſt thou call all too much, which is more then enough; That womans Ointment poured upon Chriſts feet, that hundred pound waight of perfumes to embalme his one body, was more then enough, neceſſarily enough; yet it was not too much, for the dignity of that perſon, nor for the teſtimony of their zeale, who did it, in ſo abundant manner.

Now, as in all theſe three waies, men may oppoſe the purpoſe of God, in dignifying the body, ſo in concurring with Gods purpoſe, for the dignifying thereof, a man may exceed, and goe beyond Gods purpoſe, in all three. God would not have the body torne, and mangled with tortures, in thoſe caſes; but then, hee would not have it pampered with wanton delicacies, nor varniſhed with forraigne complexion. It is ill, when it is not our own heart, that appeares in our words; it is ill too, when it is not our own blood, that appeares in our cheekes; It may doe ſome ill offices of blood, it may tempt, but it gives over, when it ſhould doe a good office of blood, it cannot bluſh. If when they are filling the wrinkles, and graves of their face, they would remember, that there is another grave, that calls for a filling with the whole body, ſo, even their pride would flow into a mortification. God would not have us put on a ſad countenance, nor disfigure our face, not in our faſtings, and other diſciplines; God would not have us marre his work; nor God would not have us goe about to doe his laſt work, which he hath reſerved to himſelfe in heaven, here upon earth, that is, to glorifie our bodies, with ſuch additions here, as though we would need no glorification there.

So alſo in the ſecond way of giving due reſpect to the body of man, a man may exceed Gods purpoſe. God would not have the body corrupted and attenuated, ſhrunk and deformed with incontinency, and licentiouſneſſe; But God would not have that ſparing of the body, to diſhonour, or undervalue, or forbeare mariage, nor to fruſtrate that, which was one of Gods purpoſes, in the inſtitution of mariage, procreation of children. Mariage without poſſibility of children, lacks one halfe of Gods purpoſe in the inſtitution of mariage; for, the third reaſon of mariage, after the other two, (which two were, for a Helper, and for Children) which is, that mariage ſhould be for a Remedy, that third came in after; for at the time of the inſtitution of mariage, man was not fallen into any inordinate concupiſcencies, and ſo, at that time, needed no remedy. Mariage without poſſibility of children, lacks one of Gods two reaſons for children, but mariage with a contract againſt children, or a practice againſt children, is not (ſayes S. Auguſtine) a mariage, but a ſolemne, an avowed, a dayly Adultery. To chooſe to be ill in the ſight of God, rather then to look ill, in the ſight of men, is a perverſe, and a poyſonous Phyſick. The ſin of Er, and Onan, in maried men; the ſin of procured abortions, in maried women, doe, in many caſes, equall, in ſome, exceed, the ſin of Adultery; To rob a husband, or a wife, of a future child, may be in the wife, or husband, as great a ſin, as to bring a ſuppoſititious, or a ſpurious child, into the Fathers inheritance. God would not have the comelineſſe, the handſomeneſſe of the body defaced by incontinency, and intemperance, but he would not have the care of that comelineſſe, and handſomeneſſe fruſtrate his purpoſe of children in mariage.

And as in thoſe two, (God would not have the body tortured, nor mangled, God would not have the body deformed by licentiouſneſſe) ſo, in his third reſpect to mans body, God would not have the bodies of his dead Saints neglected, Gods purpoſe may be exceeded too. Gods purpoſe therein is, that all men ſhould be Decently; and Honourable perſons, Honourably buried; but his purpoſe herein is exceeded, when any ragge of their skin, or chip of their bones, or lock of their haire, is kept for a Relique, and made an Univerſall balme, and Amulet, and Antidote, againſt all temporall, and all ſpirituall diſeaſes, and calamities, not onely againſt the rage of a Feaver, but of hell it ſelfe. What their

A their counterfait Reliques may doe, againſt their counterfait hell, againſt their Purgatory, I know not: That powerfull, and precious, and onely Relique, which is given to us, againſt hell it ſelfe, is onely the Communion of the body, and blood of Chriſt Jeſus, left to us by him, and preſerved for us, in his Church, though his body be removed out of our ſight.

To end this, Miramini hoc, marvell at this, at the wonderfull love of God to the body of man, and thou wilt favour it ſo, as not to macerate thine owne body, with uncommanded and inhumane flagellations, and whippings, nor afflict their bodies, who are in thy charge, with inordinate labour; thou wilt not diſhonour this body, as it is Chriſts body, nor deforme it, as it is thine owne, with intemperance, but thou wilt behave thy ſelfe towards it ſo, as towards one, whom it hath pleaſed the King to honour, with a reſurrection, (which was our firſt,) and not to deferre that reſurrection long, which is our next

Non talem Deum tuum putes, qualis nec tu debes eſſe, is excellently ſaid by S. Auguſtine: Venit hora. Never preſume upon any other diſpoſition in God, then ſuch as thou findeſt in thine own heart, that thou art bound to have in thy ſelfe; for we finde in our hearts, a band of conformity, and aſſimilation to God, that is, to be as like God as we can. Therefore whatſoever thou findeſt thy ſelfe bound to doe to another, thou maiſt expect at Gods hand. Thou art bound to help up another that is fallen, therefore thou maiſt aſſure thy ſelfe, that God will give thee a Reſurrection: ſo, thou findeſt in thy heart, that the ſoul of an almes, the ſoule of a benefit, that that gives it life, is the ſpeedy, the preſent doing of it; Therefore thou maiſt be ſure, that God will make ſpeed to ſave thee, that he will not long deferre this thy reſurrection, hora venit. S. Auguſtine comparing the former reſurrection, which is the ſpirituall reſurrection of the ſoule, ver. 25. with this in the Text,

C which is the reſurrection of the body, obſerves, that there Chriſt ſayes, hora venit, & nunc eſt, the houre is comming, and now is; becauſe in every private inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, in every Sermon, in every meeting of the Congregation, the dead may heare, and live; nunc eſt, they may doe it now. But that in this reſurrection in the Text, the reſurrection of the body, it is not ſaid, nunc eſt, that the houre is now; for, the Son of Man who ſayes it, (as hee is the Son of Man) knowes not when it ſhall bee; But hee ſayes Hora venit, It is comming, and comming apace, and comming quickly, ſhortly.

As ſoone as God had made man, he gave him his patent, Dominamini, Dominion over the Creature; As ſoone as Man was fallen, God gave him the promiſe of a Meſſias; And of his ſecond comming, himſelfe ſayes, Ecce, venio citò, Behold, I come ſpeedily: Venit, he comes, he is upon the way; and Ecce, venit, Behold, he comes, he is within ſight, you may ſee him in his fore-running tokens; and Ecce citò, as little way as he hath to goe, he

D makes haſte, And there is a Jeſuit that makes the haſte ſo great, as that he ſayes, How- Maldon.
ſoever S. Auguſtine make uſe of that note, that it is not ſaid in the Text, Nunc eſt, That the houre of the Reſurrection is now, yet he does beleeve, that Chriſt did ſay ſo, though the Euangeliſt left it out. We need not ſay ſo; we doe not; ſo much leſſe liberty doe we take in departing from the Fathers, then the Romane Authors doe: But yet, ſo as S. John ſpeaks, Hora noviſſima, This is the laſt time, (Now there are many Antichriſts, whereby we know that this is the laſt time) And ſo, as S. Peter ſpeaks, Be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thouſand yeares, and a thouſand yeares as one day: So as this Nunc may ſignifie Vltimum ſtatum, The laſt courſe of times, the time not of Nature, nor of Law, but of Grace; ſo we admit that addition in this Reſurrection too, Hora venit, & nunc eſt, The houre is comming, and now is, becauſe there are no other meanes to be hereafter inſtituted for the attaining of a happy Reſurrection, then thoſe that now are

E eſtabliſhed in the Church, eſpecially at a mans death, may we very properly ſay, Nunc eſt, Now is the Reſurrection come to him, not onely becauſe the laſt Judgement is involved in the firſt, (for that Judgment which paſſeth upon every man at his death, ſtands for ever without Repeal, or Appeal, or Error) but becauſe after the death of the Body, there is no more to be done with the Body, till the Reſurrection; for as we ſay of an Arrow, that it is over ſhot, it is gone, it is beyond the mark, though it be not come to the mark yet, becauſe there is no more to be done to it till it be; ſo we may ſay, that he that is come to death, is come to his Reſurrection, becauſe he hath not another ſtep to make, another foot to goe, another minute to count, till he be at the Reſurrection.

The Reſurrection then, being the Coronation of man, his Death, and lying downe in the

1 Joh. 2. 18.

2 Pet. 3. 8.

the grave, is his enthroning, his ſitting downe in that chayre, where he is to receive that Crown. As then the Martyrs, under the Altar, though in heaven, yet doe cry out for the Reſurrection; ſo let us, in this miſerable life, ſubmit our ſelves cheerfully to the hand of God, in death, ſince till that death we cannot have this Reſurrection, and the firſt thing that we ſhall doe after this death, is to riſe againe. To the child that is now borne, we may ſay, Hora venit, The day of his Reſurrection is comming; To him that is old, we may ſay, The hour is come; but to him that is dead, The minute is come, becauſe to him there are no more minutes till it doe come. A

Omnes. Miremini hoc, Marvail at this, at the deſcent of Gods love, He loves the Body of Man, And Miremini hoc, Mervaile at his ſpeed, He makes haſte to expreſſe this love, Hora venit, And then Miremini hoc, Marvaile at the Generality, it reaches to all, all that are in the Grave; All that are in the graves ſhall heare his voice, &c. God hath made the Body as a Houſe for the ſoule, till he call her out, and he hath made the Grave as a Houſe for the body, till he call it up. The miſery, and poore eſtate that Chriſt ſubmitted himſelfe unto for man, was not determined in that, That foxes had holes, but he no where to lay his head, while he lived; but he had no grave that he could claime, when he was dead. It is ſome diſcontinuance of the Communion of Saints, if I may not be buried with the Saints of God. Every man that hath not deveſted Humanity, hath a deſire to have his bones lie at reſt, and we cannot provide for that ſo well, any way, as to bury them in Conſecrated places, which are, in common entendment, ſafeſt from prophane violences. Even that reſpect, that his bones might lye at reſt, ſeems to have mov'd one Prophet, to enjoyne his Sons, to bury him, in the Sepulcher, where the other Prophet was buried. He knew that Ioſiah would burne the bones of all the other graves, upon the Altar of Bethel, as was prophecied; and he preſum'd that he would ſpare the bones of that Prophet, and ſo his bones ſhould be ſafe, if they were mingled with the other. God expreſſed his love to Moſes, in that particular, That he buried him; And, to deliver, and remove him, from the violence of any that lov'd him not, and ſo might diſhonor his memory, and from the ſuperſtition of any that over-lov'd him, and ſo might over-honour his memory, God buried him in ſecret. In more then one place doth David complaine, That there was none to bury Gods Saints; And the Dignity that is promiſed here in the Text, is appropriated to them, who are in the graves, who are buried. Deut. 34. 6.

But then, was that generall? Is it ſimply, plainly, literally of them, and them onely, who are in graves, who are buried? Shall none enjoy a Reſurrection, that have not enjoy'd a Grave? Still I ſay, it is a comfort to a dying man, it is an honour to his memory, it is a diſcharge of a duty in his friends, it is a piece of the Communion of Saints, to have a conſecrated grave: But the word here is, In monumentis, All that are in Monuments; that is, in Receptacles of Bodies, of what kind ſoever they be: whereſoever the hand of God layes up a dead Body, that place is the Receptacle, ſo the monument, ſo the grave of that Body. God keeps all the bones of the righteous, ſo that none of them are broken: Though they be trod to duſt in our ſight, they are intire in his, becauſe he can bid them be whole againe in an inſtant. Some Nations burnt their dead, there the fire is the grave; ſome drowned their dead, there the ſea is the grave; and ſome hung them up upon trees, and there the ayre is their grave: Some Nations eat their dead themſelves, and ſome maintained dogs to eat the dead; and as they called thoſe dogs, Canes Sepulchrales, Sepulchrall dogs, ſo thoſe men were ſepulchrall men, thoſe men and thoſe dogs were graves. Death and hell ſhall deliver up their dead, ſayes S. Iohn: That is, the whole ſtate, and manſion of the dead, ſhall be emptied: The ſtate of the dead is their grave, and upon all that are in this ſtate, ſhall the teſtimony of Gods love, to the body of man, fall; And that is the Generality, All that are in the grave, &c. D E

Herod. Strabo.

Apoc. 20. 13.

Audient. Our next ſtep is, The Inſtrument, the Means, by which, this, firſt ſo ſpeedy, and then ſo generall love of God, to man, to man in his loweſt part, his body, is accompliſhed unto him; Theſe, All theſe, All theſe that are in graves, in all theſe kinds of graves, ſhall heare his voice, and that is the Meanes. Firſt, whoſe voice? That is expreſſed immediately before, The Son of man. In the other Reſurrection, in that of the dead ſoule, ver. 25. there it is ſaid, The dead ſhall heare the voyce of the Son of God. In this, which is the Reſurrection to Judgement, it is The Son of man. The former Reſurrection (that of a ſinner to repentance by preaching) is wrought by a plaine, and ordinary meanes here in the Church; where

A where you doe but heare a man in a Pew, read prayers, and pronounce Abſolution, and a man in a Pulpit preach a Sermon, and a man at a Table conſecrate, and adminiſter a Sacrament; And becauſe all this, though it be the power of life, and the meanes of your ſpirituall reſurrection, is wrought by the Miniſtery of man, who might be contemptible in your eye, therefore the whole worke is referred to God, and not the ſon of man, but the Son of God, is ſaid to do it.

In this Reſurrection of the Text, which is a Reſurrection to Judgement, and to an account with God, that God whom we have diſpleaſed, exaſperated, violated, wounded in the whole courſe of our life, leſt we ſhould be terrified, and dejected at the preſence of that God, the whole worke is referred to the Son of Man, which hath himſelfe formerly felt all our infirmities, and hath had as ſad a ſoule at the approach of death, as bitter a Cup in the forme of Death, as heavy a feare of Gods forſaking him in the agony of
B death, as we can have: And for ſin it ſelf, I would not, I do not extenuate my ſin, but let me have fallen, not ſeven times a day, but ſeventy ſeven times a minute, yet what are my ſins, to all thoſe ſins that were upon Chriſt? The ſins of all men, and all women, and all children, the ſins of all Nations, all the Eaſt and Weſt, and all the North and South, the ſins of all times and ages, of Nature, of Law, of Grace, the ſins of all natures, ſins of the body, and ſins of the mind, the ſins of all growth, and all extentions, thoughts, and words, and acts, and habits, and delight, and glory, and contempt, and the very ſin of boaſting, nay of our belying our ſelves in ſin; All theſe ſins, paſt, preſent and future, were at once upon Chriſt, and in that depth of ſin, mine are but a drop to his Ocean; In that treaſure of ſin, mine are but ſingle money to his Talent; And therefore, that I might come with a holy reverence to his Ordinance, in this place, though it be but in the Miniſtery of man, that firſt Reſurrection is attributed to the Son of God, to give a digni-
C ty to that Miniſtery of man, which otherwiſe might have beene under-valued, that thereby we might have a conſolation, and a cheerefulneſſe towards it; It is He, that is, the Son of God, and the Son of man, Chriſt; which remembers us alſo, that all that belongs to the expreſſing of the Law of God to man, muſt be received by us, who profeſſe our ſelves Chriſtians, in, and by, and for, and through Chriſt.

We uſe to aſcribe the Creation to the Father, but the Father created by the Word, and his Word, is his Son, Chriſt; When he prepared the Heavens, I was there, (ſaies Chriſt, of himſelfe in the perſon of Wiſdome) and when he appointed the foundations of the earth, then was I by him, as one brought up with him; It is not, as one brought in to him, or brought in by him, but with him; one as old, that is, as eternall, as much God as he. We uſe to aſcribe Sanctification to the Holy Ghoſt; But the Holy Ghoſt ſanctifies in the Church, And the Church was purchaſed by the blood of Chriſt, and Chriſt remaines
D Head of the Church, uſque in conſummationem, till the end of the world. I looke upon every bleſſing that God affords me, and I conſider whether it be temporall, or ſpirituall; and that diſtinguiſhes the metall; the temporall is my ſilver, and the ſpirituall is my Gold; but then I looke againe upon the Inſcription, Cujus Imago, whoſe Image, whoſe inſcription it beares, and whoſe Name; and except I have it, in, and for, and by Chriſt Jeſus, Temporall, and Spirituall things too, are but imaginary, but illuſory ſhadows; for God convayes himſelfe to us, no other way, but in Chriſt. Prov. 8. 27.

The benefit then in our Text, the Reſurrection, is by him; but it is limited thus, It is by hearing him, They that are in their Graves ſhall heare, &c. So it is in the other Reſurrection too, the ſpirituall reſurrection. v. 25. There, they muſt heare him, that will live. In both reſurrections, That in the Church, now, by Grace, And that in the Grave hereafter, by Power, it is ſaid, They ſhall heare him. They ſhall, which ſeemes to imply a ne-E ceſſity, though not a coaction; But that neceſſity, not of equall force, not equally irreſiſtible in both: In the Grave, They ſhall; Though they be dead, and ſenſleſſe as the duſt, (for they are duſt it ſelfe) though they bring no concurrence, no cooperation, They ſhall heare, that is, They ſhall not chuſe but heare. In the other reſurrection, which is, in the Church, by Grace, in Gods Ordinance, They ſhall heare too, that is, There ſhall be a voice uttered ſo, as that they may heare, if they will, but not whether they will or no, as in the other caſe, in the grave. Therefore when God expreſſes his gathering of his Church, in this world, it is Sibilabo & congregabo, I will hiſſe, or chirpe for them, and ſo gather them: He whiſpers in the voyce of the Spirit, and he ſpeaks a little louder, in the voice of a man; Let the man be a Boanerges, a Son of thunder, never ſo powerfull a ſpeaker, yet Chriſtum. Zecha. 10. 8.

yet no thunder is heard over all the world. But for the voyce that ſhall be heard at the Reſurrection, He ſhall ſend his Angels, with a great ſound of a Trumpet; A great ſound, ſuch as may be made by a Trumpet, ſuch as an Angell, all his Angels can make in a Trumpet, and more then all that, The Lord himſelfe ſhall deſcend from Heaven, and that, with a ſhout, and with the voice of an Archangel, that is, ſaies S. Ambroſe, of Chriſt himſelfe, And in the Trumpet of God, that is alſo, Chriſt himſelfe.

1 Theſ. 4. 16.

So then, you have the Perſon, Chriſt; The meanes, A Voyce, And the powerfulneſſe of that voyce, in the Name of an Archangell, which is named but once more in all the Scriptures: And therefore, let no man, that hath an holy anhelation and panting after the Reſurrection, ſuſpect that he ſhall ſleepe in the duſt, for ever; for, this is a voyce, that will be heard, he muſt riſe. Let no man, who becauſe he hath made his courſe of life like a beaſt, would therefore be content his ſtate in death might be like a beaſt too, hope that he ſhall ſleepe in the duſt, for ever, for this is a voice, that muſt be heard, And all that heare ſhall come forth, they that have done good, &c.

Procedent. He ſhall come forth; even he that hath done ill, and would not, ſhall come forth. You may have ſeene morall men, you may have ſeen impious men, go in confidently enough: not afrighted with death, not terrified with a grave; but when you ſhall ſee them come forth againe, you ſhall ſee them in another complexion. That man that dyed ſo, with that confidence, thought death his end; It ends his ſeventy yeares, but it begins his ſeventy millions of generations of torments, even to his body, and he never thought of that: Indeed, Iudicii, niſi qui vitæ æternæ prædeſtinatus eſt, non poteſt reminiſci, ſaies S. Ambroſe, No man can, no man dares thinke upon the laſt Judgement, but he that can thinke upon it with comfort, he that is predeſtinated to eternall life. Even the beſt, are ſometimes ſhaked with the conſideration of the Reſurrection, becauſe it is impoſſible to ſeparate the conſideration of the Reſurrection, from the conſideration of the Judgement; and the terrors of that may abate the joy of the other: Sive comedam ſive bibo, ſaies S. Hierom, Whether I eate, or drink, ſtill me thinks I heare this ſound, Surgite mortui, & venite ad Iudicium, Ariſe you dead, and come to Judgement: When it cals me up from death, I am glad, when it cals me to Judgement, that impaires my joy. Can I thinke that God will not take a ſtrict account; or, can I be without feare, if I thinke he will? Non expaveſcere requiſiturum eſt dicere, non requiret, is excellently ſaid by S. Bernard, If I can put off all feare of that Judgement, I have put off all imagination, that any ſuch Judgement ſhall be. But, when I begin this feare, in this life, here, I end this feare, in my death, and paſſe away cheerefully: But the wicked begin this feare, when the Trumpet ſounds to the Reſurrection, and then ſhall never end it; but, as a man condemned to be halfe hang'd, and then quartered, hath a fearfull addition in his quartering after, and yet had no eaſe in his hanging before; ſo they that have done ill, when they have had their hanging, when they have ſuffered in ſoule, the torments of Hell, from the day of their death, to the day of Judgement, ſhall come to that day with feare, as to an addition to that, which yet, was infinite before. And therefore the vulgat Edition hath rendred this well, Procedent, They ſhall proceed, they ſhall go farther and farther in torment.

Concluſio. But this is not the object of our ſpeculation, the ſubject of our meditation, now: we propoſed this Text, for the Contemplation of Gods love to man, and therefore we rather comfort our ſelves with that branch, and refreſh our ſelves with the ſhadow of that, That they who have done good, ſhall come forth unto the Reſurrection of life. Alas, the others ſhall live as long as they; Lucifer is as immortall as Michael, and Iudas as immortall as S. Peter: But Vita damnatorum, mors eſt, That which we call immortality in the damned, is but a continuall dying; howſoever it muſt be called life, it hath all the qualities of death, ſaving the eaſe, and the end, which death hath, and damnation hath not. They muſt come forth; they that have done evill, muſt do ſo too: Neither can ſtay in their houſe, their grave; for, their houſe (though that houſe ſhould be the ſea) ſhall be burnt downe; all the world diſſolv'd with fire. But then, They who have done evill, ſhall paſſe from that fire, into a farther heat, without light, They who have done good, into a farther light, without heat.

Auguſt.

But fix upon the Conditions, and performe them; They muſt have done Good; To have knowne Good, to have beleeved it, to have intended it, nay to have preached it to others, will not ſerve, They muſt have done good. They muſt be rooted in faith, and then bring forth fruit, and fruit in ſeaſon; and then is the ſeaſon of doing good, when another needs that

A that good at thy hands. God gives the evening raine, but he gave the morning rain before; A good man gives at his death, but he gives in his life time too. To them belongs this Reſurrection of the body to life; upon which, ſince our Text inclines us to marvell rather then to diſcourſe, I will not venture to ſay with David, Narrabo omnia mirabilia tua, I will ſhew all thy wondrous works, (an Angels tongue could not ſhew them) but I will ſay with him, Mementote mirabilium, Remember the marvellous works he hath done, And by that, God will open your eyes, that you may behold the wondrous things that he will do: Remember with thankfulneſſe the ſeverall reſurrections that he hath given you; from ſuperſtition and ignorance, in which, you, in your Fathers lay dead; from ſin, and a love of ſin, in which, you, in the dayes of your youth, lay dead; from ſadneſſe, and dejection of ſpirit, in which, you, in your worldly croſſes, or ſpirituall tentations, lay dead; And aſſure your ſelf, that that God that loves to perfect his own works, when you ſhall lye B dead in your graves, will give you that Reſurrection to life, which he hath promiſed to all them that do good, and will extend to all them, who having done evill, do yet truly repent the evill they have done.

SERMON XXI.

The firſt Sermon upon this Text, Preached at S. Pauls, in the Evening, upon Eaſter-day. 1626.

1 COR. 15. 29.

Elſe what ſhall they do that are baptized for dead? If the dead riſe not at all, why are they then baptized for dead?

DIT Dominus qui feſtum Domini unum putat diem, ſayes Origen; God hates that man that thinks any of his Holy dayes laſt but one day; That is, that never thinks of a Reſurrection, but upon Eaſter-day. I have therefore propoſed words unto you, which will not be determined this day; That ſo, when at any other time, we return to the handling of them, we may alſo return to D the meditation of the Reſurrection. To which we may beſt give a beginning this day, in which we celebrate the Reſurrection of our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus: And in his one Reſurrection, all thoſe ſeverall kinds of Reſurrections which appertain unto us, becauſe howſoever theſe words have received divers good expoſitions from divers good Expoſitors, and received one perverſe expoſition from our adverſaries in the Romane Church, who have detorted and deflected them, to the maintenance of their Purgatory, yet all agree, that theſe words are an argument for the Reſurrection, and therefore proper to this day. And yet this day we ſhall not ſo much inquire, wherein, and in what ſenſe the words are an argument of the Reſurrection, as enjoy the aſſurance that they are ſo; not ſo much diſtribute the Text into an explication of the particular words (which is, as the Mintage and Coyning of gold into ſeverall leſſer pieces) as to lay up the whole wedge, and ingot of Gold all at once in you, that is, the precious aſſurance of your glo- E rious Reſurrection.

In eſtabliſhing whereof, we ſhall this day, make but this ſhort paſſage, by theſe two ſteps: Glory in the end, And Grace in the way; The Glory of our bodies, in the laſt Reſurrection then, And the Grace upon our ſouls, in their preſent Reſurrection now. For as we do not dig for gold meerly and only for treaſure, but to diſpenſe and iſſue it alſo, for preſent proviſion and uſe, not only for the future, but for the preſent too; So we doe not gather the doctrine of the Reſurrection only for that dignity which the body ſhall receive in the Triumphant, but alſo for the conſolation which thereby our ſoules may receive in the Militant Church. And therefore, as in our firſt part, which will be, By what meanes the knowledge and aſſurance of the Reſurrection of the body accrues to us, Diviſio.

us, we ſhall ſee, that though it be preſented by Reaſon before, and illuſtrated by Reaſon after, yet the roote and foundation thereof is in Faith; though Reaſon may chafe the wax, yet Faith imprints the ſeale, (for the Reſurrection is not a concluſion out of naturall Reaſon, but it is an article of ſupernaturall Faith; and though you aſſent to me now, ſpeaking of the Reſurrection, yet that is not out of my Logick, nor out of my Rhetorique, but out of that Character, and Ordinance which God hath imprinted in me, in the power and efficacy whereof, I ſpeak unto you, as often as I ſpeak out of this place.) As, I ſay we determine our firſt part in this, How the aſſurance of this Reſurrection accrues to us, ſo when we deſcend to our ſecond part, That is the conſolation which we receive whileſt we are In via, here upon our way in this world, out of the contemplation of that Reſurrection to glory, which we ſhall have In patria, at home in heaven, and how theſe two Reſurrections are arguments and evidences of one another, we ſhall look upon ſome correſpondencies, and reſemblances between naturall death, and ſpirituall death by ſin, and between the glorious Reſurrection of the body, and the gracious Reſurrection of the ſoule, that ſo having brought bodily death and bodily Reſurrection, and ſpirituall death and ſpirituall Reſurrection, by their compariſon into your conſideration, you may anon depart ſomewhat the better edified in both, and ſo enjoy your preſent Reſurrection of the ſoule, by Grace, with more certainty, and expect the future Reſurrection of the body to glory, with the more alacrity and chearfulneſſe. A B

1. Part. Though therefore we may hereafter take juſt occaſion of entring into a war, in vindicating and redeeming theſe words, ſeaſed and ſeduced by our adverſaries, to teſtifie for their Purgatory, yet this day being a day of peace and reconciliation with God and man, we begin with peace, with that wherein all agree, That theſe words (Elſe what ſhall they do that are baptized for dead? If the dead riſe not at all, why are they baptized for dead?) C muſt neceſſarily receive ſuch an Expoſition, as muſt be an argument for the Reſurrection; This baptiſme pro mortuis, for dead, muſt be ſuch a baptiſme as muſt prove that, the Reſurrection. For, that the Apoſtle repeats twice in theſe few words; Elſe, (ſayes he) that is, if there be no Reſurrection, why are men thus baptized? And again, if the dead riſe not, why are men thus baptized? Indeed the whole Chapter is a continuall argument for the Reſurrection; from the beginning thereof to the 35. ver. he handles the An ſit, whether there be a Reſurrection, or no; For, if that be denyed, or doubted in the roote, in the perſon of Chriſt, whether he be riſen or no, the whole frame of our religion fals, and every man will be apt (and juſtly apt) to ask that queſtion which the Indian King asked, when he had been catechized ſo far in the articles of our Chriſtian religion, as to come to the ſuffered, and crucified, and dead, and buried, impatient of proceeding any farther, and ſo loſing the conſolation of the Reſurrection, he asked only, Is your God dead, and buried? then let me return to the worſhip of the Sun, for I am ſure the Sun will not die; If Chriſt be dead and buried, that is, continue in the ſtate of death, and of the grave, without a Reſurrection, where ſhall a Chriſtian look for life? Therefore the Apoſtle handles, and eſtabliſhes that firſt, that aſſurance, A Reſurrection there is. D

From thence he raiſes and purſues a ſecond queſtion De modo; But ſome man will ſay, ſayes he, How are the dead raiſed up, and with what body come they forth? And in theſe queſtions, De modo, there is more exerciſe of reaſon and of diſcourſe: for, many times, The matter is matter of faith, when the manner is not ſo, but conſiderable, and triable by reaſon; Many times, for the matter, we are all bound, and bound upon ſalvation, to think alike; But for the manner, we may think diverſly, without forfeiture of ſalvation, or impeachment of diſcretion; For, he is not preſently an indiſcreet man, that differs in opinion from another man that is diſcreet, in things that fall under opinion.

Gerſon. Abſit ſuperſtitio, hoc eſt ſuperflua religio, ſayes a moderate man of the Romane Church; E This is truly ſuperſtition, to bring more under the neceſſity of being beleeved, then God hath brought in his Scriptures; ſuperfluous religion, ſayes he, is ſuperſtition; Remove that, and then (as he addes there) Contradictoria, quorum utrumq; probabile, credi poſſunt, Where two contrary opinions are both probable, they may be embraced, and beleeved by two men, and thoſe two be both learned, and diſcreet, and pious, and zealous men. And this conſideration ſhould keep men from that precipitation, of imprinting the odious and ſcandalous names of Sects, or Sectaries upon other men who may differ from them, and from others with them, in ſome opinions. Probability leads me in my aſſent, and I think thus; Let me allow another man his probability too, and let him think his way,

A way, in things that are not fundamentall. They that do not beleeve alike, in all circumſtances of the manner of the Reſurrection, may all, by Gods goodneſſe, meet there, and have their parts in the glory thereof, if their own uncharitableneſſe do not hinder them: And he that may have been in the right opinion, may ſooner miſſe heaven, then he that was in the wrong, if he come uncharitably to condemne or contemne the other: for, in ſuch caſes, humility, and love of peace, may, in the ſight of God, excuſe and recompence many errours, and miſtakings.

And after theſe, of the Matter, of the Manner of the Reſurrection, the Apoſtle proceeds to a third queſtion, of their ſtate and condition, whom Chriſt ſhall finde alive upon Earth, at his ſecond comming; and of them he ſayes onely this, Ecce, myſterium vobis dico, Behold, I tell you a myſtery, a ſecret, we ſhall not all ſleep, that is, not dye ſo, as that we ſhall reſt any time in the grave, but we ſhall all be changed, that is, receive ſuch an immutation, as that we ſhall have a ſudden diſſolution of body and ſoul, which is a true death, and a ſudden re-union of body and ſoule, which is a true reſurrection, in an inſtant, in the twinkling of an eye. Thus carefull, and thus particular is the Apoſtle, that the knowledge of the reſurrection might be derived unto us.

Now of theſe three queſtions, which he raiſes and purſues; firſt, whether there be a Reſurrection, then what manner of Reſurrection, and then what kinde of Reſu rrection they ſhall have that live to the day of Judgement, our Text enters into the firſt; For, for the firſt, That a reſurrection there is, the Apoſtle opens ſeverall Topiques, to prove it; One is, from our Head, and Patterne, and Example, Chriſt Jeſus: For ſo he argues firſt, If the dead be not raiſed, then Chriſt is not raiſed; As ſure as the head is, ſo ſure the body is raiſed. And then another Topique, from whence he produces arguments, is, the abſurd conſequences, and illations, that would follow, if there were no reſurrection. Of that kinde one is, Nos miſerrimi, If in this life onely we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men the moſt miſerable; Why? becauſe in this life we ſuffer perſecution for this profeſſion. And another is, Edamus & bibamus, Let us eate and drinke, for to morrow wee ſhall dye; What needs this abſtinence, and this ſevere denying our ſelves, the conveniencies of this life, if all end in this life? And laſtly, in the ſame kinde, followes this Text, Si omnino mortui non excitentur, If the dead riſe not at all, why are they baptized for dead? And by all theſe wayes doth the Apoſtle convay this knowledge of the Reſurrection.

V. 16.

V. 19.

V. 32.

But would all theſe wayes ſerve? would all this ſatisfie that Inquiſition which wee have brought, how this aſſurance of the Reſurrection accrues to us? Would any of theſe reaſons, or would all theſe reaſons convince a man, who were not at all prepoſſeſſed, and preoccupated with a beliefe of the reſurrection, with an aſſurance thereof? The reſurrection was alwaies a myſtery in it ſelfe; Sacrum ſecretum, a holy ſecret, and above the ſearch of reaſon. For there are ſecrets and myſteries of two kindes, as the Schoole preſents them; ſome things are ſo, Quia quædam interpoſita, Becauſe, though the thing be near enough unto me, yet ſomthing is interpoſed between me, and it, and ſo I cannot ſee it: And ſome things are ſo, Quia longè ſepoſita, becauſe they are at ſo remote a diſtance, as that, though nothing be interpoſed, yet my ſight cannot extend to them. In the firſt ſenſe, the Sacraments are myſteries, becauſe though the grace therein bee neare mee, yet there is Velamen interpoſitum, there is a viſible figure, a ſenſible ſigne, and ſeale, between me, and that grace, which is exhibited to me in the Sacrament: In the ſecond ſenſe, the reſurrection is a myſtery, becauſe it is ſo farre removed, as that it concernes our ſtate and condition in the next world; For man ſleepeth, and riſeth not; hee ſhall not wake againe, nor be raiſed from his ſleep, till the heavens be no more; that is, not till the diſſolution of all.

Job. 14. 12.

So then, the knowledge of the reſurrection in it ſelfe, is a myſtery, removed out of the Spheare, and latitude of reaſon; And, (to conſider this remoteneſſe farther) though the knowledge of Chriſts Reſurrection, be nearer us, then our owne, (for firſt we know his, becauſe from his we argue and conclude our owne, as the Apoſtle inſtitutes his argument, If the dead riſe not, Chriſt is not riſen) yet even the Reſurrection of Chriſt, was ſo far from being cleare (and obvious to the beſt, and the beſt illumined underſtandings, as that, though Chriſt himſelfe had ſpoken often of his Reſurrection, to his Diſciples, and Apoſtles, yet they did not clearly, throughly, (ſcarce at all) underſtand his Reſurrection. When Chriſt ſaid to the Jews promiſcuouſly, Solvite Templum hoc, Deſtroy this Temple, and in three dayes I will raiſe it; I wonder not that they, blinded with their own malice, malice, discerned no resurrection in that saying, but applied it to that Temple, which was forty sixe yeares in building; For, till the resurrection was really accomplished, and actually performed, the Apostles themselves understood not the Resurrection. Then, when Christ was risen from the dead, and that those two great Apostles, Peter, and Iohn, had been at the Sepulchre, and received from thence so much evidence, as convinced them, and prevailed upon them, then, and not till then, they began to understand the re-

V. 16.

John 20.9. surrection; for, till then, (sayes the Text expresly there) they knew not the Scriptures, that he must rise from the dead.

Etiam post Resurrectionem. And truly, if we take a holy liberty, (as piously we may) to consider Christs bodily actions after his resurrection, they were not such, as without admitting any opposition, might induce a necessity of confessing a resurrection. For, though he exhibited himself to their eyes to be seene, and to their eares to be heard, and to their fingers to be felt, though he eate with them, and did many other actions of a living body, yet, as the Angels in the old Testament, did the like actions, in those bodies which they had assumed; so might Christ have done all these, in such a body, though that which was buried in the Sepulchre, had had no resurrection.

Acts 1.3. It is true, that Christ confirmed his Resurrection, Multis argumentis, as the vulgat reads that place; with many infallible tokens, sayes our former Translation, with many infallible proofes, sayes our later; But still all these arguments, and tokens, and proofes wrought by way of confirmation, something was otherwise imprinted in them, and established by a former apprehension of faith, and these arguments, and tokens, and proofes confirmed it. For, the reasons for the resurrection, doe not convince a naturall man at all, neither doe they so convince a Christian, but that there is more left to his faith, and he beleeves something beyond and above his reason.

Resurrectio nostra, mysterium. The resurrection in it self, Christs Resurrection, though it be clearer then ours, Christs Resurrection, even after it was actually accomplished, was still a mystery, out of the compasse of reason; And then, as it was above our reason, so, howsoever it be our proofe, and our patterne for our resurrection, yet it is above our imitation. For our resurrection shall not be like his. Omnes alii suscitati, Christus solus resurrexit, sayes S. Bernard; All we shall be raised from the dead, onely Christ arose from the dead. We shall be raised by a power working upon us, he rose by a power inherent, and resident in himselfe. And yet, though in this respect, our resurrection be more open to the proofe of reason, then the resurrection of Christ, (for that which hath least miracle in it, is most open to reason; and therefore a naturall man would easilier beleeve that God might raise a dead man, then that a dead man should be God, and so able to raise himselfe, which was Christs case, for the God-head of Christ was as much united to his dead body in the grave, as it was to his soule in Paradise, or to his whole person consisting of body and soule, before, or after his death and resurrection) Though, in this respect, I say, our resurrection be more open to reason, because it hath lesse of the miracle in it, yet when we come to assigne reasons, even for our resurrection, (as we see Athanagoras hath undertaken, with a great deale of wit, and learning, and confidence, in his Apology for the Christians, to the Emperour, within 155. yeares after Christ; and the Schoole-men make account, that they have brought it nearer to the understanding, nay even to the very sense, by producing some such things, as even in nature, doe not only resemble, but (as they apprehend) evict a resurrection) yet when all is done, and all the reasons of Athenagoras, and the Schoole, and of S. Paul himselfe, are waighed, they determine all in this, that they are faire, and pregnant, and convenient illustrations of that which was beleeved before; and that they have force, and power to encline to an assent, and to create and beget such a probability, as a discreet, and sad, and constant man might rest in, and submit to. But yet, we shall finde also, that though no man may speak a word, or conceive a thought against the resurrection, because for the matter, we are absolutely and expresly concluded by the Scriptures, yet a man may speak probably, and dangerously against any particular argument, that is produced for the resurrection. We beleeve it immediately, intirely, chearfully, undisputably, because we see it expresly delivered by the Holy Ghost; And we embrace thankfully, that sweetnesse, and that fulnesse of that blessed Spirit, that as he laies an obligation upon our faith, by delivering the article positively to us, so he is also pleased to accompany that Article, with reasons and arguments proportionable to our reason and understanding: for though those reasons do not so conclude us, as that nothing

A thing might be ſaid to the contrary, or nothing doubted after, yet the Holy Ghoſt having firſt begotten the faith of this Article, Per ea augeſcit fides, & pingueſcit, (as Luther ſpeaks in another caſe) By thoſe reaſons and arguments, and illuſtrations, that faith is nouriſhed and maintained in a good habitude and conſtitution.

Argumenta Apoſtoli.

And of that kind are all the reaſons brought by S. Paul here; The matter is poſitively delivered by him, and ſo apprehended by us, and his reaſons (as we ſaid before) iſſue out of two Topiques; Be pleaſed to looke upon both. The firſt is our patterne, Chriſt Jeſus: He is riſen, therefore we ſhall. In which, though I have a faire illuſtration and conſolation in that, The Head is riſen, therefore the Body ſhall, yet this reaches not to make my Reſurrection like his, for I ſhall not riſe as he did. And then from his other Topique, his reaſons riſe thus: If there be no Reſurrection, we that ſuffer thus much for the profeſſion of Chriſt, are the miſerableſt men in the world. Why ſo? have not all Philoſophers had B Scholars, and all Heretiques Diſciples, and all great Men flatterers, and every private man affections? And hath there not been as much ſuffered by occaſion of theſe, as S. Paul argues upon here, and yet no imagination, no expectation of a reſurrection? Leave out the conſideration of Philoſophers, many of which ſuffered more then the Turks doe, and yet the Turks ſuffer infinitely more, in their Mortifications, then the Papiſts doe; Leave out the Heretiques, which were ſo hungry of ſuffering, that if they could not provoke others to kill them, they would kill themſelves; Leave out the preſſures of our own affections, and concupiſcencies, and yet the covetous man is in a continuall ſtarving, and the licentious man in a continuall Conſumption; Take onely into your conſideration, the miſerable vexation of the flatterer, and humourer, and dependant upon great perſons, that their time is not their owne, nor their words their owne; their joyes are not their owne, nay their ſorrowes are not their owne; they might not ſmile if they C would, nor they may not ſigh when they would, they muſt doe all according to anothers mind, and yet they muſt not know his minde; conſider this, and you cannot ſay, but that there is as much ſuffered in the world, as this upon which S. Paul argues, by them who place not their conſolation, nor their retribution in the hope of a reſurrection. He argues farther, Edamus & bibamus, If there be no reſurrection, let us diſſolve our ſelves into the pleaſures of this world, and enjoy them; Why ſo too? Have we not ſtories full of exemplar men, that might be our patterns for ſobriety, and continency, and denying themſelves the ſweetneſſes of this life, and yet never placed Conſolation, nor Retribution upon a Reſurrection? Would not S. Pauls own Pondus gloriæ, That there is an exceeding waight of eternall glory attending our afflictions, ſerve our turne, though that were determined in the ſalvation of the ſoule, though there were no reſurrection of the body? It is ſtrongly and wiſely ſaid by Aquinas, Derogant fidei Chriſtianæ rationes non cogentes; D To offer reaſons for any Article of faith, which will not convince a man therein, derogates from the dignity of that Article. Therefore we muſt conſider S. Pauls reaſons as they were intended; to Chriſtians, that had received the Article of the Reſurrection into their faith before; And then, as God gave Adam a body immediately from himſelf, but then maintained and nouriſhed that body by other meanes; ſo the holy Ghoſt by S. Paul gives the article of the Reſurrection to our faith poſitively, and then enables us to declare to our own conſciences, and to other mens underſtandings, that we beleeve no impoſſible thing, in beleeving the Reſurrection: for as it is the candle that lights me, but yet I take a lanthorne to defend that candle from the wind; ſo my faith aſſures me of the Reſurrection, but theſe reaſons and illuſtrations aſſiſt that faith. And ſo we have done with our firſt part, How this aſſurance accrues unto us, and paſſe in order to the other, The conſolation which we have from this reſurrection of the body, not onely in it E ſelfe, but as it gives us a ſenſe of the ſpirituall reſurrection of our ſoules from ſinne, by Grace.

2. Part.

We are aſſured then of a Reſurrection, and we ſee how that aſſurance growes. But of what? Of all, Body and ſoule too; For, Quod cadit, reſurgit, ſayes S. Hierome, All that is falne, receives a reſurrection; and that is ſuppoſitum, ſayes the Schoole, that is, The perſon, the whole man, not taken in pieces, ſoule alone, or body alone, but both. For as Damaſcen expreſſes the ſame that S. Hierome intends, Reſurrectio eſt ejus quod cecidit iterata ſurrectio, The Reſurrection is a new riſing of that which fell, and Man fell. A man is not ſaved, a ſinner is not redeemed, I am not received into heaven, if my body be left out; The ſoule and the body concurred to the making of a ſinner, and body and ſoule muſt must concur to the making of a Saint. So it is in the laſt Reſurrection, ſo it is in the firſt, which we conſider now, by Grace from ſin; And therefore we receive into compariſon, Triplicem caſum, a threefold fall, and a threefold reſurrection, as in the naturall and bodily death, ſo in the ſpirituall death of the ſoule alſo: For firſt, in naturall death, there is Caſus in ſeparationem, The man, the perſon falls into a ſeparation, a divorce of body and ſoul; and the reſurrection from this fall is by Re-union, the ſoule and body are re-united at the laſt day. A ſecond fall in naturall death, is Caſus in diſſolutionem, The dead body falls by putrifaction into a diſſolution, into atoms and graines of duſt; and the reſurrection from this fall, is by Re-efformation: God ſhall re-compact and re-compile thoſe atoms and graines of duſt, into that Body, which was before: And then a third fall in naturall death, is Caſus in Diſperſionem, This man being falne into a divorce of body and ſoule, this body being falne into a diſſolution of duſt, this duſt falls into a diſperſion, and is ſcattered unſenſibly, undiſcernibly upon the face of the earth; and the reſurrection from this death, is by way of Re-collection; God ſhall recall and re-collect all theſe Atoms, and grains of duſt, and re-compact that body, and re-unite that ſoule, and ſo that reſurrection is accompliſhed: And theſe three falls, Into a Divorce, into a Separation, into a Diſperſion; And theſe three Reſurrections, By Re-union, by Re-efformation, by Re-collecting, we ſhall alſo finde in our preſent ſtate, The ſpirituall death of the ſoule by ſinne.

Firſt then, the firſt fall in the ſpirituall death, is the divorce of body and ſoule; That whereas God hath made the body to be the Organ of the ſoule, and the ſoule to be the breath of that Organ, and bound them to a mutuall relation to one another, Man ſometimes withdrawes the ſoule from the body, by neglecting the duties of this life, for imaginary ſpeculations; and oftner withdrawes the body from the ſoule, which ſhould be ſubject to the ſoule, but does maintain a war; and ſhould be a wife to the ſoule, and does ſtand out in a divorce.

Reſurrectio à caſu in ſeparationem.

Now the Reſurrection, from this firſt fall into a Divorce, is, ſeriouſly and wiſely, that is, both piouſly and civilly to conſider, that Man is not a ſoule alone, but a body too; That man is not placed in this world onely for ſpeculation; He is not ſent into this world to live out of it, but to live in it; Adam was not put into Paradiſe, onely in that Paradiſe to contemplate the future Paradiſe, but to dreſſe and to keep the preſent; God did not breathe a ſoule towards him, but into him; Not in an obſeſſion, but a poſſeſſion; Not to travaile for knowledge abroad, but to direct him by counſell at home; Not for extaſies, but for an inherence; for when it was come to that, in S. Paul, we ſee it is called a rapture, he was not in his proper ſtation, nor his proper motion; He was tranſported into the third heaven: but as long as we are in our dwelling upon earth, though we muſt love God with all our ſoule, yet it is not with our ſoule alone; Our body alſo muſt teſtifie and expreſſe our love, not onely in a reverentiall humiliation thereof, in the diſpoſitions, and poſtures, and motions, and actions of the body, when we preſent our ſelves at Gods Service, in his houſe, but in the diſcharge of our bodily duties, and the ſociable offices of our callings, towards one another: Not to run away from that Service of God, by hiding our ſelves in a ſuperſtitious Monaſtery, or in a ſecular Monaſtery, in our owne houſe, by an unprofitable retiredneſſe, and abſenting our ſelves from the neceſſary buſineſſes of this world: Not to avoid a Calling, by taking none: Not to make void a Calling, by neglecting the due offices thereof. In a word, To underſtand, and to performe in the beſt meaſure we can, the duties of the body and of the ſoule, this is the reſurrection from the firſt fall, The fall into a divorce of body and ſoule. And for the advancing of this knowledge, and the facilitating of this performance of theſe duties, be pleaſed a little to ſtop upon the conſideration of both, both of Spirituall and Divine, and then of ſecular and ſociable duties, ſo far as concerns this ſubject in hand.

Firſt for the duties of the ſoule, God was never out of Chriſts ſight; He was alwaies with him, alwaies within him, alwaies he himſelf; yet Chriſt, at ſome times, applyed himſelf in a nearer diſtance, and ſtricter way of prayer to God then at other times. Chriſts whole life was a continuall abſtinence, a perpetuall ſobriety, yet Chriſt propoſed, and proportioned a certaine time, and a certaine number of dayes for a particular faſt, upon particular occaſion. This is the harmony, this is the reſurrection of a Chriſtian, in this reſpect, That his ſoule be alwayes ſo fixed upon God, as that he doe nothing but with relation to his glory principally, and habitually; That he think of God, at all times, but that,

A that, beſides that, he ſepoſe ſome times, to think of nothing but God: That he pray continually, ſo far, as to ſay nothing, to wiſh nothing, that he would not be content God ſhould heare, but that, beſides that, he ſepoſe certaine fixed times for private prayer in his chamber, and for publique prayer in the Congregation. For, though it be no where expreſly written, that Chriſt did pray in the Congregation, or in company, yet, all that Chriſt did, is not written; and it is written, that he went often into the Temples, and into the Synagogues; and it is written, that even the Phariſee, and the Publican, that went to thoſe places, went thither to pray. But howſoever, Chriſt was never ſo alone, but that if he were not in the Church, the Church was in him; All Chriſtians were in him, as all Men were in Adam.

This then is our firſt Reſurrection, for the duty that belongs to the ſoule, That the ſoule doe at all times think upon God, and at ſome times think upon nothing but him; Officium corporis.

B And for that, which in this reſpect belongs to the body, That we neither enlarge, and pamper it ſo, nor ſo adorne and paint it, as though the ſoule required a ſpacious, and ſpecious palace to dwell in. Of that exceſſe, Porphyrie, who loved not Chriſt nor Chriſtians, ſaid well, out of meer Morality, That this enormous fatning and enlarging our bodies by exceſſive diet, was but a ſhoveling of more and more fat earth upon our ſoules to bury them deeper: Dum corpus augemus, mortaliores efficimur, ſayes he, The more we grow, the more mortall we make our ſelves, and the greater ſacrifice we provide for death, when we gather ſo much fleſh: with that elegancy ſpeaks he, ſpeaking out of Nature, and with this ſimplicity and homelineſſe ſpeaks S. Hierom, ſpeaking out of Grace, Qui Chriſtum deſiderat, & illo pane veſcitur, de quàm precioſis cibis ſtercus conficiat, non quærit, He that can relliſh Chriſt, and feed upon that Bread of life, will not be ſo diligent to make precious dung, and curious excrements, to ſpend his purſe, or his wit, in that,

C which being taken into him, muſt paſſe by ſo ignoble a way from him.

The fleſh that God hath given us, is affliction enough; but the fleſh that the devill gives us, is affliction upon affliction; and to that, there belongs a woe. Per tenuitatem aſſimilamur Deo, ſaies the ſame Author; The attenuation, the ſlenderneſſe, the deliverance of the body from the encumbrance of much fleſh, gives us ſome aſſimilation, ſome conformity to God, and his Angels; The leſſe fleſh we carry, the liker we are to them, who have none: That is ſtill, the leſſe fleſh of our owne making: for, for that fleſh, which God, and his inſtrument, Nature, hath given us, in what meaſure, or proportion ſoever, that does not oppreſſe us, to this purpoſe, neither ſhall that be laid to our charge; but the fleſh that we have built up by curious diet, by meats of provocation, and witty ſawces, or by a ſlothfull and drowſie negligence of the works of our calling. All fleſh is ſinfull fleſh; ſinfull ſo, as that it is the mother of ſin, it occaſions ſin, naturall fleſh is ſo; But

D this artificiall fleſh of our owne making, is ſinfull ſo, as that it is alſo the daughter of ſin; It is, indeed, the puniſhment of former ſins, and the occaſion of future.

The ſoule then requires not ſo large, ſo vaſt a houſe of ſinfull fleſh, to dwell in: But yet on the other ſide, we may not by inordinate abſtinencies, by indiſcreet faſtings, by inhumane flagellations, by unnaturall macerations, and ſuch Diſciplines, as God doth not command, nor authorize, ſo wither, and ſhrinke, and contract the body, as though the ſoule were ſent into it, as into a priſon, or into fetters, and manacles, to wring, and pinch, and torture it. Nihil intereſt, ſaies S. Hierome, It is all one whether thou kill thy ſelfe at one blow, or be long in doing it, if thou do it. All one, whether thou fall upon thine own ſword, or ſterve thy ſelfe with ſuch a faſting, as thou diſcerneſt to induce that effect: for, ſaies he, Deſcendit a dignitate viri, & notas inſaniæ incurrit. He departs from that dignity, which God hath imprinted in man, in giving him the uſe, and the dominion over his crea- Macerationes corporis.

E tures, and he gives the world juſt occaſion to thinke him mad; And, as Tertullian adds; Reſpuit datorem, qui datum deſerit, He that does not uſe a benefit, reproaches the Benefactor, and he is ungratefull to God, that does not accept at his hands the uſe of his bleſſings. Therefore is it accepted as a good interpretation, which is made of Chriſts determining his faſt in forty daies, Ne ſui homicida videretur, Leſt if he continued it longer, he might have ſeemed to have killed himſelfe, by being the author of his owne death; And ſo do they interpret aright his Eſuriit, That then he began to be hungry, that he began to languiſh, to faint, to finde a detriment in his body; for elſe, a faſting when a man is not hungry, is no faſting; but then he gave over faſting, when he found the ſtate of his body empaired by faſting.

And therefore thoſe mad doctrines, (ſo S. Hierom cals them, Notas inſaniæ habent) yea thoſe deviliſh doctrines, (ſo S. Paul cals them) that forbid certaine meats, and that make un-commanded macerations of the body, meritorious, that upon a ſuppoſititious ſtory, of an Ermit that lived 22. yeares, without eating any thing at all, And upon an impertinent example of their S. Francis, that kept three Lents in the yeare, which they extoll, and magnifie in S. Francis, and S. Hierom condemned, and deteſted in the Montaniſts, who did ſo too, have built up thoſe Carthuſian Rules, That though it appeare that that, and nothing but that, would ſave the patients life, yet he may not eat fleſh, that is a Carthuſian, And have brought into eſtimation thoſe Apocryphall and baſtardly Canons which they father upon the Apoſtles, That a man muſt rather ſtarve, then receive food from the hand of a perſon excommunicate, or otherwiſe detected of any mortall ſin; And that all that can be done with the almes of ſuch a perſon, is, that it be ſpent in wood and coales and other fuell, that ſo, (as the ſubtile philoſophy of their Canon is) it may be burnt, and conſumed by fire; for, to ſave a mans life, it muſt not be ſpent upon meat or drink, or ſuch ſuſtentation: Theſe Doctrines are not the Doctrines of this Reſurrection, by which, man conſidered in Compoſito, as he conſiſts of ſoule and body, by a ſober and temperate life, makes his body obſequious, and ſerviceable to his ſoule, but yet leaves his ſoule a body to worke in, and an Organ to praiſe God upon, both in a devout humiliation of his body, in Gods ſervice, and in a bodily performance of the duties of ſome calling; for this is our firſt Reſurrection A caſu ſeparationis, from having falne into a ſeparation of body and ſoule, for they muſt ſerve God joyntly together, becauſe God having joyned them, man may not ſeparate them, but as God ſhall re-unite them at the laſt Reſurrection, ſo muſt we, in our Reſurrections in this life; And farther we extend not this Reſurrection, from this ſeparation, this divorce.

The ſecond fall of man in naturall death, is Caſus in diſſolutionem, The man being fallen into a divorce of ſoule and body, the body fals by putrefaction into a diſſolution of duſt; and the Reſurrection from this fall, is, a re-efformation, when God ſhall recompact that duſt into that body. This fall, and this reſurrection we have in our ſpirituall death too: for we fall into daily cuſtomes, and continuall habits of thoſe ſins, and we become not onely as that Lazarus in the parable, to have ſores upon us, but as that Lazarus in the Goſpell, that was dead; Domine jam fœtemus, & quatriduani ſumus, Lord we ſtinke in thy noſtrils, and we have beene buried foure dayes; All the foure changes of our life, Infancy, Youth, Middle Age, and Old, have beene ſpent and worne out in a continuall, and uninterrupted courſe of ſin. In which, we ſhall beſt conſider our fall, and beſt prepare our Reſurrection, by looking from whence we are fallen, and by what ſteps; and they are three. C

Nardus noſtra. Cant. 1. 12.

Firſt, Perdidimus nardum noſtrã, We have loſt the ſweet ſavour of our own Spikenard; for ſo the Spouſe ſaies, Nardus mea dedit odorem ſuum: My Spikenard hath given forth her ſweet ſavour. There was a time, when we had a Spikenard, and a ſweet ſavour of our own, when our own Naturall faculties, in that ſtate as God infuſed them, in Adam, had a power to apprehend, and lay hold upon the graces of God. Man hath a reaſonable ſoule capable of Gods grace, ſo hath no creature but man; man hath naturall faculties, which may be employed by God in his ſervice, ſo hath no creature but man. Onely man was made ſo, as that he might be better; whereas all other creatures were but to conſiſt in that degree of goodneſſe, in which they entred. Miſerable fall! Only man was made to mend, and only man does grow worſe; Only man was made capable of a ſpirituall ſoveraignty, and only man hath enthralled, and mancipated himſelfe to a ſpirituall ſlavery. And Perdidimus poſſibilitatem boni, We have loſt that good and all poſſibility of recovering it, by our ſelves, in loſing Nardum noſtram, The ſavour of our Spikenard, the life, and vigour of our naturall faculties, to ſupernaturall uſes. For though the ſoule be Forma hominis, it is but Materia Dei; The ſoule may be the forme of man, for without that, Man is but a carcaſſe; But the ſoule is but the matter upon which God works; for, except our ſoule receive another ſoule, and be inanimated with Grace, even the ſoule it ſelfe, is but a carcaſſe. And for this, we have loſt Nardum noſtram, The odour, the verdure, the vigour of thoſe powers, in poſſeſſion whereof God put us into this world. But there is a ſtep in our fall, lower then this. D

Vnguentum Domini.

We have not only loſt Nardum noſtram, The uſe of our own faculties, in originall ſin, But we have loſt alſo Vnguentum Domini, The ſweet ſavour, and the holy perfume of that

oyntment

A oyntment which the Lord hath poured out upon us. For, as the Spouſe ſayes in the ſame Chapter, Oleum effuſum nomen ejus, His name is an oyntment powred out upon us; The name of Chriſt hath been ſhed upon us all in our baptiſme, and that hath made us Chriſtians; And the merits and promiſes of Chriſt have been ſhed upon us all, in the preaching of his word, and that hath declared us to be Chriſtians; The oyntment is ſuper caput, ſuper barbam, ſuper oram veſtimenti, as David ſpeaks; It is fallen upon the Head, we have had, and have religious Princes; And upon the Beard, the Beard of Aaron, we have had, and have (no Time, no Church ever more, ever ſo much) a religious Clergy, vigilancy in the Superiour, laborioufneſſe in the Inferiour Clergy; And it is fallen upon the Skirts of the garment, the love, the deſire, the hunger of hearing is fallen upon the loweſt, and upon all our Congregations, Oleum effuſum nomen ejus, his Name, and his Ordinance is poured out upon us all; but, as the Spouſe ſayes there, Adoleſcentula dilexerunt te, Only B the virgins have loved thee; And where are thoſe Virgins? which of us have preſerved that virginity, that integrity? which of us hath not married himſelfe to ſome particular ſin? which of us hath not multiplied his fornications, and yet is not ſatisfied? we have all loſt Nardum noſtram, that which we had at firſt in Adam, and that which hath been offered us ſince in Chriſt. And this is our ſecond ſtep in this fall; But there is a lower then this.

Cant. 1. 3.

Pſal. 133. 2.

We come to loſe Odorem agri, The ſweet ſavour of the field it ſelf. As Iſaac ſaid of his Son, The ſmell of my Son is as the ſmell of a field which the Lord hath bleſſed, So the Lord of heaven, as he ſmelt a ſavour of Reſt from the Sacrifice of Noah, may have ſmelt from us the ſavour of medicinall hearbes, of Remorſe, and Repentance, and Contrition, and Deteſtation of former ſins, And the ſavour of odoriferous, and fragrant, and aromaticall hearbes, works worthy of Repentance, amendment of life, edification of others, and C zeale to his glory, and yet we may relapſe into former ſins, or fall into new, and come to ſavour only of the earth, in a worldly covetouſneſſe, or to ſavour of the fleſh, in a licentious filthineſſe; We may have received the good ſeed, and dured for a while, as S. Matthew expreſſes Chriſts words; Received it, and Beleeved it for a while, as S. Luke expreſſes them, and then depart from the goodneſſe which Gods grace had formerly wrought in us, and from the Grace of God it ſelfe.

Odor agri. Gen. 27. 27.

Mat. 13. 18. Luke 8. 13.

Now to this lamentable ſtate, belong thoſe fearefull words of the Apoſtle, That for a man that ſins thus, there remaineth no more ſacrifice; And thoſe alſo, in another place, That for ſuch a man it is impoſſible, impoſſible to be renewed. Some of the Fathers, out of a holy tenderneſſe, and compaſſion, have mollified this impoſſibile with a difficile; It is impoſſible, ſay they, that is, it is very hard; very hard for him that hath been in Gods ſervice, and is run away, to return to it again. For, as Tertullian ſayes elegantly in that caſe, Iudicato pronunciavit, That ſinner, ſayes he, hath proceeded ſolemnly, and judicially, and D hath heard what both ſides could ſay, what grace could ſay, and what ſin, what God could ſay, and what Satan, and now he hath decreed the cauſe againſt Grace and againſt God, and declared the other ſide to be in the right, becauſe he hath applyed himſelf to the other ſide. But there is more in this Impoſſibile, then Difficile: It is not only hard, but truly impoſſible: So, as it is impoſſible for God to lie, (ſo the Apoſtle ſpeaks) ſo as it is impoſſible to take away ſin by the blood of Buls and Goats, (ſo he ſpeakes) ſo as it is impoſſible to pleaſe God without faith, (ſo he ſpeaks) ſo impoſſible is it for this man to be renewed. Impoſſibile eſt, non ſperes quod impoſſibile, ſayes Chryſoſtome, It is impoſſible, never hope for that which is impoſſible. For (as that Father exalts this impoſſibility) Non dixit, non decet, non prodeſt, non licet; God hath not ſaid, it becomes not the majeſty, and the conſtancy of my proceedings to renew ſuch a man; he ſayes not ſo, non decet; He doth not E ſay, it conduces not to my ends, nor to my manner of government, it would not be good for the publique, for the Church, for the reſt of my ſervants, who might be ſcandalized if I ſhould exact ſo much as I doe at their hands, and renew ſuch a man; He ſayes not ſo, non prodeſt; He doth not ſay, non licet; I cannot do it in juſtice, it cannot conſiſt with my Laws, and my Edicts, by which I have proclaimed, That with the froward I will grow froward, and harden their hearts that oppoſe themſelves againſt me; He doth not ſay ſo, non licet; for to all theſe (it ſtands not with my wayes, non decet; or it conduces not to my ends, non prodeſt; or it conſiſts not with my juſtice, non licet) mercy would ſtill preſent diſpenſations; but it is expreſly, directly impoſſibile, impoſſible.

Heb. 10. 2. Heb. 6. 4.

Cap. 6. Cap. 10. Cap. 11.

It is true, that the hardneſſe of this ſaying, put the Fathers to hard Expoſitions. The greater greater part by much, of them who finde themſelves put to a neceſſity of admitting an impoſſibility, (for as I told you before, ſome of them mollifie and ſouple the impoſſibility into a difficulty) place the impoſſibility in this, That it is impoſſible for ſuch a man to be renewed by baptiſme, as he was renewed before: for in thoſe Primitive times, though they excluded not children, yet the greateſt part of them who were baptized, were ſuch as underſtood their caſe, perſons of diſcretion, ſuch as had ſpent many months, many times many yeares, in ſtudying and in practiſing the Chriſtian religion, and then were baptized; and if theſe men (ſay thoſe Fathers) fell after this, it was impoſſible to be renewed that way, impoſſible that they ſhould have a ſecond baptiſme: And it is ſcarce mannerly, ſcarce ſafe to depart from ſo many as meet in this interpretation of this impoſſibility; for they all intend that which S. Chryſoſtome expreſſes moſt plainly, Dixit impoſſibile, ut in deſperationem induceret; The Apoſtle ſayes it is impoſſible, that he might bring us before hand into a kinde of deſperation; A deſperation of this kinde, That there was abſolutely no hope of a poſſibility of renewing, as they were renewed before, that is, by baptiſme.

But becauſe at this time when the Apoſtle writ, that queſtiō, which troubled the Church ſo much after, in S. Cyprians time, of Rebaptization, was not moved at all, neither doth it appeare, nor is it likely, that any that fell ſo, put his hopes upon renewing by a ſecond baptiſme; there is ſomething elſe in this Impoſſibility then ſo. And that in one word is, That the falling intended here, is not a falling à nardo noſtra, from the ſavour of our own Spikenard, the good uſe of our owne faculties, loſt in Originall ſin, nor a falling Ab unguento Domini, that though the perfume an Incenſe of the name of Chriſt, and the offer of his merits be ſhed upon us here, that doth not reſtrain us from falling into ſome ſins, But this falling is, as it is expreſſed, a falling away, away from Chriſt in all his Ordinances; an undervaluing, a deſpiſing of thoſe meanes which he hath eſtabliſhed for the renewing of a broken ſoule, which is the making a mock of the Son of God, and the treading the blood of the Covenant under foot. When Chriſt hath ordained but one way for the renewing of a ſoul, The conveyance of his merits, in preaching the word, and the ſealing thereof, in applying the Sacraments, to that man that is fallen ſo, as to refuſe that, as it is impoſſible to live, if a man refuſe to eat, Impoſſible to recover, if a man refuſe Phyſick, ſo it is Impoſſible for him to be renewed, becauſe God hath notified to us but one way, and he refuſes that. So this is a true Impoſſibility, and yet limited too; for though it be impoſſible to us, by any meanes imparted to us, or to our diſpenſing, and ſtewardſhip, yet ſhall any thing be impoſſible to God? God forbid; For, even from this death, and this depth there is a Reſurrection.

Reſurrectio. As from the loſſe of our Spikenard, our naturall faculties in originall ſin, we have a reſurrection in baptiſme, And from the loſſe of the oyntment of the Lord, the offer of his Graces, in theſe meetings, and the falling into ſome actuall ſins, for all that aſſiſtance, we have a reſurrection in the other Sacrament; So when we have loſt the ſavour of the field, thoſe degrees of goodneſſe, and holineſſe which we had, and had declared before, when we are fallē from all preſent ſenſe of the means of a reſurrection, yet there may be a reſurrection wrapped up in the good purpoſes of God upon that man, which, unleſſe he will himſelfe, ſhall not be fruſtrated, not evacuated, not diſappointed. Though he have fœtorem pro odore, as the Prophet ſpeaks, That in ſtead of the ſweet ſavour, which his former holy life exhaled and breathed up, he be come now to ſtink in the ſight of the Church, (and howſoever God may have a good ſavour from his own work, from thoſe holy purpoſes which he hath upon him, which lie in Gods boſome, yet from his preſent ſins, and from the preſent teſtimony and evidence that the Church gives againſt him, as a preſent ſinner, he muſt neceſſarily ſtink in the noſtrils of God too) yet, as in the Reſurrection of the body, it ſhall come, when we ſhall not know of it, So when this poore dead, putrified ſoule hath no ſenſe of it, and perchance, little or no diſpoſition towards it, the efficacy of Gods purpoſe ſhall break out, and work in him a reſurrection: And this S. Chryſoſtome takes to be intended in that which is ſaid in the ſame place to the Hebrews, That that earth which drinketh in the rain, and bringeth forth nothing but Bryers, is Maledicto proxima, neareſt to be accurſed, That man is neareſt to be a Reprobate; But yet, ſayes he, Vides quantam habet conſolationem, We apprehend a bleſſed conſolation in this, That it is ſaid, neare a curſe, neare reprobation, and no worſe; for, Qui propè eſt, procul eſſe poterit, ſayes he, That ſoule which is but neare deſtruction, may weather that miſchiefe, and grow to be far from it, and out of danger of it.

Bay 3.14.

Heb. 6.

It

A It is true, this man hath loſt his paratum cor meum; he cannot ſay, his heart is prepared; that he hath loſt in originall ſin; This man hath loſt his Confirmatum cor meum, he cannot ſay, his heart is eſtabliſhed; that hath been offered him in theſe exerciſes, but it hath not prevailed upon him. He hath loſt his variis odoribus delectatum cor, the delight which his heart heretofore had in the ſavour of the field, in thoſe good actions, in which formerly he exercíſed himſelf, and now is falne from: But yet there may be cor novum, a new heart, a heart which is yet in Gods boſome, and ſhall be tranſplanted into his; A duplicate, an exemplification of Gods ſecret purpoſe to be manifeſted, and revealed by the Spirit of God, in his good time, upon him. And this may work, In inſigni & vehementi mutatione, in ſuch an evidence, and demonſtration of it ſelf, as he ſhall know it to be that, becauſe it ſhall not work as a Circumciſion, but as an Exciſion, not as a lopping off, but as a rooting up, not by mending him, but by making him a new creature; He ſhall B not grow leſſe riotous then before, for ſo a ſentence in the Star-Chamber, or any other Criminall Court for a riot, might be a reſurrection to him; nor leſſe voluptuous, for ſo, poverty in his Fortune, or inſipidneſſe and taſtleſneſſe in his palate might be a reſurrection to him; Nor leſſe licentious, for ſo age or ſickneſſe, nor leſſe quarrelſome, for ſo blowes, and oppreſſion might be a reſurrection to him. But when in a rectified underſtanding he can but apprehend, that ſuch a reſurrection there may be, nay there is for him; it ſhall grow up to a holy confidence, eſtabliſhed by the ſenſible effects thereof, that he ſhall not onely diſcontinue his former acts, and deveſt his former habits of ſin, but produce acts, and build up habits, contrary to his former habits, and former acts, for this is the reſurrection from this ſecond fall, In diſſolutionem, into the diſſolution of particular ſins.

Now, after all this, there is in naturall death, a third fall, caſus in diſperſionem, the man C is fallen in ſeparationem, into a divorce of body and ſoule, the body is fallen in diſſolutionem, to putrifaction, and diſſolution in duſt, and then this duſt is fallen in diſperſionem, into a diſperſion, and ſcattering over the earth, as God threatens, Comminuam in pulverem, I will break the wicked as ſmall as duſt, and ſcatter them with the winde; For after ſuch a ſcattering, no power, but of God onely can recollect thoſe grains of duſt, and re-compact them into a body, and re-inanimate them into a man. And ſuch a ſtate, ſuch a diſperſion, doth the heart and ſoule of an habituall ſinner undergoe; For, as the eyes of a foole are in the corners of the earth, ſo is the heart and ſoule of a ſinner. The wanton and licentious man, ſighs out his ſoule, weeps out his ſoule, ſweares out his ſoule, in every place, where his luſt, or his cuſtome, or the glory of victory, in overcomming, and deluding, puts him upon ſuch ſolicitations. In the corrupt taker, his ſoul goes out, that it may leave him unſenſible of his ſin, and not trouble him in his corrupt bargaine; and in a corrupt D giver, ambitious of preferment, his ſoule goes out with his money, which he loves well, but not ſo well as his preferment: This yeare his ſoule and his money goes out upon one office, and next yeare, more ſoul, and more money upon another; He knowes how his money will come in againe; for they will bring it, that have need of his corruptneſſe in his offices; But where will this man finde his ſoule, thus ſcattered upon every woman corruptly won, upon every office corruptly uſurped, upon every quillet corruptly bought, upon every fee corruptly taken?

Thus it is, when a ſoule is ſcattered upon the daily practiſe of any one predominant, and habituall ſin; but when it is indifferently ſcattered upon all, how much more is it ſo? In him, that ſwallowes ſins in the world, as he would doe meats at a feaſt; paſſes through every diſh, and never askes Phyſitian the nature, the quality, the danger, the offence of any diſh: That baits at every ſin that riſes, and poures himſelfe into every ſinfull mold E he meets: That knowes not when he began to ſpend his ſoule, nor where, nor upon what ſin he laid it out; no, nor whether he have, whether ever he had any ſoule, or no; but hath loſt his ſoule ſo long agoe, in ruſty, and in incoherent ſins, (not ſins that produced one another, as in Davids caſe (and yet that is a fearfull ſtate, that concatenation of ſins, that pedegree of ſins) but in ſins which he embraces, meerely out of an eaſineſſe to ſin, and not out of a love, no, nor out of a tentation to that ſin in particular) that in theſe incoherent ſins hath ſo ſcattered his ſoule, as that he hath not ſoule enough left, to ſeek out the reſt. And therefore David makes it the Title of the whole Pſalme, Domine ne diſperdas, O Lord doe not ſcatter us: And he begins to expreſſe his ſenſe of Gods Judgements, in the next Pſalme, ſo, O Lord thou haſt caſt us out, thou haſt ſcattered us, turn again unto unto us; for even from this averſion, there may be converſion, and from this laſt and loweſt fall, a reſurrection. But how? A

In the generall reſurrection upon naturall death, God ſhall work upon this diſperſion of our ſcattered duſt, as in the firſt fall, which is the Divorce, by way of Re-union, and in the ſecond, which is Putrifaction, by way of Re-efformation; ſo in this third, which is Diſperſion, by way of Re-collection; where mans buried fleſh hath brought forth graſſe, and that graſſe fed beaſts, and thoſe beaſts fed men, and thoſe men fed other men, God that knowes in which Boxe of his Cabinet all this ſeed Pearle lies, in what corner of the world every atome, every graine of every mans duſt ſleeps, ſhall recollect that duſt, and then recompact that body, and then re-inanimate that man, and that is the accompliſhment of all.

In this reſurrection, from this Diſperſion and ſcattering in ſin, the way is by Recollection too: That this ſinner recollect himſelfe, and his own hiſtory, his own annalls, his own journalls, and call to minde where he loſt his way, and with what tenderneſſe of conſcience, and holy ſtartling he entred into ſome ſins at firſt, in which he is ſeared up now, and whereas his triumph ſhould have been, in a victory over the fleſh, he is come to a triumph in his victory over the ſpirit of God, and glories in having overcome the Holy Ghoſt, and brought his conſcience to an unſenſibleneſſe of ſin: If hee can recollect himſelfe thus, and caſt up his account ſo, If he can ſay to God, Lord, we have ſold our ſelves for nothing, he ſhall heare God ſay to him, as he does there in the Prophet, You have Eſay 52.3. ſold your ſelves for nothing, and you ſhall be redeemed without money. But how is this recollecting wrought? B

Ezek. 37. God hath intimated the way, in that viſion to the Prophet Ezekiel: He brings the Prophet into a field of dead bones, and dry bones, ſicca vehementer, (as it is ſaid there) as dry as this duſt which we ſpeak of: And he asks him, fili hominis, thou that art but the ſon of man, and muſt judge humanely, Putaſne vivent oſſa iſta? Doſt thou think that theſe bones can live? The Prophet anſwers, Domine tu noſti, thou Lord, who knoweſt whoſe names are written in the Book of Life, and whoſe are not; whoſe bones are wrapped up in the Decree of thy Election, and whoſe are not, knoweſt whether theſe bones can live, or no; for, but in the efficacy and power of that Decree, they cannot. Yes, they ſhall, ſayes God Almighty; and they ſhall live by this meanes, Dices eis, Thou ſhalt ſay unto them, O ye dry bones, heare the word of the Lord: As dry, as deſperate, as irremediable as they are in themſelves, God ſhall ſend his ſervants unto them, and they ſhall heare them: And, as it is added in that place, Prophetante me, factus ſonitus, & commotio, As I Propheſied, there was a noyſe and a ſhaking; As whilſt Peter ſpake, The Holy Ghoſt fell upon all them that heard the word; So whilſt the Meſſengers of God ſpeak in the preſence of ſuch ſinners, there ſhall be a noyſe, and a commotion, a horrour of their former ſins, a wonder how they could provoke ſo patient, and ſo powerfull a God, a ſinking down under the waight of Gods Judgements, a flying up to the apprehenſion of his mercies, and this noyſe and commotion in their ſoules, ſhall be ſetled with that Goſpell in that Prophet, Dabo ſuper vos nervos, I will lay ſinewes upon you, and will bring up fleſh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath into you, and you ſhall live, and ye ſhall know that I am the Lord; God ſhall reſtore them to life, and more, to ſtrength, and more, to beauty, and comelineſſe, acceptable to himſelfe in Chriſt Jeſus. C D

Your way is Recollecting; gather your ſelves into the Congregation, and Communion of Saints in theſe places; gather your ſins into your memory, and poure them out in humble confeſſions, to that God, whom they have wounded; Gather the crummes under his Table, lay hold upon the gracious promiſes, which by our Miniſtery he lets fall upon the Congregation now; and gather the ſeales of thoſe promiſes, whenſoever, in a rectified conſcience, his Spirit beares witneſſe with your ſpirit, that you may be worthy receivers of him in his Sacrament; and this recollecting ſhall be your reſurrection. E

Apoc. 20.6. Beatus qui habet partem, ſayes S. Iohn, Bleſſed is he that hath part in the firſt Reſurrection, for on ſuch the ſecond death hath no power. He that riſes to this Judgement of recollecting, and of judging himſelfe, ſhall riſe with a chearfulneſſe, and ſtand with a confidence, when Aug. Chriſt Jeſus ſhall come in the ſecond: And, Quando exacturus eſt in ſecundo, quod dedit in primo, when Chriſt ſhall call for an account, in that ſecond judgement, how he hath huſbanded thoſe graces, which he gave him; for the firſt, he ſhall make his poſſeſſion of this firſt reſurrection, his title, and his evidence to the ſecond. When thy body, which hath been

A been subject to all kindes of deſtruction here; to the deſtruction of a Flood, in Catarrhs, and Rheums, and Dropſies, and ſuch diſtillations, to the deſtruction of a fire, in Feavers, and Frenzies, and ſuch conflagrations, ſhall be removed ſafely and gloriouſly above all ſuch diſtempers, and malignant impreſſions, and body and ſoule ſo united, as if both were one ſpirit in it ſelfe, and God ſo united to both, as that thou ſhalt be the ſame ſpirit with God. God began the firſt World, but upon two, Adam and Eve: The ſecond world, after the Flood, he began upon a greater ſtock, upon eight reſerved in the Arke; But when he eſtabliſhes the laſt and everlaſting world in the laſt Reſurrection, he ſhall admit ſuch a number, as that none of us who are here now, none that is, or hath, or ſhall be upon the face of the earth, ſhall be denied in that Reſurrection, if he have truly felt this; for Grace accepted, is the infallible earneſt of Glory.

SERMON XXII.

Preached at S. Pauls, upon Eaſter-day. 1627.

HEB. 11. 35.

Women received their dead raiſed to life againe: And others were tortured, not accepting a
C deliverance, that they might obtaine a better Reſurrection.

MErcy is Gods right hand, with that God gives all; Faith is mans right hand, with that man takes all. David, Pſal. 136. opens, and enlarges this right hand of God, in pouring out his bleſſings, plentifully, abundantly, manifoldly there. And in this Chapter, the Apoſtle opens, and enlarges this right hand of man, by laying hold upon thoſe mercies of God, plentifully, abundantly, manifoldly, by faith here. There, David powres downe the mercies of God, in repeating, and re-repeating that phraſe, For his mercy endureth for ever; And here, S. Paul carries up man to heaven, by repeating, and re-repeating the bleſſings which man hath attained by faith; By faith Abel ſacrificed, By faith Enoch walked with God, By faith Noah built an Arke, &c. And as in that Pſalme, Gods mercies are expreſt two waies,
D First in the good that God did for his ſervants, He remembred them in their low eſtate, for his mercy endureth for ever: And then againe, He redeemed them from their enemies, for his mercy endureth for ever: And then alſo, in the evill that he brought upon their enemies, He ſlew famous Kings, for his mercy endureth for ever: And then, He gave their land for an heritage, for his mercy endureth for ever. So in this Chapter, the Apoſtle declares the benefits of faith, two wayes alſo: Firſt, how faith enriches us, and accommodates us in the wayes of proſperity, By faith Abraham went to a place which he received for an inheritance: And ſo, By faith Sarah received ſtrength to conceive ſeed: And then, how faith ſuſtaines, and eſtabliſhes us in the wayes of adverſity, By faith they ſtopt the mouthes of Lions, by faith they quencht the violence of fire, by faith they eſcaped the edge of the ſword, in the verſe immediatly before the Text. And in this verſe, which is our Text, the Apoſtle hath collected both; The benefits which they received by faith, Women received
E their dead raiſed to life againe, And then, the holy courage which was infuſed by Faith, in their perſecutions, Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might receive a better Reſurrection. And becauſe both theſe have relation, evidently, pregnantly to the Reſurrection, (for their benefit was, that the Women received their dead by a Reſurrection, And their coutage in their perſecution was, That they ſhould receive a better Reſurrection) therefore the whole meditation is propet to this day, in which wee celebrate all Reſurrections in the Root, in the Reſurrection of the Firſt fruits of the dead, our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Ieſus.

Ver 23. Ver.24. Ver.8. Ver.11. Ver.34.

Our Parts are two; How plentifully God gives to the faithfull, Women receive their dead raiſed to life againe, And how patiently the faithfull ſuffer Gods corrections, Others were Diviſio.

were tortured not accepting, &c. Though they be both large conſiderations, (Benefits by Faith, Patience in the Faithfull) yet we ſhall containe our ſelves in thoſe particulars which are expreſt, or neceſſarily implyed in the Text it ſelfe. And ſo in the firſt place we ſhall ſee firſt, The extraordinary conſolation in Gods extraordinary Mercies, in his miraculous Deliverances, ſuch as this, Women received their dead raiſed to life again, And ſecondly we ſhall ſee the examples, to which the Apoſtle refers here, What women had had their dead reſtored to life againe; And then, laſtly, in that part, That this affection of joy, in having their dead reſtored to life againe, being put in the weaker ſexe, in women onely, we may argue conveniently from thence, That the ſtrength of a true and juſt joy lies not in that, but that our virility, our holy manhood, our religious ſtrength conſiſts in a faithfull aſſurance, that we have already a bleſſed communion with theſe Saints of God, though they be dead, and we alive; And that we ſhall have hereafter a glorious Aſſociation with them in the Reſurrection, though we never receive our dead raiſed to life again in this world. And in thoſe three conſiderations, we ſhall determine that firſt part. And then, in the other, The Patience of the Faithfull, Others were tortured, &c. we ſhall firſt look into the examples which the Apoſtle refers to; who they were that were thus tortured: And ſecondly, the heighth and exaltation of their patience, They would not accept a deliverance: And laſtly, the ground upon which their Anchor was caſt, what eſtabliſhed their patience, That they might obtaine a better Reſurrection.

1 Part. Firſt then, for that Bleſſedneſſe, which we need not be afraid, nor abſtaine from calling the Recompence, the Reward, the Retribution of the faithfull, (for as we conſider Death to grow out of Diſobedience, and Life out of Obedience to the Law, as properly as Death is the wages of ſin, Life is the wages of Righteouſneſſe) If I be asked, what it is wherein this Recompence, this Reward, this Retribution conſiſts, if I muſt be put to my Speciall Plea, I muſt ſay it is, in that of the Apoſtle, Omnia cooperantur in bonum, That nothing can befall the faithfull, that does not conduce to his good, and advance his happineſſe: For he ſhall not onely find S. Pauls Mori lucrum, That he ſhall be the better for dying, if he muſt dye; but he ſhall find S. Auguſtines Vtile cadere, He ſhall be the better for ſinning, if he have ſinned; So the better, as that by a repentance after that ſin, hee ſhall find himſelfe eſtabliſhed in a neerer, and ſafer diſtance with God, then he was in that ſecurity, which he had before that ſin. But the Title, and the Plea of the faithfull to this Recompence, extends farther then ſo; It is not onely, that nothing, how evill ſoever in the nature thereof, ſhall be evill to them; but that all that is Good, is theirs; properly theirs, theirs peculiarly. Pſal. 34. 9. There is no want to them that fear the Lord, ſayes David; The young Lions doe lack, and ſuffer hunger, but they that ſeeke the Lord, ſhall not want any good thing.

The Infidel hath no pretence upon the next world, none at all; No nor ſo cleare a Title to any thing in this world, but that we diſpute in the Schoole, whether Infidels have any true dominion, any true proprietie in any thing which they poſſeſſe here; And whether there be not an inherent right in the Chriſtians, to plant Chriſtianity in any part of the Dominions of the Infidels, and conſequently, to deſpoile them even of their poſſeſſion, if they oppoſe ſuch Plantations, ſo eſtabliſhed, and ſuch propagations of the Chriſtian Religion. For though we may not begin at the diſpoſſeſſing, and diſplanting of the native and naturall Inhabitant, (for ſo we proceed but as men againſt men, and upon ſuch equall termes, we have no right to take any mens poſſeſſions from them) yet, when purſuing that Right, which reſides in the Chriſtian, we have eſtabliſhed ſuch a Plantation, if they ſupplant that, we may ſupplant them, ſay our Schooles, and our Caſuiſts; For in that caſe, we proceed not as men againſt men; not by Gods Common Law, which is equall to all men; that is, the Law of Nature; but we proceed by his higher Law, by his Prerogative, as Chriſtians againſt Infidels, and then, it is God that proceeds againſt them, by men, and not thoſe men, of themſelves, to ſerve their owne Ambitions, or their other ſecular ends. 1 Cor. 3. 22. All things are yours, ſaies the Apoſtle; By what Right? You are Chriſts, ſaies he, And Chriſt is Gods; Thus is a Title convayed to us, All things are Gods, God hath put all things under Chriſts feete; And he under ours, as we are Chriſtians. And then, as the generall profeſſion of Chriſt, entitles us to a generall Title of the world, (for the World belongs to the Faithfull; and Chriſtians, as Chriſtians, and no more, are Fideles, Faithfull in reſpect of Infidels) ſo thoſe Chriſtians that come to that more particular

A ticular, more active, more operative faith, which the Apoſtle ſpeaks of in all this Chapter, come alſo to a more particular reward, and recompence, and retribution at Gods hands; God does not onely give them the naturall bleſſings of this World, to which they have an inherent right, as they are generall Chriſtians, but as they are thus faithfull Chriſtians, he gives them ſupernaturall bleſſings, he enlarges himſelfe even to Miracles, in their behalfe; Which is a ſecond conſideration; Firſt God opens himſelfe in nature, and temporall bleſſings, to the generall Chriſtian, but to the Faithfull, in Grace, exalted even to the height of Miracle.

In this, we conſider firſt, That there is nothing dearer to God then a Miracle. There is nothing that God hath eſtabliſhed in a conſtant courſe of nature, and which therefore is done every day, but would ſeeme a Miracle, and exerciſe our admiration, if it were done but once; Nay, the ordinary things in Nature, would be greater miracles, then the B extraordinary, which we admire moſt, if they were done but once; The ſtanding ſtill of the Sun, for Ioſuahs uſe, was not, in it ſelfe, ſo wonderfull a thing, as that ſo vaſt and immenſe a body as the Sun, ſhould run ſo many miles, in a minute; The motion of the Sun were a greater wonder then the ſtanding ſtill, if all were to begin againe; And onely the daily doing takes off the admiration. But then God having, as it were, concluded himſelf in a courſe of nature, and written downe in the booke of Creatures, Thus and thus all things ſhall be carried, though he glorifie himſelfe ſometimes, in doing a miracle, yet there is in every miracle, a ſilent chiding of the world, and a tacite reprehenſion of them, who require, or who need miracles.

Therefore hath God reſerved to himſelfe the power of Miracles, as a Prerogative; For the devill does no miracles; the devill and his inſtruments, doe but haſten Nature, or hinder nature, antedate Nature, or poſtdate Nature, bring things ſooner to paſſe, or re- C tarde them; And howſoever they pretend to oppoſe nature, yet ſtill it is but upon nature, and but by naturall meanes, that they worke; onely God ſhakes the whole frame of Nature in pieces, and in a miracle, proceeds ſo, as if there were no Creation yet accompliſhed, no courſe of Nature yet eſtabliſhed. Facit mirabilia magna ſolus, ſaies David; There are Mirabilia parva, ſome leſſer wonders, that the devill and his Inſtruments, Pharaohs Sorcerers, can do; But when it comes to Mirabilia magna, Great wonders, ſo great, as that they amount to the nature of a Miracle, Facit ſolus, God, and God onely does them. And amongſt theſe, and amongſt the greateſt of theſe, is the raiſing of the Dead, and therefore we make it a particular conſideration, the extraordinary Joy in that caſe, when Women received their dead raiſed to life againe.

Mortui.

Wee know the diſhonour, and the infamy that lay upon barrenneſſe, among the Jews; how wives deplored, and lamented that. When God is pleaſed to take away that impe- D diment of barrenneſſe, and to give children, we know the miſery, and deſolation of orbity, when Parents are deprived of thoſe children, by death; And by the meaſure of that ſorrow, which follows barrenneſſe, or orbitie, we may proportion that joy, which accompanies Gods miraculous bleſſings, when Women receive their dead raiſed to life againe. In all the ſecular, and prophane Writers in the world, in the whole bodie of Story, you ſhall not finde ſuch an expreſſing of the miſery of a famine, as that of the Holy Ghoſt in the Lamentations; That women eate Palmarum filios; We tranſlate it, Their children of a ſpan long; that is, that they procured abortions and untimely births of thoſe children, which were in their bodies, that they might have ſo much fleſh to eate. As that is propoſed for the greateſt miſery, that ever was, women to deſtroy their children ſo, ſo is this for the higheſt accumulation of Joy, to have dead children brought to life againe. When we heare S. Auguſtine in his Confeſſions, lament ſo paſſionately the death E of his Son, and inſiſt ſo affectionately, upon the Pregnancie, and Forwardneſſe of that Son, though that Son if he had lived, muſt have lived a continuall evidence, and monument of his ſin, (for, for all his Son, S. Auguſtine was no married man) yet what may we think, S. Auguſtine would have given, though it had been to have beene cut out of his own life, to have had that Son reſtored to life againe? Meaſure it but by the Joy, which we have, in recovering a ſick child, from the hands, and jawes, and gates of death, Meaſure it but by that delight which we have, when we ſee our Garden recovered frō the death of Winter, Mens curioſities have carried them to unlawfull deſires of communication with the Dead, as in Sauls caſe towards Samuel. But if with a good conſcience, and without that horror, which is likely to accompanie ſuch a communication with the Dead, a man might might have the converſation of a friend, that had been dead, and had ſeene the other World; As Dives thought no Preacher ſo powerfull to worke upon his Brethren, as one ſent from the Dead, ſo certainly all the Travailers in the World, if we could heare them all, all the Libraries in the world, if we could read them all, could not tell us ſo much, as that friend, returned from the dead, which had ſeene the other World.

But wayving that conſideration, becauſe as we know not, what kind of remembrance of this world, God leaves us in the next, when he tranſlates us thither, ſo neither do we know, what kinde of remembrance of that world, God would leave in that man, whom he ſhould re-tranſlate into this, we fixe onely upon the examples entended in our Text, who theſe joyfull Women were, that receiv'd their Dead raiſed to life againe, which is our ſecond Branch of this firſt part; for with thoſe three conſiderations, which conſtituted our firſt Branch, we have done, That God gives us this World, as we are generall Chriſtians; And, as we are Faithfull Chriſtians, Miracles; And, the greateſt of Miracles, The raiſing of the Dead.

Mulieres. In the ſecond Branch, we have two Conſiderations; firſt, what kind of Women theſe were, and then, who they were; firſt, their Qualities, and then, their Perſons. We have occaſion to ſtop upon the firſt, becauſe Aquinas in his Expoſition of this Text, tels us, there are ſome Expoſitors, who take this word, Women, in this place, to be entended, not of Mothers, but of Wives; And then, becauſe the Apoſtle ſaies here, that Women received their dead, that is, ſay they, Wives received their dead Husbands, raiſed to life again, and received them, as Husbands, that is, cohabited with them as Husbands, therefore they conclude, ſaies Aquinas, that Death it ſelfe does not diſſolve the band of Marriage; and conſequently, that all other Marriages, all ſuper-inductions, even after Death, are unlawfull. Let me ſay but one word, of the Word, and a word or two of the Matter it ſelfe, and I ſhall paſſe to the other Conſideration, The Women whom the Apoſtle propoſes for his examples.

Vxores. The word, Women, taken alone, ſignifies the whole ſex, women in generall, When it is contracted to a particular ſignification, in any Author, it followes the circumſtances, and the coherence of that place, in that Author; and by thoſe a man ſhall eaſily diſcerne, of what kinde of Women, that word is entended in that place. In this place, the Apoſtle works upon his Brethren, the Hebrews, by ſuch examples, as were within their owne knowledge, and their owne ſtories, throughout all this Chapter. And in thoſe ſtories of theirs, we have no example, of any Wife, that had her dead Husband reſtored to her; but of Mothers that had their Children raiſed to life, we have. So that this word, Women, muſt ſignifie here, Mothers, and not Wives, as Aquinas Expoſitors miſ-imagined.

Nuptiæ iteratæ. And for the matter it ſelfe, that is, ſecond or oftner-iterated Marriages, the diſ-approving of them, entred very ſoone into ſome Hereticks, in the Primitive Church. For the eighth Canon of that great Councell of Nice, (which is one of the indubitable Canons) forbids, by name, Catharos, The Puritanes of thoſe Times, to be received by the Church, except they would be content to receive the Sacrament with perſons that had beene twice married; which, before they would not doe. It entred ſoone into ſome Hereticks, and it entred ſoone, and went far, in ſome holy and reverent Men, and ſome Aſſemblies, that had, and had juſtly, the name, and forme of Councels. For, in the Councell of Neo-Cæſarea, which was before the Nicen Councell, in the ſeventh Canon, there are ſomewhat ſhrewd aſperſions laid upon ſecond Mariages. And certainly, the Roman Church cannot be denyed, to come too neere this diſ-approving of ſecond Mariages. For though they will not ſpeak plaine, (they love not that, becauſe they get more by keeping things in ſuſpence) yet plainly they forbid the Benediction at ſecond Mariages. Valeat quantum valere poteſt; Let them doe as well as they can, with their ſecond Marriage, Let them marrie De bene eſſe, At all adventures; but they will affoord no Bleſſing to a ſecond, as to a firſt Marriage. And though they will not ſhut the Church doores againſt all ſuch, yet they will ſhut up all Church functions againſt all ſuch. No ſuch Perſon as hath married twice, or married once, one that hath married twice, can be received to the dignity of Orders, in their Church.

And though ſome of the Fathers pared ſomewhat too neare the quick in this point, yet it was not as in the Romane Church, to lay ſnares, and ſpread nets for gain, and profit, and to forbid only therefore, that they might have market for their Diſpenſations; neither was it to fixe, and appropriate ſanctity, only in Eccleſiaſticall perſons, who only

muſt

A must not marry twice, but out of a tender ſenſe, and earneſt love to Continency, and out of a holy indignation, that men tumbled and wallowed ſo licentiouſly, ſo promiſcuouſly, ſo indifferently, ſo inconſiderately in all wayes of incontinency, thoſe bleſſed Fathers admitted in themſelves a ſuper-zealous, an over-vehement animoſity in this point. But yet S. Ierome himſelfe, though he remember with a holy ſcorn, that when he was at Rome in the aſſiſtance of Pope Damaſus (as his word is, Cum juvarem) he ſaw a man that had buried twenty wives, marry a wife, that buried twenty two husbands, yet for the matter, and in ſeriouſneſſe, he ſayes plainly enough, Non damno Bigamos, imo nec Trigamos, nec ſi dici poteſt octogamos, I condemne no man for marrying two, or three, or if he have a minde to it, eight wives. And ſo alſo in his former Epiſtle, Abjicimus de Eccleſia Digamos? abſit; God forbid we ſhould deny any Church aſſiſtance to any, for twice marrying; but yet, ſayes that bleſſed Father, Monogamos ad continentiam provocamus; Let me have leave to perſwade them who have been married, and are at liberty, B to continency, now at laſt.

Ep. ad Agerachiam.

Apolog. ad Pammach.

Thoſe Fathers departed not from the Apoſtles Nubat in Domino, Let them marry in the Lord; but they would fain bring the Lord to the making of every marriage, and not only the world, and worldly reſpects. For the Lord himſelf, who honoured marriage, even with the firſt fruits of his miracles, yet perſwades continency, He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. The fault which thoſe Fathers did, and we may reprehend, is, that men do not try whether they be able to receive it or no; In all Treaties of marriage, in all Contracts for Portion, and Joynture, who ever ask their children, who ever aske themſelves, whether they can live continently or no? Or what triall, what experiment can have been made of this, in Cradle-marriages? Marriage was given for a remedy; but not before any apparance of a danger. And given for Phyſick, but not before any appa- C rance of a diſeaſe. And do any Parents lay up a medicine againſt the falling ſickneſſe, for their new-born children, becauſe thoſe children may have the falling ſickneſſe? The peace of neighbouring States, the uniting of great Families for good ends, may preſent juſt occaſions of departing from ſevere rules. I only intend, as I take moſt of thoſe Fathers to have done, to leave all perſons to their Chriſtian liberty, as the Lord hath done; and yet, as the Lord hath done too, to perſwade them to conſider themſelves, and thoſe who are theirs, how far they need the uſe of that Liberty, and not to exceed that. And thus much Aquinas Expoſitors, who would needs underſtand the Women in this Text, to be Wives, have occaſioned us to ſay in this point. In our order propoſed, we paſſe now to the other conſideration, who theſe women were whom the Apoſtle makes his Examples, for they are but two, and may ſoon be conſidered.

Mat. 19. 12.

The firſt is the Widow of Zareptha, in whoſe houſe Elias the Prophet ſojourned. She 1 King. 17. D was a Widow, and a poore Widow, and might need the labour, or the providence of a husband in that reſpect: Yet ſhe ſolicites not, nor Elias endeavours not the raiſing of her dead husband to life againe. A Widow, that is, A Widow indeed, (as the Apoſtle 1 Tim. 5. 3. ſpeaks) may have in that ſtate of ſuch a Widowhood, more aſſiſtances towards the next world, then ſhe ſhould have for this, by taking another husband. For, for that Widow, Quæ in tumulo mariti, ſepeliit voluptates, Who hath buried all her affections towards Hieron. this world, in her husbands grave, the Apoſtle in that place, ordaines honour, Honour Widows, that are Widows indeed. And when he ſayes Honour, and ſpeaks of poore Widows, he ſpeaks not of ſuch honour as ſuch poore ſoules are incapable of, but of that Honour, which that word ſignifies ordinarily in the Scriptures, Qui non tam in ſalutationibus, quam in elecmoſynis, ſayes S. Chryſoſtome, which rather conſiſts in Almes, and Reliefe, then in Salutations, and Reverences, or ſuch reſpects. For ſo (as S. Ierome E notes in particular) when we are commanded to honour our Parents, it is intended wee ſhould relieve and maintain our Parents, if they be decayed. And ſuch honour the Apoſtle perſwades to be given, and ſuch honour God will provide, that is, Peace in the poſſeſſion of their eſtate, if they have any eſtate; and reliefe from others, if they have none, for Widows, that are Widows indeed.

In which qualification of theirs, that they be Widows indeed, we may well take in that Ver. 9. addition which the Apoſtle makes, That ſhe have been the wife of one man. For though we make not that an only, or an eſſentiall Character of a Widow indeed, to have had but one husband, yet we note, as Calvin doth, that the Church received Widows, in yeares, therefore, Quia timendum erat, ne ad novas nuptias aſpirarent, becauſe the Church feared that they would marry again. And certainly, if the Church feared they would, the Church had rather they would not. It is (as Calvin adds there) Pignus continentiæ, & pudoris (though Calvin were no man to be ſuſpected, to countenance the perverſneſſe of the Romane Church, in defaming, or undervaluing marriage, yet he ſayes ſo) it is a good Pawne, and Evidence of Continency, to have reſted in one husband. A

This Widow of Zarephta then, importunes not the Prophet to reſtore her dead husband; Shee beares her widows eſtate well enough; but for her dead Son ſhe doth importune him; in the agony and vehemence of a Paſſion, ſhe ſayes, at her firſt encounter with the Prophet, Quid mihi, & tibi? What have I to do with thee? Shee doth almoſt renounce the means; In irregular paſſion, a diſconſolate ſoule comes to ſay, what have I to do with Prayers, with Sermons, with Sacraments, I ſee that God hath forſaken me: but yet ſhee collects her ſelf; What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? When ſhe confeſſes him to be the man of God, ſhe doth not renounce him; When we conſider the meanes, to be means ordained by God, we finde comfort in them. Yet ſhe cannot contain the bitterneſſe of her paſſion; Art thou come unto me, to call my ſin to remembrance, and to kill my Son? She implyes thus much; Shall my ſoule never be at peace? Shall no repentance from my heart, no abſolution from thy mouth, make me ſure that God hath forgiven and forgotten my ſins? But when I have received all Seales of Reconciliation, will God ſtill puniſh thoſe ſins which he pretends to have forgiven, and puniſh them with ſo high a hand, as the taking away of my only Childe? And we may ſee an exaltation of this womans paſſion, not only in the loſſe, but in the recovery of her childe too. For when ſhe had received her childe alive, ſhe comes to that paſſionate acclamation, Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the Lord in thy mouth, is truth; As though, if this had not been done, ſhe would not have beleeved that. V. 18. B V. 14.

How then ſayes our Apoſtle in this Text, That this woman received her dead Son by faith, when ſhe declares this inordinateneſſe, this diſ-compoſedneſſe, and fluctuation of paſſion? This queſtion made S. Chryſoſtome refer this faith that the Apoſtle ſpeakes of, to the Prophet that raiſed the childe, and not to the mother; For ſhe ſeemes to him to have had none. And ſo the Syriack tranſlates this place, Reddiderunt, not Acceperunt; By faith, They, that is, the Prophets reſtored the dead, not By faith, They, that is, the mothers received their dead. C

But God forbid that naturall affections, even in an exaltation, and vehement expreſſing thereof, ſhould be thought to deſtroy faith; God forbid that I ſhould conclude an extermination of faith, in Moſes Dele me, Pardon this people, or blot my name out of thy Book; or in S. Pauls Anathema pro fratribus, That he deſired to be ſeparated from Chriſt, rather then his brethren ſhould; or in Iob, or in Ieremy, or in Ionas, when they expoſtulate, and chide with God himſelf, out of a wearineſſe of their lives; or in the Lord of Life himſelf, Chriſt Jeſus, when he came to an Vt quid dereliquiſti? To an apprehenſion that God had forſaken him upon the Croſſe. God that could reſtore her cold childe, could keep his childe, her faith, alive in thoſe hot embers of Paſſion. So God did; But he did it thus; The childe was taken from the mothers warm and ſoft boſome, and carried to the Prophets hard and cold bed. D

Beloved, we die in our delicacies, and revive not, but in afflictions; In abundancies, the blow of death meets us, and the breath of life, in miſery, and tribulation. God puts himſelf to the coſt of one of his greateſt Miracles, for her Faith; He raiſes her childe to life; And then, he makes up his own work; he continues with that childe, and makes him a good man; There are men, whom, even Miracles will not improve; but this childe (we will not diſpute it, but accept it from S. Ierome, who relates it) became a Prophet. It was that very Ionas, whom God imployed to Ninive; in which Service, he gave ſome ſignes whoſe Son he was, and how much of his mothers paſſion he inherited in his vehement expoſtulations with God. Be this then our doctrinall inſtruction for this firſt example, the Widow of Zarephta; firſt, that God thinks nothing too deare for his faithfull Children; not his great Treaſure, not his Miracles; And then God preſerves this faith of theirs, in contemplation of which only, he beſtowes this Treaſure, this Miracle, in the midſt of the ſtormes of naturall affections, and the tempeſt of diſtempered paſſions; and then laſtly, that he proceeds, and goes on in his own goodneſſe; Here he makes a Carkaſſe a Man, and then that man a Prophet; Every day he makes a dead ſoul, a ſoul again, and then that ſoul, a Saint. Prooem. in Ionam. E

A The other example in this point, is that Shunamite, whoſe dead ſon Eliſha reſtored to life. In the beginning of that Chapter, you heare of another Widow; A certaine woman, of the wives of the ſons of the Prophets, cryed unto Eliſha, Thy ſervant my husband is dead; And truly a Widow of one of the ſons of the Prophets, a Church-mans Widow, was like enough, to be poore enough; And yet, the Prophet doth not turne upon that way, either to reſtore her dead husband, or to provide her another husband; but onely enquires how ſhe was left; and finding her in poore eſtate, and in debt, provides her meanes to pay her debts, and to bring up her children, and to that purpoſe, procures a miracle from God, in the abundant increaſe of her oyle; but he troubles not God for her old, or for a new husband. But our example, to which the Apoſtle in our Text referres himſelfe, is not this Widow in the beginning, but that Mother, in the body of the Chapter, who having, by Eliſha's prayers, obtained a Son of God, after ſhe was paſt hope, and
B that Son being dead in her lap, in her alſo, (as in the former example) we may conſider, how Paſſion and Faith may conſiſt together: She asks her husband leave, That ſhe might run to the Prophet; her zeale, her paſſionate zeale haſtned her, ſhe would run, but not without her husbands leave. 2 Reg. 4. V. 22.

As S. Ierome forbids a Lady, to ſuffer her daughter, to goe to what Churches ſhe would, ſo may there be indiſcretion at leaſt, to ſuffer wives to goe to what meetings (though holy Convocations) they will; ſhe does not harbour in her houſe, a perſon dangerous to the Publike State, or to her husbands private ſtate, nor a perſon likely to ſolicite her chaſtity, though in a Prophets name; We may finde women, that may have occaſion of going to Confeſſion, for ſomething that their Confeſſors may have done to them. In this womans caſe, there was no diſguiſe; She would faine goe, and run; but not without her husbands knowledge, and allowance.

C Her husband asks her, Why ſhe would goe to the Prophet, then, being neither Sabbath, nor new Moone? He acknowledges, that God is likelier to conferre bleſſings upon Sabbaths, and new Moones, upon ſome dayes, rather then other; That all dayes are not alike with God, then, when he, by his ordinance, hath put a difference between them. And he acknowledges too, that though the Sabbath be the principall of thoſe dayes which God hath ſepoſed for his eſpeciall working, yet there are new Moones too; there are other Holy-dayes, for holy Convocations, and for his Divine and Publique Worſhip, beſides the Sabbath. But this was neither Sabbath, nor new Moone, neither Sunday, nor Holy-day; Why would ſhe goe upon that day? Beloved, though for publique meetings, in publique places, the Sabbaths, and Holy-dayes be the proper dayes, yet for conference, and counſell, and other aſſiſtances from the Prophets, and Miniſters of God, all times are ſeaſonable, all dayes are Sabbaths. V. 23.

D She goes to the Prophet; ſhe preſſes with ſo much paſſion, and ſo much faith too, and ſo good ſucceſſe, (for ſhe had her dead ſon reſtored unto her) that as from the other, ſo from this example ariſes this, That in a heart abſolutely ſurrendred to God, vehement expoſtulation with God, and yet full ſubmiſſion to God, and a quiet acquieſcence in God; A ſtorme of affections in nature, and yet a ſetled calme, and a faſt anchorage in grace, a ſuſpition, and a jealouſie, and yet an aſſurance, and a confidence in God, may well conſiſt together: In the ſame inſtant that Chriſt ſaid, Si poſſibile, he ſaid Veruntamen too; though he deſired that that cup might paſſe, yet he deſired not, that his deſire ſhould be ſatisfied. In the ſame inſtant that the Martyrs under the Altar ſay, Vſque quò Domine, How long Lord before thou execute judgement? they ſee, that he does execute judgement every day, in their behalfe. All jealouſie in God, does not deſtroy our aſſurance in him; nor all diffidence, our confidence; nor all feare, our faith. Theſe wo-
E men had theſe naturall weakneſſes, that is, this ſtrength of affections, and paſſions, and yet by this faith, theſe women received their dead, raiſed to life againe.

But yet, (which is a laſt conſideration, and our concluſion of this part) this being thus put onely in women, in the weaker ſexe, that they deſired, that they rejoyced in this reſuſcitation of the dead, may well intimate thus much unto us, that our virility, our holy manhood, our true and religious ſtrength, conſiſts in the aſſurance, that though death have divided us, and though we never receive our dead raiſed to life again in this world, yet we do live together already, in a holy Communion of Saints, and ſhal live together for ever, hereafter, in a glorious Reſurrection of bodies. Little know we, how little a way a ſoule hath to goe to heaven, when it departs from the body; Whether it muſt paſſe locally, Faminile.

through Moone, and Sun, and Firmament, (and if all that muſt be done, all that may be done, in leſſe time then I have propoſed the doubt in) or whether that ſoule finde new light in the ſame roome, and be not carried into any other, but that the glory of heaven be diffuſed over all, I know not, I diſpute not, I inquire not. Without diſputing, or inquiring, I know, that when Chriſt ſayes, That God is not the God of the dead, he ſaies that to aſſure me, that thoſe whom I call dead, are alive. And when the Apoſtle tels me, That God is not aſhamed to be called the God of the dead, he tels me that to aſſure me, That Gods ſervants loſe nothing by dying. A

Heb. 11. 16.

Menander. Thraces.

He was but a Heathen that ſaid, If God love a man, Iuvenis tollitur, He takes him young out of this world; And they were but Heathens, that obſerved that cuſtome, To put on mourning when their ſons were born, and to feaſt and triumph when they dyed. But thus much we may learne from theſe Heathens, That if the dead, and we, be not upon one floore, nor under one ſtory, yet we are under one roofe. We think not a friend loſt, becauſe he is gone into another roome, nor becauſe he is gone into another Land; And into another world, no man is gone; for that Heaven, which God created, and this world, is all one world. If I had fixt a Son in Court, or married a daughter into a plentifull Fortune, I were ſatisfied for that ſon and that daughter. Shall I not be ſo, when the King of Heaven hath taken that ſon to himſelfe, and maried himſelfe to that daughter, for ever? I ſpend none of my Faith, I exerciſe none of my Hope, in this, that I ſhall have my dead raiſed to life againe. B

This is the faith that ſuſtaines me, when I loſe by the death of others, or when I ſuffer by living in miſery my ſelfe, That the dead, and we, are now all in one Church, and at the reſurrection, ſhall be all in one Quire. But that is the reſurrection which belongs to our other part; That reſurrection which wee have handled, though it were a reſurrection from death, yet it was to death too; for thoſe that were raiſed again, died again. But the Reſurrection which we are to ſpeak of, is for ever; They that riſe then, ſhall ſee death no more, for it is (ſayes our Text) A better Reſurrection. C

2 Part. That which we did in the other part, in the laſt branch thereof, in this part we ſhall doe in the firſt; Firſt we ſhall conſider the examples, from which the Apoſtle deduceth this encouragement, and faithfull conſtancy, upon thoſe Hebrewes, to whom he directs this Epiſtle. Though, as he ſayes in the beginning of the next Chapter, he were compaſſed about with a Cloud of witneſſes, and ſo might have propoſed examples from the Authenticke Scriptures, and the Hiſtories of the Bible, yet we accept that direction, which our Tranſlators have given us, in the Marginall Concordance of their Tranſlation, That the Apoſtle, in this Text, intends, and ſo referres to that Story, which is 2 Maccab. 7. 7. To that Story alſo doth Aquinas referre this place; But Aquinas may have had a minde, to doe that ſervice to the Romane Church, to make the Apoſtle cite an Apocryphall Story, though the Apoſtle meant it not. It may be ſo in Aquinas; He might have ſuch a minde, ſuch a meaning. But ſurely Beza had no ſuch meaning, Calvin had no ſuch minde; and yet both Calvin, and Beza referre this Text to that Story. Though it be ſaid, ſayes Calvin, that Ieremy was ſtoned to death, and Eſay ſawed to death, Non dubito, quin illas perſecutiones deſignet, quæ ſub Antiocho, I doubt not, ſayes he, but that the Apoſtle intends thoſe perſecutions, which the Maccabees ſuffered under Antiochus. D

So then, there may be good uſe made of an Apocryphall Booke. It alwayes was, and alwayes will be impoſſible, for our adverſaries of the Romane Church, to eſtabliſh that, which they have ſo long endeavoured, that is, to make the Apocryphall Bookes equall to the Canonicall. It is true, that before there was any occaſion of jealouſie, or ſuſpition, that there would be new Articles of faith coyned, and thoſe new Articles authorized, and countenanced out of the Apocryphall Books, the bleſſed Fathers in the Primitive Church, afforded honourable names, and made faire and noble mention of thoſe Books. So they have called them Sacred; and more then that, Divine; and more then that too, Canonicall Books; and more then all that, by the generall name of Scripture, and Holy Writ. But the Holy Ghoſt, who fore-ſaw the danger, though thoſe bleſſed Fathers themſelves did not, hath ſhed, and dropt, even in their writings, many evidences, to prove, in what ſenſe they called thoſe Books by thoſe names, and in what diſtance they alwayes held them, from thoſe Bookes, which are purely, and poſitively, and to all purpoſes, and in all ſenſes, Sacred, and Divine, and Canonicall, and ſimply Scripture, and ſimply, Holy Writ. E

A Of this there is no doubt in the Fathers before S. Auguſtine: For all they propoſed theſe Bookes, as Canones morum, non fidei, Canonicall, that is, Regular, for applying our manners, and converſation to the Articles of Faith; but not Canonicall, for the eſtabliſhing thoſe Articles; Canonicall for edification, but not for foundation. And even in the later Roman Church, we have a good Author that gives us a good rule, Ne turberis Novitie, Let no young Student be troubled, when he heares theſe Bookes, by ſome of the Fathers, called Canonicall, for, they are ſo, ſaies he, in their ſenſe, Regulares ad ædificationem, Good Canons, good Rules for matter of manners, and converſation. And this diſtinction, ſaies that Author, will ſerve to rectifie, not onely what the Fathers afore S. Auguſtine, (for they ſpeake cleerely enough) but what S. Auguſtine himſelfe, and ſome Councels have ſaid of this matter. But yet, this difference gives no occaſion to an elimination, to an extermination of theſe Books, which we call Apocryphall. And there- B fore, when in a late forraine Synod, that Nation, where that Synod was gathered, would needs diſpute, whether the Apocryphall Bookes ſhould not be utterly left out of the Bible; And, not effecting that, yet determined, that thoſe Bookes ſhould be removed from their old place, where they had ever ſtood, that is, after the Bookes of the Old Teſtament, Exteri ſe excuſari petierunt, (ſay the Acts of that Synod) Thoſe that came to that Synod, from other places, deſire to be excuſed, from aſſenting to the diſplacing of thoſe Apocryphall Books. For, in that place, (as we ſee by Athanaſius) they preſcribe; For, though they be not Canonicall, ſaies he, yet they are Ejuſdem veteris Inſtrumenti libri, Books that belong to the Old Teſtament, that is, (at leaſt) to the elucidation, and cleering of many places in the Old Teſtament. And that the Ancient Fathers thought theſe Books worthy of their particular conſideration, muſt neceſſarily be more then evident to him that reads S. Chryſoſtomes Homilie, or Leo his Sermon upon this ve- C ry part of that Book of the Maccab: to which the Apoſtle refers in this Text; that is, to that which the ſeven Brethren there, ſuffered for a better Reſurrection. And if we take in the teſtimony of the Reformation, divers great and learned men, have interpreted theſe Books, by their particular Commentaries. Oſyander hath done ſo, and done it, with a proteſtation, that divers great Divines intreated him to do it. Conrad: Pellicanus hath done ſo too; Who, leſt theſe Books ſhould ſeeme to be undervalued, in the name of Apocryphall, ſaies, that it is fitter to call them Libros Eccleſiaſticos, rather Eccleſiaſticall, then Apocryphall Books. And of the firſt of theſe two books of the Maccab: he ſaies freely, Revera, Divini Spiritus inſtigatione, No doubt, but the holy Ghoſt moved ſome holy man to write this Book; becauſe, ſaies he, by it, many places of they Prophets are the better underſtood, and without that Booke, (which is a great addition of dignitie) Eccleſiaſtica eruditio perfecta non fuiſſet, The Church had not been ſo well enabled, to D give perfect inſtruction in the Eccleſiaſticall Story. Therefore he cals it Piiſſimum Catholicæ Eccleſiæ inſtitutum, A moſt holy Inſtitution of the Catholike Church, that thoſe Books were read in the Church; And, if that Cuſtome had been every where continued, Non tot errores increviſſent, So many errors had not growne in the Reformed Church, ſaies that Author. And to deſcend to practiſe, at this day we ſee, that in many Churches of the Reformation, their Preachers never forbeare, to preach upon Texts taken out of the Apocryphall Books. We diſcerne cleerely, and as earneſtly we deteſt the miſchievous purpoſes of our Adverſaries, in magnifying theſe Apocryphall Books; It is not, principally, that they would have theſe Books as good as Scriptures; but, becauſe they would have Scriptures no better then theſe Books: That ſo, when it ſhould appeare, that theſe Books were weake books, and the Scriptures no better then they, their owne Traditions might be as good as either. But, as their impiety is inexeuſable, that thus over- E value them, ſo is their ſingularity too, that depreſſe theſe books too farre; of which, the Apoſtle himſelfe makes this uſe, not to eſtabliſh Articles of Faith, but to eſtabliſh the Hebrews in the Articles of Faith, by examples, deduced from this Booke.

The example then, to which the Apoſtle leads them, is that Story of a Mother, and her ſeven Sons, which in one day ſuffered death, by exquiſite torments, rather then break that Law of their God, which the King preſt them to break, though but a Ceremoniall Law. Now, as Leo ſaies, in his Sermon upon their day, (for the Chriſtian Church kept a day, in memory of the Martyredome of theſe ſeven Maccabees, though they were but Jewes) Gravant audita, niſi ſuſcipiantur imitanda; It is a paine to heare the good that others have done, except we have ſome deſire to imitate them, in doing the like. Panegyrick

Panegyricke ſaid well, Oneroſum eſt, ſuccedere bono Principi; That King, that comes after a good Predeceſſour, hath a ſhrewd burthen upon him; becauſe all the World can compare him with the laſt King; and all the world will looke, that he ſhould be as good a King, as his immediate Predeceſſour, whom they all remember, was. So Gravant audita, It will trouble you to heare, what theſe Maccabees, which S. Paul ſpeaks of, ſuffered for the Law of their God, but you are weary of it, and would be glad we would give over talking of them, except you have a deſire to imitate them. And if you have that, you are glad to heare more, and more of them; and, from this Apoſtle here, you may. For he makes two uſes of their example; Firſt, that though they were tortured, they would not accept a deliverance, And then, that they put on that reſolution, That they might obtaine a better Reſurrection. A

What they ſuffered, hath exerciſed all our Grammarians, and all our Philologers, and all our Antiquaries, that have enquired into the Racks, and Tortures of thoſe times. We tranſlate it roundly, They were tortured. And S. Pauls word implies a torture of that kind, that their bodies were extended, and rackt, as upon a drumme, and then beaten with ſtaves. What the torture, intended in that word, was, we know not. But in the Story it ſelfe, to which he refers, in the Maccab: you have all theſe divers tortures; Cutting out of tongues, and cutting off of hands, and feete, and macerating in hot Cauldrons, and pulling off the skin of their heads, with their haire; And yet they would not accept a Ver. 24. deliverance. Was it offered them? Expreſly it was. The King promiſes, and ſweares to one of them, that he would make him Rich, and Happie, and his Friend, and truſt him with his affaires, if he would apply himſelfe to his deſires; and yet he would not accept this deliverance. This is that which S. Auguſt: ſaies, Sunt qui patienter moriuntur, There may be many found, that dye without any diſtemper, without any impatience, that ſuffer patiently enough; But then, Sunt qui patienter vivunt, & delectabiliter moriuntur; There are others, whoſe life exerciſes all their patience, ſo that it is a paine to them (though they indure it patiently) to live. But they could dye, not only patiently, but cheerefully; They are not onely content, if they muſt, but glad if they may dye, when they may dye ſo, as that thereby, They may obtaine a better Reſurrection. B C

And this was the caſe of theſe Martyrs, whom the Apoſtle here propoſes to the imitation of the Hebrews. They put all upon that iſſue, A better Reſurrection. So the ſecond Ver. 9. Brother ſaies to the King, Thou, like a Fury, takeſt us out of this life; but the King of the World, ſhall raiſe us up, who have dyed for his Law, unto everlaſting life. Here lay his hope; That that which dyed, that which could dye, his body, ſhould be raiſed againe. Ver. 11. So the third Brother proceeded; He held out his hands, and ſaid, Theſe I had from Heaven; and, for his Laws, I deſpiſe them; and from him, I hope to receive them again. There was his hope; a reſtitution of the ſame hands, in the Reſurrection. And ſo the fourth Ver. 14. Brother; It is good, being put to death, by men, to looke for hope, from God. Hope of what? To be raiſed up againe by him; There was his hope. And he thought he could not ſpeake more bitterly to that Tyran, then to tell him, As for thee, thou ſhalt have no Reſurrection unto life. And ſo the Mother eſtabliſht her ſelfe too; To her Sons ſhe ſaies, Ver. 22. I gave you not life in my wombe, but doubtleſſe the Creator that did, will, of his mercy, give you life againe. The ſoule needed not life againe, for the ſoule never dyed; the body Ver. 29. that dyed, did; Therefore her hope was in a Reſurrection. And to her youngeſt Son ſhe ſaid, Be worthy of thy Brethren, Take thy death, that I may receive thee againe, in mercy, with thy Brethren. All their eſtabliſhment, all their expectation, all their iſſue was, That they might obtaine a better Reſurrection. D

Now what was this that they qualified and dignified by that addition, The better Reſurrection? Is it called better, in that it is better then this life, and determined in that compariſon, and degree of betterneſſe, and no more? Is it better then thoſe honours, and preferments which that King offered them, and determined in that compariſon, and no more? Or better then other men ſhall have at the laſt day, (for all men ſhall have a Reſurrection) and determined in that? Or, as S. Chryſoſtome takes it, is it but a better Reſurrection then that in the former part of this Text, where dead children are reſtored to their mothers alive again? Is it but a better Reſurrection in ſome of theſe ſenſes? Surely better in a higher ſenſe then any of theſe; It is a ſupereminent degree of glory, a larger meaſure of glory, then every man, who in a generall happineſſe, is made partaker of the Reſurrection of the righteous, is made partaker of. E

Beloved,

A Beloved, There is nothing ſo little in heaven, as that we can expreſſe it; But if wee could tell you the fulneſſe of a ſoul there, what that fulneſſe is; the infiniteneſſe of that glory there, how far that infiniteneſſe goes; the Eternity of that happineſſe there, how long that happineſſe laſts; if we could make you know all this, yet this Better Reſurrection is a heaping, even of that Fulneſſe, and an enlarging, even of that Infiniteneſſe, and an extention, even of that eternity of happineſſe; For, all theſe, this Fulneſſe, this Infiniteneſſe, this Eternity are in all the Reſurrections of the Righteous, and this is a better Reſurrection; We may almoſt ſay, it is ſomething more then Heaven; for, all that have any Reſurrection to life, have all heaven; And ſomething more then God; for, all that have any Reſurrection to life, have all God; and yet theſe ſhall have a better Reſurrection. Amorous ſoule, ambitious ſoule, covetous ſoule, voluptuous ſoule, what wouldeſt thou have in heaven? What doth thy holy amorouſneſſe, thy holy covetouſ-
B neſſe, thy holy ambition, and voluptuouſneſſe moſt carry thy deſire upon? Call it what thou wilt; think it what thou canſt; think it ſomething that thou canſt not think; and all this thou ſhalt have, if thou have any Reſurrection unto life; and yet there is a Better Reſurrection. When I conſider what I was in my parents loynes (a ſubſtance unworthy of a word, unworthy of a thought) when I conſider what I am now, (a Volume of diſeaſes bound up together, a dry cynder, if I look for naturall, for radicall moiſture, and yet a Spunge, a bottle of overflowing Rheumes, if I conſider accidentall; an aged childe, a gray-headed Infant, and but the ghoſt of mine own youth) When I conſider what I ſhall be at laſt, by the hand of death, in my grave, (firſt, but Putrifaction, and then, not ſo much as Putrifaction, I ſhall not be able to ſend forth ſo much as an ill ayre, not any ayre at all, but ſhall be all inſipid, taſtleſſe, ſavourleſſe duſt; for a while, all wormes, and after a while, not ſo much as wormes, ſordid, ſenſleſſe, nameleſſe duſt) When I conſi-
C der the paſt, and preſent, and future ſtate of this body, in this world, I am able to conceive, able to expreſſe the worſt that can befall it in nature, and the worſt that can be inflicted upon it by man, or fortune; But the leaſt degree of glory that God hath prepared for that body in heaven, I am not able to expreſſe, not able to conceive.

That man comes with a Barly corn in his hand, to meaſure the compaſſe of the Firmament, (and when will he have done that work, by that way? ) he comes with a grain of duſt in his ſcales, to weigh the whole body of the world, (and when will he have done that work, that way? ) that bids his heart imagine, or his language declare, or his wit compare the leaſt degree of the glory of any good mans Reſurrection; And yet, there is a Better Reſurrection. A Better Reſurrection reſerved for them, and appropriated to them That fulfill the ſufferings of Chriſt, in their fleſh, by Martyrdome, and ſo become witneſſes to that Conveyance which he hath ſealed with his blood, by ſhedding their blood; and
D glorifie him upon earth (as far as it is poſſible for man) by the ſame way that he hath glorified them in heaven; and are admitted to ſuch a conformity with Chriſt, as that (if we may have leave to expreſſe it ſo) they have dyed for one another.

Neithet is this Martyrdome, and ſo this Better Reſurrection, appropriated to a reall, and actuall, and abſolute dying for Chriſt; but every ſuffering of ours, by which ſuffering, he may be glorified, is a degree of Martyrdome, and ſo a degree of improving, and bettering our Reſurrection. For as S. Ierome ſayes, That chaſtity is a perpetuall Martyrdome, So every war maintained by us, againſt our own deſires, is a Martyrdome too. In a word, to do good for Gods glory, brings us to a Good, but to ſuffer for his glory, brings us to a Better Reſurrection; And, to ſuffer patiently, brings us to a Good, but to ſuffer chearefully, and more then that, thankfully, brings us to a Better Reſurrection. If all the tor-
E ments of all the afflicted men, from Abel, to that ſoul that groanes in the Inquiſition, or that gaſpes upon his death-bed, at this minute, were upon one man at once, all that had no proportion to the leaſt torment of hell; nay if all the torments which all the damned in hell have ſuffered, from Cain to this minute, were at once upon one ſoul, ſo, as that ſoul for all that, might know that thoſe torments ſhould have an end, though after a thouſand millions of millions of Generations, all that would have no proportion to any of the torments of hell; becauſe, the extention of thoſe torments, and their everlaſtingneſſe, hath more of the nature of torment, and of the nature of hell in it, then the intenſneſſe, and the vehemency thereof can have. So, if all the joyes, of all the men that have had all their hearts deſires, were con-centred in one heart, all that would not be as a ſpark in his Chimney, to the generall conflagration of the whole world, in reſpect of the leaſt joy,

joy, that that ſoule is made partaker of, that departs from this world, immediatly after a pardon received, and reconciliation ſealed to him, for all his ſins; No doubt but he ſhall have a good Reſurrection; But then, we cannot doubt neither, but that to him that hath been carefull in all his wayes, and yet croſt in all his wayes, to him whoſe daily bread hath been affliction, and yet is ſatisfied as with marrow, and with fatneſſe, with that bread of affliction, and not only contented in, but glad of that affliction, no doubt but to him is reſerved a Better Reſurrection; Every Reſurrection is more then we can think, but this is more then that more. Almighty God inform us, and reveale unto us, what this Better Reſurrection is, by poſſeſſing us of it; And make the haſtening to it, one degree of addition in it. Come Lord Jeſus, come quickly to the conſummation of that Kingdome which thou haſt purchaſed for us, with ineſtimable price of thine incorruptible blood. Amen.

SERMON XXIII.

Preached at S. Pauls, for Eaſter-day. 1628.

1 COR. 13. 12.

For now we ſee through a Glaſſe darkly, But then face to face; Now I know in part, But then I ſhall know, even as alſo I am knowne.

THeſe two termes in our Text, Nunc and Tunc, Now and Then, Now in a glaſſe, Then face to face, Now in part, Then in perfection, theſe two ſecular termes, of which, one deſignes the whole Age of this world from the Creation, to the diſſolution thereof (for, all that is comprehended in this word, Now) And the other deſignes the everlaſtingneſſe of the next world, (for that incomprehenſibleneſſe is comprehended in the other word, Then) Theſe two words, that deſign two ſuch Ages, are now met in one Day; in this Day, in which we celebrate all Reſurrections in the roote, in the Reſurrection of our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, bleſſed for ever. For the firſt Term, Now (Now in a glaſſe, now in part) is intended moſt eſpecially of that very act, which we do now at this preſent, that is, of the Miniſtery of the Goſpell, of declaring God in his Ordinance, of Preaching his word; (Now, in this Miniſtery of his Goſpell, we ſee in a glaſſe, we know in part) And then the Then, the time of ſeeing face to face, and knowing as we are knowne, is intended of that time, which we celebrate this day, the day of Reſurrection, the day of Judgement, the day of the actuall poſſeſſion of the next life. So that this day, this whole Scripture is fulfilled in your eares; for now, (now in this Preaching) you have ſome ſight, and then, (Then when that day comes, which (in the firſt roote thereof) we celebrate this day) you ſhall have a perfect ſight of all; Now we ſee through a glaſſe, &c.

Diviſio. That therefore you may the better know him, when you come to ſee him face to face, then, by having ſeen him in a glaſſe now, and that your ſeeing him now in his Ordinance, may prepare you to ſee him then in his Eſſence, proceed we thus in the handling of theſe words. First, That there is nothing brought into compariſon, into conſideration, nothing put into the balance, but the ſight of God, the knowledge of God; It is not called a better ſight, nor a better knowledge, but there is no other ſight, no other knowledge propoſed, or mentioned, or intimated, or imagined but this; All other ſight is blindneſſe, all other knowledge is ignorance; And then we ſhall ſee how there is a twofold ſight of God, and a twofold knowledge of God propoſed to us here; A ſight, and a knowledge here in this life, and another manner of ſight, and another manner of knowledge in the life to come: For, here we ſee God In ſpeculo, in a glaſſe, that is, by reflexion, And here we know God In ænigmate, ſayes our Text, Darkly, (ſo we tranſlate it) that is, by obſcure repreſentations, and therefore it is called a Knowledge but in part;

But

A But in heaven, our ſight is face to face, And our knowledge is to know, as we are knowne.

For our ſight of God here, our Theatre, the place where we ſit and ſee him, is the whole world, the whole houſe and frame of nature, and our medium, our glaſſe, is the Booke of Creatures, and our light, by which we ſee him, is the light of Naturall Reaſon. And then, for our knowledge of God here, our Place, our Academy, our Univerſity is the Church, our medium, is the Ordinance of God in his Church, Preaching, and Sacraments; and our light is the light of faith. Thus we ſhall finde it to be, for our ſight, and for our knowledge of God here. But for our ſight of God in heaven, our place, our Spheare is heaven it ſelfe, our medium is the Pateſaction, the Manifeſtation, the Revelation of God himſelfe, and our light is the light of Glory. And then, for our knowledge of God there, God himſelf is All; God himſelf is the place, we ſee Him, in Him; God is our medium, we ſee Him, by him; God is our light; not a light which is His, but a light which is He; not a
B light which flowes from him, no, nor a light which is in him, but that light which is He himſelf. Lighten our darkneſſe, we beſeech thee, O Lord, O Father of lights, that in thy light we may ſee light, that now we ſee this through thy glaſſe, thine Ordinance, and, by the good of this, hereafter face to face.

The ſight is ſo much the Nobleſt of all the ſenſes, as that it is all the ſenſes. As the reaſonable ſoul of man, when it enters, becomes all the ſoul of man, and he hath no longer a vegetative, and a ſenſitive ſoul, but all is that one reaſonable ſoul; ſo, ſayes S. Aug. (and he exemplifies it, by ſeverall pregnant places of Scripture) Viſus per omnes ſenſus recurrit, All the ſenſes are called Seeing; as there is videre & audire, S. Iohn turned to ſee the ſound; and there is Guſtate, & videte, Taſte, and ſee, how ſweet the Lord is; And ſo of the reſt of the ſenſes, all is ſight. Employ then this nobleſt ſenſe upon the nobleſt object, ſee God; ſee God in every thing, and then thou needſt not take off thine eye from Beauty, from Riches, from
C Honour, from any thing. S. Paul ſpeaks here of a diverſe ſeeing of God. Of ſeeing God in a glaſſe, and ſeeing God face to face; but of not ſeeing God at all, the Apoſtle ſpeaks not at all.

When Chriſt tooke the blinde man by the hand, though he had then begun his cure upon him, yet hee asked him, if hee ſaw ought: Something he was ſure he ſaw; but it was a queſtion whether it were to be called a ſight, for he ſaw men but as trees. The naturall man ſees Beauty, and Riches, and Honour, but yet it is a queſtion whether he ſees them or no, becauſe he ſees them, but as a ſnare. But he that ſees God in them, ſees them to be beames and evidences of that Beauty, that Wealth, that Honour, that is in God, that is God himſelfe. The other blinde man that importuned Chriſt, Ieſus thou Son of David have mercy on me, when Chriſt asked him, What wilt thou, that I ſhall doe unto thee? Had preſently that anſwer, Lord that I may receive my ſight; And we may eaſily think, that if Chriſt had asked him a ſecond queſtion, What wouldſt thou ſee,
D when thou haſt received thy ſight, he would have anſwered, Lord I would ſee thee; For when he had his ſight, and Chriſt ſaid to him, Goe thy way, he had no way to goe from Chriſt, but, as the Text ſayes there, He followed him. All that he cared for, was ſeeing, all that he cared to ſee, was Chriſt. Whether he would ſee a Peace or a Warre, may be a States-mans Probleme; whether he would ſee plenty or ſcarcity of ſome commodity, may be a Merchants Probleme; whether he would ſee Rome, or Spaine grow in greatneſſe, may be a Jeſuits Probleme; But whether I had not rather ſee God then any thing, is no Problematicall matter. All ſight is blindneſſe, that was our firſt; all knowledge is Ignorance, till we come to God, that is our next Conſideration.

The firſt act of the will, is love, ſayes the Schoole; for till the will love, till it would have ſomething, it is not a will. But then, Amare niſi nota non poſſumus, It is impoſſible
E to love any thing till we know it: Firſt our Underſtanding muſt preſent it as Verum, as a Knowne truth, and then our Will imbraces it as Bonum, as Good, and worthy to be loved. Therefore the Philoſopher concludes eaſily, as a thing that admits no contradiction, That naturally, all men deſire to know, that they may love, But then, as the addition of an honeſt man, varies the ſignification, with the profeſſion, and calling of the man, (for he is a honeſt man at Court, that oppreſſes no man with his power; and at the Exchange he is the honeſt man, that keeps his word; and in an Army, the Valiant man is the honeſt man) ſo the Addition of learned and underſtanding, varies with the man: The Divine, the Phyſitian, the Lawyer are not quallfied, nor denominated by the ſame kinde of learning. But yet, as it is for honeſty, there is no honeſt man at Court, or Exchange, or Army, if he beleeve not in God; ſo there is no knowledge in the Phyſitian, nor Lawyer, if

if he know not God. Neither does any man know God, except he know him ſo, as G hath made himſelfe known, that is, In Chriſt. Therfore, as S. Paul deſires to know thing elſe, ſo let no man pretend to know any thing, but Chriſt Crucified; that is, Cr fied for him, made his. In the eighth verſe of this Chapt. he ſayes, Propheſie ſhall fa and Tongues ſhall faile, and Knowledge ſhall vaniſh; but this knowledge of God in Ch made mine, by being Crucified for me, ſhall dwell with me for ever. And ſo from generall conſideration, All ſight is blindneſſe, all knowledge is ignorance, but of God, paſſe to the particular Conſideration of that twofold ſight and knowledge of God preſſed in this Text, Now we ſee through a glaſſe, &c.

2. Part. Viſio.

Firſt then we conſider, (before we come to our knowledge of God) our ſight of G in this world, and that is, ſayes our Apoſtle, In ſpeculo, we ſee as in a glaſſe. But how we ſee in a glaſſe? Truly, that is not eaſily determined. The old Writers in the Optiq ſaid, That when we ſee a thing in a glaſſe, we ſee not the thing it ſelfe, but a repreſen tion onely; All the later men ſay, we doe ſee the thing it ſelfe, but not by direct, but reflected beames. It is a uſeleſſe labour for the preſent, to reconcile them. This well conſiſt with both, That as that which we ſee in a glaſſe, aſſures us, that ſuch a th there is, (for we cannot ſee a dreame in a glaſſe, nor a fancy, nor a Chimera) ſo this ſi of God, which our Apoſtle ſayes we have in a glaſſe, is enough to aſſure us, that a G there is.

This glaſſe is better then the water; The water gives a crookedneſſe, and falſe dim ſions to things that it ſhewes; as we ſee by an Oare when we row a Boat, and as the P deſcribes a wry and diſtorted face, Qui faciem ſub aqua Phœbe natantis habes, That he l ked like a man that ſwomme under water. But in the glaſſe, which the Apoſtle inter we may ſee God directly, that is, ſee directly that there is a God. And therefore S. Cy addition in this Text, is a Diminution; Videmus quaſi in fumo, ſayes he, we ſee G as in a ſmoak; we ſee him better then ſo; for it is a true ſight of God, though it be a perfect ſight, which we have this way. This way, our Theatre, where we ſit to ſee G is the whole frame of nature; our medium, our glaſſe in which we ſee him, is the Creat and our light by which we ſee him, is Naturall Reaſon.

Theatrum, Mundus. Pſal. 138. 8.

Aquinas calls this Theatre, where we ſit and ſee God, the whole world; And Da compaſſes the world, and findes God every where, and ſayes at laſt, Whither ſhall I from thy preſence? If I aſcend up into heaven, thou art there; At Babel they thought to b to heaven; but did any men ever pretend to get above heaven? above the power of wi or the impreſſion of other malignant Meteors, ſome high hils are got: But can any get above the power of God? If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttern parts of the Sea, there thy right hand ſhall hold me, and lead me. If we ſaile to the wa above the Firmament, it is ſo too. Nay, take a place, which God never made, a pl which grew out of our ſins, that is Hell, yet, If we make our bed in hell, God is there too. a wofull Inne, to make our bed in, Hell; and ſo much the more wofull, as it is more t an Inne; an everlaſting dwelling: But even there God is; and ſo much more ſtrang then in any other place, becauſe he is there, without any emanation of any beame of co fort from him, who is the God of all conſolation, or any beame of light from him, w is the Father of all lights. In a word, whether we be in the Eaſterne parts of the wo from whom the truth of Religion is paſſed, or in the Weſterne, to which it is not come; whether we be in the darkneſſe of ignorance, or darkneſſe of the works of da neſſe, or darkneſſe of oppreſſion of ſpirit in ſadneſſe, The world is the Theatre that rep ſents God, and every where every man may, nay muſt ſee him.

Medium, Creatura. Exod. 38. 8.

The whole frame of the world is the Theatre, and every creature the ſtage, the medi the glaſſe in which we may ſee God. Moſes made the Laver in the Tabernacle, of the king glaſſes of women: Scarce can you imagine a vainer thing (except you will exc the vaine lookers on, in that action) then the looking-glaſſes of women; and yet M brought the looking-glaſſes of women to a religious uſe, to ſhew them that came in, ſpots of dirt, which they had taken by the way, that they might waſh themſelves cle before they paſſed any farther.

There is not ſo poore a creature but may be thy glaſſe to ſee God in. The greateſt glaſſe that can be made, cannot repreſent any thing greater then it is: If every gnat t flies were an Arch-angell, all that could but tell me, that there is a God; and the poo worme that creeps, tells me that. If I ſhould aske the Baſilisk, how cameſt thou by th kill

killing eyes, he would tell me, Thy God made me ſo; And if I ſhould aske the Slow-worme, how cameſt thou to be without eyes, he would tell me, Thy God made me ſo. The Cedar is no better a glaſſe to ſee God in, then the Hyſſope upon the wall; all things that are, are equally removed from being nothing; and whatſoever hath any beeing, is by that very beeing, a glaſſe in which we ſee God, who is the roote, and the fountaine of all beeing. The whole frame of nature is the Theatre, the whole Volume of creatures is the glaſſe, and the light of nature, reaſon, is our light, which is another Circumſtance.

Of thoſe words, Iohn 1.9. That was the true light, that lighteth every man that commeth into the World, the ſlackeſt ſenſe that they can admit, gives light enough to ſee God by. If we ſpare S. Chryſoſtomes ſenſe, That that light, is the light of the Goſpel, and of Grace, and that that light, conſidered in it ſelf, and without oppoſition in us, does enlighten, that is, would enlighten, every man, if that man did not wink at that light; If we forbear S. Auguſtines ſenſe, That light enlightens every man, that is, every man that is enlightned, is enlightned by that light; If we take but S. Cyrils ſenſe, that this light is the light of naturall Reaſon, which, without all queſtion, enlightneth every man that comes into the world, yet have we light enough to ſee God by that light, in the Theatre of Nature, and in the glaſſe of Creatures. God affords no man the comfort, the falſe comfort of Atheiſm: He will not allow a pretending Atheiſt the power to flatter himſelf, ſo far, as ſeriouſly to thinke there is no God. He muſt pull out his own eyes, and ſee no creature, before he can ſay, he ſees no God; He muſt be no man, and quench his reaſonable ſoule, before he can ſay to himſelfe, there is no God. The difference betweene the Reaſon of man, and the Inſtinct of the beaſt is this, That the beaſt does but know, but the man knows that he knows. The beſtiall Atheiſt will pretend that he knows there is no God; but he cannot ſay, that hee knows, that he knows it; for, his knowledge will not ſtand the battery of an argument from another, nor of a ratiocination from himſelfe. He dares not aske himſelfe, who is it that I pray to, in a ſudden danger, if there be no God? Nay he dares not aske, who is it that I ſweare by, in a ſudden paſſion, if there be no God? Whom do I tremble at, and ſweat under, at midnight, and whom do I curſe by next morning, if there be no God? It is ſafely ſaid in the Schoole, Media perfecta ad quæ ordinantur, How weak ſoever thoſe meanes which are ordained by God, ſeeme to be, and be indeed in themſelves, yet they are ſtrong enough to thoſe ends and purpoſes, for which God ordained them.

And ſo, for ſuch a ſight of God, as we take the Apoſtle to intend here, which is, to ſee that there is a God, The frame of Nature, the whole World is our Theatre, the book of Creatures is our Medium, our glaſſe, and naturall reaſon is light enough. But then, for the other degree, the other notification of God, which is, The knowing of God, though that alſo be firſt to be conſidered in this world, the meanes is of a higher nature, then ſerved for the ſight of God; and yet, whilſt we are in this World, it is but In ænigmate, in an obſcure Riddle, a repreſentation, darkly, and in part, as we tranſlate it.

Scientia Dei.

As the glaſſe which we ſpoke of before, was propoſed to the ſenſe, and ſo we might ſee God, that is, ſee that there is a God, This ænigma that is ſpoken of now, this darke ſimilitude, and compariſon, is propoſed to our faith, and ſo far we know God, that is, Beleeve in God in this life, but by ænigmaes, by darke repreſentations, and alluſions. Therefore ſaies S. Auguſtine, that Moſes ſaw God, in that converſation which he had with him in the Mount, Sevocatus ab omni corporis ſenſu, Removed from all benefit and aſſiſtance of bodily ſenſes, (He needed not that Glaſſe, the helpe of the Creature) And more then ſo, Ab omni ſignificativo ænigmate Spiritus, Removed from all alluſions, or ſimilitudes, or repreſentations of God, which might bring God to the underſtanding, and ſo to the beliefe; Moſes knew God by a more immediate working, then either ſenſe, or underſtanding, or faith. Therefore ſaies that Father, Per ſpeculum & ænigma, by this which the Apoſtle cals a glaſſe, and this which he cals ænigma, a darke repreſentation, Intelliguntur omnia accommodata ad notificandum Deum, He underſtands all things by which God hath notified himſelfe to man: By the Glaſſe, to his Reaſon, by the ænigma to his faith. And ſo, for this knowing of God, by way of Beleeving in him, (as for ſeeing him, our Theatre was the world, the Creature was our glaſſe, and Reaſon was our light) Our Academy to learne this knowledge, is the Church, our Medium is the Ordinance and Inſtitution of Chriſt in his Church, and our light is the ſight of faith, in the application of thoſe Ordinances in that Church.

Academia, Ecclesia.

This place then where we take our degrees in this knowledge of God, our Academy, our University for that, is the Church; for, though, as there may be some few examples given, of men that have growne learned, who never studied at University; so there may be some examples of men enlightned by God, and yet not within that covenant which constitutes the Church; yet the ordinary place for Degrees is the University, and the ordinary place for Illumination in the knowledge of God, is the Church. Therefore did God, who ever intended to have his Kingdome of Heaven well peopled, so powerfully, so miraculously enlarge his way to it, The Church, that it prospered as a wood, which no felling, no stubbing, could destroy. We finde in the Acts of the Church, Acts 4.4. five thousand Martyrs executed in a day; And we finde in the Acts of the Apostles five thousand brought to the Church, by one Sermon; still our Christnings were equall to our burials at least. A

Luke 12.32. Therefore when Christ saies to the Church, Feare not little flock, it was not Quia de magno minuitur, sed quia de pusillo crescit, saies Chrysologus, Not because it should fall from great to little, but rise from little to great. Such care had Christ of the growth thereof; and then such care of the establishment, and power thereof, as that the first time, that Mat. 16.18. ever he names the Church, he invests it with an assurance of perpetuity, Upon this Rock will I build my Church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevaile against it; Therein is denoted the strength and stability of the Church in it selfe, and then the power and authority of the Church upon others, in those often directions, Dic Ecclesiæ, complaine to the Church, and consult with the Church, and then Audi Ecclesiam, Harken to the Church, be judged by the Church; heare not them, that heare not the Church; And then Ejice de Ecclesia, let them that disobey the Church, be cast out of the Church. In all which, we are forbidden private Conventicles, private Spirits, private Opinions. For, as S. Augustine Psal. 49. saies well, (and he cites it from another whom he names not, Quidam dixit) If a wall stand single, not joyned to any other wall, he that makes a doore through the wall, and passes through that doore, Adhuc foris est, for all this is without still, Nam domus non est, One wall makes not a house; One opinion makes not Catholique Doctrine, one man makes not a Church; for this knowledge of God, the Church is our Academy, there we must be bred; and there we may be bred all our lives, and yet learne nothing. Therefore, as we must be there, so there we must use the meanes; And the meanes in the Church, are the Ordinances, and Institutions of the Church. B C

Medium, Institutio.

The most powerfull meanes is the Scripture; But the Scripture in the Church. Not that we are discouraged from reading the Scripture at home: God forbid we should think any Christian family to be out of the Church. At home, the holy Ghost is with thee in the reading of the Scriptures; But there he is with thee as a Remembrancer, (The Holy John 14.26. Ghost shall bring to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you, saies our Saviour) Here, in the Church, he is with thee, as a Doctor to teach thee; First learne at Church and then meditate at home, Receive the seed by hearing the Scriptures interpreted here, and water it by returning to those places at home. When Christ bids you Search the Scriptures, he meanes you should go to them, who have a warrant to search; A warrant in their Calling. To know which are Scriptures, To know what the holy Ghost saies in the Scriptures, apply thy selfe to the Church. Not that the Church is a Judge above the Scriptures, (for the power, and the Commission which the Church hath, it hath from the Scriptures) but the Church is a Judge above thee, which are the Scriptures, and what is the sense of the Holy Ghost in them. D

So then thy meanes are the Scriptures; That is thy evidence: but then this evidence must be sealed to thee in the Sacraments, and delivered to thee in Preaching, and so sealed and delivered to thee in the presence of competent witnesses, the Congregation. E

2 Cor. 12.4. When S. Paul was carried up In raptu, in an extasie, into Paradise, that which he gained by this powerfull way of teaching, is not expressed in a Vidit, but an Audivit, It is not said that he saw, but that he heard unspeakeable things. The eye is the devils doore, before the eare: for, though he doe enter at the eare, by wanton discourse, yet he was at the eye before; we see, before we talke dangerously. But the eare is the Holy Ghosts first doore, He assists us with Rituall and Ceremoniall things, which we see in the Church; but Ceremonies have their right use, when their right use hath first beene taught by preaching. Therefore to hearing does the Apostle apply faith; And, as the Church is our Academy, and our Medium the Ordinances of the Church, so the light by which we see this, that is,

A is, know God ſo, as to make him our God, is faith; and that is our other Conſideration in this part.

Thoſe Heretiques, againſt whom S. Chryſoſtome, and others of the Fathers writ, The Anomæi, were inexcuſable in this, that they ſaid, They were able to know God in this life, as well as God knew himſelfe; But in this more eſpecially lay their impiety, that they ſaid, They were able to doe all this by the light of Nature, without Faith. By the light of Nature, in the Theatre of the World, by the Medium of Creatures, we ſee God; but to know God, by beleeving, not only Him, but in Him, is only in the Academy of the Church, only through the Medium of the Ordinances there, and only by the light of Faith. Lumen, fides.

The Schoole does ordinarily deſigne foure wayes of knowing God; and they make B the firſt of the foure wayes, to be by faith; but then, by faith they meane no more but an aſſent, that there is a God; which is but that, which in our former Conſiderations we called The ſeeing of God; and which indeed needs not faith, for the light of Nature will ſerve for that, to ſee God ſo. They make their ſecond way Contemplation, that is, An union of God in this life; which is truly the ſame thing that we meane by Faith: for we do not call an aſſent to the Goſpell, faith, but faith is the application of the Goſpell to our ſelves; not an aſſent that Chriſt dyed, but an aſſurance that Chriſt dyed for all. Their third way of knowing God is by Apparition; as when God appeared to the Patriarchs and others in fire, in Angels, or otherwiſe; And their fourth way is per apertam viſionem, by his cleare manifeſtation of himſelf in heaven.

Their firſt way, by aſſenting only, and their third way of apparition, are weak and uncertain wayes. The other two, preſent Faith, and future Viſion, are ſafe wayes, but admit this difference, That that of future Viſion, is gratiæ conſummantis, ſuch a knowledge C of God, as when it is once had can never be loſt nor diminiſhed, But knowledge by faith in this world, is Gratiæ communis, it is an effect and fruit of that Grace which God ſhed upon the whole communion of Saints, that is, upon all thoſe who in this Academy, the Church, do embrace the Medium, that is, the Ordinances of the Church; And this knowledge of God, by this faith, may be diminiſhed, and encreaſed; for it is but In ænigmate, ſayes our Text, darkly, obſcurely; Clearly in reſpect of the naturall man, but yet but obſcurely in reſpect of that knowledge of God which we ſhall have in heaven; for, ſayes the Apoſtle, As long as we walk by faith, and not by ſight, we are abſent from the Lord. 2 Cor. 5. 6. Faith is a bleſſed preſence, but compared with heavenly viſion, it is but an abſence; though it create and conſtitute in us a poſſibility, a probability, a kinde of certainty of ſalvation, yet that faith, which the beſt Chriſtian hath, is not ſo far beyond that ſight of God which the naturall man hath, as that ſight of God which I ſhall have in heaven, D is above that faith which we have now in the higheſt exaltation. Therefore there belongs a conſideration to that which is added by our Apoſtle here, That the knowledge which I have of God here (even by faith, through the ordinances of the Church) is but a knowledge in part. Now I know in part.

That which we call in part, the Syriack tranſlates Modicum ex multis; Though we know by faith, yet, for all that faith, it is but a little of a great deale that we know yet, becauſe, though faith be good evidence, yet faith is but the evidence of things not ſeen; Heb. 11. 1. And there is better evidence of them, when they are ſeen. For, if we conſider the object, we cannot beleeve ſo much of God, nor of our happineſſe in him, as we ſhall ſee then. For, when it is ſaid, that the heart comprehends it not, certainly faith comprehends it not neither: And if we conſider the manner, faith it ſelf is but darkneſſe in reſpect of the viſion of God in heaven: For, thoſe words of the Prophet, I will ſearch Ieruſalem with Candles, are ſpoken of the times of the Chriſtian Church, and of the beſt E men in the Chriſtian Church; yet they ſhall be ſearched with Candles, ſome darkneſſe ſhall be found in them. To the Galatians well inſtructed, and well eſtabliſhed, the Apoſtle ſayes, Now, after ye have known God, or rather are known of God; The beſt knowledge that we have of God here, even by faith, is rather that he knows us, then that we know him. And in this Text, it is in his own perſon, that the Apoſtle puts the inſtance, Now I, (I, an Apoſtle, taught by Chriſt himſelfe) know but in part. And therefore, as S. Auguſtine ſaith, Sunt quaſi cunabula charitatis Dei, quibus diligimus proximum, The love which we beare to our neighbour is but as the Infancy, but as the Cradle of that love which we beare to God; ſo that ſight of God which we have In ſpeculo, in the Glaſſe, that is, in nature, is but Cunabula fidei, but the infancy, but the cradle of that knowledge which we have in faith, and yet that knowledge which we have in faith, is but Cunabula visionis, the infancy and cradle of that knowledge which we shall have when we come to see God face to face. Faith is infinitely above nature, infinitely above works, even above those works which faith it self produces, as parents are to children, & the tree to the fruit: But yet faith is as much below vision, and seeing God face to face. And therefore, though we ascribe willingly to faith, more then we can expresse, yet let no man think himself so infallibly safe, because he finds that he beleeves in God, as he shall be when he sees God; The faithfullest man in the Church must say, Domine adauge, Lord increase my faith; He that is least in the kingdome of heaven, shal never be put to that. All the world is but Speculum, a glasse, in which we see God; The Church it self, and that which the Ordinance of the Church begets in us, faith it self, is but aenigma, a dark representation of God to us, till we come to that state, To see God face to face, and to know, as also we are known. B

Cælum, Sphæra. Now, as for the sight of God here, our Theatre was the world, our Medium and glasse was the creature, and our light was reason, And then for our knowledge of God here, our Academy was the Church, our Medium the Ordinances of the Church, and our Light the light of faith, so we consider the same Termes, first, for the sight of God, and then for the knowledge of God in the next life. First, the Sphear, the place where we shall see him, is heaven; He that asks me what heaven is, meanes not to heare me, but to silence me; He knows I cannot tell him; When I meet him there, I shall be able to tell him, and then he will be as able to tell me; yet then we shall be but able to tell one another, This, this that we enjoy is heaven, but the tongues of Angels, the tongues of glorified Saints, shall not be able to expresse what that heaven is; for, even in heaven our faculties shall be finite. Heaven is not a place that was created; for, all place that was created, shall be dissolved. God did not plant a Paradise for himself, and remove to that, as he planted a Paradise for Adam, and removed him to that; But God is still where he was before the world was made. And in that place, where there are more Suns then there are Stars in the Firmament, (for all the Saints are Suns) And more light in another Sun, The Sun of righteousnesse, the Son of Glory, the Son of God, then in all them, in that illustration, that emanation, that effusion of beams of glory, which began not to shine 6000. yeares ago, but 6000. millions of millions ago, had been 6000. millions of millions before that, in those eternall, in those uncreated heavens, shall we see God. C

Medium, Revelatio sui. This is our Spheare, and that which we are fain to call our place; and then our Medium, our way to see him is Patefactio sui, Gods laying himself open, his manifestation, his revelation, his evisceration, and embowelling of himselfe to us, there. Doth God never afford this patefaction, this manifestation of himself in his Essence, to any in this life? We cannot answer yea, nor no, without offending a great part in the Schoole, so many affirm, so many deny, that God hath been seen in his Essence in this life. There are that say, That it is fere de fide, little lesse then an article of faith, that it hath been done; And Aquinas denies it so absolutely, as that his Followers interpret him de absoluta potentia, That God by his absolute power cannot make a man, remaining a mortall man, and under the definition of a mortall man, capable of seeing his Essence; as we may truly say, that God cannot make a beast, remaining in that nature, capable of grace, or glory. S. Augustine speaking of discourses that passed between his mother, and him, not long before her death, sayes; Perambulavimus cuncta mortalia, & ipsum cælum, We talked our selves above this earth, and above all the heavens; Venimus in mentes nostras, & transcendimus eas, We came to the consideration of our owne mindes, and our owne soules, and we got above our own soules; that is, to the consideration of that place where our soules should be for ever; and we could consider God then, but then wee could not see God in his Essence. As it may be fairely argued that Christ suffered not the very torments of very hell, because it is essentiall to the torments of hell, to be eternall, They were not torments of hell, if they received an end; So is it fairely argued too, That neither Adam in his extasie in Paradise, nor Moses in his conversation in the Mount, nor the other Apostles in the Transfiguration of Christ, nor S. Paul in his rapture to the third heavens, saw the Essence of God, because he that is admitted to that sight of God, can never look off, nor lose that sight againe. Only in heaven shall God proceed to this patefaction, this manifestation, this revelation of himself; And that by the light of glory. D E

Lux Gloriæ.

A The light of glory is ſuch a light, as that our School-men dare not ſay confidently, That every beam of it, is not all of it. When ſome of them ſay, That ſome ſoules ſee ſome things in God, and others, others, becauſe all have not the ſame meaſure of the light of glory, the reſt cry down that opinion, and ſay, that as the Eſſence of God is indiviſible, and he that ſees any of it, ſees all of it, ſo is the light of glory communicated intirely to every bleſſed ſoul. God made light firſt, and three dayes after, that light became a Sun, a more glorious Light: God gave me the light of Nature, when I quickned in my mothers wombe by receiving a reaſonable ſoule; and God gave me the light of faith, when I quickned in my ſecond mothers womb, the Church, by receiving my baptiſme; but in my third day, when my mortality ſhall put on immortality, he ſhall give me the light of glory, by which I ſhall ſee himſelf. To this light of glory, the light of honour is but a glow-worm; and majeſty it ſelf but a twilight; The Cherubims and Seraphims are but Candles; and that Goſpel it ſelf, which the Apoſtle calls the glorious Goſpel, but a Star of the leaſt magnitude. And if I cannot tell, what to call this light, by which I ſhall ſee it, what ſhall I call that which I ſhall ſee by it, The Eſſence of God himſelf? and yet there is ſomething elſe then this ſight of God, intended in that which remaines, I ſhall not only ſee God face to face, but I ſhall know him, (which, as you have ſeen all the way, is above ſight) and know him, even as alſo I am knowne.

Deus omnia ſolus.

In this Conſideration, God alone is all; in all the former there was a place, and a meanes, and a light; here, for this perfect knowledge of God, God is all thoſe. Then, ſaies the Apoſtle, God ſhall be all in all. Hic agit omnia in omnibus, ſayes S. Hierome; Here God does all in all; but here he does all by Inſtruments; even in the infuſing of faith, he works by the Miniſtery of the Goſpel: But there he ſhall be all in all, doe all in all, immediately by himſelf; for, Chriſt ſhall deliver up the Kingdome to God, even the Father. His Kingdome is the adminiſtration of his Church, by his Ordinances in the Church. At the reſurrection there ſhall be an end of that Kingdome; no more Church; no more working upon men, by preaching, but God himſelf ſhall be all in all. Miniſtri quaſi larvæ Dei, ſaies Luther. It may be ſomewhat too familiarly, too vulgarly ſaid, but uſefully; The miniſtery of the Goſpell is but as Gods Vizar; for, by ſuch a liberty the Apoſtle here calls it enigma, a riddle; or, (as Luther ſayes too) Gods picture; but in the Reſurrection, God ſhall put of that Vizar, and turne away that picture, and ſhew his own face. Therefore is it ſaid, That in heaven there is no Temple, but God himſelfe is the Temple; God is Service, and Muſique, and Pſalme, and Sermon, and Sacrament, and all. Erit vita de verbo ſine verbo; We ſhall live upon the word, and heare never a word; live upon him, who being the word, was made fleſh, the eternall Son of God. Hic non eſt omnia in omnibus, ſed pars in ſingulis: Here God is not all in all; where he is at all in any man, that man is well; In Solomone ſapientia, ſaies that Father; It was well with Solomon, becauſe God was wiſdome with him, and patience in Iob, and faith in Peter, and zeale in Paul, but there was ſomething in all theſe, which God was not. But in heaven he ſhall be ſo all in all, Vt ſinguli ſanctorum omnes virtutes habeant, that every ſoule ſhall have every perfection in it ſelf; and the perfection of theſe perfections ſhall be, that their ſight ſhall be face to face, and their knowledge as they are known.

Facie ad faciem.

Since S. Auguſtine calls it a debt, a double debt, a debt becauſe ſhe asked it, a debt becauſe he promiſed it, to give, even a woman, Paulina, ſatisfaction in that high point, and myſtery, how we ſhould ſee God face to face in heaven, it cannot be unfit in this congregation, to aske and anſwer ſome ſhort queſtions concerning that. Is it alwaies a declaration of favour when God ſhewes his face? No. I will ſet my face againſt that ſoule, that eateth blood, and cut him off. But when there is light joyned with it, it is a declaration of favour; E This was the bleſſing that God taught Moſes for Aaron, to bleſſe the people with, The Lord make his face to ſhine upon thee, and be gracious to thee. And there we ſhall ſee him face to face, by the light of his countenance, which is the light of glory. What ſhall we ſee, by ſeeing him ſo, face to face? not to inlarge our ſelves into Gregories wild ſpeculation, Qui videt videntem omnia, omnia videt, becauſe we ſhall ſee him that ſees all things, we ſhall ſee all things in him, (for then we ſhould ſee the thoughts of men) reſt we in the teſtimony of a ſafer witneſſe, a Councell, In ſpeculo Divinitatis quicquid eorum interſit illuceſcet; In that glaſſe we ſhall ſee, whatſoever we can be the better for ſeeing. Firſt, all things that they beleeved here, they ſhall ſee there; and therefore, Diſcamus in terris, quorum ſcientia nobiſcum perſeveret in Cœlis, let us meditate upon no other things on earth, then then we would be glad to think on in heaven; and this consideration would put many frivolous, and many fond thoughts out of our minde, if men and women would love another but so, as that love might last in heaven. A

This then we shall get, concerning our selves, by seeing God face to face; but what concerning God? nothing but the sight of the humanity of Christ, which only is visible to the eye. So Theodoret, so some others have thought, but that answers not the scrutiest; and we know we shall see God, (not only the body of Christ) as he is in his Essence. Why? did all that are said to have seene God face to face, see his Essence? no. In earth God assumed some materiall things to appeare in, and is said to have been seene face to face, when he was seen in those assumed formes. But in heaven there is no materiall thing to be assumed, and if God be seen face to face there, he is seen in his Essence. S. Augustine summes it up fully, upon those words, In lumine tuo, In thy light we shall see light, Te scilicet in te, we shall see thee in thee; that is, sayes he, face to face. B

In Psal 36.10.

Vt cognitus. And then, what is it to know him, as we are knowne? First, is that it, which is intended here, That we shall know God so as we are known? It is not expressed in the Text so: It is only that we shall know so; not, that we shall know God so. But the frame, and context of the place, hath drawn that unanime exposition from all, that it is meant of our knowledge of God then. A comprehensive knowledge of God it cannot be; To comprehend is to know a thing as well as that thing can be known; and we can never know God so, but that he will know himselfe better: Our knowledge cannot be so dilated, nor God condensed, and contracted so, as that we can know him that way, comprehensively. It cannot be such a knowledge of God, as God hath of himselfe, nor as God hath of us; For God comprehends us, and all this world, and all the worlds that he could have made, and himselfe. But it is Nota similitudinis, non æqualitatis; As God knowes me, so I shall know God; but I shall not know God so, as God knowes me. It is not quantum, but sicut; not as much, but as truly; as the fire does as truly shine, as the Sun shines, though it shine not out so farre, nor to so many purposes. So then, I shall know God so, as that there shall be nothing in me, to hinder me from knowing God; which cannot be said of the nature of man, though regenerate, upon earth, no, nor of the nature of an Angell in heaven, left to it selfe, till both have received a super-illustration from the light of Glory. C

And so it shall be a knowledge so like his knowledge, as it shall produce a love, like his love, and we shall love him, as he loves us. For, as S. Chrysostome, and the rest of the Fathers, whom Oecumenius hath compacted, interpret it, Cognoscam practicè, ideſt, accurrendo, I shall know him, that is, imbrace him, adhere to him. Qualis sine fine festivitas! what a Holy-day shall this be, which no working day shall ever follow! By knowing, and loving the unchangeable, the immutable God, Mutabimur in immutabilitatem, we shall be changed into an unchangeablenesse, sayes that Father, that never said any thing but extraordinarily. He sayes more, Dei præsentia si in inferno appareret, If God could be seene, and known in hell, hell in an instant would be heaven. D

How many heavens are there in heaven? how is heaven multiplied to every soule in heaven, where infinite other happinesses are crowned with this, this sight, and this knowledge of God there? And how shall all those heavens be renewed to us every day, Qui non mirabimur hodiè, that shall be as glad to see, and to know God, millions of ages after every daies seeing and knowing, as the first houre of looking upon his face. And as this seeing, and this knowing of God crownes all other joyes, and glories, even in heaven, so this very crown is crowned; There growes from this a higher glory, which is, participes erimus Divinæ naturæ, (words, of which Luther sayes, that both Testaments afford none equall to them) That we shall be made partakers of the Divine nature; Immortall as the Father, righteous as the Son, and full of all comfort as the Holy Ghost. 2 Pet. 1.4.

Let me dismisse you, with an easie request of S. Augustine; Fieri non potest ut seipsum non diligat, qui Deum diligit; That man does not love God, that loves not himself; doe but love your selves: Imo solus se diligere novit, qui Deum diligit, Only that man that loves God, hath the art to love himself; doe but love your selves; for if he love God, he would live eternally with him, and, if he desire that, and indeavour it earnestly, he does truly love himself, and not otherwise. And he loves himself, who by seeing God in the Theatre of the world, and in the glasse of the creature, by the light of reason, and knowing God in the Academy of the Church, by the Ordinances thereof, through the light of faith,

A faith, indeavours to ſee God in heaven, by the manifeſtation of himſelfe, through the light of Glory, and to know God himſelf, in himſelf, and by himſelf, as he is all in all; Contemplatively, by knowing as he is known, and Practically, by loving, as he is loved.

SERMON XXIV.

Preached upon Eaſter-day. 1629.

JOB 4. 18.

Behold, he put no truſt in his Servants, And his Angels he charged with folly.

WE celebrate this day, the Reſurrection of our Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, Bleſſed for ever; and in His, all ours; All, that is, the Reſurrection of all Perſons; All, that is, the Reſurrection of all kinds, whether the Reſurrection from calamities in this world, Ezechiels Reſurrection, where God ſaies to him, Putaſne vivent? Son of man doeſt thou thinke, theſe ſcattered Bones can live againe? or the Reſurrection from ſin, S. Johns Reſurrection, Bleſſed is he that hath his part in the firſt Reſurrection: Or of the Reſurrection to Glory, S. Pauls Reſurrection, that is, more argued, and more particularly eſtabliſhed, by that Apoſtle, then by the reſt. C This Reſurrection to glory, is the conſummation of all the others; therefore we looke eſpecially at this; and in this, our qualification in this ſtate of glory, is thus expreſſed by our Saviour Chriſt himſelfe, Erimus ſicut Angeli, In the Reſurrection, we ſhall be as the Angels. And that we might not flatter our ſelves in a dreame of a better eſtate, then the Angels have, in this text we have an intimation, what their ſtate and condition is, Behold, he put no truſt in his Servants, and his Angels he charged with folly.

Ezek. 8.6. Apo. 20.5. 1 Cor. 15. Luke 20.36.

In our handling of theſe words, theſe ſhall be our two parts; De quibus, and De quo; Of whom theſe words are ſpoken, and then of what; Firſt, what is poſitively ſaid, and then, what is conſequently inferred; what propoſed, and what concluded; what of the Angels, and then, what of us, who ſhall be like the Angels. In the firſt, the Perſons of whom theſe words are ſpoken, becauſe, though our Interpreters vary in opinions, yet D even from their various opinions, there ariſe good inſtructions, we ſhall rather Problematically inquire, then Dogmatically eſtabliſh, firſt, whether theſe words were ſpoken of Angels, or no; whether this word Angell, in this text, be not (as it is in many other places of Scriptures, and in the nature of the Word it ſelfe) communicable to other ſervants, and other meſſengers then thoſe, whom ordinarily we intend, when we ſay Angels; and then ſecondly, if the words be ſpoken of Angels, then, whether of Good or Bad Angels, of thoſe which ſtand now, or thoſe which fell at firſt; and againe, if of thoſe that ſtand, then what degree of perfection they have, and what that which we uſe to call their Confirmation, is, how it accrues to them, and how it works in them, if even of them it be ſaid, Behold, he put no truſt in his Servants, and his Angels he charged with folly. In our ſecond part, what was inferd upon theſe premiſſes, what was concluded out of theſe propoſitions, what reflected upon us, by this aſſimilation of ours to the Angels, becauſe E it is a matter of much weight, we ſhall firſt, in our entrance into that part, conſider the weight of the teſtimony, in the Perſon that gives it; for it is not Iob himſelfe that ſpeaks theſe words; It is but one of his friends; but Elephaz, but the Temanite, a Gentile, a ſtranger from the Covenant and the Church of God, and yet his words are part of the Word of God. And then for the matter that is inferd, from our aſſimilation to the ſtate of Angels, will be fairely collected, that if thoſe Angels ſtand, but by the ſupport of Grace, & not by any thing inſeparably inhering in their nature, when we are at our beſt, in heaven, we ſhall do but ſo neither; much leſſe whilſt we are upon earth, have we in us any impoſſibility of falling, by any thing already done for us; Our ſtanding is meerely from the grace of God, and therefore let no man aſcribe any thing to himſelfe; and Let him

him that ſtandeth take heed leſt he fall; for, God hath done no more for the beſt of us, here nor hereafter, then for thoſe Angels, and of them we heare here, He put no truſt in his Servants, and his Angels he charged with folly. A

1 Part. An Angeli.

Firſt then, for our firſt Diſquiſition, in our firſt part, De quibus, the perſons of whom theſe words are ſpoken. Amongſt all our Expoſitors of this book of Iob, (which are very many) and amongſt all Authors, Ancient and Moderne, which have had occaſion in their Sermons and Tractates to reflect upon this text, (which are many more, infinite) I have never obſerved more then one, that denies theſe words to be ſpoken of Angels, or that there is any mention, any intention, any intimation of Angels, in theſe words. And, (which is the greater wonder) this one ſingle man, who thus departs from all, and prefers himſelfe above all, is no Jeſuit neither; It is but a Capuccin, but Bolduc upon this Book of Iob, and yet he adventures to ſay, That that Perſon of whom it is ſaid in this text, He put no truſt in his Servants, and He charged his Angels with folly, is not God; and that they of whom it is ſaid, He truſted not his Servants, and his Angels he charged with folly, are not Angels; But that all that Eliphaz intended in all this paſſage of Iob, was no more but this, That no great Perſon muſt truſt in any kind of Greatneſſe, particularly not in great retinues, and dependances, of many ſervants, and powerfull inſtruments, for that was Iobs owne caſe, and yet he loſt them all. The doctrine truly is good; neither ſhould I ſo dainly condemne his ſingularity, if it were well grounded. For, though in the expoſition of Scriptures, ſingularity alwaies carry a ſuſpition with it, ſingularity is Indicium, (as we ſay in the Law) ſome kind of evidence, It is Semi-probatio, a kind of halfe-proofe againſt that man, that holds an opinion, or induces an interpretation different from all other men; yet as theſe which we call Indicia, in the Law, worke but ſo, as that they may bring a man to his oath, or, in ſome caſes, to the rack, and to torture, but are not, alone ſufficient to condemne him; So if we finde this ſingularity in any man, we take from thence juſt occaſion to queſtion and ſift him, and his Doctrine, the more narrowly, but not only upon that, preſently to condemne him. For this was S. Auguſtines caſe; S. Auguſtine induced new Doctrines, in divers very important points, different from all that had written before him; but, upon due examination, for all his ſingularity, the Church hath found reaſon to adhere to him, in thoſe points, ever ſince his reaſons prevailed. In our ſingle Capuccins caſe here in our text, it is not ſo. B C

And therefore here we muſt continue that complaint, which we are often put to make, of the iniquity of the Roman Church to us; If the Fathers ſeeme to agree in any point, wherein we differ from them, they cry out, we depart from the Fathers; If we adhere to the Fathers, in any point, in which they differ from them, then they cry out, we forſake the Church; Still they preſſe us with their Trent-Canon, You muſt interpret Scriptures according to the unanime conſent of the Fathers, and yet they ſuffer a ſingle Capuccin of their owne, to depart from the Fathers, and Sons, from the Ancient and Moderne Expoſitors in their owne Church, And, I may adde, from the Holy Ghoſt too, from the evident purpoſe and meaning of the place, in more places, then any Author, whom I have ſeene, and in this, more then in any other place, when he ſaies, with ſuch aſſurance, that in theſe words, He put no truſt in his Servants, and his Angels he charged with folly, there is no mention, no intention of God, or Angels, but it is onely ſpoken of men, of the infidelity of ſervants, and of the inſecurity of Maſters relying upon ſuch dependancies. D

An de Angelis Bonis.

We take this then, as All do, All, (for this ſingle Capuccin makes no conſiderable exception, more then a mole-hill to the roundneſſe of the earth) to be ſpoken of Angels, which was our firſt probleme and diſquiſition; And our ſecond is, being ſpoken of Angels, of what Angels they are ſpoken, Good or Bad, of thoſe that fell, or thoſe that ſtood. Here we meet with the ſame rub as before, ſingularity. For, amongſt all our Expoſitors upon this book, I have not obſerved any other then Calvin, to interpret this place, of the good Angels, of thoſe that ſtand confirmed in grace. Not that Calvin is to be left alone, in that opinion, as though he were the onely man, that thought that the good Angels, conſidered in themſelves, might be defective in the offices committed unto them by God; for, it is evident that Origen in divers of his Homilies upon the book of Numbers, in his twentieth, and twentie two, and foure, and twentie ſixt, and in his thirteenth Homily upon S. Luke, And as evident that S. Hierom himſelfe upon the firſt verſe of the ſixt Chapter of Micheas, thought and taught, That thoſe good Angels whom E

God

A God appoints for the tuition of certaine men, and certaine places, in this world, ſhall give an account at the day of Judgement, of the execution of their office, whether the men committed to them, have not fallen ſometimes by their fault, and their dereliction; for ſo does he (and not he only) underſtand that place, That we ſhall judge the Angels; As alſo, thoſe words in the beginning of the Revelation, which S. John is commanded by Chriſt, to write to the Angels of certaine Churches, that Father, S. Hierom interprets not only of figurative, and Metaphoricall Angels, the Biſhops of thoſe Churches, but literally of the Angels of Heaven. 1 Cor. 6. 3.

So then Calvin is from any ſingularity in that, That the good Angels conſidered in themſelves, may be defective; but becauſe he may be ſingular in interpreting this Text, of good Angels, (as for ought I have obſerved he is) this ſingularity of his, may be a juſt reaſon of ſuſpending our aſſent, but not a juſt reaſon preſently to condemne his expoſi-
B tion. The Church muſt be as juſt to him, as it was to S. Auguſtine, that is, to examine his grounds. And truly, his ground is faire; his ground is firme. It is this, that though this ſeeme to derogate from the honour of Angels, that being confirmed, they ſhould be ſubject to weakneſſe, yet, ſaies he, we muſt not pervert, nor force any place of Scripture, for the honour of the Angels. For indeed, the perverting, and forcing of Scriptures, for the over-honouring of Saints, hath induced a chain of Hereſies in the Romane Church. And that this is a forcing of Scripture, to underſtand this Text of fallen Angels, Calvin argues rationally, That thoſe Angels which are ſpoken of here, are called the ſervants of God; And devils are but his ſlaves, not his ſervants; They execute his will, but againſt their will; Good Angels are the ſervants of God; Nor ſhall we eaſily finde that Ti-
C tle, The ſervant of God, applyed to ill perſons in the Scriptures. Therefore, (as he notes uſefully) God doth not charge Angels in this Text, with rebellion, or obſtination, or any haynous crime, but only with folly, weakneſſe, infirmity, from which, in all degrees, none but God himſelf can be free. Though therefore there be no ſuch neceſſity of accepting this expoſition, as ſhould produce that confident aſſeveration which he comes to, Dubium non eſt, It can admit no doubt, but this place muſt be thus underſtood, (for, by his favour, it may admit a doubt) yet neither is there any ſuch newneſſe in it, (becauſe it is grounded upon Truth, and all Truth is ancient) but that it may very well be received; And therefore, as the ſenſe that is moſt fit to advance his purpoſe that ſpeakes it, (which is one principall thing to be conſidered in every place) as the ſenſe that moſt conduces to Eliphaz his end, and to prove that which he intends to Iob, without laying obligation upon any to think ſo, or imputation upon any that doth not think ſo, we accept this interpretation of theſe words; that they are ſpoken of Angels, (which was our firſt) and of good Angels, (which was our ſecond diſquiſition) and now proceed to our third,
D what their confirmation is, and how it works, if for all that, God put no truſt in thoſe ſervants, but charged thoſe Angels with folly.

That Moſes did ſpeak nothing of the fall, or of the confirmation of Angels, may juſtly ſeem a convenient reaſon to think, that he meant to ſpeak nothing of the creation of Angels neither. If Moſes had intended to have told us of the creation of Angels, he would have told us of their fall, and confirmation too; as having told us ſo particularly of the making of man, he tells us as particularly of the fall of man, and the reſtitution of man, by the promiſe of a Meſſiah in Paradiſe. Confirmatio.

And therefore, that the Angels are wrapped up in that word of Moſes, The Heavens, and that they were made when the heavens were made, or that they are wrapped up in that word of Moſes, The Light, and that they were made, when Light was made, is all but conjecturall, & cloudy: Neither doth any article of that Creed, which we call the Apo-
E ſtles, direct us upon any conſideration of Angels. That they were created long before this world, all the Greek Fathers of the Eaſtern Church did conſtantly think; And in the Weſterne Church, amongſt the Latine Fathers, S. Ierome himſelf was ſo cleare in it, as to ſay, Sex millia, noſtri orbis, nondum implentur anni, Our world is not yet ſix thouſand yeares old, Et quantas æternitates, quantas ſæculorum origines, ſayes that Father, what infinite revolutions of ages, what infinite eternities, did the Powers, and Principalities, and Thrones, and Angels of God, ſerve God in before? Theodoret that thinkes not ſo, thinks it not againſt any article of Faith, to think that it was ſo. Aquinas, that thinkes not ſo, will not call it an errour, to think ſo, out of a reverence to Athanaſius, and Nazianzen, who did think ſo; for that is an indelible character, which S. Ierome hath imprinted printed upon thoſe two Fathers, That no man ever durſt impute errour to Athanaſius, or Nazianzen. Therefore S. Auguſtine ſayes moderately, and with that diſcreet and charitable temper which becomes every man, in matters that are not fundamentall, Vt volet, unuſquiſq; accipiat; I forbid no man, ſayes he, either opinion, That the Angels were made before the world, or with it; Dum non Deo coæternos, & de vera fælicitate ſecuros non ambigat; Only this I forbid him, that he do not beleeve the Angels to be coeternall with God; For, if they were never made, but ſubſiſt of themſelves, then they are God, If they be not creatures, they are Creators; And then, this I forbid him too, ſayes he, That he do not think the Angels now in any danger of falling. So that S. Auguſtine makes this, matter of faith, That the Angels cannot fall; Nor hath S. Auguſtine any adverſary in that point; we only inquire how they acquired this Infallibility, and aſſurance in their ſtation. For, if they were made ſo long before this world, and fell when this world was made, ſince they that had ſtood ſo long, fell then, why may not they that ſtand yet, fall now? They are ſupported and eſtabliſhed by a confirmation, ſayes the Schoole; And that is our preſent and ordinary anſwer; and it is enough; But how, or when was this confirmation ſealed upon them, or how doth it work in them, if God doe not yet truſt theſe ſervants, but charge theſe Angels with folly?

Viatores. That the Angels were created Viatores, and not Beati, in a poſſibility of everlaſting bleſſednesſe, but not in actuall poſſeſſion of it, admits no doubt, becauſe ſome of them did actually fall. Of whom S. Auguſtine ſayes, Beatæ vitæ dulcedinem non guſtaverunt, nec faſtidiverunt acceptam; The Angels had not already fed upon Manna, and then were weary of that; Non ex eo quod acceperant, ceciderunt, ſed ex eo, quod, ſi ſubdi Deo voluiſſent, accepiſſent, They fell not from that which they were come to, but from that, to which, if they had applyed themſelves to God, they ſhould have come. So that then, they were not created in a ſtate of bleſſedneſſe, but in a way to it; and there was in them Pinguedo ſpiritus (as S. Ierome ſayes elegantly) they were meere ſpirits; but if we compare them with God, there was a certain fleſhlineſſe, ſayes he, a certain fatneſſe, a ſlipprineſſe of falling into a worſe ſtate, for any thing that was in their nature; and the nature of thoſe that fell, and thoſe that ſtood, is all one, neither is their nature that do ſtand, changed by the benefit of their confirmation. Hence is it, that the Fathers are both ſo evident, and ſo concurrent in that aſſertion, That an Angel is a ſpirit, Gratiâ, & non Naturâ immortalitatem ſuſcipiens, that is, Immortall, but Immortall by additionall Grace, and not by Nature. Take it in the eldeſt; Immortalitas eorum ex aliena voluntate pendet, they have an Immortality, but dependant upon the will of another. And agreeably to the another, Quia ortum habuerunt, occidere poſſunt, Becauſe the Angels were produced of nothing, they may be reduced to nothing; for, Solus Deus naturaliter immortalis, ſayes that Father, Only God is immortall in himſelf, and by nature. And bring it from the elder to later Fathers, ſtill we ſhall meet that which was ſaid before by them, and S. Bernard ſayes after, Non creati, ſed facti immortales, they were not created at firſt, but made immortall after. Which S. Hierome carries even to a ſpirituall death, the death of ſin; Licèt non peccent, peccati tamen ſunt capaces, ſayes he; though Angels do not ſin, if they were left to themſelves, they might ſin; As S. Ambroſe expreſſes the ſame thing elegantly, Non in præjudicium trahas, you muſt not draw that into conſequence, nor conclude ſo, Non moritur Gabriel, Vriel, Raphael non moritur, That the Angel Gabriel doth not die, Raphael, Vriel doth not die, therefore an Angel, and conſidered in his own nature, cannot die; for ſuch an impoſſibility of dying, as in the ſoul of man, all agree to be in Angels; for, We ſhall be like the Angels, which cannot die, ſayes Chriſt. But how this Immortality, and Infallibility accrues to them, and works in them, is ſtill under our diſquiſition, ſince In theſe his ſervants God puts no truſt, but charges theſe Angels with folly.

An. Chriſti 512. We have in the Eccleſiaſticall Story, a ſtory of Alamandarus, a King of the Saracens, who having been converted, and baptized, and catechized in the true faith, was after attempted by ſome Biſhops in his Court, of the Eutychian hereſie. The Eutychian hereſie was, That the divine nature in Chriſt, the Godhead, ſuffered aſwell as the Humane; and the good King, providing a Packet of Intelligence to be delivered him, or ſomething to be whiſpered in his eare in the preſence of thoſe hereticall Biſhops, upon reading thereof he told them, that he had received news, That Michael the Archangell was dead; And when thoſe Biſhops rejected that with a ſcorn, Alas Sir, Gabriel cannot die, Angels cannot die, The King replyed, if an Angel cannot die, if an Angel be impaſſible, why would you

In Oſeam. Damaſc. Juſt. Mart. Cyrill Alex.

A you make me beleeve, that the God-head it ſelf, the Divine Nature ſuffered in Chriſt? So we ſee, that the piety of a religious King was able to maintain his holy ſtation, even againſt the reall practices of hereticall Court Biſhops. A pious and religious King ſhould not eaſily be ſuſpected of that levity, to hearken to impious and hereticall motions, though there were good evidence, that that were practiſed upon him; much leſſe, when the feares in himſelf, and in thoſe which ſhould practiſe upon him, are but imaginary, and proceed, (as by Gods grace they doe) rather out of zeale that it may not be ſo, then out of evidence that it is ſo. Zeale diſtempered, (and God knowes, zeale is not alwaies well tempered) will think an Alamandurus, a conſtant and impregnable King, eaſily ſhaked; and zeale diſtempered will think an Athanaſius, a Nazianzen, an Eutychian Biſhop. Woe, when Gods ſword is in the Devils hand! zeale is Gods ſword; uncharitableneſſe is the Devils. When God gave a flaming ſword to the Cherubims in Paradiſe,
B they make good that place, but that ſword killed no body, wounded no body. God gives good men zeale; zeale to make good their ſtation, zeale to conſerve the integrity and the ſincerity of Religion, but this zeale ſhould not wound, not defame any man. Faith comes by hearing, by hearing Sermons, and God ſends us many of them; Charity goes out by hearing, by hearing rumours, and the Devill ſends many of them. God continue our faith, and reſtore our charity.

That Angels are impaſſible, that they cannot ſin, that they cannot die, all ſay; but that, if they were left to themſelves, without the ſupport of additionall grace, they might doe both; not only the Ancient Fathers, but, both the firſt Schoole, from Damaſcen, and the middle Schoole, from Lombard, and the later Schoole, (if we except only thoſe Authors that have writ ſince the Lateran Councell, I meane the later Lateran Councell, in our Fathers times, (under Leo the tenth) in which Councell, it was firſt determined, that the
C ſoul of man (and conſequently Angels) was immortall by nature) doe waigh down the ſcale on that ſide, That God does not ſo truſt in thoſe ſervants, nor ſo diſcharge them, of all weakneſſe, but that they might fall, but for this ſupport of grace, which is their Confirmation. Now how is this conferd upon them?

In Chriſt certainly; In Chriſt the Father reconciled to himſelf all things in earth, and in heaven. How? Not as a Redeemer; for thoſe that fell, and thereby needed a redemption, never were, never ſhall be redeemed; but as a Mediator, an Interceſſor in their behalf, that thoſe that doe ſtand, may ſtand for ever. For, therefore, ſayes S. Auguſtine, doe the Angels refuſe ſacrifice at our hands, Quia & ipſi nobiſcum ſacrificium norunt, Becauſe they know that there is one ſacrifice offered to God, for them, and for us too, that is Chriſt Jeſus, a propitiation for them, and us; For us, by way of redemption; for them, by way of Mediation, and Interceſſion. In ſuch a ſenſe, as S. Auguſtine confeſſes that God
D had forgiven him the ſins he never did, becauſe but for his grace he ſhould have done them, the Angels are well ſaid to have received a reconciliation in Chriſt, becauſe, but for his mediation, they might have fallen into Gods diſpleaſure. Upon thoſe words, that God ſhewed Adam his judgements, Quæ judicia? ſaies that Biſhop Catharinus, what judgements did God ſhew Adam? Iudicia peſſimorum ſpirituum, ſayes he, the better to containe Adam in his duty, God declared to him, the judgement that he had executed upon thoſe diſobedient Angels. So that, as Adam, if he had made a right uſe of Gods grace, had been immortall in his body, and yet not immortall then, by nature, as our bodies in the ſtate of glory in the reſurrection, ſhall be immortall, and yet not immortall then by nature; ſo no Angell, after this Confirmation, (that is, the mediation of Chriſt applied to him) ſhall fall: For, Quis Catholicus ignorat, nullum novum Diabolum ex bonis Angelis futurum? Who can pretend to be a Catholique, and beleeve, that ever there ſhall be any
E new Devill from amongſt the good Angels? And yet, by the way, many of the Ancient Fathers thought that thoſe words, That the ſons of God ſaw the daughters of men to be faire, and fell in love with them, were meant of good Angels, who fell in love with thoſe women, that were committed to their charge, and that they ſinned in ſo doing, and that they never returned to heaven, but fell to the firſt fallen Angels: So that thoſe Fathers have more then implied a poſſibility of falling into ſin, and puniſhment for ſin, in the good Angels.

But this none ſayes now; nor with any probability ever did. It is enough that they ſtand confirmed, confirmed by the grace of God in Chriſt Jeſus; ſo that now, being in poſſeſſion of the ſight of God, and the light of Glory, their underſtanding is perfectly illuſtrated, luſtrated, ſo that they can apprehend nothing erroneouſly, and therefore their will is perfectly rectified, ſo that they can deſire nothing irregularly, and therefore they cannot ſin, and therefore they cannot die; for all ſin is from the perverſeneſſe of the will, and all diſorder in the will from errour in the underſtanding; In heaven they are, and we, by our aſſimilation to them, ſhall be free from both, and impeccable, and impaſſible, by the continuall grace of God; Though if they, or we were left to our ſelves, even there, God could put no truſt in his ſervants, nor leave his Angels uncharged with folly. And ſo we have done with the pieces, which conſtitute our firſt part, De quibus, of whom theſe words are ſpoken; Firſt, that they were ſpoken of Angels, rejecting that ſingle Capuccin, who only denies it; and then, of good Angels, accepting Calvins interpretation, becauſe, though he be ſingular in applying this Text to that Doctrine, yet in the Doctrine it ſelf, he hath authority enough, and faire reaſons for the Text it ſelfe; and laſtly, how that which we call Confirmation in thoſe Angels accrewes to them, and how it works in them. And ſo we paſſe to our ſecond Part, what is inferred upon theſe premiſſes, what concluded upon theſe propoſitions, what by our aſſimilation to Angels, reflects upon us.

2. Part. Teſtis Eliphaz.

And here, becauſe the matter is of much conſideration, we propoſed firſt to be conſidered, the waight and validity of the teſtimony, in the perſon of him that gives it; for many times the credit of the teſtimony depends much upon the credit of the witneſſe: And here, it is not Iob himſelf, it is but Eliphaz, Eliphaz the Temanite, an Alien, a ſtranger to the Covenant, and Church of God. But ſurely no greater a ſtranger, then thoſe ſecular Poets, whoſe ſentences S. Paul cites not only in his Epiſtles, but in his Sermons too. Certainly not ſo great a ſtranger, as the Devill, and yet in how many places of Scripture, are words ſpoken by the Devill himſelf inſerted into the Scriptures, and thereby, ſo farre made the word of God, as that the word of God, the Bible, were not perfect nor intire to us, if we had not thoſe words of thoſe Poets, thoſe words of the Devill himſelf in it? How can I doubt but that God can draw good out of ill, and make even ſome ſin of mine, ſome occaſion of my ſalvation, when the God of truth can make the word of the father of lies, his word? There is but one place in all this Book of Iob cited in the New Teſtament; that is, He taketh the wiſe in their owne craft; and thoſe words are not ſpoken by Iob himſelf, but by this very friend of Iob, this Eliphaz, that ſpeaks in our Text; and yet they are cited, in the phraſe, and manner, in which holy Scripture is ordinarily cited, It is written, ſayes the Apoſtle there, and ſo the Holy Ghoſt, that ſpoke in S. Paul, hath canonized the words ſpoken by Eliphaz.

Job 5.13.

Viſio.

But beſides the credit which theſe words have, à poſteriori, that they are after inſerted into the word of God, (which is another manner of credit, and authentiqueneſſe, then that which the Canoniſts ſpeak of, that when any ſentence of a Father is cited, and inſerted into a Decretall Epiſtle of a Pope, or any part of the Canon Law, that ſentence is thereby made authenticall, and canonicall) theſe words have their credit à priori, for, before he ſpake them to Iob, he received them in a viſion from God. I had a viſion in the night, ſayes he, and feare, and trembling came upon me, and a ſpirit ſtood before me, and I heard this voyce.

Ver. 12.

Neither is there any neceſſity, no nor reaſon, to charge Eliphaz with a falſe relation, or counterfaiting a revelation from God, which he had not had, as ſome Expoſitors have done. For, howſoever in ſome argumentations, and applyings of things to Iobs particular caſe, we may finde ſome errors in Eliphaz, in modo probandi, in the manner of his proceeding, yet we ſhall not finde him to proceed upon falſe grounds; and therefore, we beleeve Eliphaz to have received this that he ſayes, from God, in a viſion, and for the inſtruction of a man, more in Gods favour then himſelf, of Iob. Balaam had the reputation of a great Wizard, and yet God made his Aſſe wiſer then he, and able to inſtruct and catechize him. Generally we are to receive our inſtructions from Gods eſtabliſhed Ordinances, from his ordinary meanes afforded to us, in his Church: And where thoſe meanes, ſufficient in themſelves, are duly exhibited to us, we are not to hearken after revelations, nor to beleeve every thing, that may have ſome ſuch apparance, to be a revelation.

But yet, we are not ſo to conclude God in his Law, as that he ſhould have no Prerogative, nor ſo to binde him up in his Ordinances, as that he never can, or never does work by an extraordinary way of revelation. Neither muſt the profuſion of miracles, the prodigality

A digality and proſtitution of miracles in the Romane Church, (where miracles for every naturall diſeaſe may be had, at ſome Shrine, or miracle-ſhop, better cheap, then a Medicine, a Drugge, a Simple at an Apothecaries) bring us to deny, or diſtruſt all miracles, done by God upon extraordinary cauſes, and to important purpoſes. Eliphaz was a prophane perſon, and yet received a Viſion from God, and for the inſtruction of Iob himſelfe.

What was it? we ſee ver. 17. Shall mortall man be more juſt then God, ſhall a man be more pure then his Maker? Why? Did this Doctrine need this ſolemnity, this preparation, that Eliphaz gives it, v. 8. That it was a thing told him in ſecret, and ſuch a ſecret, that he was able to comprehend but a little at once of it? Is there any ſuch incomprehenſibleneſſe, any ſuch difficulty in this Doctrine, That no mortall man is more juſt then God, no man more pure then his Maker, but that the ſhalloweſt capacity may receive it, and the ſhorteſt memory B retaine it? Needs this a Revelation, an extraordinary conveyance? For the generall knowledge it does not; Every man will ſay, he knowes mortall man cannot be more juſt then God, nor any man purer then his Maker; But, for the particular conſideration it does. Every juſtifying a ſin, is a making mortall man more juſt then God; when I come to ſay, With what juſtice can God puniſh a nights, or an houres ſin, with everlaſting torments? Every murmuring at Gods corrections is a making man purer then God; when I come to ſay, Does not God depart farther from the purity of his nature, when he is an angry, and a vindicative God, then I from mine, when I am an amorous, or wanton man? We that are but mortall men, muſt not think, ſayes Eliphaz, to make our ſelves purer then our Maker; for, they, who in their nature, are much purer then we, the Angels, are farre ſhort of that, for, God put no truſt in thoſe ſervants, and thoſe Angells he charged with folly. Quid.

So then, though Eliphaz his premiſſes reach to the Angels, and their ſtate, his infe- C rence and his laſt purpoſe fals upon us, who, by Gods goodneſſe, become capable of ſucceſſion into the place of the Angels that are fallen, and of an aſſociation, and aſſimilation to thoſe Angels that ſtand. And our aſſimilation is this, That as they have in their ſtation, we alſo ſhall have in ours, a faithfull certitude, that we ſhall never fall out of the armes and boſome of our gracious God. But then, there ariſes to us a ſweeter relliſh in conſidering this ſtability, this perpetuity, this infallibility to conſiſt in the continuall ſucceſſion, and ſupply of grace, then in any one act, which God hath done for them, or us. I conceive a more effectual delight, when I conſider God to have ſo wrought the confirmation of Angels, that he hath taken them into a ſtate of glory, and a fruition of his ſight, and to perpetuate that ſtate unto them, perpetually ſuperinfuſes upon them more and more beames of that glory, then if I ſhould conſider God to have confirmed them, with ſuch a meaſure of grace, at once, as that he could not withdraw, or they could for- D feit that grace. For, as there is no doubt made by the Fathers, nor by the Schoole, but that that light which the Apoſtles ſaw at the Transfiguration of Chriſt, was that very light of glory, which they ſee now in Heaven, and yet they loſt the ſight of that light againe; ſo is there no violation of any Article of our Faith, if we concurre in opinion with them, who ſay, That S. Paul in his extaſie, in his rapture into the third heaven, did ſee that very light of glory, which conſtitutes the Beatificall Viſion, and yet did loſe that light againe.

Truly to me, this conſideration, That as his mercy is new every morning, ſo his grace is renewed to me every minute, That it is not by yeſterdaies grace that I live now, but that I have Panem quotidianum, and Panem horarium, My daily bread, my hourely bread, in a continuall ſucceſſion of his grace, That the eye of God is open upon me, though I winke at his light, and watches over me, though I ſleep, That God makes theſe returnes E to my ſoule, and ſo ſtudies me in every change, this conſideration, infuſes a ſweeter verdure, and imprints a more cheerefull tincture upon my ſoule, then any taſte of any one Act, done at once, can miniſter unto me. God made the Angels all of one naturall condition, in nature all alike; and God gave them all ſuch grace, as that thereby they might have ſtood; and to them that uſed that grace aright, he gave a farther, a continuall ſucceſſion of grace, and that is their Confirmation; Not that they cannot, but that they ſhall not fall; not that they are ſafe in themſelves, but by Gods preſervation ſafe; for, otherwiſe, He puts no truſt in thoſe Servants, and thoſe Angels he charges with folly.

This is our caſe too, ours that are under the bleſſed Election, and good purpoſe of God upon us; if we do not fall from him, it is not of our ſelves, for left to our ſelves, we ſhould:

Iohn 5.

For, ſo S. Auguſtine interprets thoſe words of our Saviour, Pater operatur, My Father worketh ſtill; God hath not accompliſhed his worke upon us, in one Act, though an Election; but he works in our Vocation, and he works in our Juſtification, and in our Sanctification he works ſtill. And, if God himſelfe be not ſo come to his Sabbath, and his reſt in us, but that he works upon us ſtill for all that Election, ſhall any man thinke to have ſuch a Sabbath, ſuch a reſt, in that Election, as ſhall ſlacken our endeavour, to make ſure our Salvation, and not worke as God works, to his ends in us? Hence then we baniſh all ſelf-ſubſiſtence, all attributing of any power, to any faculty of our own; either by preoperation, in any naturall or morall diſpoſing of our ſelves, before Gods preventing grace diſpoſe us, or by ſuch a cooperation, as ſhould put God and man in Commiſſion together, or make grace and nature Collegues in the worke, or that God ſhould do one halfe, and man the other; or any ſuch poſt-operation, That I ſhould thinke to proceed in the waies of godlineſſe, by vertue of Gods former grace, without imploring, and obtaining more, in a continuall ſucceſſion of his concomitant grace, for every particular action: In Chriſt I can do all things; I need no more but him; without Chriſt, I can doe nothing; not onely not have him, but not know that I need him; for I am not better then thoſe Angels, of whom it is ſaid, He put no truſt in thoſe Servants, and thoſe Angels hee charged with folly.

And as we baniſh from hence all ſelf-ſubſiſtence, all opinion of ſtanding by our ſelves, ſo doe we alſo all impeccability, and all impoſſibility of falling in our ſelves, or in any thing, that God hath already done for us, if he ſhould diſcontinue his future grace, and leave us to our former ſtock. They that were raiſed from death to life againe, Dorcas, Lazarus, and the reſt, were ſubject to ſin, in that new life, which was given them. They that are quickned by the ſoule of the ſoule, Election it ſelfe, are ſubject to ſin, for all that. God ſees the ſins of the Elect, and ſees their ſins to be ſins; and in his Ephemerides, his journals, he writes them downe, under that Title, ſins, and he reads them every day, in that booke, as ſuch; and they grow greater and greater in his ſight, till our repentance have waſhed them out of his ſight. Caſuiſts will ſay, that though a dead man raiſed to life againe, be not bound to his former marriage, yet he is bound to that Religion, that he had inveſted in Baptiſme, and bound to his former religious vowes, and the ſame obedience to Superiours as before. We were all dead in Adam; and he that is raiſed againe, even by Election, though he be not ſo married to the world, as others are, not ſo in love with ſin, not ſo under the dominion of ſin, yet he is as much bound to an obedience to the Will of God declared in his Law, and may no more preſume of a liberty of ſinning before, nor of an impunity of ſin after, then he that pretends no ſuch Election, to confide in. For, this is excellently ſaid, to be the working of our election, by Proſper, the Diſciple of S. Auguſtines Doctrines, and the Eccho of his words, Vt fiat permanendi voluntaria, fælixque neceſſitas, That our aſſurance of ſalvation by perſeverance, is neceſſary, and yet voluntary; Conſider it in Gods purpoſe, eaſily it cannot, conſider it in our ſelves, it might be reſiſted. For we are no better then thoſe Angels, and, In thoſe ſervants he put no truſt, and thoſe Angels he charged with folly.

Proſper.

But ſuch as they are, we ſhall be: And, ſince with the Lord there is Copioſa Redemptio, Plenteous Redemption, that overflowing mercy of our God, thoſe ſuper-ſuperlative Merits of our Saviour, that plenteous Redemption, may hold even in this particular bleſſednеſſe, in our aſſimilation to them, That as, though there fell great numbers of Angels, yet great, and greater then they that fell, ſtood, So though The way to Heaven be narrow, and the gate ſtrait, (which is ſaid by Chriſt, to excite our induſtry, and are rather an expreſſion ariſing out of his mercy, leſt we ſhould ſlacken our holy endeavours, then any intimidation, or commination) (for though the way be narrow, and the gate ſtrait, yet the roome is ſpacious enough within) why, by this plenteous redemption, may we not hope, that many more then are excluded, ſhall enter there? Thoſe words, The dragons taile drew the third part of the ſtars from Heaven, the Fathers generally interprete of the fall of Angels with Lucifer; and it was but a third part; And by Gods grace, whoſe mercy is overflowing, whoſe merits are ſuper-abundant, with whom there is plenteous redemption, the ſerpent gets no farther upon us. I know ſome ſay, that this third part of the ſtars, is meant of eminent perſons, illuſtrated and aſſiſted with the beſt meanes of ſalvation, and, if a third of them, how many meanlier furniſhed, fall? But, thoſe that we can conſider to be beſt provided of meanes of ſalvation, next to theſe, are Chriſtians in generall;

A nerall; and ſo may this plenteous Redemption be well hoped to worke, that but a third part of them, of Chriſtians, ſhall periſh; and then the God of this plenteous Redemption having promiſed us, that the Chriſtian Religion ſhall be carried over all the world, ſtill the number of thoſe that ſhall be ſaved is enlarged.

Apply to thy ſelfe that which S. Cyril ſaies of the Angels, Triſtaris, quia aliqui vitam amiſerunt? Does it grieve thee, that any are fallen? At plures meliorem ſtatum apud Deum obtinent, Let this comfort thee, even in the application thereof to thy ſelfe, that more ſtood then fell. As Eliſha ſaid to his ſervant, in a danger of ſurpriſall, Feare not, for they that be with us, are more then they that are with them, ſo, if a ſuſpition of the paucity of them that ſhall be ſaved, make thee afraid, looke up upon this overflowing mercy of thy God, this ſuper-abundant merit of thy Saviour, this plenteous Redemption, and thou maiſt finde, finde in a faire credulity, and in a well regulated hope, more with thee, then B with them that periſh. Live ſo, in ſuch a warfare with tentations, in ſuch a colluctation with thy concupiſcences, in ſuch a jealouſie, and ſuſpition of thine indifferent, nay, of thy beſt actions, as though there were but one man to be ſaved, and thou wouldſt be that one; But live and die in ſuch a ſenſe of this plenteous Redemption of thy God, as though neither thou, nor any could loſe ſalvation, except he doubted of it. I doubt not of mine own ſalvation; and in whom can I have ſo much occaſion of doubt, as in my ſelf? When I come to heaven, ſhall I be able to ſay to any there, Lord! how got you hither? Was any man leſſe likely to come thither then I? There is not only an Onely God in heaven; But a Father, a Son, a Holy Ghoſt in that God; which are names of a plurality, and ſociable relations, converſable notions. There is not only one Angel, a Gabriel; But to thee all Angels cry aloud; and Cherubim, and Seraphim, are plurall terminations; many Cherubs, many Seraphs in heaven. There is not only one Monarchall C Apoſtle, a Peter, but The glorious company of the Apoſtles praiſe thee. There is not onely a Proto-Martyr, a Stephen, but The noble army of Martyrs praiſe thee. Who ever amongſt our Fathers, thought of any other way to the Moluccaes, or to China, then by the Promontory of Good hope? Yet another way opened it ſelf to Magellan; a Straite; it is true; but yet a way thither; and who knows yet, whether there may not be a North-Eaſt, and a North-Weſt way thither, beſides? Go thou to heaven, in an humble thankfulneſſe to God, and holy cheerfulneſſe, in that way that God hath manifeſted to thee; and do not pronounce too bitterly, too deſperately, that every man is in an errour, that thinkes not juſt as thou thinkeſt, or in no way, that is not in thy way. God found folly, weakneſſe in his Angels, yet more ſtood then fell; God findes weakneſſe, wickedneſſe in us, yet hee came to call, not the righteous, but ſinners to repentance; and who, that comes in that capacity, a Repentant ſinner, can be ſhut out, or denied his part in this Reſurrection?

D The key of David opens, and no man ſhuts. The Son of David, is the key of David, Chriſt Jeſus; He hath opened heaven for us all; let no man ſhut out himſelf, by diffidence in Gods mercy, nor ſhut out any other man, by overvaluing his own purity, in reſpect of others. But forbearing all lacerations, and tearings, and woundings of one another, with bitter invectives, all exaſperations by odious names of ſubdiviſion, let us all ſtudy, firſt the redintegration of that body, of which Chriſt Jeſus hath declared himſelfe to be the head, the whole Chriſtian Church, and pray that he would, and hope that he will enlarge the means of ſalvation to thoſe, who have not yet been made partakers of it. That ſo, he that called the gates of heaven ſtraite, may ſay to thoſe gates, Elevamini portæ æternales, Be ye lifted up, ye eternall gates, and be ye enlarged, that as the King of glory himſelf is entred into you, for the farther glory of the King of glory, not only that hundred and foure and forty thouſand of the Tribes of the children of Iſrael, but that multitude E which is ſpoken of in that place, which no man can number, of all Nations, and Kindreds, and People, and friends, may enter with that acclamation, Salvation to our God, which ſitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lamb for ever. And unto this City of the living God, the heavenly Ieruſalem, and to the innumerable company of Angels, to the generall aſſembly, and Church of the firſt born, which are written in heaven, and to God the Iudge of all, and to the ſpirits of juſt men made perfect, and to Ieſus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of ſprinkling, that ſpeaks better things then that of Abel, Bleſſed God bring us all, for thy Sons ſake, and by the operation of thy Spirit. Amen.

SERMON XXV.

Preached at S. Pauls, upon Easter-day. 1630.

MAT. 28. 6.

He is not here, for he is risen, as he said; Come, See the place where the Lord lay.

THese are words spoken by an Angel of heaven, to certain devout Women, who, not yet considering the Resurrection of Christ, came with a pious intention to do an office of respect, and civill honour to the body of their Master, which they meant to embalme in the Monument where they thought to finde it. How great a compasse God went in this act of the Resurrection? Here was God, the God of life, dead in a grave, And here was man, a dead man, risen out of the grave; Here are Angels of heaven imployed in so low an office, as to catechize Women, and Women imployed in so high an office, as to catechize the Apostles. I chose this verse out of the body of the Story of the Resurrection, because in this verse the act of Christs rising, (which we celebrate this day) is expressly mentioned, Surrexit enim, for he is risen: Which word stands as a Candle, that shews it self, and all about it, and will minister occasion of illustrating your understanding, of establishing your faith, of exalting your devotion in some other things about the Resurrection, then fall literally within the words of this verse. For, from this verse we must necessarily reflect, both upon the persons (they to whom, and they by whom the words were spoken) and upon the occasion given. I shall not therefore now stand to divide the words into their parts and branches, at my first entring into them, but handle them, as I shall meet them again anon, springing out, and growing up from the body of the Story; for the Context is our Text, and the whole Resurrection is the work of the day, though it be virtually, implicitely contracted into this verse, He is not here, for he is risen, as he said; Come, and see the place where the Lord lay.

Mulieres.

Our first consideration is upon the persons; and those we finde to be Angelicall women, and Euangelicall Angels: Angels made Euangelists, to preach the Gospell of the Resurrection, and Women made Angels, (so as Iohn Baptist is called an Angel, and so as the seven Bishops are called Angels) that is, Instructers of the Church; And to recompence that observation, that never good Angel appeared in the likenesse of woman, here are good women made Angels, that is, Messengers, publishers of the greatest mysteries of our Religion. For, howsoever some men out of a petulancy and wantonnesse of wit, and out of the extravagancy of Paradoxes, and such singularities, have called the faculties, and abilities of women in question, even in the roote thereof, in the reasonable and immortall soul, yet that one thing alone hath been enough to create a doubt, (almost an assurance in the negative) whether S. Ambroses Commentaries upon the Epistles of S. Paul, be truly his or no, that in that book there is a doubt made, whether the woman were created according to Gods Image; Therefore, because that doubt is made in that book, the book it self is suspected not to have had so great, so grave, so constant an author as S. Ambrose was; No author of gravity, of piety, of conversation in the Scriptures could admit that doubt, whether woman were created in the Image of God, that is, in possession of a reasonable and an immortall soul.

Mal. 3. 1.
Apoc. 1. 20.

The faculties and abilities of the soul appeare best in affaires of State, and in Ecclesiasticall affaires; in matter of government, and in matter of religion; and in neither of these are we without examples of able women. For, for State affaires, and matter of government, our age hath given us such a Queen, as scarce any former King hath equalled; And in the Venetian Story, I remember, that certain Matrons of that City were sent by Commission, in quality of Ambassadours, to an Empresse with whom that State had occasion occaſion to treate; And in the Stories of the Eaſtern parts of the World, it is ſaid to be in ordinary practiſe to ſend women for Ambaſſadours. And then, in matters of Religion, women have evermore had a great hand, though ſometimes on the left, as well as on the right hand. Sometimes their abundant wealth, ſometimes their perſonall affections to ſome Church-men, ſometimes their irregular and indiſcreet zeale hath made them great aſſiſtants of great Heretiques; as S. Hierome tels us of Helena to Simon Magus, and ſo was Lucilia to Donatus, ſo another to Mahomet, and others to others. But ſo have they been alſo great inſtruments for the advancing of true Religion, as S. Paul teſtifies in their behalf, at Theſſalonica, Of the chiefe women, not a few; Great, and Many. For, many times women have the proxies of greater perſons then themſelves, in their boſomes; many times women have voices, where they ſhould have none; many times the voices of great men, in the greateſt of Civill, or Eccleſiaſticall Aſſemblies, have been in the power and diſpoſition of women.

Hierom. Acts 17.4.

Hence is it, that in the old Epiſtles of the Biſhops of Rome, when they needed the Court, (as, at firſt they needed Courts as much, as they brought Courts to need them at laſt) we finde as many letters of thoſe Popes to the Emperours Wives, and the Emperours Mothers, and Siſters, and women of other names, and intereſts in the Emperours favours and affections, as to the Emperours themſelves. S. Hierome writ many letters to divers holy Ladies; for the moſt part, all of one ſtocke and kindred; and a ſtock and kindred ſo religious, as that I remember, the good old man ſaies, That if Iupiter were their Couſin, of their kindred, he beleeves Iupiter would be a Chriſtian; he would leave being ſuch a God as he was, to be their fellow-ſervant to the true God.

Now if women were brought up according to S. Hieromes inſtructions in thoſe letters, that by ſeaven yeares of age, they ſhould be able to ſay the Pſalmes without book; That as they grew in yeares, they ſhould proceed in the knowledge of Scriptures, That they ſhould love the Service of God at Church, but not ſine Matre, not goe to Church when they would, but when their Mother could goe with them, Nec quærerent celebritatem Eccleſiarum, They ſhould not alwaies goe to the greateſt Churches, and where the moſt famous Preachers drew moſt company; If women have ſubmitted themſelves to as good an education as men, God forbid their ſexe ſhould prejudice them, for being examples to others. Their ſexe? no, nor their ſins neither: for, it is S. Hieromes note, That of all thoſe women, that are named in Chriſts pedegree in the Goſpell, there is not one, (his onely Bleſſed Virgin-Mother excepted) upon whom there is not ſome ſuſpitious note of incontinency. Of ſuch women did Chriſt vouchſafe to come; He came of woman ſo, as that he came of nothing but woman; of woman, and not of man. Neither doe we reade of any woman in the Goſpel, that aſſiſted the perſecutors of Chriſt, or furthered his afflictions; Even Pilats wife diſſwaded it. Woman, as well as man, was made after the Image of God, in the Creation; and in the Reſurrection, when we ſhall riſe ſuch as we were here, her ſexe ſhall not diminiſh her glory: Of which, ſhe receives one faire beame, and inchoation in this Text, that the purpoſe of God, is, even by the miniſtery of Angel s, communicated to women. But what women? for, their preparation, their diſpoſition is in this Text too; ſuch women, as were not only devout, but ſedulous, diligent, conſtant, perſeverant in their devotion; To ſuch women God communicated himſelf; which is another Conſideration in theſe perſons.

As our Saviour Chriſt was pleaſed, that one of theſe women ſhould be celebrated by name, for another act upon him, Mary Magdalen, and that whereſoever his Goſpell was preached, her act ſhould be remembred, ſo the reſt, with her, are worthy to be known and celebrated by their names; Therfore we conſider, Quæ, and quales; firſt who they were, and then what they were; their names firſt, and then their conditions. There is an Hiſtoricall relation, and obſervation, That though there be divers Kingdomes in Europe, in which the Crowns may fall upon women, yet, for ſome ages, they did not, and when they did, it was much at one time, and all upon women of one name, Mary. It was ſo with us in England, and in Scotland it was ſo; ſo in Denmark, and in Hungary it was ſo too; all foure, Maries. Though regularly women ſhould not preach, yet when theſe Legati à latere, theſe Angels from heaven did give Orders to women, and made them Apoſtles to the Apoſtles, the Commiſſion was to women of that name, Mary; for, though our Expoſitors diſpute whether the Bleſſed Virgin Mary were there then, when this paſſed at the the Sepulchre, yet of Mary Magdalen, and Mary the Mother of Iames, there can be no doubt. Indeed it is a Noble, and a Comprehenſive name, Mary. It is the name of woman, in generall; For, when Adam ſayes of Eve, She ſhall be called Woman, in the Arabique Tranſlation, there is this name, She ſhall be called Mary; and the Arabique is, perchance, a dialect of the Hebrew. But in pure, and Originall Hebrew, the word ſignifies Exaltation, and whatſoever is beſt in the kinde thereof. This is the name of that ſiſter of Aaron, and Moſes, that with her Quire of women aſſiſted at that Euchariſticall ſacrifice, that Triumphant ſong of Thankſgiving, upon the deſtruction, the ſubverſion, the ſubmerſion of Ægypt, in the Red Sea. Her name was Miriam; and Miriam and Mary is the ſame name in women, as Ioſuah and Ieſus is the ſame name to men. The word denotes Greatneſſe, not only in Power, but in Wiſdome, and Learning too; and ſo ſignifies often Prophets, and Doctors; and ſo falls fitlieſt upon theſe bleſſed women, who, in that ſenſe, were all made Maries, Meſſengers, Apoſtles to the Apoſtles; in which ſenſe, even thoſe women were made Maries, (that is, Meſſengers of the Reſurrection) who, no doubt, had other names of their own. There was amongſt them, the wife of Chuſa, a great man in Herods Court, his Steward; and her name was Ioanna, Ioane. So that here was truly a Pope Ioane, a woman of that name, above the greateſt men in the Church. For the dignity of the Papacy, they venture to ſay, that whoſoever was S. Peters Succeſſor in the Biſhoprick of Rome, was above any of the Apoſtles, that over-lived Peter; as S. Iohn did; Here was a woman, a Pope Ioane, Superiour to S. Peter himſelf, and able to teach him. But though we found juſt reaſon to celebrate theſe women by name, we meant not to ſtay upon that circumſtance; we ſhut it up with this prayer, That that bleſſing which God gave to theſe Maries, which was, to know more of Chriſt, then their former teachers knew, he will alſo be pleaſed to give to the greateſt of that name amongſt us, That ſhe may know more of Chriſt, then her firſt teachers knew. And we paſſe on, from the Names, to the Conditions of theſe women.

And firſt we conſider their ſedulity; ſedulity, that admits no intermiſſion, no interruption, no diſcontinuance, no tepidity, no indifferency in religious offices. Conſider we therefore their ſedulity if we can. I ſay, if we can; becauſe if a man ſhould ſit down at a Bee-hive, or at an Ant-hill, and determine to watch ſuch an Ant, or ſuch a Bee, in the working thereof, he would finde that Bee, or that Ant ſo ſedulous, ſo ſerious, ſo various, ſo concurrent with others, ſo contributary to others, as that he would quickly loſe his marks, and his ſight of that Ant, or that Bee; So if we fixe our conſideration upon theſe devout women, and the ſedulity of their devotion, ſo as the ſeverall Euangeliſts preſent it unto us, we may eaſily loſe our ſight, and hardly know which was which, or, at what time ſhe or ſhe came to the Sepulchre. They came in the end of the Sabbath, as it begun to dawne, towards the firſt day of the week, ſayes S. Mathew; They came very early in the morning, upon the firſt day of the week, the Sun being then riſen, ſayes S. Mark; They prepared their Spices, and reſted the Sabbath, and came early the next day, ſayes S. Luke; They came the firſt day, when it was yet dark, ſayes S. Iohn. From Friday Evening, till Sunday morning they were ſedulous, buſie upon this ſervice; ſo ſedulous, as that Athanaſius thinks theſe women came foure ſeverall times to the Sepulchre, and that the foure Euangeliſts have relation to their foure commings; and S. Hierome argues upon this ſeeming variety in the Euangeliſts, thus, Non mendacii ſignum, ſed ſedulæ viſitationis officium, This variety argues no uncertainty in the Euangeliſts, but teſtifies the ſedulity of thoſe women they ſpeak of; Dum crebrò abeunt & recurrunt, ſayes he, whilſt they make many acceſſes, and returnes, Nec patiuntur à Sepulchro diu, aut longiùs abeſſe, and cannot indure to be farre diſtant, or long abſent from their devout exerciſe.

Beloved, true devotion is a ſerious, a ſedulous, an impatient thing. He that ſaid in the Goſpell, I faſt twice a week, was but a Phariſee; He that can reckon his devout actions, is no better; He that can tell how often he hath thought upon God to day, hath not thought upon him often enough. It is S. Auguſtines holy Circle, to pray, that we may heare Sermons profitably, and to heare Sermons that we learn to pray acceptably. Devotion is no Marginall note, no interlineary gloſſe, no Parentheſis that may be left out; It is no occaſionall thing, no conditionall thing; I will goe, if I like the Preacher, if the place, if the company, if the weather; but it is of the body of the Text, and layes upon us an Obligation of fervour and of continuance. This we have in this example of theſe, not only Euangelicall, but Euangeliſticall (preaching) women; And thus much more, that

A as they were ſedulous and diligent after, ſo they were early, and begun betimes; for, howſoever the Euangeliſts may ſeeme to vary, in the point of time, when they came, they all agree they came early, which is another exaltation of Devotion.

They were women of quality, and meanes. They came with Chriſt from Galilee, and they came upon their owne charges; and more then ſo; for, ſaies the text, They miniſtred to Chriſt of their ſubſtance. Women of quality may be up and ready early enough for Gods ſervice, if they will. If they be not, let them but ſeriouſly aske themſelves that queſtion, whether upon no other occaſion, no entertainment, no viſit, no letter to or from another, they could have made more haſte; And if they finde they could, I muſt ſay in that caſe, as Tertullian ſaid, They have put God and that man into the balance, and waighed them together, and found God too light. That Mighty, that waighty, that ponderous God, that blaſts a State with a breath, that melts a Church with a looke, B that molders a world with a touch, that God is waighed downe with that man; That man, whoſe errand, if it be but converſation, is vanity, but, if it be ſin, is nothing, waighs downe God. The world will needs thinke one of theſe Maries, (Magdalen) to have been guilty of ſuch entertainments as theſe, of Incontinency, and of that in the loweſt (that is, the higheſt) kinde, Proſtitution; perchance ſhe was; But, I would there were that neceſſity of thinking ſo, that becauſe ſhe was a Woman, and is called a ſinner, therefore that muſt be her ſin, as though they were capable of no other ſin; Alas, it is not ſo. There may be women, whom even another ſin, the ſin of Pride, and over-valuation of themſelves may have kept from that ſin, and yet may well be called ſinners too; There may be found women, whom only their ſcorne of others, hath kept honeſt, and yet are ſinners, though not in that ſin. But yet, even this woman, Mary Magdalen, be her ſin what you will, came early to Chriſt; early, as ſoone as he afforded her any light. Chriſt ſaies, C in the perſon of Wiſdome, I love them that love me, and they that ſeeke me early, ſhall finde me; And a good ſoule will eccho back that returne of David, O God, thou art my God, early will I ſeeke thee; my ſoule thirſteth for thee, my fleſh longeth for thee; and double that eccho with Eſay, With my ſoule have I deſired thee in the night, with my ſpirit within me, will I ſeeke thee early.

Now, what is this early ſeeking of God. Firſt, there is a generall rule given by Salomon, Remember thy Creator in the dayes of thy youth; ſubmit thy ſelfe to a religious diſcipline betimes. But then, in that there is a Now inſerted into that rule of Solomons, (Remember Now thy Creator, in the dayes of thy youth,) there is an intimation, that there is a youth in our age, and an earlineſſe acceptable to God, in every action; we ſeeke him early, if we ſeeke him at the beginning of every undertaking. If I awake at midnight, and embrace God in mine armes, that is, receive God into my thoughts, and purſue thoſe meditati- D ons, by ſuch a having had God in my company, I may have fruſtrated many tentations that would have attempted me, and perchance prevailed upon me, if I had beene alone, for ſolitude is one of the devils ſcenes; and, I am afraid there are perſons that ſin oftner alone, then in company; but that man is not alone that hath God in his ſight, in his thought. Thou preventedſt me with the bleſſings of goodneſſe, ſaies David to God. I come not early enough to God, if I ſtay till his bleſſings in a proſperous fortune prevent me, and lead me to God, I ſhould come before that. The dayes of affliction have prevented me, ſaies Iob. I come not early enough to God, if I ſtay till his Judgements prevent me, and whip me to him; I ſhould come before that. But, if I prevent the night watches, and the dawning of the morning, If in the morning my prayer prevent thee O God, (which is a high expreſſion of Davids, That I ſhould wake before God wakes, and even prevent his preventing grace, before it be declared in any outward act, that day) If before bleſſing or E croſſe fall upon me, I ſurrender my ſelfe intirely unto thee, and ſay, Lord here I lye, make thou theſe ſheets my ſheets of penance, in inflicting a long ſickneſſe, or my winding ſheete, in delivering me over to preſent death, Here I lye, make thou this bed mine Altar, and binde me to it in the cords of decrepitneſſe, and bedridneſſe, or throw me off of it into the grave and duſt of expectation, Here I lye, doe thou chooſe whether I ſhall ſee any to morrow in this world, or begin my eternall day, this night, Thy Kingdome come, thy will be done; when I ſeeke God, meerely for love of him, and his glory, without relation to his benefits or to his corrections, this is that early ſeeking, which we conſider in thoſe bleſſed Women, whoſe ſedulity and earneſtneſſe, when they were come, and acceleration and earlineſſe, in their comming, having already conſidered, paſſe we now now to the Ad quid, to what purpose, and with what intention they came, for in that alone, there are divers exaltations of their devotion. A

Ad quid. In the first verse of this Chapter it is said, They came to see the Sepulchre; Even to see the Sepulchre was an act of love, and every act of love to Christ, is Devotion. There is a love that will make one kisse the case of a picture, though it be shut; There is a love that will melt ones bowels, if he do but passe over, or passe by the grave of his dead friend. But their end was not onely to see the Sepulchre, but to see whether the Sepulchre were in such state, as that they might come to their end, which was, To embalme their Masters body. But this was done before; and done to their knowledge; for, that all the Euangelists testifie; particularly, S. Luke, The women followed, and beheld the Sepulchre, and how the body was laid. How, that is, how abundantly it was embalmed by Nicodemus. How, that is, how decently and orderly it was wound and bound up, according to the manner of the Jews funerals. What then intended these women to doe more then was done already?

Theophy. Gen. 50.1. That cannot be well admitted, which Theophylact saies, That as Iacobs body was embalmed forty dayes in Egypt, so they intended to re-embalme our Saviours body, formerly embalmed by Nicodemus. For, that was onely done upon such bodies as were exenterated and embowelled, and then filled up, and plastered about with spices and gums, to preserve them from putrifaction, when they were to be carried into remote parts; But of these re-embalmings and post-unctions after the body had beene laid in the Sepulchre, I know not, who may have read of them; I have not. Neither seemes it to have beene possible in this case; not possible for these women to have come to the body of Christ. For, if that be the true winding sheet of Christ which is kept in Savoy, it appeares, that that sheet stuck so close to his body, as that it did, and does still retaine the dimensions of his body, and the impressions and signatures of every wound that he had received in his body. So that it would have beene no easie matter for those women to have pulled off that sheet, if it had had no other glue, no other gumme, but his owne precious blood to hold it; But, if (as their more wary Authors say) Christs body were carried loose, in that sheet, which is shewed in Savoy, from the Crosse to the Sepulchre, and then taken out of that sheet, and embalmed by Nicodemus, and wrapped up in other linnen, upon those spices and gummes which he bestowed upon it, and then buried according to the manner of the jews, whose manner it was to swathe the bodies of the dead, just as we swathe the bodies of children, all over, (for, so Lazarus came out bound hand and foote with grave-cloathes) how could it fall into the imagination of these women, that they could come to embalme the body of Christ, so swathed, so wound, so bound up, as that body was; for, certainly, it was the body, and not the grave-cloathes that they meant to embalme.

Truly I have often wondred, that amongst our very many Expositors of the Gospels, (which I can pronounce of some scores) no one hath touched upon this doubt. They all make good use of their piety, and devout officiousnesse towards their dead Master, but of the impossibility of comming to that body, and of the irregularity, and impertinency of undertaking that, and proceeding so far in that, which could not possibly be done, I find no mention. What shal be said of this? That may be said, which Chrysologus saies, (though not of this, for of this none saies any thing) Sæva passionis procella turbaverat, That a bitter storme of passion and consternation, had so disordered them, as that no faculty of theirs performed the right function; And that which Calvin saies, of the same case, which Chrysologus intends, Præ fervore cæcutiebant, Vehemence and earnestnesse had discomposed them, amazed them, amuzed them so, as that they discerned nothing clearely, did nothing orderly. This, these, and some other Authors say, of some other inconsiderations in these Women, particularly, of the removing of the stone of the Sepulchre. For, they had prepared their gummes, and they were come upon their way, before they ever thought of that. Then they stop, and say to one another, Who shall roll us away the stone from the doore of the Sepulchre; we never thought of that. So also did they fall under the rebuke and increpation of the Angell for another supine inconsideration, Quid quæritis vivum? Why seeke yee the living amongst the dead? Why him, who is The Son of the living God? Why him, who is The Prince of life? Why him, Who hath life in himselfe? Why him who is Life it selfe? Why him, who is The Bread of life to us? Why him, who is this life and the next too, (I am the life, and the Resurrection) Why him, who by his death

A death hath made you a path of life, (Thou wilt ſhew me the path of life) Why ſeek ye the living among the dead? What makes you think of arming him with your gummes againſt putrifaction, who had told you before, that he was not ſubject to putrifaction, but would riſe again. So alſo in ſuch another inconſideratiō we may deprehend one of theſe womē, Mary Magdalen, whē the Angel had told her at the Sepulchre, He is not here, for he is riſen, as he ſaid, yet when ſhe came to Peter, ſhe ſaid nothing of the Reſurrection, never thought of that, but powred her ſelf out in that lamentation, Tulerunt Dominū, They have taken away the Lord out of the Sepulchre, & we know not where they have laid him; Wheras if ſhe had cōſidered it adviſedly, ſhe muſt neceſſarily have knowen from the Angels words, that no man had taken away the Lord, that no man had laid him any where elſe, but that by his own power he was riſen again. But as in this ſtorm of paſſion they left Chriſts promiſe, That he would riſe, unconſidered, & left the rolling of the ſtone frō the doore of the Sepulchre, unconſidered, ſo in this ſtorm they alſo left unconſidered the impoſſibility of comming to Chriſts body to do that office; Their devotion was awake, their conſideration was in a ſlumber. But what though? Did they therefore loſe all benefit of their pious and devout intention? That is another, and our next Conſideration.

As Luther ſayes, that if the marriage bed be kept undefiled, that is, from ſtrange perſons, and from ſuch ſins as are oppoſed againſt the very purpoſe of marriage, God pardons Maritales ineptias, ſome levities, and half-wantonneſſes in married folkes; ſo Calvin ſayes of our preſent caſe, Deus non imputat, Becauſe theſe good women were tranſported with a zealous piety towards Chriſt, God did not impute this inconſideration unto them. For, though zeal without diſcretion produce ill effects, yet not ſo ill as diſcretion without zeal, worldly wiſdome without Religion, for that is an evident preferring of thy worldly ſafety before the glory of God. When Moſes makes that prayer to God in a holy fury and exceſſe, Dele me, If thou wilt not forgive their ſin, blot me I pray thee, out of the book thou haſt written, (which was the exceſſe of S. Paul too, in his Anathema, I could wiſh that my ſelf were accurſed from Chriſt, for my brethren) God proceeds not to any ſharper rebuke toward Moſes, then this, Take heed what you ſay in your inconſiderate prayer, you may ſin in a prayer, and, Whoſoever hath ſinned againſt me, (ſayes God there) him will I blot out of my book; yet it concernes but others, take heed you draw it not upon your ſelves. And ſuch a charitable interpretation it becomes us to give of thoſe prayers for the dead, which we finde in the ancient Fathers; In S. Auguſtine for his mother Monica, in S. Ambroſe for his Maſter Theodoſius; They prayed inconſiderately, and upon conſideration they retracted their prayers, at leaſt, gave ſuch Expoſitions of them, as that then they were no prayers, but vehement, and indeed, exorbitant declarations of piety mixt with paſſion. And ſo beloved, behooves it thee to do in thine own behalf, if at any time having caſt thy ſelf into the poſture of prayer, upon thy knees, and entred into thy prayer thou have found thy ſelf withdrawn, tranſported, ſtrayed into ſome deviations, and by-thoughts; Thou muſt not think all that devotion loſt; much leſſe, that prayer to be turned into ſin; for, God, who hath put all thy tears into his Bottle, all thy words into his Regiſter, all thy ſighs into his boſome, will alſo ſpread that zeale with which thou entredſt into thy prayer, over thy whole prayer, and where that (thine own zeale) is too ſhort, Chriſt Jeſus himſelf will ſpread his prayer over thine, and ſay, Give him, O Father, that which he hath asked faithfully in my name, and, where he hath fallen into any deviations or negligences, Father forgive him, though he knew not what he ſaid.

In our caſe in hand, for all their inconſideration, their miſgovernment, their miſtaking, the Angel doth not forbeare to comfort them; Nolite timere, ſayes he, Do not ye feare. In illis perſeveret pavor, in quibus permanet incredulitas, ſayes S. Hierome, in the perſon of this Angel to theſe women; I cannot blame ye, if ye feare, ſuch unexpected changes, ſuch violent earthquakes, ſuch unnaturall darkneſſes and eclipſes, ſuch rentings of the Temple, ſuch cleaving of grave-ſtones may well occaſion feare in you, but recollect your ſelves, In illis perſeveret, Let them continue in feare, who continue in unbeliefe, and have no God to comfort themſelves in. Cur vos pertimeſcitis, qui veſtros concives videtis, (ſayes S. Gregory alſo, in, and to the ſame perſons) Let thoſe mercenary ſouldiers, who are hired to watch the Sepulchre, feare, and never recover, Cur vos, why ſhould you feare, who ſee none but us, Concives, your fellow-Citizens, in the City, and ſervice of God, if your converſation be in heaven, as it is, if ye do truly ſeek that Jeſus, who is riſen from hence, that he might go thither? And as though this comfort from the Angel gel were not enough, he multiplies this comfort in perſon unto them; he meets them, and ſayes, Avete, firſt ſalutes them, and then inlarges himſelf unto them; as long as the roote of their actions was piety and zeale, he caſts no cloud of diſcouragement upon them, he occaſions no jealouſie or ſuſpition of his good purpoſe towards them, in them, but he maintains and exalts their holy confidence. Peccata non nocent, ubi non placent; Even our ſins are forgiven, when we leave delighting in them; much more our inconſiderations, and miſtakings, when we recollect, and rectifie our ſelves. For, all this withholds not the Angel from proceeding to a farther eſtabliſhment of theſe devout, though weak women, in other particulars ariſing out of the very words, Non eſt hic, He is not here, for he is riſen.

Non hic. Non hic per præſentiam carnis, qui, per præſentiam Majeſtatis nuſquam abeſt; He is not here, ſo as you thought to have found him here; ſo, as that you may anoint and embalme his body, he is not here: But, ſo as the ſecret ſinner would wiſh him away, God is away no where. No adulterer that hath waited for the twilight, no whiſpering Calumniator that hath ſhot his arrow of ſlander In occulto, and wounded the righteous in ſecret, can ſay, Non eſt hic, God is not here, God ſees not this. For even in the wayes of death and hell (in all thy ſinfull courſes) though God be a God of pure eyes and cannot behold evill, he ſees thee. He ſees thee in thy way thither, and when thou ſhalt make thy bed in hell, that is, enter into that perpetuall priſon, there will he be, felt though not ſeen. But could the Angel intend this for a comfort to theſe women, Non eſt hic, He is not here? Alas, might theſe poore ſoules ſay, we ſee that well enough, He is not here, but, where is he? From this ariſes the occaſion of theirs, and all our comfort, Surrexit enim, He is not here, for he is riſen.

Enim. Firſt, this For, (for he is riſen) this particle of argumentation, the Angel oppoſes prophetically, and by way of prevention, both againſt that hereſie of Rome, That the body of Chriſt may be in divers places at once, by the way of Tranſubſtantiation, and againſt that dream of the Ubiquetaries, That the body of Chriſt muſt neceſſarily be in all places at once, by communication of the divine Nature. For, if the Angel argue fairely, logically, ſincerely, (He is not here, for he is riſen) then there is no neceſſity, there is no poſſibility of this omni-preſence, or this multi-preſence, for then the Angels argument might have been denied, and they might have replyed, What though he be riſen, he may be here too, for he may be in divers places; But the Angel concludes us in this for, He cannot be here, for he is riſen; Becauſe he is riſen, he cannot be here in the Sepulchre, ſo, as that you may embalm his body, Becauſe he is aſcended, he cannot be here, here in the Sacrament, ſo, as you may break or eat that body.

Surrexit. But is there ſuch a comfort exhibited in this Surrexit, he is riſen, as may recompence the diſcomfort that ariſes from the Non eſt hic, That he is not here? Abundantly, ſuperabundantly there is; in theſe two channels and derivations of comfort; Firſt, that hee in whom we had placed our comfort, and our hope, is, by this his riſing, declared to be the Son of God. God hath fulfilled his promiſe, in that he hath raiſed Jeſus from the dead, as it is written in the ſecond Pſalme, ſayes S. Paul in his Sermon at Antioch. Acts 13.33. Now, what is written in that Pſalme, which S. Paul cites there, to our preſent purpoſe? This; Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. But is not this Hodie genui, This this dayes begetting intended rather of the eternall filiation & generation of the Son of God, then of this daies work, the Reſurrection? Thoſe words of that Pſalm may well admit that interpretation, and ſo many have taken them. But, with S. Hilary, moſt of the ancients have applied them to the Reſurrection, as the application of S. Paul himſelf directly binds us to do, That the Hodie genui, This dayes generation, is this dayes manifeſtation that Chriſt was the Son of God. Calvin enlarges it farther; That every declaration of the Son by the Father, is a generation of the Son: So his baptiſme, and the voice then, ſo his Transfiguration, and the voice then, were each of them, a Hodie genui, a generation of the Son that day. Mat. 3. 17. Mat. 17. 3. But eſpecially (ſayes Calvin) do thoſe words of the Pſalm belong to this day, becauſe the Reſurrection was the moſt evident actuall declaration that Chriſt was the Son of God, for, He was declared to be the Son of God by the Reſurrection from the dead, ſaies the Apoſtle expreſly. Rom. 1. 4. But how? wherein was he declared? There were others that were raiſed from the dead by Prophets in the old Teſtament, by Chriſt and his Apoſtles in the new, and yet not thereby declared to be ſuch Sons of God, Eſſentiall Sons; no nor any Sons of God, not Sons by adoption; for we are not ſure that all thoſe that were

were miraculously raised from the dead, were effectually saved at last. Therefore the comfort in our case is in that word of the Angel, Surrexit, He is risen; For so all our Translators, and Expositors do constantly carry it, not in a Suscitatus (as all the rest are) That he was raised, but in this Surrexit, He is risen, risen of himself. For so he testifies of himself, Destroy this Temple, and in three dayes Ego suscitabo, I will raise it up again; Not that the Father should, but that he would; so also, Ego pono, and Ego sumo, sayes Christ, I lay down, and I take again my soul; Not that it is given, or taken by another. And therefore Gregory Nyssen suspects, that for the infirmity of the then hearers, the Apostles thought it scarce safe, to expresse it often in that phrase, He rose, or He raised himself, and therefore, for the most part, return to the Suscitatus est, that He was raised, lest weak hearers might be scandalized with that, that a dead man had raised himself of his own power. And therefore the Angel in this place enlarges the comfort to these devout women, in a full measure, when he opens himselfe in that word Surrexit, He is risen, risen of himselfe.

John 2.19. John 10.17. Nyssen.

This then is one piece of our evidence, and the foundation of all, that we cannot be deceived, because he, in whom we trust, is, by this his own rising, declared to be the Son of God; And another, and a powerfull comfort is this, That he being risen for our justification, we are also risen in him. He that raised the Lord Iesus, shall raise us up also by the same Iesus. He shall; there is our assurance; but that is not all, for there is a con-resuscitavit, He hath quickned us together, and raised us together, and made us to sit together in heavenly places; not together with one another, but together with Christ. There is our comfort collected from this surrexit, He is risen, equivalent to the discomfort of the non est hic, he is not here; That this his rising declares him to be the Son of God, who therefore can, and will, and to be that Jesus, an actuall Redeemer, and therefore hath already raised us. To what? To that renovation, to that new creation, which is so excellently expressed by Severianus, as makes us sorry we have no more of his; Mutatur ordorerum, The whole frame and course of nature is changed; Sepulchrum non mortuum, sed mortem devorat, The grave, (now, since Christs Resurrection, and ours in him) does not bury the dead man, but death himself; My Bell tolls for death, and my Bell rings out for death, and not for me that dye; for I live, even in death; but death dies in me, and hath no more power over me.

Nos. Rom.4.25. 2 Cor.4.14. Ephes.2.6. Severianus.

I was crucified with Christ upon Friday, saies Chrysologus, Et hodiè resurgo, to day I rose with him again; Et gloria resurrectionis sepelivit injuriam morientis, The inglorioussnesse of having been buried in the dust, is recompenced in the glory I rise to, Liber inter mortuos; that which David sayes, and, (by S. Augustines application) of Christ, is true of me too; Christ was, and I am Liber inter mortuos, free amongst the dead, undetainable in the state of death. For, sayes S. Peter, It was not possible he should be holden of it. Not possible for Christ, because of the prediction of so many Prophets, whose words had an infallibility in them; not possible especially, because of the Union of the Divine Nature: Not possible for me neither, because God hath afforded me the marks of his Election, and thereby made me partaker of the Divine Nature too. But yet these things might, perchance, not fall into the consideration of these women; They did not; but they might, they should have done; for, as the Angell tels them here, Christ had told them of this before; Sicut dixit, he is risen, as he said.

Chrysologus. Psal.88.5. August. Acts 2.24. 2 Pet.1.4.

Even the Angell himself referres himself to the word; Sicut dixit; The Angell himself desires not to be beleeved, but as he grounds himself upon the word, sicut dixit. Let therefore no Angell of the Church, not that super-Arch-angell of the Romane Church, proceed upon an ipse dixit, upon his own pectorall word, and determination, for the Angell here referres us to the sicut dixit, the former word. God will be content that we doubt, and suspend our assent to any revelation, if it doe not concerne some duty delivered in Scripture before; And to any miracle, if it doe not conduce to the proofe of some thing commanded in Scripture before. Sicut dixit, is an Angelicall issue, As he said.

Sicut dixit.

But, how often soever Christ had spoken of this Resurrection to others, these women might be ignorant of it. For, all that is said, even by Christ himself, is not said to all; nor is all, written for all, that is written by the Holy Ghost. No man must suspect that he knowes not enough for salvation, if he understand not all places of Scripture. But yet these women could not well be ignorant of this, because being Disciples and followers of Christ, though Christ had never spoken of the Resurrection to them, they were likely to have heard of it from them, to whom Christ had spoken of it. It was Cleophas his question to Christ, (though he knew him not then to be so, when they went together to Emaus) Art thou onely a stranger in Ierusalem? that is, hast thou been at Jerusalem, and is this, The death of Christ, strange to thee? So may we say to any that professes Christianity; Art thou in the Christian Church, and is this, The Resurrection of Christ, strange to thee? Are there any amongst us, that thrust to Fore-noones, and After-noones Sermons, that pant after high, and un-understandable Doctrines, of the secret purposes of God, and know not this, the fundamentall points of Doctrine? Even these womens ignorance, though they were in the number of the Disciples of Christ, makes us affraid, that some such there may be; and therefore blessed be they that have set on foote that blessed way of Catechizing, that after great professions, we may not be ignorant of small things. These things these women might have learnt of others, who were to instruct them. But for their better assurance, the Angell tells them here, that Christ himself had told them of this before; Remember, sayes he, how Christ spoke to you whilst he was with you in Galile.

to

Luke 24. 16.

We observe, that Christ spoke to his Disciples, of his Resurrection, five times in the Gospell; Now, these women could not be present at any of the five but one, which was the third; And, before that, it is evident that they had applied themselves to Christ, and ministred unto him. The Angell then remembers them, what Christ said to them there. It was this; The Sonne of man must be delivered into the hands of sinfull men, and Crucified, and the third day, rise againe; And they remembred his words, sayes the Text there; Then they remembred them, when they heard of them again; but not till then.

Mat. 17. 22.

Luke 24.6.

Which gives me just occasion to note first the perverse tenderness, and the supercilious, and fastidious delicacy of those men, that can abide no repetitions, nor indure to heare any thing which they have heard before; when as even these things which Christ himself had preached to these women, in Galile, had been lost, if this Angel had not preached them over again to them at Jerusalem; Remember how he spake to you, sayes he to them. And why shouldst thou be loath to heare those things which thou hast heard before, when, till thou heardst them again, thou didst not know, that is, not consider that ever thou hadst heard them? So have we here also just occasion to note their impertinent curiosity, who though the sense be never so well observed, call every thing a falsification, if the place be not rightly cyphard, or the word exactly cited; and magnifie one another for great Text men, though they understand no Text, because they cite Book, and Chapter, and Verse, and Words aright; whereas in this place, the Angel referres the women to Christs words, and they remember that Christ spake those words, and yet if we compare the places, (that where Christ speaks the words, and that where the Angell repeats them) though the sense be intirely the same, yet the words are not altogether so. Thus the Angell erects them in the consternation; Remember what was promised, that in three dayes he would rise; The third day is come, and he is risen, as he said; and, that your senses may be exercised as well as your faith, Come and see the place, where the Lord lay.

Mat. 17. 22.
Luke 24.6.

Dominus Angeli.

Even the Angell calls Christ Lord; and his Lord; for, the Lord, (and the Angell calls him so) is Lord of all, of men, and Angels. When God brings his Son into the world, (sayes the Apostle) he sayes, let all the Angels of God worship him. And when God caries his Son out of the world, by the way of the Crosse, they have just cause to worship him too, for, By the blood of his Crosse are all things reconciled to God, both things in earth, and things in heaven, Men and Angels. Therefore did an Angel minister to Christ before he was, in the Annunciation to his blessed Mother, that he should be; And an Angel to his imaginary Father Ioseph, before he was born; And a Quire of Angels to the Shepheards at his birth; An Angel after his tentation, And in his Agony, and Bloody-sweat, more Angels; Angels at his last step, at his Ascension, and here, at his Resurrection Angels minister unto him. The Angels of heaven acknowledged Christ to be their Lord. In the beginning some of the Angels would be Similes Altissimo, like to the most High; But what a transcendent, what a super-diabolicall, what a præ-Luciferian pride is his, that will be supra Altissimum, superiour to God; That not only exalteth himself above all that is called God, (Kings are called Gods, and this Arch-Monarch exalts himself above all Kings) but above God literally, and in that wherein God hath especially manifested himself to be God, to us, that is in prescribing us a Law, how he will be obeyed; for, in dis-

A penſing with this Law, and adding to, and withdrawing from this law, he exalts himſelf above God, as our Law-giver. And, (as it is alſo ſaid there) He exalteth himſelf, and oppoſeth himſelfe againſt God. There is no truſting of ſuch neighbours, as are got above us in power. This man of ſin hath made himſelfe ſuperiour to God, and then, an enemy to God; for God is Truth, and he oppoſes him in that, for he is hereſie and falſhood; and God is Love, and he oppoſes him in that, for he is envy, and hatred, and malice, and ſedition, and invaſion, and rebellion.

The Angell confeſſes Chriſt to be The Lord, his Lord, and he confeſſes him to be ſo then when he lay dead in the grave, Come, ſee the place where the Lord lay. A Weſt Indian King having beene well wrought upon for his Converſion to the Chriſtian Religion, and having digeſted the former Articles, when he came to that, He was crucified, dead, and buried, had no longer patience, but ſaid, If your God be dead and buried, leave me to my B old god, the Sunne, for the Sunne will not dye. But if he would have proceeded to the Article of the Reſurrection, hee ſhould have ſeene, that even then, when hee lay dead, hee was GOD ſtill; Then, when hee was no Man, hee was GOD ſtill; Nay, then when hee was no man, hee was God, and Man, in this true ſenſe, That though the body and ſoule were divorced from one another, and that during that divorce, he were no man, (for it is the union of body and ſoule that makes a man) yet the Godhead was not divided from either of theſe conſtitutive parts of man, body or ſoule. Even then, when a man is no man, he may be a Chriſtian; when I am a worme and no man, when I am the off-ſcouring of the world, when I am the reproach, the proverb, the hiſſing of men, yet, as my Saviour, when he lay in the grave, was the ſame Chriſt, ſo in this grave of oppreſſion and perſecution, I am the ſame Chriſtian, as in my Baptiſme.

Pſal. 22.7. 1 Cor. 4.13. Ier. 19.8.

Let nothing therefore that can fall upon thee, diſpoyle thee of the dignity and conC ſtancy of a Chriſtian; howſoever thou be ſevered from thoſe things, which thou makeſt account do make thee up, ſevered from a wife by divorce, from a child by death, from goods by fire, or water, from an office by juſt, or by unjuſt diſpleaſure, (which is the heavier but the happier caſe) yet never think thy ſelf ſevered from thy Head Chriſt Jeſus, nor from being a lively member of his body. Though thou be a brother of Dragons and a companion of Owles, Though thy Harpe be turned into mourning, and thine Organ into the voyce of them that weepe, nay, Though the Lord kill thee, yet truſt in him. Thy Saviour when he lay dead in the grave, was ſtill the ſame Lord, Thou, when thou art enwrapped, and enterred in confuſion, art ſtill the ſame Chriſtian. To this meditation the Angell carries us, in keeping up Chriſts ſtyle at the higheſt, then when he was at the loweſt, And to ſome other particulars he carries theſe Women, in that which remaines, Come and ſee the place.

Iob 30.29. Iob 13.15.

It is not nothing, certainly not meerely nothing, that God does ſo often direct us to D frequent his Sanctuary, and his holy places. Not nothing, that Solomon, into that Inſtrument which paſſed betweene God and him, for the Conſecration of the Temple, inſerted that Covenant, That not onely they which came to that Temple, but they, who being neceſſarily abſent, prayed towards the Temple, might be heard; which is, (not inconveniently) aſſigned for a reaſon of Ezechias his turning to the wall to pray, in his ſick bed, and of Daniels opening of his windows, when he prayed in his private chamber, becauſe, in ſo doing, they looked towards Jeruſalem, where the Temple was. When Naaman being recovered from his bodily leproſie, recovered from his ſpirituall leproſie too, and reſolved to worſhip none but the true God, he was loath to worſhip the true God, in an unholy place, and therefore deſired ſome of that earth to build an Altar upon. Pharaoh was come to be content that Moſes and his people ſhould ſacrifice to their true God, ſo they would ſacrifice in Egypt; But, Moſes durſt not accept of thoſe conditions. Pharaoh grew con E tent that they ſhould go out of Egypt to Sacrifice, ſo they would not go far, but keepe within his limits; but Moſes durſt not accept thoſe conditions; nor any conditions leſſe then thoſe, in which God had determined him, which was, To go three dayes iourney into the Wilderneſſe. We know that God is alike in all places, but he does not worke in all places alike; God works otherwiſe in the Church, then in an Army; and diverſly in his divers Ordinances in the Church; God works otherwiſe in Prayer then in Preaching, and otherwiſe in the Sacraments then in either; and otherwiſe in the later, then in the firſt Sacrament. The power is the ſame, and the end is the ſame, but the way is not ſo. Athanaſius, ſcarce three hundred yeares after Chriſt, found the Church in poſſeſſion of that Cuſtome (and he takes knowledge of it, as of a precept from the Apoſtles themſelves) ſelves) That the Congregation ſhould pray towards the Eaſt, to teſtifie (ſaies that Father) their deſire of returning to the Country, which they had loſt, Paradiſe. Places of prophane and ſecular uſe ſhould not be made equall with holy places; nor ſhould holy actions, and motions, and geſtures, and poſitions of the body in divine ſervice, be ſubmitted to ſcorne and deriſion. They have their uſe; either in a reall exaltation of Devotion, or for a peaceable conſervation of uniformity, and decency, or for a reverentiall obedience to lawfull Authority; and any of theſe is enough, to authorize things in their uſe, which in themſelves and in their owne nature are indifferent. And though the principall purpoſe of the Angell, in ſhewing theſe women the place, were to aſſure them, that Chriſt was riſen, yet may there alſo be an intimation of the helpe and aſſiſtance that we receive from holy places, in this their Ecce locum, Come, and ſee the place. A

Peregrinationes. But this is farre, very very far from that ſuperſtitious fixing of God to the free-hold, which they have induced in the Roman Church, and upon which, they have ſuperinduced their meritorious Pilgrimages to certaine places. Conſider a little the Pilgrimage of theſe Pilgrimages, how they have gone on. Innocent the third, in the Lateran Councell, about foure hundred yeares ſince, gave free pardon of all ſins to all men, that went or contributed to the recovery of the holy land. Now theſe expeditions were not with any hope of recovering that land, but principally to carry the powerfulleſt perſons, and the activeſt ſpirits into thoſe remote parts, that ſo theſe parts might be left the more open to the Inundation of that Sea of Rome, and the invaſions of that Biſhop. After this, theſe Indulgences were enlarged, and communicated to all that went to Jeruſalem, not onely as Soldiers, but as Pilgrims. And, after that by Boniface the eighths liberality the way was ſhortned, and they had as much that came but to Rome, as they that went to Jeruſalem. As, a little before, by Clement the ſixt, there was a power given to every man, that went ſuch a Pilgrimage, to deliver foure ſoules out of Purgatory, which he would, and a commandment given to the Angels of Heaven, to carry their ſoules that dyed in that Pilgrimage, immediately to Heaven, without touching upon Purgatory. B C

Gerſon. Theſe abuſes made that learned and devout Man, Gerſon, the Chancelor of Paris, in his time, (as, let them deny it with what ſtifneſſe they will, nothing is more demonſtrable, nor more evidently demonſtrated, Then that in all times, ſome great men amongſt themſelves have oppoſed their Superſtitions) This, I ſay, made Gerſon ſay, (though he durſt ſay no more) Abnegare non poſſumus, None of us all can deny, but that many things are induced upon colour of Religion, quorum ſanctior eſſet omiſsio, which he ſhall be more holy that forbeares, then he that performes them. In deteſtation of this locall and ſtationary ſalvation of theſe meritorious pilgrimages to certaine places, ſome of the bleſſed Fathers ſpoke much, long before they were come to that enormous abuſe, in which the later times exceeded. S. Hierom had occaſion to ſay much of it, by a ſolicitation from Polinus, and he ſaies this, Quanti hodie portant funera ſua? How many men carry Sepulchres to the Sepulchre, when they carry themſelves to Jeruſalem? Non Hieroſolymis vixiſſe, ſaies he, To have lived well at Jeruſalem is praiſe-worthy, but not to have lived there. Non audeo concludere, I dare not ſhut up that God, whom the Heavens cannot containe, in a corner of the earth; and Jeruſalem is but ſo. Et de Britannia, & de Hieroſolymis æqualiter patet aula cæleſtis, Heaven is as neare England, (ſaies S. Hierom) as it is to Jeruſalem. And Chriſt, (ſaies he) was then in Jeruſalem, in that holy place, when he ſaid, Abeamus hinc, Let us go from hence; as holy as the place was, he made haſte out of it; for, (as that Father adds) it is a place full of mutinous Souldiers, of licentious proſtitutes, of Players and Jeſters; and theſe are the elements of the holineſſe of that place. Epiſt. 13.

Nyſſen. Gregory Nyſſen (in the ſame time with Hierom) had a particular occaſion to deliver his opinion of theſe pilgrimages to Jeruſalem; for he had beene there himſelfe, though not as a Pilgrim. Sunt aliqui, There are ſome that make it a part of Religion, to have beene at Jeruſalem, Sin præter præceptum Domini, But, ſaies he, if Chriſt never commanded it, (that is his Rule) I know not what can juſtifie that man, that makes himſelfe the Rule of his Religion. Chriſt never called that, Bleſſedneſſe, ſaies he, to have beene at Jeruſalem, nor ever called this Jeruſalem the way to Heaven; why any man ſhould do ſo, when Chriſt did not, Qui mentem habet, conſideret, (ſaies that Father) Let him that is not diſtracted, conſider. Nay, ſaies he, there is not only no certaine profit, but evident danger to a chaſte ſoule, in the unchaſte converſation of thoſe Pilgrims, and he exemplifies, E

A plifies, and particularizes wherein; but we forbeare that. Shall I be asked then, why I went to Jeruſalem? ſayes that Father; I went into thoſe parts out of neceſſity, ſayes he, being called to a Councell held in thoſe parts; And, being ſo neare, I was choſen as an Arbitrator between ſome Churches, which were then at variance, which differences were to be compoſed at Jeruſalem, and ſo I went thither. Howſoever, let no man be encouraged to go thither for my being there, (for I was never the better Chriſtian for having been there) but let every man think and beleeve me to be the more competent witneſſe, and judge of the dangers, becauſe I ſaw them. I beleeved that Chriſt was riſen, before I ſaw the empty Sepulchre; And though (I thank God for it) I loſt none of my faith at Jeruſalem, yet I encreaſed it not there. Si perverſè vivas; live Chriſtianly, or thou art as far from Chriſt in the Sepulchre, and from all benefit of his Reſurrection, as they that were hired to watch the Sepulchre, and to ſeale the Sepulchre to prevent the B Reſurrection, or as if he that lay in the Sepulchre had never dyed. When we have remembred you of that which S. Chryſoſtome (of the ſame time with Ierome and Nyſſen) ſayes, That there were ſome ſo vain, as to go to Arabia to kiſſe that dunghill where Iob ſate to be viſited by his impertinent friends, you have teſtimony enough, concurrence enough for the deteſtation of theſe hypocriticall Pilgrimages, and the manifold ſuperſtitions that grow from this tree; and grew to a far greater inexcuſableneſſe, when all was transferred to Rome, where, both the Indulgences were larger, and the peſtilent infections of the place more contagious then at Jeruſalem. Chryſoſt.

Now, to binde up our ſheafe, and lay it ſo upon you, that you may eaſily carry it, you have ſeen, That women, though weak, are capable of religious offices; No underſtanding ſo weak, but it may beleeve, no body ſo weak, but it may do ſomething in ſome calling. You have ſeen too, that theſe women were early in their religious work, they be-
C gun betimes; we have but one Parable that tels us, that they that came late to the labour were as well rewarded as the earlieſt. So have you alſo ſeen, that as they were early and forward, ſo were they earneſt, and ſedulous; Curſed be he that doth the work of God (that is, any godly work) negligently. You have likewiſe ſeen upon what their devotion was carried; upon things which could not intirely be done; yet God accepted their devotion; where the roote and ſubſtance of the work is piety, God pretermits many times errours in circumſtance. You have heard the Angels information to them, Non hîc, that Chriſt was not there, and yet comfort in that; God raiſes comfort out of all things, even out of diſcomfort it ſelf to the godly. You have heard the reaſon added, Quia ſurrexit, for he is riſen; And if this be a good reaſon, there is no Tranſubſtantiation, no Ubiquitiſme, for then Chriſt might have been there, though he were riſen. He is riſen, not only raiſed, and therefore the Son of God; and riſen for our Iuſtification, therefore we are riſen
D in him. And this, Sicut dixit, As he had ſaid before; No word is certain, not in the mouth of an Angel, but as it is referred to the former word of God. And it is Sicut dixit vobis, As he had ſaid to you; Though all Scriptures be not propoſed to all, and Gods ſecret purpoſes propoſed to none, yet the fundamentall doctrines of the Chriſtian faith are propoſed to all, the weakeſt of all, Theſe women had heard Chriſt. Him, this Angel calls The Lord, His Lord; How rebellious is that man of ſin, that makes Chriſt his ſervant, and pretence of religion his inſtrument? He avows him to be the Lord, then when he lay dead in the grave; Be truly a Chriſtian, and in the grave of perſecution, in the grave of putrifaction thou ſhalt retain the ſame name, and even thy duſt ſhall be Chriſtian duſt. And laſtly, for the eſtabliſhment of their comfort, the Angel directs them to conſider the place, Ecce locus, not to incline them to ſuperſtitious pilgrimages, but yet to a holy reverence, and eſtimation of places conſecrated to Gods ſervice. And if theſe
E Meditations have raiſed you from the bed of ſin, in any holy purpoſe, this is one of your Reſurrections, and you have kept your Eaſter-day well. To which, he, whoſe name is Amen, ſay Amen, our bleſſed Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, in the power of his Father, and in the operation of his Spirit.

SERMON XXVI.

Preached upon Easter-day.

1 THES. 4. 17.

Then we which are alive, and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the ayre; and so shall we be ever with the Lord.

IN this Epistle, our Apostle (according to his manner in all his Epistles) first establishes those to whom he writes, in those matters of faith, in which he had formerly instructed them; and then, rectifies them in matter of manners, of holinesse of life, and the wayes and fruits of sanctification. In this last part of this Chapter, he involves, he wraps up both together; a Fundamentall point, the Resurrection of the dead, and then, an instruction for manners arising out of that, That they mourn not intemperately for the dead, as they do (saith he) which have no hope of seeing them again, who are gone. For we know, that they which are gone, are gone but into another room of the same house, (this world, and the next, do but make up God a house) they are gone but into another Pue of the same Church, (the Militant and the Triumphant do but make up God a Church.) If we beleeve that Iesus dyed, and rose again (sayes our Apostle) even so, them also, which sleep in Iesus, will God bring with him: with him; For, howsoever they have lien ingloriously in the dust all this while, all this while they have been with God, and he shall bring them with him. But the Thessalonians were not so hard in beleeving the Resurrection, as curious in enquiring the order of the Resurrection. And as among the Corinthians some inquired de modo, How are the dead raised, and with what body do they come? So among the Thessalonians some inquired, de Ordine, in what order, for precedency, shall the last scean of this last act of man, be transacted? What difference between them that were dead thousands of yeares before, and them whom Christ shall finde alive at his second comming? Them the Apostle satisfies; We that are alive, shall not prevent them that are asleep, we shall not enter into heaven before them; The dead in Christ shall first rise, sayes he; and then, (then enters our Text) Then we which are alive, and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meete the Lord in the ayre, and so shall be ever with the Lord.

Ver. 14.

1 Cor. 15. 35.

Divisio.

Then. When? This Then in our text, is an apprehensive, and a comprehensive word. It reaches to, and layes hold upon that which the Apostle sayes before the text, in the fifteenth and sixteenth verses. Then, when the dead in Christ are first risen, and risen by Christs comming down from heaven, in clamore, in a shout, in the voice of the Archangel, and in the Trumpet of God, Then, when that is done, We that are alive, and remain, shall bee wrought upon, and all being joyned in one body, They, and we together, shall be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the ayre, and so shall we be ever with the Lord. So that, in these words we shall have three things to consider, which will constitute three parts in this exercise. First, the raising of those that were dead before; Secondly, the changing of them who are alive then; And lastly, our union in our exaltation, and possession of the kingdome of God, We, together with them, shall be caught up.

Neither of these three parts will be swallowed down in a generality; There must passe a Mastication, a re-division into more particular branches upon them all. For, in the first, which the first word of our Text, Then induces, which is the raising of them who were dead before, we shall consider first, That the dead are not forgotten, though they have dwelt long in the house of forgetfulnesse, nor lost, though they have lyen long in the dust of dispersion, nor neglected, nor deferred, that others might be preferred before them, which shall be alive then, for, sayes the Apostle, We shall not prevent them, but they shall

A shall rise first; How shall they rise? For, that is also a second consideration, induced by our first word, Then, Then when they shal be raised in virtute Christi, in the power of Christ, for, sayes the Text, The Lord himself shall descend from heaven to raise them. And how shall he exercise, how shall he execute, and declare his power in their raising? It shall be In clamore, with a shout, and in the voyce of the Arch-angel, and the Trumpet of God. And in these three Branches, That the dead shall rise first, That they shall rise in the power of Christ, That that power shall be thus expressed, In a shout, in the voyce of the Arch-angell, in the Trumpet of God, we shall determine that first Part. When that is done, and done so, we shall be wrought upon, We that are alive and remain then; where we shall first see, that some shall be alive, and remain then, when Christ comes, And then consider their state and condition, how they being then cloathed with bodies of corruption shall be capable of that present entrance into glory; and in that disquisition we shall B end our second Part. And then, in our third and last part, The glorious Union of these two Armies, Those which were dead, and those which are alive, we shall consider first, That here is no mention at all, of any Resurrection of the wicked, but onely of them that sleep in Christ; They shall rise; And then, those that are to partake of this glory, are thus proceeded with; They are caught up, Rapiuntur; Caught up in the Clouds, In Nubibus; Exalted into the Ayre, In Aëra; There to meet the Lord, Obviam Domino; And so to be with the Lord for ever. We shall be, and be with the Lord, and be with the Lord for ever; which are blessed and glorious gradations, if we may have time to insist upon them; which we may best hope for this day of all others; for, this day, we have two dayes in one. This day both Gods Sons arose; The Sun of his Firmament, and the Son of his bosome. And if one Sun doe set upon us, the other will stay, as long as our devotion last. God went not from Abraham, till Abraham had no more to say; No more Gen. 18. init.

was laid in the dust of the earth, Abel, loses nothing by lying so long there; He loses nothing, that men of later ages gain; For, if we live to the comming of Christ to Judgement, we shall not prevent them, we shall have no precedency of them, that were dead ages before. No man is superannuated in the grave, that he is too old to enter into heaven, where the Master of the house is The ancient of dayes. No man is bed-rid with age in the grave, that he cannot rise. It is not with God, as it is with man; we doe, but God does not forget the dead; and, as long as God is with them, they are with him. As he Psal. 56. 9.
puts all thy teares into his bottles, so he puts all the graines of thy dust into his Cabinet, and the windes that scatter, the waters that wash them away, carry them not out of his sight. He remembers that we are but dust; but dust then when we lie in the grave; and yet he re- Psal. 103. 14.

tring into a new state, when they dye, but a returning to their old, They return to dust; And it is not to that dust which is cast upon them, in the grave, (for that may be another mans dust) but to that dust which they carried about them in their bodies, They returne, and to dust; and to their own dust.

Nor is dust so inglorious a thing, but that God gives a dignity to dust, when he admits it into comparison to expresse the multiplication, the accumulation of his blessings upon Abraham, I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; not for weaknesse, but for infiniteGen. 13. 16.

ment to himself by death, that he shall be the worse by dying, but that God may lose of his glory, when (as he addes there) the enemy shall say, we have prevailed against him. For, as in the Primitive Church, those that seeme prayers for the dead, at Funeralls, are, indeed, but thanksgivings to God, in their behalf that are departed; so, as often as David expresses himself in that Patheticall manner, Awake, O Lord, why sleepest thou? arise, and Psal. 44. 23.

he will. Is his mercy cleane gone for ever? Doth his promiſe faile for ever? Hath God forgot to be gracious? Hath he ſhut up his mercy in anger? All theſe imply a kinde of confidence that he hath not. A

And, as it is in that Reſurrection of which David ſpeaks moſt literally in thoſe places, (that is, The Reſurrection from the calamities and oppreſſions of this world) ſo is it in the Reſurrection from the duſt of the grave too; Thou haſt brought me to the duſt of the grave; but, be not thou farre from me; That is, when thou ſhalt bring me to the duſt of the grave, thou wilt not be farre from me. And, when he ſayes, (in apparence) by way of expoſtulation, and jealouſie, and ſuſpition, Will God ſhew wonders to the dead? ſhall the dead ariſe and praiſe him? ſhall his loving kindneſſe be declared in the grave, or his faithfulneſſe in deſtruction? All theſe paſſionate interrogatories, and vehement expoſtulations may ſafely be reſolved into theſe Doctrinall propoſitions, Yes, God will ſhew wonders to the dead, The dead ſhall riſe and praiſe him, His loving kindneſſe ſhall be declared in the grave, and his faithfulneſſe in deſtruction. For, God will not forget the Congregation of his poore for ever. The poore of this world, are our poore; Gods poore are they that lie in the duſt, the duſt of the grave, the dead; of whom, God hath a greater Congregation under ground, then of the living upon the face of the earth; And, God will not forget the congregation of his poore for ever. Finitus eſt eorum pulvis; That which we tranſlate, Their Extortioner is at an end, their Oppreſſor is at an end, is in S. Hierome, Their duſt is at an end; that is, there comes a time, when the duſt of the grave ſhall oppreſſe them no longer. When? Truly, that time is virtually, and in an infallibility come already; as thoſe other words of the ſame Prophet, may admit an accommodation in the perſon of Chriſt, Thy dead men ſhall live; When? Together with my dead body they ſhall riſe. Conſider, by occaſion of thoſe words, a promiſe, long before Chriſts Reſurrection, that all they which ſlept in Chriſt ſhould riſe in him, with my dead body they ſhall riſe; And then conſider the performance of this promiſe in the Apoſtle, Conſurrexerunt, together with Chriſt, all that ſlept in him, (nay, all that fell aſleep ſince he waked, all that dyed ſince he roſe) did ariſe. Virtually, and infallibly they did. And, for the actuall accompliſhment of this Reſurrection in every individuall perſon, they that were laid in the grave in the firſt ages, loſe no time. For, there is no time of entring into heaven, till the Lord come to fetch us; And then, they that are dead, ſhall be ſo farre from being pretermitted, as that they ſhall firſt be raiſed before any thing be done upon us. But how ſhall they be raiſed, by what power? (for that is a ſecond Conſideration induced alſo by this firſt word of our Text, Then, when the Lord ſhall have deſcended from heaven to raiſe them; Then when they are raiſed, In virtute Chriſti, in the vertue and power of Chriſt.

In virtute Chriſti.

Then, (ſayes our bleſſed Saviour, ſpeaking of the Reſurrection) then, ſhall the righteous ſhine forth as the Sun; And whereſoever we are called the Sun, compared, aſſimilated to the Sun, Chriſt is our Zodiake; In him we move, from the beginning to the end of our Circle. And therefore, as the laſt point of our Circle, our reſurrection determines in him, in Chriſt; ſo, the firſt point of our Circle, our firſt adoption began in him, in Chriſt too. And, if I were adopted in Chriſt, (in Chriſt who is a Redeemer of ſinners) I was adopted in the condition, and in the conſideration of a ſinner, and ſuch a ſinner as ſhould, as would lay hold upon this Chriſt, this Redeemer. Chriſt is the Reſurrection; ſo Chriſt is the Adoption; If there be a Reſurrection in him, there were ſome dead before; If there be an Adoption in him, there are ſome ſinners before. The firſt look that God caſts upon us, is in Chriſt, and therefore the firſt conſideration that he takes of us, is, as we are ſinners; He adopts none but penitent ſinners, he reproves none but impenitent ſinners. In him alſo the dead are raiſed; that is, in that power, which he was raiſed by, The power of God. For, ſtill that phraſe is ingeminated, iterated, multiplied, Suſcitavit Deus, ſuſcitatus à Deo, God raiſed Chriſt from the dead, and Chriſt was raiſed from the dead by God. And when it is ſaid by the Angell to the women, Surrexit, He is riſen, (riſen of himſelf, as the word ſounds) And when by thoſe two which went with Chriſt to Emaus, it is ſaid at their return to Jeruſalem, to the eleven Apoſtles, ſurrexit verè, He is riſen indeed, (riſen of himſelf, as the word ſounds) yet that phraſe and expreſſion, He is riſen, if there were no more in it, but that expreſſion, and that phraſe, would not conclude Chriſts riſing to have been in virtute propria, in his own power. For, of Dorcas who was raiſed from the dead, it is ſaid, Reſedit, ſhe ſate up, and of Lazarus, Prodiit, he came forth; and

Mat. 13. 43. — D — Mat. 28. 6. — Luke 24. 34. — E — Acts 9. 40. John 11.

A and yet, theſe actions thus aſcribed to themſelves, were done in virtute aliena, in the power of another. Chriſts Reſurrection was not ſo, In virtute aliena, in the power of another, if you conſider his whole perſon, God and Man, but it was aliena à filio Mariæ; Chriſt as the Son of Mary roſe not by his own power. It was by his own; but his own, becauſe he was God, as well as man. Nor could all the Magick in the world have raiſed him ſooner, then by that his power, (his, as God) he (that is, that perſon, God and man) was pleaſed to riſe. So ſits he now at the right hand of his Father in heaven; nor can all the Conſecrations of the Romane Prieſts either remove him from thence, or multiply him to a bodily being any where elſe, till his time of comming to Judgment, come. Then, and not till then, The Lord himſelf ſhall deſcend from heaven, in clamore, ſayes the Text, in a ſhout, with the voyce of the Arch-angell, and with the Trumpet of God, which circumſtances conſtitute our third, and laſt Branch of this firſt Part, The dead ſhall riſe firſt, They

B ſhall riſe in the power of Chriſt, (therefore Chriſt is God; for Chriſt himſelf roſe in the power of God) and that power ſhall be thus declared, In a ſhout, in the voyce of the Arch-Angell, in the Trumpet of God.

The dead heare not Thunder, nor feele they an Earth-quake. If the Canon batter that Church walls, in which they lye buryed, it wakes not them, nor does it ſhake or affect them, if that duſt, which they are, be thrown out, but yet there is a voyce, which the dead ſhall heare; The dead ſhall heare the voyce of the Son of God, (ſayes the Son of God himſelf) and they that heare ſhall live; And that is the voyce of our Text. It is here called a clamour, a vociferation, a ſhout, and varied by our Tranſlators, and Expoſitors, according to the origination of the word, to be clamor hortatorius, and ſuaſorius, and juſſorius, A voyce that carries with it a penetration, (all ſhall heare it) and a perſwaſion, (all ſhall beleeve it, and be glad of it) and a power, a command, (all ſhall obey it.) Since that voyce

C at the Creation, Fiat, Let there be a world, was never heard ſuch a voyce as this, Surgite mortui, Ariſe ye dead. That was ſpoken to that that was meerely nothing, and this to them, who in themſelves ſhall have no cooperation, no concurrence to the hearing or anſwering this voyce.

The power of this voyce is exalted in that it is ſaid to be the voyce of the Archangel. Though legions of Angels, millions of Angels ſhall be employed about the Reſurrection, to recollect their ſcattered duſt, and recompact their ruined bodies, yet thoſe bodies ſo recompact, ſhall not be able to heare a voyce. They ſhall be then but ſuch bodies, as they were when they were laid downe in the grave, when, though they were intire bodies, they could not heare the voice of the mourner. But this voyce of the Archangel ſhall enable them to heare; The Archangel ſhall re-infuſe the ſeverall ſoules into their bodies, and ſo they ſhall heare that voyce, Surgite mortui, Ariſe ye that were dead, and they ſhall

D ariſe. And here we are eaſed of that diſputation, whether there be many Archangels, or no, for, if there be but one, yet this in our text, is he, for, it is not ſaid, In the voyce of An Archangell, but of The Archangell; if not the Onely, yet he who comprehends them all, and in whom they all conſiſt, Chriſt Jeſus.

And then, the power of this voyce is exalted to the higheſt in the laſt word, that it is, Tuba Dei, The Trumpet of God. For, that is an Hebraiſme, and in that language, it conſtitutes a ſuperlative, to adde the name of God to any thing. As in Sauls caſe, when David ſurpriſed him, in his dead ſleepe, it is ſaid, that Sopor Domini, The ſleepe of the Lord was upon him, that is, the heavieſt, the deadeſt ſleepe that could be imagined, ſo here, The Trumpet of God is the loudeſt voice that we conceive God to ſpeake in.

All theſe pieces, that it is In clamore, In a cry, in a ſhout, that it is In the voyce of the Archangell, that it is In the Trumpet of God, make up this Concluſion, That all Reſurrecti-

E ons from the dead, muſt be from the voice of God, and from his loud voice; It muſt be ſo, even in thy firſt Reſurrection, thy reſurrection from ſin, by grace here; here, thou needeſt the voice of God, and his loud voyce. And therefore, though thou thinke thou heare ſometimes Gods ſibilations, (as the Prophet Zechary ſpeaks) Gods ſoft and whiſpering voyce, (inward remorſes of thine owne, and motions of the Spirit of God to thy ſpirit) yet thinke not thy ſpirituall reſurrection accompliſhed, till, in this place, thou heare his loud voyce; Till thou heare Chriſt deſcending from Heaven, (as the text ſayes) that is, working in his Church; Till thou heare him In clamore, in this cry, in this ſhout, in this voyce of Penetration, of perſwaſion, of power, that is, till thou feele in thy ſelfe in this place a liquefaction, a colliquation, a melting of thy bowels under the commination tion of the Judgements of God upon thy ſin, and the application of his mercy to thy Repentance. A

In voce Archangeli. And then, this thou muſt heare In voce Archangeli, In the voice of the Archangel. S. Iohn in the beginning of the Revelation, cals every Governour of a Church an Angel. And much reſpect and reverence, much faith, and credit behoves it thee to give to thine Angell, to the Paſtour of that Church, in which God hath given thee thy ſtation; for,

Mal. 2. 7. he is thine Angel, thy Tutelar, thy guardian Angell. Men ſhould ſeeke the Law at the mouth of the Prieſt, ſaies God in Malachi; (of that Prieſt that is ſet over him) For, the lips of the Prieſt, (of every Prieſt, to whom the ſoules of others are committed) ſhould preſerve knowledge, ſhould be able to inſtruct and rectifie his flock, Quia Angelus Domini Exercituum, becauſe every ſuch Prieſt is the Angell of the Lord of Hoſts. Hearken thou therefore, to that Angel, thine Angel. But here thou art directed above thine Angell to Acts 20. 28. Ephes. 5. 23. the Archangell. Now, not the governour of any particular Church, but he Who hath purchaſed the whole Church with his blood, He who onely is head of the whole Church, Chriſt B Jeſus, is this Archangell; Heare him. It is the voyce of the Archangell, (that is, the true and ſincere word of God) that muſt raiſe thee from the death of ſin, to the life of grace. If therefore any Angell differ from the Archangell, and preach other then the true and

Gal. 1. 8. ſincere word of God, Anathema, ſaies the Apoſtle, let that Angell be accurſed. And take thou heed of over-affecting, overvaluing the gifts of any man ſo, as that thou take the voice of an Angell, for the voyce of the Archangell, any thing that that man ſaies, for the word of God.

In Tuba Dei. Yet thou muſt heare this voice of the Archangell in the Trumpet of God. The Trumpet of God is his loudeſt Inſtrument; and his loudeſt Instrument is his publique Ordinance in the Church; Prayer, Preaching, and Sacraments; Heare him in theſe; In all C theſe; come not to heare him in the Sermon alone, but come to him in Prayer, and in the Sacrament too. For, exeept the voyce come in the Trumpet of God, (that is, in the publique Ordinance of his Church) thou canſt not know it to be the voyce of the Archangell. Pretended ſervices of God, in ſchiſmaticall Conventicles, are not in the Trumpet of God, and therefore not the voyce of the Archangell, and ſo, not the meanes ordained for thy ſpirituall reſurrection. And, as our laſt reſurrection from the grave, is rooted in

1 Cor. 15. 17. the perſonall reſurrection of Chriſt, (For, if Chriſt be not raiſed from the dead, we are yet in our ſins, (ſaies the Apoſtle) But why ſo? Becauſe, to deliver us from ſin. Chriſt was to deſtroy all our enemies; Now, the laſt enemy is Death; and laſt time that Death and Chriſt met, (upon the Croſſe) Death overcame him, and therefore, except he be riſen from the power of Death, we are yet in our ſins) as we roote our laſt reſurrection in the perſon of Chriſt, ſo do we our firſt reſurrection in him, in his word, exhibited in his Ordinance, for, that is the voice of the Archangell in the Trumpet of God. And as the A- D

Ver. 15. poſtle ſaies here, This we ſay unto you, by the word of the Lord, that thus the laſt reſurrection ſhall be accompliſhed by Chriſt himſelfe, ſo, this we ſay to you, by the Word of the Lord, (by the harmony of all the Scriptures) thus, and no other way, By the pure word of God, delivered and applied by his publique Ordinance, by Hearing, and Beleeving, and Practiſing, under the Seales of the Church, the Sacraments, is your firſt reſurrection from ſin, by grace, accompliſhed. So have you then thoſe three branches, which conſtitute our firſt part; That they that are dead before us, ſhall not be prevented by us, but they ſhall riſe firſt; That they ſhall be raiſed by the power of Chriſt; that is, the power of God in Chriſt; That that power, working to their reſurrection ſhall be declared in a mighty voyce, the voyce of the Archangell, in the Trumpet of God. And then, then when they who were formerly dead, are firſt raiſed, and raiſed by this Power, and this power thus declared, then ſhall we, we who ſhall be then alive and remaine, be E wrought upon; which is our ſecond, and our next generall part.

2. Part. Nos. When the Apoſtle ſayes here, Nos qui vivimus, We that are alive, and remaine, would he not be thought to ſpeake this of himſelfe, and the Theſſalonians to whom he writes? Doe not the words import that? That he, and they ſhould live till Chriſts comming to Judgement? Some certainly had taken him ſo; But he complaines that he was miſtaken;

2 Theſ. 2. 2. We beſeech you brethren, be not ſoone ſhaken in minde, nor troubled, by word or letter, as from us, that the day of the Lord is at hand; ſo at hand, as that we determine it in our dayes, in our life. So that the Apoſtle ſpeakes here, but Hypothetically; he does but put a caſe, That if it ſhould be Gods pleaſure to continue them in the world, till the comming of his

Son

A Son Christ Jesus, thus and thus they should be proceeded withall; for, thus and thus shall they be proceeded with, sayes he, that shall then be alive. Our blessed Saviour hath such a manner of speech, of an ambiguous sense, in S. Matthew, That there were some standing there, that should not taste of death, till they saw the Son of man comming in his Kingdome. And this might give them just occasion to think, that that Kingdome into which the Judgement shall enter us, was at hand; For, the words which Christ spoke immediatly before those, were evidently, undeniably spoken of that last, and everlasting kingdome of glory, The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his Angels, &c. Then follows, Some standing here shall live to see this. And yet Christ did not speak this of that last kingdome of glory; but either he spoke it of that manifestation of that kingdome which was shewed to some of them, (to Peter, and Iames, and Iohn) in the Transfiguration of Christ, (for the Transfiguration was a representation of the kingdome of
B glory) or else he spoke it of that inchoation of the kingdome of glory, which shined out in the kingdome of grace, which all the Apostles lived to see, in the personall comming of the Holy Ghost, and in his powerfull working in the conversion of Nations in their life time. Mat. 16. 28.

And this is an inexpressible comfort to us, That our blessed Saviour thus mingles his Kingdomes, that he makes the Kingdome of Grace, and the Kingdome of Glory, all one; the Church, and Heaven all one; and assures us, That if we see him In hoc speculo, in this his Glasse, in his Ordinance, in his Kingdome of Grace, we have already begun to see him facie ad faciem, face to face, in his Kingdome of Glory; If we see him Sicuti manifestatur, as he looks in his Word, and Sacraments, in his Kingdome of Grace, we have begun to see him, Sicuti est, As he is, in his Essence, in the Kingdome of Glory; And when we pray, Thy Kingdome come; and mean but the Kingdome of Grace, he gives us
C more then we ask, an inchoative comprehension of the Kingdome of Glory, in this life. This is his inexpressible mercy, that he mingles his Kingdomes, and where he gives one, gives both. So is there also a faire beam of comfort exhibited to us in this Text, That the number reserved for that Kingdome of Glory, is no small number. For though David said, The Lord looked down from heaven, and saw not one that did good, no not one, (there it is lesse then a few) though when the times had better means to be better, when Christ preached personally upon the earth, when one Centurion had but replyed to Christ, Sir, you need not trouble your self to go to my house, if you do but say the word here, my servant will be well, Christ said in his behalfe, Verily I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel; When Christ makes so much of this single grain of Mustard-seed, this little faith, as to prefer it before all the faith of Israel, surely faith went very low in Israel at that time, Nay, when Christ himself sayes, speaking of his last comming, after so many
D ages preaching of the Gospell, When the Son of man comes, shall he finde faith upon earth, any faith? We have I say, a blessed beam of comfort shining out of this text, that it is no small number that is reserved for that Kingdome; For, whether the Apostle speak this of himself and the Thessalonians, or of others, he speaks not as of a few, but that by Christs having preached the narrownesse of the way, and the straitnesse of the gate, our holy industry and endeavour is so much exalted, (which was Christs principall end in taking those Metaphors of narrow wayes, and strait gates, not to make any man suspect an impossibility of entring, but to be the more industrious and endeavorous in seeking it) that as he hath sent workmen in plenty, (abundant preaching) so he shall return a plentifull harvest, a glorious addition to his Kingdome, both of those which slept in him before, and of those which shall be then alive, fit, all together, to be caught up in the clouds to meet him, and be with him for ever; for these two armies imply no small number. Pſal. 14. 2. Mat. 8. 10. Luk. 18. 8.
E Now, of the condition of these men, who shall be then alive, and how being clothed in bodies of corruption, they become capable of the glory of this text, in our first distribution, we proposed that for a particular consideration, and the other branch of this second part, and to that, in that order, we are come now.

Immutabimur.

I scarce know a place of Scripture, more diversly read, and consequently more variously interpreted then that place, which should most enlighten us, in this consideration presently under our hands; which is that place to the Corinthians, Non omnes dormiemus, We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. The Apostle professes there to deliver us a mystery, (Behold, I shew you a mystery) but Translators and Expositors have multiplyed mysticall clouds upon the words. S. Chrysostome reads these words as we do, Non 1 Cor. 15. 51. Chryſoſt.

Non dormiemus, We ſhall not all ſleep, but thereupon he argues, and concludes, that wee ſhall not all die. The common reading of the ancients is contrary to that, Omnes dormiemus, ſed non, &c. We ſhall all ſleep, but we ſhall not all be changed. The vulgat Edition in the Romane Church differs from both, and as much from the originall, as from either, Omnes reſurgemus, We ſhall all riſe again, but we ſhall not all be changed. S. Hierome examines the two readings, and then leaves the reader to his choice, as a thing indifferent. S. Auguſtine doth ſo too, and concludes aquè Catholicos eſſe, That they are as good Catholiques that reade it the one way, as the other. But howſoever, that which S. Chryſoſtome collects upon his reading, may not be maintained. He reads as we do; and without all doubt aright, We ſhall not all ſleep; But what then? Therefore ſhall we not all die? To ſleep there, is to reſt in the grave, to continue in the ſtate of the dead, and ſo we ſhall not all ſleep, not continue in the ſtate of the dead. But yet, Statutum eſt, ſayes the Apoſtle, as verily as Chriſt was once offered to beare our ſinnes, ſo verily it is appointed to every man once to die; And, as verily as by one man, ſinne entred into the world, and death by ſinne, ſo verily death paſſed upon all men, for that all men have ſinned; So the Apoſtle inſtitutes the compariſon, ſo he conſtitutes the doctrine, in thoſe two places of Scripture, As verily as Chriſt dyed for all, all ſhall die, As verily as every man ſins, every man ſhall die.

Heb. 9. 27. Rom. 5. 12.

In that change then, which we who are then alive, ſhall receive, (for though we ſhall not all ſleep, we ſhall all be changed) we ſhall have a preſent diſſolution of body and ſoul, and that is truly a death, and a preſent redintegration of the ſame body and the ſame ſoul, and that is truly a Reſurrection; we ſhall die, and be alive again, before another could conſider that we were dead; but yet this ſhall not be done in an abſolute inſtant; ſome ſucceſſion of time, though undiſcernible there is. It ſhall be done In raptu, in a rapture; but even in a rapture there is a motion, a tranſition from one to another place. It ſhall be done ſayes he, In ictu oculi, In the twinkling of an eye; But even in the twinkling of an eie, there is a ſhutting of the eie-lids, and an opening of them again; Neither of theſe is done in an abſolute inſtant, but requires ſome ſucceſſion of time. The Apoſtle, in the Reſurrection in our text, conſtitutes a Prius, ſomething to be done firſt, and ſomething after; firſt thoſe that were dead in Chriſt ſhall riſe firſt, and then, Then when that is done, after that, not all at once, we that are alive ſhall be wrought upon, we ſhall be changed, our change comes after their riſing; ſo in our change there is a Prius too, firſt we ſhall be diſſolved, (ſo we die) and then we ſhall be re-compact, (ſo we riſe again) This is the difference, they that ſleep in the grave, put off, and depart with the very ſubſtance of the body, it is no longer fleſh, but duſt, they that are changed at the laſt day, put off, and depart with, only the qualities of the body, as mortality and corruption; It is ſtill the ſame body, without reſolving into duſt, but the firſt ſtep that it makes, is into glory.

Now transfer this to the ſpirituall Reſurrection of thy ſoul by grace, here. Here, Grace works not that Reſurrection upon thy ſoul, in an abſolute inſtant. And therefore ſuſpect not Gods gracious purpoſe upon thee, if thou beeſt not preſently, throughly recovered. God could have made all the world in one day, and ſo have come ſooner to his Sabbath, his reſt; but he wrought more, to give us an example of labour, and of patience, in attending his leaſure in our ſecond Creation, this Reſurrection from ſin, as we did in our firſt Creation, when we were not made till the ſixt day. But remember too, that the laſt Reſurrection, from death, is to be tranſacted quickly, ſpeedily; And in thy firſt, thy ſpirituall Reſurrection from ſin, make haſte. The laſt is to be done In raptu, in a rapture; Let this rapture in the firſt Reſurrection be, to teare thy ſelf from that company and converſation that leads thee into tentation. The laſt is to be done In ictu oculi, In the twinkling of an eye; Let that, in thy firſt Reſurrection be, The ſhutting of thine eyes from looking upon things in things, upon creatures in creatures, upon beauty in that face that miſleads thee, or upon honour in that place that poſſeſſes thee; And let the opening of thine eyes be, to look upon God in every object, to repreſent to thy ſelf the beauty of his holineſſe, and the honour of his ſervice in every action. And in this rapture, and in this twinkling of an eye, will thy Reſurrection ſoon, though not ſuddenly, ſpeedily, though not inſtantly be accompliſhed. And if God take thee out of the world, before thou think it throughly accompliſhed, yet he ſhall call thine inchoation, conſummation, thine endeavour, performance, and thy deſire, effect. For all Gods works are intire, and done in him, at once, and perfect as ſoon as begun; And this ſpirituall Reſurrection is his

A his work, and therefore quickned even in the Conception, and borne even in the quickning, and grown up even in the birth, that is, perfected in the eyes of God, as ſoone as it is ſeriouſly intended in our heart. And farther we carry not your conſideration upon thoſe two Branches which conſtitute our ſecond Part, That ſome ſhall be alive at Chriſts comming, That they that are alive, ſhall receive ſuch a change, as ſhall be a true death, and a true Reſurrection, And ſo ſhall be caught up into the Clouds, to meet the Lord in the Aire, and ſo be with the Lord for ever; which are the Circumſtances of our third, and laſt Part.

In this laſt part, we propoſed it for the firſt Conſideration, that the Apoſtle determines the Conſideration of the Reſurrection in thoſe two, Them, and Us, They that ſlept in Chriſt, and We that expect the comming of Chriſt. Of any Reſurrection of the wicked, here is no mention. Not that there is not one; but that the reſurrection of the wicked B conduced not to the Apoſtles purpoſe, which was to miniſter comfort in the loſſe of the dead, becauſe they were to come again, and to meet the Lord, and to be with him for ever; whereas, in the Reſurrection of the wicked, who are only to riſe, that they may fall lower, there is no argument of comfort. And therefore our Saviour Chriſt determines his Commiſſion in that, This is the Fathers will that ſent me, that of all which he hath given me, I ſhould loſe nothing, but ſhould raiſe it up again at the laſt day. This was his not loſing, if it were raiſed again; but, he hath only them in charge to raiſe at the laſt day, whom the Father had given him; given him ſo, as that they were to be with him for ever; for others he never mentions.

John 6.39.

And upon this, much, very much depends. For, this forbearing to mention the reſurrection of the wicked with the righteous, gave occaſion to many in the Primitive Church, to imagine a two-fold, a former and a later Reſurrection; which was furthered C by their miſtaking of thoſe words in S. Iohn, Bleſſed and holy is he that hath part in the firſt Reſurrection; which words, being intended of the Reſurrection from ſin, by grace, in this life, the Chiliaſts, the Millenarians, interpreted of this Reſurrection in our Text, That at Chriſts comming, the righteous ſhould riſe, and live a thouſand yeares, (as S. Iohn ſayes) in all temporall abundances, with Chriſt here, in recompence of thoſe temporall calamities, and oppreſſions, which here they had ſuffered; and then, after thoſe thouſand yeares, ſo ſpent with Chriſt, in temporall abundances, ſhould follow the reſurrection of the wicked; and then the wicked, and the righteous ſhould be diſpoſed and diſtributed and ſetled in thoſe Manſions, in which they ſhould remain for ever. And of this errour, (as very many of the Fathers perſiſted in it to the end) S. Auguſtine himſelf had a touch, and a tincture, at beginning. And this errour, S. Hierome alſo, (though truly, I think, S. Hierome was never touched with it himſelfe) out of a reverence to thoſe many, and D great men, that were, (Irenæus, Tertullian, Lactantius, and the reſt) would never call an Hereſie, nor an Errour, nor by any ſharper name, then an opinion, which is no word of heavy deteſtation.

Chiliaſtæ.

Apoc. 20.6.

And as thoſe bleſſed Fathers of tender bowels, enlarged themſelves in this diſtribution, and apportioning the mercy of God, that it conſiſted beſt with the nature of his mercy, that as his Saints had ſuffered temporall calamities in this world, in this world they ſhould be recompenced with temporall abundances, ſo did they inlarge this mercy farther, and carry it even to the Gentiles, to the Pagans that had no knowledge of Chriſt in any eſtabliſhed Church. You ſhall not finde a Trismegiſtus, a Numa Pompilius, a Plato, a Socrates, for whoſe ſalvation you ſhall not finde ſome Father, or ſome Ancient and Reverend Author, an Advocate. In which liberality of Gods mercy, thoſe tender Fathers proceed partly upon that rule, That in Triſmegiſtus, and in the reſt, they finde evi- E dent impreſſions, and teſtimonies, that they knew the Son of God, and knew the Trinity; and then, ſay they, why ſhould not theſe good men, beleeving a Trinity, be ſaved? and partly they goe upon that rule, which goes through ſo many of the Fathers, Facienti quod in ſe eſt, That to that man who does as much as he can, by the light of nature, God never denies grace; and then, ſay they, why ſhould not theſe men that doe ſo be ſaved? And, upon this ground, S. Dionyſe, the Areopagite ſayes, That from the beginning of the world, God hath called ſome men of all Nations, and of all ſorts, by the miniſtry of Angels, though not by the miniſtry of the Church. To me, to whom God hath revealed his Son, in a Goſpel, by a Church, there can be no way of ſalvation, but by applying that Son of God, by that Goſpel, in that Church. Nor is there any other foundation for any, any, nor other name by which any can be ſaved, but the name of Jeſus. But how this foundation is preſented, and how this name of Jeſus is notified to them, amongſt whom there is no Goſpel preached, no Church eſtabliſhed, I am not curious in inquiring. I know God can be as mercifull as thoſe tender Fathers preſent him to be; and I would be as charitable as they are. And therefore humbly imbracing that manifeſtation of his Son, which he hath afforded me, I leave God, to his unſearchable waies of working upon others, without farther inquiſition.

Angeli lapſi in Cœlis.

Neither did thoſe tender Fathers then, (much leſſe the School after) conſiſt in carying this overflowing, and inexhauſtible mercy of God, upon his Saints, after their Reſurrection, in temporall abundances, nor upon the Gentiles, who had no ſolemne, nor cleare knowledge of Chriſt, (which is Magnificare miſericordiam, to magnifie, to extend, to ſtretch the mercy of God) but, Mirificant miſericordiam, (as David alſo ſpeaks) they ſtretch this mercy miraculouſly, for, they carry this mercy even to hell it ſelf. For, firſt, for the Angels that fell in heaven, from the time that they committed their firſt ſin, to the time that they were caſt down into hell, they whom we call the more ſubtile part of the Schoole, ſay, That In illa mora, during that ſpace, between their falling into their ſin, and their expulſion from heaven, the Angels might have repented, and been reſtored, for, ſo long, ſay they, thoſe Angels were but in ſtatu viatorum, in the ſtate and condition of perſons, as yet upon their way, (as all men are, as long as they are alive) and not In termino, in their laſt, and determined ſtation. And that which is ſo often cited out of Damaſcen, concerning the fall of Angels, Quod hominibus mors eſt, Angelis caſus, That as death works upon man, and concludes him, and makes him impenitible for ever, ſo works the fall upon the Angels, and concludes them for ever too, they interpret to have been intended by Damaſcen, not of the Angels fall in heaven, but their fall from heaven; for, till then, they were not, ſay they, In termino, in their laſt ſtate, and, ſo, not impenitible. And thoſe Ancients, which expound that battle in heaven, between Michael and the Dragon, and their ſeverall Angels, to have been fought at that time, after their fall, and between Lucifers rebellion, and his expulſion, (as the Ancients abound much in that ſenſe of that place) argue rationally, That that battle, (what kinde of battle ſoever it were) muſt neceſſarily have ſpent ſome time. They conceive it to have been a battle of Diſputation, of Argumentation, of Perſwaſion; and that thoſe good Angels which are ſo glad of our Converſion, would have been infinitely glad to have reduced their rebellious brethren to their obedience. And, during that time, (which could not be a ſudden inſtant) they were not Inadeptivi gratiæ, incapable of repentance, and of mercy. S. Cyril comes towards it, comes neare it; nay, if it be well obſerved, goes beyond it; Of Gods longanimity and patience toward man, (ſayes he) we have in part ſpoken; Quanta ille Angelis condonaverit, neſcimus; how great tranſgreſſions he hath forgiven in the Angels, we know not; only this we know, ſayes he, Solus qui peccare non poſſit Ieſus eſt, There is none impeccable, none that cannot ſin, Man nor Angel, but only Chriſt Jeſus.

Hieſolom.

Angeli lapſi in Infernum.

Nay after the expulſion of the Angels, not onely after their fall in Heaven, but their fall from Heaven, many of the Ancients ſeeme loath to exclude all wayes of Gods mercy, even from hell it ſelfe. De ſtatu moti, ſed non irremediabiliter moti, ſaies Origen, The Angels are fallen, fallen even into hell, but not ſo irrecoverably fallen, Vt Inſtitutionibus bonorum Angelorum non poſſint reſtitui, But that by the counſaile and labour of the good Angels, they may be reſtored againe. Origen is thought to be ſingle, ſingular in this doctrine, but he is not. Even S. Ambroſe, interpreting that place, That S. Paul ſaies He was made a Miniſter of the Goſpel, Vt innoteſceret, to the intent that the wiſdome of God, might by the Church, be made knowne to Powers and Principalities, interprets it of fallen Angels; That they, the fallen Angels might receive benefit by the preaching of the Goſpell in the Church. Prudentius ſaies not ſo, but this he does ſay, That upon this day, when our bleſſed Saviour aroſe from hell, Pœnarum celebres ſub Styge feriæ, And, Suppliciis mitibus, Nec fervent ſolito flumina ſulphure, Some relaxation, ſome eaſe in their torments, at ſome time, ſome very good men have imagined, even in hell. And more then that; they have not abſolutely cryed downe (for, ſo much it deſerves) that fable of Traian; That after that Emperour had beene ſome time in hell, yet, upon the prayers of Pope Gregory, he was removed to Heaven. Nay, more then that; (for, that was but of one man) But, an Author of our age, and much eſteemed in the Roman Church, delivers as his owne opinion, (and thinks he hath the ſubtiler part of the Schoole on his ſide) That that, which is

ſo

A so often said, (from hell there is no redemption) is only to be understood of them, whom God sends to hell, as to their last place; to them, certainely there is no redemption. But, saies he, God may send soules of the heathen, who had not the benefit of any Christian Church, and yet were good morall men, to burne out certaine errors, or ignorances, or sins in hell, and then remove them to Heaven; for, for so long time, they are but Viatores, they are but in their way, and not concluded.

Beloved, that we might have something in the balance to weigh downe the cruelty, and the petulancy, and the pertinacy of those men, who in these later times have so attenuated the mercy of God, as that they have almost brought it to nothing, (for there is no mercy where there is no misery, and they place all mercy to have beene given at once, and that, before man was fallen into misery by sin, or before man was made) and have pronounced, that God never meant to shew mercy to all them, nor but to a very few of
B them, to whom he pretended to offer it, that we might have something in the balance to weigh against these unmercifull men, I have staid thus long upon these over-mercifull men, that have carried mercy upon the Saints of God, in temporall abundances after the Resurrection, and upon the Heathen who never heard Gospell preached, and upon the Angels fallen in Heaven, and upon those Angels fallen from Heaven into hell, and upon the soules of men there, not onely in the ease of their torments, but in their translation from thence to Heaven. That so our later men might see, that the Ancients thought God so far from beginning at Hate, (That God should first, for his glory, hate some, and then make them that he might execute his hate upon them) as that they thought God implacable, inexorable, irreconciliable to none; therfore to these unmercifull, have we opposed these overmercifull men.

But yet, to them wee must say, Numquid Deus indiget mendacio vestro, ut pro eo Io- Iob 13.7.
C quamini dolos? Shall wee lye for God; or speake deceitfully for him? deceive your soules, with over-extending his mercy? wee may derive mercy from hell, though wee carry not mercy to hell. Gehenna non solum eorum, qui puniendi, causa facta, sed & Origen.
eorum, qui salvandi; Hell was not onely made for their sakes, who were to suffer in it, but for theirs, who were to be warned by it; and so there is mercy in hell. Cooperatur regno, saies S. Chrysostome, elegantly, Hell hath a co-operation with Heaven, It Chrysost.
works upon us, in the advancement of our Salvation, as well as Heaven; Nec savitiæ res est, sed misericordiæ, Hell is not a monument of Gods cruelty, but of his mercy; Et nisi fuisset intentata gehenna, in gehennam omnes cecidissemus, If we were not told of hell, we should all fall into hell; and, so there is mercy in hell. And therefore, saies the same Father, Out of an unspeakeable wisdome, and Fatherly care, (as Fathers will speak loudest to their Children, and looke angerliest, and make the greatest rods, when they intend not D the severest correction) Christus sæpius gehennam comminatus est, quam regnum pollicitus, Christ in his Gospell, hath oftner threatned us with hell, then promised us Heaven. We are bound to praise God, saies he, as much for driving Adam out of Paradise, as for placing him there, Et agere gratias tam pro gehenna, quam pro regno, And to give him thanks, as well for hell, as for Heaven. For, whether he cauterise or foment, whether he draw blood, or apply Cordials, he is the same Physitian, and seekes but one end, (our spirituall health) by his divers wayes. For us, who by this notification of hell, escape hell, We shall Psal. 118.17.

are our beds. And in those beds, (and in all other beds of death) (for, the dead have their beds in the Sea too, and sleepe even in the restlesse motion thereof) the voyce of the Archangel, and the Trumpet of God shall awake them that slept in Christ before, and

Though we live to see Christ, we shall not prevent them, though they have attended Christ five thousand yeares in the grave, they shall not prevent us, but united in one body, Rapiemur, They and we shall be caught, &c.

Rapiemur, We shall be caught up. This is a true Rapture, in which we doe nothing our selves. Our last act towards Christ, is as our first; In the first act of our Conversion we do nothing; nothing in this last act, our Resurrection, but Rapimur, we are caught. In every thing, the more there is left to our selves, the worse it is done; that that God does intirely, is intirely good. S. Paul had a Rapture too; He was caught up into Paradise; but 2 Cor. 12.4.

whether in the body, or out of the body, he cannot tell. We can tell, that this Rapture of ours, A ſhall be in body and ſoule, in the whole man. Man is but a vapour; but a glorious, and a bleſſed vapour, when he is attracted, and caught up by this Sun, the Son of Man, the Son of God. O what a bleſſed alleviation poſſeſſes that man! and to what a bleſſed levity, (if without levity we may ſo ſpeake) to what a cheerefull lightneſſe of ſpirit is he come, that comes newly from Confeſſion, and with the ſeale of Abſolution upon him! Then, when nothing troubles his conſcience, then, when he hath disburdened his ſoule of all that lay heavy upon it, then, when if his Confeſſor ſhould unjuſtly reveale it to any other, yet God will never ſpeake of it more to his conſcience, not upbraid him with it, not reproach him for it, what a bleſſed alleviation, what a holy cheerefulneſſe of ſpirit is that man come to? How much more in the endowments which we ſhall receive in the Rapture of this text, where we do not onely deveſt all ſins paſt, (as in Confeſſion) but all poſſibility of future ſins; and put on, not onely incorruption, but incorruptibleneſſe; B not onely impeccancy, but impeccability. And, to be inveſted with this endowment, Rapiemur, Wee ſhall be caught up, and Rapiemur in Nubibus, Wee ſhall be caught up in the Clouds.

In Nubibus. We take a Sar to be the thickeſt, and ſo the impureſt, and ignobleſt part of that ſphear; and yet, by the illuſtration of the Sun, it becomes a glorious ſtar. Clouds are but the beds, and wombs of diſtempered and malignant impreſſions, of vapours, and exhalations, and the furnaces of Lightnings and of Thunder; yet by the preſence of Chriſt, and his employment, theſe clouds are made glorious Chariots to bring him and his Saints

Obviam Domino. So far towards that, as into the Ayre, this text carries us, Obviam Domino, To meet the Lord.

A Lord. The Lord requires no more, not ſo much at our hands, as he does for us. When he is come from the right hand of his Father in heaven, into the ayre to meet us, he is come farther then we are to go from the grave to meet him. But we have met the Lord in many a lower place; in many unclean actions have we met the Lord in our owne hearts, and ſaid to our ſelves, Surely the Lord is here, and ſees us, and (with Ioſeph) How then can I doe this great wickedneſſe, and ſin againſt my God? and yet have proceeded, gone forward in the accompliſhment of that ſin. But there it was Obviam Ieſu, Obviam Chriſto, We met a Ieſus, We met a Chriſt, a God of mercy, who forgave us thoſe ſins. Here in our text, it is Obviam Domino, We muſt meet the Lord; He inveſts here no other name but that; He hath laid aſide his Chriſt, and his Ieſus, names of Mercy, and Redemption, and Salvation, and comes only in the name of power, The Lord, The Judge of quick and dead. In which Judgement he ſhews no mercy; All his mercy is exerciſed B in this life; and he that hath not received his portion of that mercy before his death, ſhall never receive any. There he judges only by our workes, Whom haſt thou fed, whom haſt thou clothed? Then in judgement we meet the Lord, the Lord of power, and the laſt time that ever we ſhall meet a Ieſus, a Chriſt, a God of mercy, is upon our death-bed; but there we ſhall meet him ſo, as that when we meet him in another name, The Lord, in the ayre, yet by the benefit of the former mercy received from Ieſus, We ſhall be with the Lord for ever. Gen. 39. 9.

First Erimus, We ſhall Bee, we ſhall have a Beeing. There is nothing more contrary to God, and his proceedings, then annihilation, to Bee nothing, Do nothing, Think nothing. It is not ſo high a ſtep, to raiſe the poore out of the duſt, and to lift the needy from the dunghill, and ſet him with Princes, To make a King of a Beggar is not ſo much, as to make a Worm of nothing. Whatſoever God hath made thee ſince, yet his greaC teſt work upon thee, was, that he made thee; and howſoever he extend his bounty in preferring thee, yet his greateſt largeneſſe, is, in preſerving thee in thy Beeing. And therefore his own name of Majeſty, is Jehovah, which denotes his Eſſence, his Beeing. And it is uſefully moved, and ſafely reſolved in the School, that the devill himſelf cannot deliberately wiſh himſelfe nothing. Suddenly a man may wiſh himſelf nothing, becauſe that ſeemes to deliver him from the ſenſe of his preſent miſery; but deliberately he cannot; becauſe whatſoever a man wiſhes, muſt be ſomething better then he hath yet; and whatſoever is better, is not nothing. Nihil contrarium Deo, There is nothing truly contrary to God; To do nothing, is contrary to his working; but contrary to his nature, contrary to his Eſſence there is nothing. For whatſoever is any thing, even in that Beeing, and therefore becauſe it is, hath a conformity to God, and an affinity with God, who is Beeing, Eſſence it ſelf. In him we have our Beeing, ſayes the Apoſtle, But here D it is more then ſo; not only In illo, but Cum illo, not only In him, but With him, not only in his Providence, but in his Preſence. Erimus. Pſal. 113. 7. Auguſt. Act. 17. 28. Cum illo.

The Hypocrite hath a Beeing, and, in God, but it is not with God, Quia cor longè, With his lips he honours God, but removes his heart far from him. And God ſends him after his heart, that he may keep him at that diſtance, (as S. Gregory reads and interprets that place of Eſay) Redite prævaricatores ad cor, Return O ſinners, follow your own heart, and then I am ſure you and I ſhall never meet. Our Saviour Chriſt delivers this diſtance plainly, Diſcedite à me, Depart from me, ye curſed, into everlaſting fire. Where the firſt part of the ſentence is incomparably the heavieſt, the departing worſe then the fire; the intenſneſſe of that fire, the ayre of that brimſtone, the anguiſh of that worm, the diſcord of that howling, and gnaſhing of teeth, is no comparable, no conſiderable part of the torment, in reſpect of the privation of the ſight of God, the baniſhment from the preſence E of God, an abſolute hopeleſneſſe, an utter impoſſibility of ever comming to that, which ſuſtaines the miſerable in this world, that though I ſee no Sun here, I ſhall ſee the Son of God there. The Hypocrite ſhall not do ſo; we ſhall Bee, and Bee with him, and Bee with him for ever; which is the laſt thing that doth fall under ours, or can fall under any conſideration. Eſay 29. 13. Eſay 46. 8. Mat. 25. 41.

Of S. Hierome, S. Auguſtine ſayes, Quæ Hieronymus neſcivit, nullus hominum unquam ſcivit; That that S. Hierome knew not, no man ever knew. And S. Cyril, to whom S. Auguſtine ſaid that, ſaid alſo to S. Auguſtine, in magnifying of S. Hierome, That when a Catholique Prieſt diſputed with an Heretique, and cited a paſſage of S. Hierome, and the Heretique ſaid Hierome lyed, inſtantly he was ſtruck dumb; yet of this laſt and everlaſting Semper.

joy and glory of heaven, in the fruition of God, S. Hierome would adventure to ſay nothing, no not then, when he was deveſted of his mortall body, dead; for, as ſoon as he dyed at Bethlem, he came inſtantly to Hippo, S. Auguſtines Biſhoprick, and though he told him, Hieronymi anima ſum, I am the ſoule of that Hierome, to whom thou art now writing about the joyes and glory of heaven, yet he ſaid no more of that, but this, Quid quæris brevi immittere vaſculo totum mare? Canſt thou hope to poure the whole Sea into a thimble, or to take the whole world into thy hand? And yet, that is eaſier, then to comprehend the joy and the glory of heaven in this life. Nor is there any thing, that makes this more incomprehenſible, then this Semper in our text, the Eternity thereof, That we ſhall be with him for ever. For, this Eternity, this Everlaſtingneſſe is not only incomprehenſible to us in this life, but even in heaven we can never know it experimentally; and all knowledge in heaven is experimentall; As all knowledge in this world is cauſall, (we know a thing, if we know the cauſe thereof) ſo the knowledge in heaven, is effectuall, experimentall, we know it, becauſe we have found it to be ſo. A B

The endowments of the bleſſed, (thoſe which the School calls Dotes beatorum) are ordinarily delivered to be theſe three, Viſio, Dilectio, Fruitio, The ſight of God, the love of God, and the fruition, the injoying, the poſſeſſing of God. Now, as no man can know what it is to ſee God in heaven, but by an experimentall and actuall ſeeing of him there, nor what it is to love God there, but by ſuch an actuall and experimentall love of him, nor what it is to enjoy and poſſeſſe God, but by an actuall enjoying, and an experimentall poſſeſſing of him, So can no man tell what the eternity, and everlaſtingneſſe of all theſe, is, till he have paſſed through that eternity, and that everlaſtingneſſe; and that he can never doe; for, if it could be paſſed through, then it were not eternity. How barren a thing is Arithmetique? (and yet Arithmetique will tell you, how many ſingle graines of ſand, will fill this hollow Vault to the Firmament) How empty a thing is Rhetorique? (and yet Rherorique will make abſent and remote things preſent to your underſtanding) How weak a thing is Poetry? (and yet Poetry is a counterfait Creation, and makes things that are not, as though they were) How infirme, how impotent are all aſſiſtances, if they be put to expreſſe this Eternity? The beſt help that I can aſſigne you, is, to uſe well Æternum veſtrum, your owne Eternity; as S. Gregory calls our whole courſe of this life, Æternum noſtrum, our Eternity; Æquum eſt, ut qui in æterno ſuo peccaverit, in æterno Dei puniatur, ſayes he; It is but juſtice, that he that hath ſinned out his owne Eternity, ſhould ſuffer out Gods Eternity. So, if you ſuffer out your owne Eternity, in ſubmitting your ſelves to God, in the whole courſe of your life, in ſurrendring your will intirely to his, and glorifying of him in a conſtant patience, under all your tribulations, It is a righteous thing with God, (ſayes our Apoſtle, in his other Epiſtle to theſe Theſſalonians) To recompence tribulation to them that trouble you, and to you, that are troubled reſt with us, ſayes hee there; with us, who ſhall be caught up in the Clouds, to meete the Lord in the Ayre, and ſo ſhall be with the Lord for ever. Amen. C D

PSAL. 89. 47.

What man is he that liveth, and ſhall not ſee death?

AT firſt, God gave the judgement of death upon man, when he ſhould tranſgreſſe, abſolutely, Morte morieris, Thou ſhalt ſurely dye: The woman in her Dialogue with the Serpent, ſhe mollifies it, Ne fortè moriamur, perchance, if we eate, we may die; and then the Devill is as peremptory on the other ſide, Nequaquam moriemini, do what you will, ſurely you ſhall not die; And now God in this Text comes to his reply, Quis eſt homo, ſhall they not die? Give me but one inſtance, but one exception to this rule, What man is hee that liveth, and ſhall not ſee death? Let no man, no woman, no devill offer a Ne fortè, (perchance we may dye) much leſſe a Nequaquam, (ſurely we ſhall not dye) except he be provided of an anſwer to this queſtion, except he can give an inſtance againſt this generall, except he can produce that mans name, and hiſtory, that hath lived, and ſhall not ſee death. Wee are all conceived in cloſe Priſon; in our Mothers wombes, we are cloſe Priſoners all; when we are borne, we are borne but to the liberty of the houſe; Priſoners ſtill, though within larger walls; and then all our life is but a going out to the place of Execution, to death. Now was there ever any man ſeen to ſleep in the Cart, between New-gate, and Tyborne? between the Priſon, and the place of Execution, does any man ſleep? And we ſleep all the way; from the womb to the grave we are never throughly awake; but paſſe on with ſuch dreames, and imaginations as theſe, I may live as well, as another, and why ſhould I dye, rather then another? but awake, and tell me, ſayes this Text, Quis homo? who is that other that thou talkeſt of? What man is he that liveth, and ſhall not ſee death?

In theſe words, we ſhall firſt, for our generall humiliation, conſider the unanſwerableneſſe of this queſtion, There is no man that lives, and ſhall not ſee death. Secondly, we ſhall ſee, how that modification of Eve may ſtand, fortè moriemur, how there may be a probable anſwer made to this queſtion, that it is like enough, that there are ſome men that live, and ſhall not ſee death: And thirdly, we ſhall finde that truly ſpoken, which the Devill ſpake deceitfully then, we ſhall finde the Nequaquam verified, we ſhall finde a direct, and full anſwer to this queſtion; we ſhall finde a man that lives, and ſhall not ſee death, our Lord, and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, of whom both S. Auguſtine, and S. Hierome, doe take this queſtion to be principally asked, and this Text to be principally intended. Aske me this queſtion then, of all the ſons of men, generally guilty of originall ſin, Quis homo, and I am ſpeechleſſe, I can make no anſwer; Aske me this queſtion of thoſe men, which ſhall be alive upon earth at the laſt day, when Chriſt comes to judgement, Quis homo, and I can make a probable anſwer; forte moriemur, perchance they ſhall die; It is a problematicall matter, and we ſay nothing too peremptorily. Aske me this queſtion without relation to originall ſin, Quis homo, and then I will anſwer directly, fully, confidently, Ecce homo, there was a man that lived, and was not ſubject to death by the law, neither did he actually die ſo, but that he fulfilled the reſt of this verſe; Eruit animam de inferno, by his owne power, he delivered his ſoule from the hand of the grave. From the firſt, this leſſon riſes, Generall doctrines muſt be generally delivered, All men muſt die: From the ſecond, this leſſon, Collaterall, an unrevealed doctrines muſt be ſoberly delivered, How we ſhall be changed at the laſt day, we know not ſo clearly: From the third, this leſſon ariſes, Conditionall Doctrines muſt be conditionally delivered, If we be dead with him, we ſhall be raiſed with him.

1. Part. Quis homo?

First then, for the generality, Thoſe other degrees of puniſhment, which God inflicted upon Adam, and Eve, and in them upon us, were as abſolutely, and illimitedly pronounced, as this of death, and yet we ſee, they are many wayes extended, or contracted; To man it was ſaid, In ſudore vultus, In the ſweat of thy browes, thou ſhalt eate thy bread, and how many men never ſweat, till they ſweat with eating? To the woman it was ſaid, Thy deſire ſhall be to thy husband, and he ſhall rule over thee: and how many women have no deſire to their husbands, how many over-rule them? Hunger, and thirſt, and wearineſſe, and ſickneſſe are denounced upon all, and yet if you ask me Quis homo? What is that man that hungers and thirſts not, that labours not, that ſickens not? I can tell you of many, that never felt any of theſe; but contract the queſtion to that one of death, Quis homo? What man is he that ſhall not taſte death? And I know none. Whether we conſider the Summer Solſtice, when the day is ſixteen houres, and the night but eight, or the Winter Solſtice, when the night is ſixteen houres, and the day but eight, ſtill all is but twenty foure houres, and ſtill the evening and morning make but a day: The Patriarchs in the old Teſtament had their Summer day, long lives; we are in the Winter, ſhort lived; but Quis homo? Which of them, or us come not to our night in death? If we conſider violent deaths, caſuall deaths, it is almoſt a ſcornfull thing to ſee, with what wantonneſſe, and ſportfulneſſe, death playes with us; We have ſeen a man Canon proofe in the time of War, and ſlain with his own Piſtoll in the time of peace: We have ſeen a man recovered after his drowning, and live to hang himſelfe. But for that one kinde of death, which is generall, (though nothing be in truth more againſt nature then diſſolution, and corruption, which is death) we are come to call that death, naturall death, then which, indeed, nothing is more unnaturall; The generality makes it naturall; Moſes ſayes, that Mans age is ſeventy, and eighty is labour and pain; and yet himſelfe was more then eighty, and in a good ſtate, and habitude when he ſaid ſo. No length, no ſtrength enables us to anſwer this Quis homo? What man? &c.

Pſal. 90. 10.

Take a flat Map, a Globe in plano, and here is Eaſt, and there is Weſt, as far aſunder as two points can be put: but reduce this flat Map to roundneſſe, which is the true form, and then Eaſt and Weſt touch one another, and are all one: So conſider mans life aright, to be a Circle, Pulvis es, & in pulverem reverteris, Duſt thou art, and to duſt thou muſt return; Nudus egreſſus, Nudus revertar, Naked I came, and naked I muſt go; In this, the circle, the two points meet, the womb and the grave are but one point, they make but one ſtation, there is but a ſtep from that to this. This brought in that cuſtome amongſt the Greek Emperours, that ever at the day of their Coronation, they were preſented with ſeverall ſorts of Marble, that they might then beſpeak their Tombe. And this brought in that Cuſtome into the Primitive Church, that they called the Martyrs dayes, wherein they ſuffered, Natalitia Martyrum, their birth dayes; birth, and death is all one.

Job 1.

Their death was a birth to them into another life, into the glory of God; It ended one Circle, and created another; for immortality, and eternity is a Circle too; not a Circle where two points meet, but a Circle made at once; This life is a Circle, made with a Compaſſe, that paſſes from point to point; That life is a Circle ſtamped with a print, an endleſſe, and perfect Circle, as ſoone as it begins. Of this Circle, the Mathematician is our great and good God; The other Circle we make up our ſelves; we bring the Cradle, and Grave together by a courſe of nature. Every man does; Mi Gheber, ſayes the Originall; It is not Iſhe, which is the firſt name of man, in the Scriptures, and ſignifies nothing but a ſound; a voyce, a word, a Muſicall ayre dyes, and evaporates, what wonder if man, that is but Iſhe, a ſound, dye too? It is not Adam, which is another name of man, and ſignifies nothing but red earth; Let it be earth red with blood, (with that murder which we have done upon our ſelves) let it be earth red with bluſhing, (ſo the word is uſed in the Originall) with a conſcience of our own infirmity, what wonder if man, that is but Adam, guilty of this ſelf-murder in himſelf, guilty of this in-borne frailty in himſelf, dye too? It is not Enos, which is alſo a third name of man, and ſignifies nothing but a wretched and miſerable creature; what wonder if man, that is but earth, that is a burden to his Neighbours, to his friends, to his kindred, to himſelfe, to whom all others, and to whom himſelf deſires death, what wonder if he dye? But this queſtion is framed upon none of theſe names; Not Iſhe, not Adam, not Enos; but it is Mi Gheber, Quis vir; which is the word alwayes ſignifying a man accompliſhed in all excellencies, a man accompanied with all advantages; fame, and good opinion juſtly conceived,

A ceived, keepes him from being Ishe, a meere ſound, ſtanding onely upon popular acclamation; Innocency and integrity keepes him from being Adam, red earth, from bleeding, or bluſhing at any thing hee hath done; That holy and Religious Art of Arts, which S. Paul profeſſed, That he knew how to want, and how to abound, keepes him from being Enos, miſerable or wretched in any fortune; Hee is Gheber, a great Man, and a good Man, a happy Man, and a holy Man, and yet Mi Gheber, Quis homo, this man muſt ſee death.

And therefore we will carry this queſtion a little higher, from Quis homo, to Quis deorum, Which of the gods have not ſeene death? Aske it of thoſe, who are Gods by participation of Gods power, of thoſe of whom God ſaies, Ego dixi, dii eſtis, and God anſwers for them, and of them, and to them, You ſhall dye like men; Aske it of thoſe gods, who are gods by imputation, whom Creatures have created, whom Men have made
B gods, the gods of the Heathen, and do we not know, where all theſe gods dyed? Sometimes divers places diſpute, who hath their tombes; but do not they deny their godhead in confeſſing their tombes? doe they not all anſwer, that they cannot anſwer this text, Mi Gheber, Quis homo, What man, Quis deorum, What god of mans making hath not ſeen death? As Iuſtin Martyr asks that queſtion, Why ſhould I pray to Apollo or Eſculapius for health, Qui apud Chironem medicinam didicerunt, when I know who taught them all that they knew? ſo why ſhould I looke for Immortality from ſuch or ſuch a god, whoſe grave I finde for a witneſſe, that he himſelfe is dead? Nay, carry this queſtion higher then ſo, from this Quis homo, to quid homo, what is there in the nature and eſſence of Man, free from death? The whole man is not, for the diſſolution of body and ſoule is death. The body is not; I ſhall as ſoone finde an immortall Roſe, an eternall Flower, as an immortall body. And for the Immortality of the Soule, It is ſafelier ſaid to be im-
C mortall, by preſervation, then immortall by nature; That God keepes it from dying, then, that it cannot dye. We magnifie God in an humble and faithfull acknowledgment of the immortality of our ſoules, but if we aske, quid homo, what is there in the nature of Man, that ſhould keepe him from death, even in that point, the queſtion is not eaſily anſwered.

It is every mans caſe then; every man dyes; and though it may perchance be but a meere Hebraiſme to ſay, that every man ſhall ſee death, perchance it amounts to no more, but to that phraſe, Guſtare mortem, To taſte death, yet thus much may be implied in it too, That as every man muſt dye, ſo every man may ſee, that he muſt dye; as it cannot be avoided, ſo it may be underſtood. A beaſt dyes, but he does not ſee death; S. Baſil ſayes, he ſaw an Oxe weepe for the death of his yoke-fellow; but S. Baſil might miſtake the occaſion of that Oxes teares. Many men dye too, and yet doe not ſee death;
D The approaches of death amaze them, and ſtupifie them; they feele no colluctation with Powers, and Principalities, upon their death bed; that is true; they feele no terrors in their conſciences, no apprehenſions of Judgement, upon their death bed; that is true; and this we call going away like a Lambe. But the Lambe of God had a ſorrowfull ſenſe of death; His ſoule was heavy unto death, and he had an apprehenſion, that his Father had forſaken him; And in this text, the Chalde Paraphraſe expreſſes it thus, Videbit Angelum mortis, he ſhall ſee a Meſſenger, a forerunner, a power of Death, an executioner of Death, he ſhall ſee ſomething with horror, though not ſuch as ſhall ſhake his morall, or his Chriſtian conſtancy.

So that this Videbunt, They ſhall ſee, implies alſo a Viderunt, they have ſeene, that is, they have uſed to ſee death, to obſerve a death in the decay of themſelves, and of every creature, and of the whole World. Almoſt fourteene hundred yeares agoe, S. Cyprian
E writing againſt Demetrianus, who imputed all the warres, and deaths, and unſeaſonableneſſes of that time, to the contempt, and irreligion of the Chriſtians, that they were the cauſe of all thoſe ils, becauſe they would not worſhip their Gods, Cyprian imputes all thoſe diſtempers to the age of the whole World; Canos videmus in pueris, ſaies hee, Wee ſee Children borne gray-headed; Capilli deficiunt, antequam creſcant, Their haire is changed, before it be growne. Nec ætas in ſenectute deſinit, ſed incipit a ſenectute, Wee doe not dye with age, but wee are borne old. Many of us have ſeene Death in our particular ſelves; in many of thoſe ſteps, in which the morall Man expreſſes it; Wee have ſeene Mortem infantiæ, pueritiam, The death of infancy in youth; and Pueritiæ, adoleſcentiam, and the death of youth in our middle age; And at laſt we ſhall ſee Mortem ſenectutis,

Videbit.

Baſil orat. de Morte.

Cyprian ad Demetrianum.

Seneca.

ctutis, mortem ipſam, the death of age in death it ſelfe. But yet after that, a ſtep farther then that Morall man went, Mortem mortis in morte Ieſu, We ſhall ſee the death of Death it ſelf in the death of Chriſt. As we could not be cloathed at firſt, in Paradiſe, till ſome Creatures were dead, (for we were cloathed in beaſts skins) ſo we cannot be cloathed in Heaven, but in his garment who dyed for us. A

This Videbunt, this future ſight of Death implies a viderunt, they have ſeene, they have ſtudied Death in every Booke, in every Creature; and it implies a Vident, they doe preſently ſee death in every object, They ſee the houre-glaſſe running to the death of the houre; They ſee the death of ſome prophane thoughts in themſelves, by the entrance of ſome Religious thought of compunction, and converſion to God; and then they ſee the death of that Religious thought, by an inundation of new prophane thoughts, that overflow thoſe. As Chriſt ſayes, that as often as wee eate the Sacramentall Bread, we ſhould remember his Death, ſo as often, as we eate ordinary bread, B

Bern. Aug. we may remember our death; for even hunger and thirſt, are diſeaſes; they are Mors quotidiana, a daily death, and if they laſted long, would kill us. In every object and ſubject, we all have, and doe, and ſhall ſee death; not to our comfort as an end of miſery, not onely as ſuch a miſery in it ſelfe, as the Philoſopher takes it to be, Mors omnium miſeriarum, That Death is the death of all miſerie, becauſe it deſtroyes and diſſolves our

Prov. 16. 14. beeing; but as it is Stipendium peccati, The reward of ſin; That as Solomon ſayes, Indignatio Regis nuncius mortis, The wrath of the King, is as a meſſenger of Death, ſo Mors nuncius indignationis Regis, We ſee in Death a teſtimony, that our Heavenly King is angry; for, but for his indignation againſt our ſinnes, we ſhould not dye. And this death, as it is Malum, ill, (for if ye weigh it in the Philoſophers balance, it is an annihilation of our preſent beeing, and if ye weigh it in the Divine Balance, it is a ſeale of Gods anger againſt ſin) ſo this death is generall; of this, this queſtion there is no anſwer, Quis homo, What C man, &c.

2 Part. We paſſe then from the Morte moriemini, to the fortè moriemini, from the generality and the uneſcapableneſſe of death, from this queſtion, as it admits no anſwer, to the Fortè moriemini, perchance we ſhall dye; that is, to the queſtion as it may admit a probable anſwer. Of which, we ſaid at firſt, that in ſuch queſtions, nothing becomes a Chriſtian better then ſobriety; to make a true difference betweene problematicall, and dogmaticall points, betweene upper buildings, and foundations, betweene collaterall doctrines,

Aug. and Doctrines in the right line: for fundamentall things, Sine hæſitatione credantur, They muſt be beleeved without diſputing; there is no more to be done for them, but beleeving; for things that are not ſo, we are to weigh them in two balances, in the balance of Analogy, and in the balance of ſcandall: we muſt hold them ſo, as may be analogall, proportionable, agreeable to the Articles of our Faith, and we muſt hold them ſo, as our D brother be not juſtly offended, nor ſcandalized by them; wee muſt weigh them with faith, for our own ſtrength, and we muſt weigh them with charity, for others weakneſſe. Certainly nothing endangers a Church more, then to draw indifferent things to be neceſſary; I meane of a primary neceſſity, of a neceſſity to be beleeved De fide, not a ſecondary neceſſity, a neceſſity to be performed and practiſed for obedience: Without doubt, the Roman Church repents now, and ſees now that ſhe ſhould better have preſerved her ſelfe, if they had not denied ſo many particular things, which were indifferently and problematically diſputed before, to bee had neceſſarily De fide, in the Councell of Trent.

Taking then this Text for a probleme, Quis homo, What man lives, and ſhall not ſee Death? we anſwer, It may be that thoſe Men, whom Chriſt ſhal find upon the earth alive, at his returne to Judge the World, ſhall dye then, and it may be they ſhall but be changed, and not dye. That Chriſt ſhall judge quick and dead, is a fundamentall thing; we E

Auguſt. Chryſ. and the dead, as Auguſtine and Chryſoſtome doe, for the Righteous which lived in faith, and the unrighteous, which were dead in ſinne, Though wee doe not take the quick and the dead, as Ruffinus and others doe, for the ſoule and the body, (He ſhall judge the ſoule, which was alwaies alive, and he ſhall the body, which was dead for a time) though we take the words (as becomes us beſt) literally, yet the letter does not conclude, but that they, whom Chriſt ſhall finde alive upon earth, ſhall have a preſent

A and ſudden diſſolution, and a preſent and ſudden re-union of body and ſoul again. Saint Paul ſayes, Behold I ſhew you a myſtery; Therefore it is not a cleare caſe, and preſently, and peremptorily determined; but what is it? We ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed. But whether this ſleeping be ſpoke of death it ſelf, and exclude that, that we ſhall not die, or whether this ſleep be ſpoke of a reſt in the grave, and exclude that, we ſhall not be buried, and remain in death, that may be a myſtery ſtill. S. Paul ſayes too, The dead in Chriſt ſhall riſe firſt; Then we which are alive, and remain, ſhall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the ayre. But whether that may not ſtill be true, that S. Auguſtine ſayes, that there ſhall be Mors in raptu, An inſtant and ſudden diſ-union, and re-union of body and ſoul, which is death, who can tell? So on the other ſide, when it is ſaid to him, in whom all we were, to Adam, Pulvis es, Duſt thou art, and into duſt thou ſhalt return, when it is ſaid, In Adam all die, when it is ſaid, Death paſſed B upon all men, for all have ſinned, Why may not all thoſe ſentences of Scripture, which imply a neceſſity of dying, admit that reſtriction, Niſi dies judicii naturæ curſum immutet, We ſhall all die, except thoſe, in whom the comming of Chriſt ſhall change the courſe of Nature.

Conſider the Scriptures then, and we ſhall be abſolutely concluded neither way; Conſider Authority, and we ſhall finde the Fatherrs for the moſt part one way, and the Schoole for the moſt part another; Take later men, and all thoſe in the Romane Church; Then Cajetan thinks, that they ſhall not die, and Catharin is ſo peremptory, that they ſhall, as that he ſayes of the other opinion, Falſam eſſe confidenter aſſerimus, & contra Scripturas ſatis manifeſtas, & omnino ſine ratione; It is falſe, and againſt Scriptures, and reaſon, ſaith he; Take later men, and all thoſe in the reformed Church; and Calvin ſayes, Quia aboletur prior natura, cenſetur ſpecies mortis, ſed non migrabit anima à cor- C pore: S. Paul calls it death, becauſe it is a deſtruction of the former Beeing; but it is not truly death, ſaith Calvin; and Luther ſaith, That S. Pauls purpoſe in that place is only to ſhew the ſuddenneſſe of Chriſts comming to Judgement, Non autem inficiatur omnes morituros; nam dormire, eſt ſepeliri: But S. Paul doth not deny, but that all ſhall die; for that ſleeping which he ſpeaks of, is buriall; and all ſhall die, though all ſhall not be buried, ſaith Luther.

Luther.

Take then that which is certain; It is certain, a judgement thou muſt paſſe: If thy cloſe and cautelous proceeding have ſaved thee from all informations in the Exchequer, thy clearneſſe of thy title from all Courts at Common Law, thy moderation from the Chancery, and Star-Chamber, If heighth of thy place, and Authority, have ſaved thee, even from the tongues of men, ſo that ill men dare not ſlander thy actions, nor good men dare not diſcover thy actions, no not to thy ſelf, All thoſe judgements, and all the D judgements of the world, are but interlocutory judgements; There is a finall judgement, In judicantes & judicatos, againſt Priſoners and Judges too, where all ſhalbe judged again; Datum eſt omne judicium, All judgement is given to the Son of man, and upon all the ſons of men muſt his judgement paſſe. A judgement is certain, and the uncertainty of this judgement is certain too; perchance God will put off thy judgement; thou ſhalt not die yet; but who knows whether God in his mercy, do put off this judgement, till theſe good motions which his bleſſed Spirit inſpires into thee now, may take roote, and receive growth, and bring forth fruit, or whether he put it off, for a heavier judgement, to let thee ſee, by thy departing from theſe good motions, and returning to thy former ſins, after a remorſe conceived againſt thoſe ſins, that thou art inexcuſable even to thy ſelf, and thy condemnation is juſt, even to thine own conſcience. So perchance God will bring this judgement upon thee now; now thou maiſt die; but whether God will E bring that judgement upon thee now, in mercy, whileſt his Graces, in his Ordinance of preaching, work ſome tenderneſſe in thee, and gives thee ſome preparation, ſome fitneſſe, ſome courage to ſay, Veni Domine Ieſu, Come Lord Ieſu, come quickly, come now, or whether he will come now in judgement, becauſe all this can work no tenderneſſe in thee, who can tell?

John 5.

Thou heareſt the word of God preached, as thou heareſt an Oration, with ſome gladneſſe in thy ſelf, if thou canſt heare him, and never be moved by his Oratory; thou thinkeſt it a degree of wiſdome, to be above perſwaſion; and when thou art told, that he that feares God, feares nothing elſe, thou thinkeſt thy ſelf more valiant then ſo, if thou feare not God neither; Whether or why God defers, or haſtens the judgement, we know not;

not; This is certain, this all S. Pauls places collineate to, this all the Fathers, and all the Schoole, all the Cajetans, and all the Catharins, all the Luthers, and all the Calvins agree in, A judgement must be, and it must be In ictu oculi, In the twinkling of an eye, and Fur in nocte, A theefe in the night. Make the queſtion, Quis homo? What man is he that liveth, and ſhall not paſſe this judgement? or, what man is he that liveth, and knowes when this judgement ſhall be? So it is a Nemo ſcit, A queſtion without an anſwer; but ask it, as in the text, Quis homo? Who liveth, and ſhall not die? ſo it is a problematicall matter; and in ſuch things as are problematicall, if thou love the peace of Sion, be not too inquiſitive to know, nor too vehement, when thou thinkeſt thou doeſt know it.

3. Part. Come then to ask this queſtion, not problematically, (as it is contracted to them that ſhall live in the laſt dayes) nor peremptorily of man, (as he is ſubject to originall ſin) but at large, ſo, as the queſtion may include Chriſt himſelf, and then to that Quis homo? What man is he? We anſwer directly, here is the man that ſhall not ſee death; And of him principally, and literally, S. Auguſtine (as we ſaid before) takes this queſtion to be framed; Vt quæras, dictum, non ut deſperes, ſaith he, this queſtion is moved, to move thee to ſeek out, and to have thy recourſe to that man which is the Lord of Life, not to make thee deſpaire, that there is no ſuch man, in whoſe ſelf, and in whom, for all us, there is Redemption from death: For, ſayes he, this queſtion is an exception to that which was ſaid before the text; which is, Wherefore haſt thou made all men in vain? Conſider it better, ſayes the Holy Ghoſt, here, and it will not prove ſo; Man is not made in vain at firſt, though he do die now; for, Perditio tua ex te, This death proceeds from man himſelf; and Quare moriemini domus Iſrael? Why will ye die, ô houſe of Iſrael? God made not death, neither hath he pleaſure in the deſtruction of the living; The Wiſe man ſayes it, and the true God ſweares it, As I live ſaith the Lord, I would not the death of a ſinner. God did not create man in vain then, though he die; not in vain, for ſince he will needs die, God receives glory even by his death, in the execution of his juſtice; not in vaine neither, becauſe though he be dead, God hath provided him a Redeemer from death, in his mercy; Man is not created in vain at all; nor all men, ſo neare vanity as to die; for here is one man, God and Man Chriſt Jeſus, which liveth, and ſhall not ſee death. And conformable to S. Auguſtines purpoſe, ſpeakes S. Hierome too, Scio quòd nullus homo carneus evadet, ſed novi Deum ſub velamento carnis latentem; I know there is no man but ſhall die; but I know where there is a God clothed in mans fleſh, and that perſon cannot die.

Auguſt. Sap. 1. 13. Hieron.

But did not Chriſt die then? Shall we joyne with any of thoſe Heretiques, which brought Chriſt upon the ſtage to play a part, and ſay he was born, or lived, or dyed, In phantaſmate, In apparance only, and repreſentation; God forbid; ſo all men were created in vain indeed, if we had not a regeneration in his true death. Where is the contract between him, and his Father, that Oportuit pati, All this Chriſt ought to ſuffer, and ſo enter into glory: Is that contract void, and of none effect? Muſt he not die? Where is the ratification of that contract in all the Prophets? Where is Eſays Verè languores noſtros tulit, Surely he hath born our ſorrows; and, he made his grave with the wicked in his death; Is the ratification of the Prophets cancelled? Shall he not, muſt he not die? Where is the conſummation, and the teſtification of all this? Where is the Goſpell, Conſummatum eſt? And he bowed his head, and gave up the ghoſt? Is that fabulous? Did he not die? How ſtands the validity of that contract, Chriſt muſt die; the dignity of thoſe Prophecies, Chriſt will die; the truth of the Goſpell, Chriſt did die, with this anſwer to this queſtion, Here is a man that liveth and ſhall not ſee death? Very well; For though Chriſt Jeſus did truly die, ſo as was contracted, ſo as was prophecied, ſo as was related, yet hee did not die ſo, as was intended in this queſtion, ſo as other naturall men do die.

Eſay 53. 4. 9.

For firſt, Chriſt dyed becauſe he would dye; other men admitted to the dignity of Martyrdome, are willing to dye; but they dye by the torments of the Executioners, they cannot bid their ſoules goe out, and ſay, now I will dye. And this was Chriſts caſe: It was not only, I lay down my life for my ſheep, but he ſayes alſo, No man can take away my ſoule; And, I have power to lay it down; And De facto, he did lay it down, he did dye, before the torments could have extorted his ſoule from him; Many crucified men lived many dayes upon the Croſſe; The thieves were alive, long after Chriſt was dead; and therefore Pilate wondred, that he was already dead. His ſoule did not leave his body by force, but becauſe he would, and when he would, and how he would; Thus far then

John 10. 15.

Mar. 15. 44. Auguſt.

first,

A first, this is an answer to this question, Quis homo? Christ did not die naturally, nor violently, as all others doe, but only voluntarily.

Again, the penalty of death appertaining only to them, who were derived from Adam by carnall, and sinfull generation, Christ Jesus being conceived miraculously of a Virgin, by the over-shadowing of the Holy Ghost, was not subject to the Law of death; and therefore in his person, it is a true answer to this Quis homo? Here is a man, that shall not see death, that is, he need not see death, he hath not incurred Gods displeasure, he is not involved in a general rebellion, and therfore is not involved in the generall mortality, not included in the generall penalty. He needed not have dyed by the rigour of any Law, all we must; he could not dye by the malice, or force of any Executioner, all we must; at least by natures generall Executioners, Age, and Sickneſſe; And then, when out of his own pleasure, and to advance our salvation, he would dye, yet he dyed
B so, as that though there were a dis-union of body and soule, (which is truly death) yet there remained a Nobler, and faster union, then that of body and soule, the Hypostaticall Union of the God-head, not onely to his soule, but to his body too; so that even in his death, both parts were still, not onely inhabited by, but united to the God-head it selfe; and in respect of that inseparable Union, we may answer to this question, Quis homo? Here is a man that shall not see death, that is, he shall see no separation of that, which is incomparably, and incomprehensibly, a better soul then his soule, the God-head shall not be separated from his body.

But, that which is indeed the most direct, and literall answer, to this question, is, That whereas the death in this Text, is intended of such a death, as hath Dominion over us, and from which we have no power to raise our selves; we may truly, and fully answer to his Quis homo? here is a man, that shall never see death so, but that he shall even in
C the jawes, and teeth of death, and in the bowels and wombe of the grave, and in the sink, and furnace of hell it selfe, retaine an Almighty power, and an effectuall purpose, to deliver his soule from death, by a glorious, a victorious, and a Triumphant Resurrection: So it is true; Christ Jesus dyed, else none of us could live; but yet hee dyed not so, as is intended in this question; Not by the necessity of any Law, not by the violence of any Executioner, not by the separation of his best soule, (if we may so call it) the God-head, nor by such a separation of his naturall, and humane soule, as that he would not, or could not, or did not resume it againe.

If then this question had beene asked of Angels at first, Quis Angelus? what Angel is that, that stands, and shall not fall? though as many of those Angels, as were disposed to that answer, Erimus similes Altissimo, We will be like God, and stand of our selves, without any dependance upon him, did fall, yet otherwise they might have an-D swered the question fairly, All we may stand, if we will; If this question had been asked of Adam in Paradise, Quis homo? though when he harkned to her, who had harkned to that voyce, Eritis sicut Dii, You shall be as Gods, he fell too, yet otherwise, he might have answered the question fairly so, I may live, and not dye, if I will; so, if this question be asked of us now, as the question implies the generall penalty, as it considers us onely as the sons of Adam, we have no other answer, but that by Adam sin entred upon all, and death by sin upon all; as it implies the state of them onely, whom Christ at his second comming shall finde upon earth, wee have no other answer but a modest, non liquet, we are not sure, whether we shall dye then, or no; wee are onely sure, it shall be so, as most conduces to our good, and Gods glory; but as the question implies us to be members of our Head, Christ Jesus, as it was a true answer in him, it is true in every one of us, adopted in him, Here is a man that liveth, and
E shall not see death.

Death and life are in the power of the tongue, sayes Solomon, in another sense; and in this sense too, If my tongue, suggested by my heart, and by my heart rooted in faith, can say, Non moriar, non moriar; If I can say, (and my conscience doe not tell me, that I belye mine owne state) if I can say, That the blood of my Saviour runs in my veines, ~~That the breath of his Spirit quickens all my purposes, that all my deaths have their~~ Resurrection, all my sins their remorses, all my rebellions their reconciliations, I will harken no more after this question, as it is intended de morte naturali, of a naturall death, I know I must die that death, what care I? nor de morte spirituali, the death of sin, I know I doe, and shall die so; why despaire I? but I will finde out another death, mortem raptus, Prov. 18. 21.

2 Cor. 12.

Acts 9. Greg. a death of rapture, and of extasie, that death which S. Paul died more then once, The death which S. Gregory speaks of, Divina contemplatio quoddam sepulchrum animæ, The contemplation of God, and heaven, is a kinde of buriall, and Sepulchre, and rest of the soule; and in this death of rapture, and extasie, in this death of the Contemplation of my interest in my Saviour, I shall finde my self, and all my sins enterred, and entombed in his wounds, and like a Lily in Paradise, out of red earth, I shall see my soule rise out of his blade, in a candor, and in an innocence, contracted there, acceptable in the sight of his Father. A

1 Tim. 5. 6. Though I have been dead, in the delight of sin, so that that of S. Paul, That a Widow that liveth in pleasure, is dead while she liveth, be true of my soule, that so, viduatur, gratiâ mortuâ, when Christ is dead, not for the soule, but in the soule, that the soule hath no sense of Christ, Viduatur anima, the soul is a Widow, and no Dowager, she hath lost her husband, and hath nothing from him; yea though I have made a Covenant with death, and have been at an agreement with hell, and in a vain confidence have said to my self, that when the overflowing scourge shall passe through, it shall not come to me, yet God shall annull that covenant, he shall bring that scourge, that is, some medicinall correction upon me, and so give me a participation of all the stripes of his son; he shall give me a sweat, that is, some horrour, and religious feare, and so give me a participation of his Agony; he shall give me a diet, perchance want, and penury, and so a participation of his fasting; and if he draw blood, if he kill me, all this shall be but Mors raptus, a death of rapture towards him, into a heavenly, and assured Contemplation, that I have a part in all his passion, yea such an intire interest in his whole passion, as though all that he did, or suffered, had been done, and suffered for my soule alone; Quasi moriens, & ecce vivo: some shew of death I shall have, for I shall sin; and some shew of death again, for I shall have a dissolution of this Tabernacle; Sed ecce vivo, still the Lord of life will keep me alive, and that with an Ecce, Behold, I live; that is, he will declare, and manifest my blessed state to me; I shall not sit in the shadow of death; no nor I shall not sit in darknesse; his gracious purpose shall evermore be upon me, and I shall ever discerne that gracious purpose of his; I shall not die, nor I shall not doubt that I shall; If I be dead within doores, (If I have sinned in my heart) why, Suscitavit in domo, Christ gave a Resurrection to the Rulers daughter within doores, in the house; If I be dead in the gate, (If I have sinned in the gates of my soule) in mine Eies, or Eares, or Hands, in actuall sins, why, Suscitavit in porta, Christ gave a Resurrection to the young man at the gate of Naim. If I be dead in the grave, (in customary, and habituall sins) why, Suscitavit in Sepulchro, Christ gave a Resurrection to Lazarus in the grave too. If God give me mortem raptus, a death of rapture, of extasie, of fervent Contemplation of Christ Jesus, a Transfusion, a Transplantation, a Transmigration, a Transmutation into him, (for good digestion brings alwaies assimilation, certainly, if I come to a true meditation upon Christ, I come to a conformity with Christ) this is principally that Pretiosa mors Sanctorum, Pretious in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his Saints, by which they are dead and buryed, and risen again in Christ Jesus: pretious is that death, by which we apply that pretious blood to our selves, and grow strong enough by it, to meet Davids question, Quis homo? what man? with Christs answer, Ego homo, I am the man, in whom whosoever abideth, shall not see death. JOHN 14. 26.

But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghoſt, whom the Father will ſend in my Name, Hee ſhall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatſoever I have ſaid unto you.

C THis day is this Scripture fulfilled in your eares, ſaith our Saviour Chriſt, having read for his Text, that place of Eſay, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. And that day which we celebrate now, was another Scripture fulfilled in their eares, and in their eyes too; For all Chriſts promiſes are Scripture; They have all the Infallibility of Scripture; And Chriſt had promiſed, that that Spirit which was upon him, when he preached, ſhould alſo be ſhed upon all his Apoſtles. And upon this day he performed that promiſe, when, They being all with one accord, in one place, there came a ſound from heaven, as of a ruſhing mighty winde, and filled the houſe, and there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it ſate upon each of them, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghoſt. And this very particular day, in which we now commemorate, and celebrate that performance of Chriſts promiſe, in that Miſ-
D ſion of the Holy Ghoſt upon the Apoſtles, are all theſe Scriptures performed again, in our eares, and eyes, and in our hearts; For in all thoſe Congregations that meet this day, to this purpoſe, every Preacher hath ſo much of this Vnction (which Vnction is Chriſt) upon him, as that the Spirit of the Lord is upon him, and hath anointed him to that ſervice; And every Congregation, and every good perſon in the Congregation, hath ſo much of the Apoſtle upon him, as that he feeles This Spirit of the Lord, this Holy Ghoſt, as he is this cloven tongue, that ſets one ſtemme in his eare, and the other in his heart, one ſtemme in his faith, and the other in his manners, one ſtemme in his preſent obedience, and another in his perſeverance, one to rectifie him in the errours of life, another to eſta-
E bliſh him in the agonies of death; For the Holy Ghoſt, as he is a Cloven tongue, opens as a Compaſſe, that reaches over all our Map, over all our World, from our Eaſt to our Weſt, from our birth to our death, from our cradle to our grave, and directs us for all things, to all perſons, in all places, and at all times; The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghoſt, whom the Father will ſend in my Name, he ſhall teach you all things, &c.

Acts 2. 1.

The bleſſed Spirit of God then, the Holy Ghoſt, the third perſon in the Trinity, (and yet, not Third ſo, as that either Second or Firſt, Son or Father, were one minute before him in that Co-eternity, that enwraps them all alike) this Holy Ghoſt is here deſigned by Chriſt, in his Perſon, and in his Operation; Who he is, and what he does; From whence he comes, and why he comes; And theſe two, Hee, and His office, will conſtitute our two parts in this text. In the firſt of which, (which will be the exerciſe of this day) we ſhall direct you upon theſe ſeverall Conſiderations: Firſt, that the Perſon deſigned for this Miſſion, and true Conſolation, is the Holy Ghoſt; You ſhall not be without comfort, comfort, ſaies Chriſt; But miſtake not falſe comforts for true, nor deceitfull comforters for faithfull; It is the Holy Ghoſt, or it is none; His Comfort, or no comfort, Him the Father will ſend, ſais Chriſt, in a ſecond branch; though the Holy Ghoſt be God, equall to the Father, and ſo have all Miſſions, and Commiſſions in his owne hand, yet he applies himſelfe, accommodates himſelfe to order, and he comes when he hath a Miſſion from the Father: and this Father, ſaies Chriſt, (which is a third branch in this part) ſends him in my name; Though he have as good intereſt in the name of Adonai, which is all our Powerfull name, and in the name of Iehovah, which is all our Eſſentiall name, as I, or my Father have, (the holy Ghoſt is as much Adonai, and as much Iehovah, as we are) yet he is ſent in my Name, that is, to proceed in my way, to perfect my worke, and to accompliſh that Redemption, by way of Application, which I had wrought, by way of Satisfaction. A

And then laſtly, that which qualifies him for this Miſſion, for this Imployment, is his Title, and Addition in this Text, That he is the Comforter; Diſcomfortable doctrines (of a primary impoſſibility of Salvation, to any man, And that impoſſibility originally rooted in God, and in Gods hating of that man, and hating of that man, not onely before he was a ſinfull man, but before he was any man at all, not onely before an actuall making, but before any intention to make him in Gods minde; That God cannot ſave that man, becauſe he meant to damne him, before he meant to make him) are not the way, in which the Holy Ghoſt is ſent by the Father, in the Sons Name; For they that ſent him, and he that comes, intend all that is done, in that capacity, as he is a Comforter, as he is the Comforter. And this is the Perſon, and this will be the extent of our firſt part; It is the Holy Ghoſt; No deceiving Spirit. He, though as high as the Higheſt, reſpects order, attends a Miſſion, ſtaies till he be ſent. And thirdly, he comes in anothers name, in anothers way, to perfect anothers worke. And he does all, in the quality and denomination of a Comforter, not eſtabliſhing, not countenancing any diſcomfortable Doctrines. B C

Firſt then, the Perſon into whoſe hands this whole worke is here recommended, is the Holy Ghoſt, The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghoſt. The manifeſtation of the myſterie of the Trinity was reſerved for Chriſt. Some intimations in the Old, but the publication only in the New Teſtament; Some irradiations in the Law, but the illuſtration onely in the Goſpell; Some emanation of beames, as of the Sun before it is got above the Horizon, in the Prophets, but the glorious proceeding thereof, and the attaining to a Meridianall height, only in the Euangeliſts. And then, the doctrine of the Trinity, thus reſerved for the time of the Goſpell, at that time was thus declared; So God loved the World, as that he ſent his Son; So the Son loved the World, as that he would come into it, and die for it; So the Holy Ghoſt loved the World, as that he would dwell in it, and inable men, in his Miniſtery, and by his gifts, to apply this mercy of the Father, and this merit of the Son, to particular ſouls, and to whole Congregations. The mercy of the Father, that he would ſtudy ſuch a way for the Redemption of our ſouls, as the death of his only Son, (a way which no man would ever have thought of, of himſelf, nor might have prayed for, if he could have imagined it) this Mercy of the Father is the object of our Thankfulneſs. The Merit of the Son, That into a man but of our nature, and equall to us in infirmities, there ſhould be ſuperinfuſed ſuch another nature, ſuch a divinity, as that any act of that Perſon, ſo compoſed of thoſe two natures, ſhould be even in the rigour of Juſtice, a ſufficient ranſome for all the ſins of all the Werld, is the object of our admiration. But the object of our conſolation (which is the ſubject of this Text) is this, That the Holy Ghoſt, by his preſence, and by inanimating the Ordinances of Chriſt, in the Miniſtery of the Goſpell, applies this mercy, and this merit to me, to thee, to every ſoul that anſwers his motions. D E

1 King. 5. In that Contract that paſt between Solomon and Hiram, for commerce and trade between their Nations, That Solomon ſhould ſend him Corne and Oyle, and Hiram ſhould ſend him Cedar, and other rich materials for Building, that people of God received an honor, and an aſſurance, in that preſent Contract, for future trade and commerce. So did the World, in that Contract, which paſt betweene the Father and the Son, That the Father ſhould ſend downe God, and the World ſhould deliver up Man, The nature of Man to be aſſumed by that Son, and ſo a Redemption ſhould be wrought after, in the fulneſſe of Time. And then, in the performance of this Contract, when Hiram ſent downe

thoſe

A thoſe rich materials from Libanon to the Sea, and by Sea in Flotes, to the place aſſigned, where Solomon received them, that people of God received a reall profit, in that actuall performance of that, which was but in contract before. So did the World too, when in the fulneſſe of Time, and in the place aſſigned by God in the Prophet Micah, which was Bethlem, the Son of God came in our fleſh, and after dyed for us; His Blood was the Subſtance, the Materials of our ranſome, and actually, and really delivered, and depoſited for us; which was the performance of the former Contract between his Father, and him. But then was the dignity of that people of God accompliſht, when thoſe rich Materials, ſo ſent, were really imploied in the building of the Temple; when the Altar, and the Oracle, were cloathed with that Gold; when the Cherubim, and the Olive-Trees, and the other Figures were made of that rich ſtuffe, which was provided; when certaine chiefe Officers, and three thouſand three hundred under-Officers, were appointed to Ver. 15.
B over-ſee the Work, and ten thouſand that attended by monthly courſes, and ſeaven ſcore Ver. 14.
& ten thouſand, that were alwaies reſident upon the Work. And ſo is our comfort accompliſht to us, when the Holy Ghoſt diſtributes theſe materials, the Blood, and the Merits of Chriſt, upon ſeverall Congregations, and that by his higher Officers, Reverend and Vigilant Biſhops, and others that have part in the Government of the Church, and then, by thoſe, who like Solomons ten thouſand, performed the ſervice by monthly courſes, and thoſe, who like his ſeaven ſcore and ten thouſand, are alwayes reſident upon fixt places, that ſalvation of ſoules, ſo decreed at firſt by the Father, and ſo accompliſhed after by the Son, is, by the Holy Ghoſt, ſhed, and ſpred upon particular men.

When, as the world began in a community, that every thing was every bodies, but improved it ſelfe, to a propriety, and came to a Meum & Tuum, that every man knew his owne; ſo, that which is Salus Domini, The Salvation of the Lord, as it is in the firſt
C Decree, and that which is Salus Mundi, The Salvation of the World, as it is in the accompliſhment of the Decree by Chriſt, may be Mea, & Tua, My Salvation, and thy Salvation, as it is applyed by the Holy Ghoſt, in the Miniſtry of the Church. Salvation in the Decree, is as the Bezar ſtone in the maw of that creature; there it growes. Salvation in Chriſts death, is as that Bezar in the Merchants, or Apothecaries proviſion; But ſalvation in the Church, in the diſtribution, and application thereof, by the Holy Ghoſt, is as that Bezar working in my veines, expelling my peccant humours, and rectifying my former defects.

The laſt work, the Seale, and Conſummation of all, is of the Holy Ghoſt. And therefore, as the Manifeſtation of the whole Trinity ſeemes to have been reſerved for Chriſt, ſo Chriſt ſeemes to have reſerved the Manifeſtation of the Holy Ghoſt, for his laſt Do-
D ctrine. For this is the laſt Sermon that Chriſt preached; And this is a Sermon recorded only by that laſt Euangeliſt, who, as he conſidered the Divine Nature of Chriſt, more then the reſt did, and ſo took it higher, ſo did he alſo conſider the future ſtate, and ſucceſſion of the Church, more then the reſt did, and ſo carried it lower. For, S. Iohn was a Prophet, as well as an Euangeliſt. Therefore in this laſt, and laſting Euangeliſt, and in this laſt Sermon, Chriſt declares this laſt work, in this world, that is, the Conſummation of our Redemption, in the application of the Holy Ghoſt. For herein conſiſts our comfort, that it is He, the Holy Ghoſt, that miniſters this comfort.

Chriſt had told them before, that there ſhould be a Comforter ſent; But he did not tell Ver. 16.
them then, that that Comforter was the Holy Ghoſt. Here he does; at laſt he does; and he ends all in that; that we might end and determine our comfort in that too, This God gives me, by the Holy Ghoſt. For we miſtake falſe comforts for true. We comfort our ſelves in things, that come not at all from God; in things which are but vanities, and E conduce not all to any true comfort. And we comfort our ſelves in things, which, though they doe come from God, yet are not ſigned, nor ſealed by the Holy Ghoſt. For, Wealth, and Honour, and Power, and Favour, are of God; but we have but ſtolne them from God, or received them by the hand of the Devil, if we be come to them by ill meanes. And if we have them from the hand of God, by having acquired them by good meanes, yet if we make them occaſions of ſin, in the ill uſe of them after, we loſe the comfort of the Holy Ghoſt, which requires the teſtimony of a rectified conſcience, that all was well got, and is well uſed. Therefore as Chriſt puts the Origination of our Redemption upon the Father, (I came but to doe my Fathers will) and as he takes the execution of that Decree upon himſelfe, (I am the way, and the truth, and the life, and the Reſurrection; I am all) ſo so he puts the comfort of all, upon the Holy Ghost: Discomfort, and Disconsolation, Sadnesse and Dejection, Damnation, and Damnation aggravated, and this aggravated Damnation multiplied upon that soule, that findes no comfort in the Holy Ghost. A

If I have no Adventure in an East-Indian Returne, though I be not the richer, yet neither am I poorer then I was, for that. But if I have no comfort from the Holy Ghost, I am worse, then if all mankinde had been left in the Putrifaction of Adams loynes, and in the condemnation of Adams sin. For then, I should have had but my equall part in the common misery; But now having had that extraordinary favour, of an offer of the Holy Ghost, if I feele no comfort in that, I must have an extraordinary condemnation. The Father came neare me, when he breathed the breath of life into me, and gave me my flesh. The Son came neare me, when he took my flesh upon him, and laid downe his life for me. The Holy Ghost is alwaies neare me, alwaies with me; with me now, if now I shed any drops of his dew, his Manna upon you; With me anon, if anon I turne B any thing that I say to you now, to good nourishment in my selfe then, and doe then, as I say now; With me when I eate, or drink, to say Grace at my meale, and to blesse Gods Blessings to me; With me in my sleep, to keep out the Tempter from the fancy, and imagination, which is his proper Sceane, and Spheare, That he triumph not in that, in such dreames as may be effects of sin, or causes of sin, or sins themselves. The Father is a Propitious Person; The Son is a Meritorious Person; The Holy Ghost is a Familiar Person; The Heavens must open, to shew me the Son of Man at the right hand of the Father, as they did to Steven; But if I doe but open my heart to my selfe, I may see the Holy Ghost there, and in him, all that the Father hath Thought and Decreed, all that the Son hath Said and Done, and Suffered for the whole World, made mine. Accustome your selves therefore to the Contemplation, to the Meditation of this Blessed Person of the glorious Trinity; Keep up that holy cheerefulnesse, which Christ makes C the Ballast of a Christian, and his Fraight too, to give him a rich Returne in the Heavenly Jerusalem. Be alwayes comforted; and alwayes determine your comfort in the Holy Ghost; For that is Christs promise here, in this first Branch, A Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost; And Him (sayes our second Branch) the Father shall send.

Missio. There was a Mission of the Son, God sent his Son. There was a Mission of the Holy Ghost; This day God sent the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost. But betweene these two Missions, that of the Son, and this of the holy Ghost, we consider this difference, that the first, the sending of the Son, was without any merit preceding; There could be nothing but the meere mercy of God, to move God to send his Son. Man was so far from meriting that, that (as we said before) he could not, nor might, if he could, have wisht it. But for this second Mission, the sending of the holy Ghost, there was a preceding merit. Christ, by his dying had merited, that mankinde, who by the fall of Adam, had lost, (as D S. August. speaks) Possibilitatem boni, All possibilitie of Redintegration, should, not only be restored to a possibility of Salvation, but that actually, that that was done, should be pursued farther, and that by this Mission, and Operation of the holy Ghost, actually, really, effectually, men should be saved. So that, as the work of our Redemption fals under our consideration, that is, not in the Decree, but in the execution of the Decree, in this Mission of the holy Ghost into the World, Man hath so far an interest, (not any particular man, but Man, as all Mankind was in Christ) as that we may truly say, The holy Luke 24. Ghost was due to us. And as Christ said of himselfe, Nonne hæc oportuit pati? Ought not Christ to suffer all this? Was not Christ bound to all this, by the Contract betweene him and his Father? to which Contract himselfe had a Privity; it was his owne Act; He signed it; He sealed it; so we may say, Nonne hunc oportuit mitti? Ought not the holy Ghost to be sent? Had not Christ merited that the holy Ghost should be sent, to perfect E the worke of the Redemption? So that, in such a respect, and in such a holy and devout sense we may say, that the holy Ghost is more ours, then either of the other Persons of the Trinity; Because, though Christ be so ours, as that he is our selves, the same nature, and flesh, and blood, The holy Ghost is so ours, as that we, we in Christ, Christ in our nature merited the holy Ghost, purchased the holy Ghost, bought the holy Ghost; Which is a sanctified Simony, and hath a faire, and a pious truth in it, We, we in Christ, Christ in our nature, bought the holy Ghost, that is, merited the holy Ghost.

A Patre. Christ then was so sent, as that, till we consider the Contract, (which was his owne Act) there was no Oportuit pati, no obligation upon him, that he must have been sent. The

Holy

A Holy Ghoſt was ſo ſent, as that the Merit of Chriſt, (of Chriſt, who was Man, as well as God) which was the Act of another, required, and deſerved that he ſhould bee ſent. Therefore he was ſent A Patre, By the Father. Now, not ſo by the Father, as not by the Son too; For, there is an Ego mittam, If I depart, I will ſend him unto you. But, cleane thorough Chriſts Hiſtory, in all his proceedings, ſtill you may obſerve, that he aſcribes all that he does, as to his Superiour, to his Father; though in one Capacity, as he was God, he were equall to the Father, yet to declare the meekeneſſe and the humility of his Soule, ſtill he makes his recourſe to his inferiour ſtate, and to his lower nature, and ſtill aſcribes all to his Father: Though he might ſay, and doe ſay there, I will ſend him, yet every where, the Father enters; I will ſend him, ſaies he; Whom? I will ſend the Promiſe of my Father. Still the Father hath all the glory, and Chriſt ſinks downe to his inferiour ſtate, and lower nature. — Iohn 16.7. — Luke 24.49.

B In the World it is far otherwiſe; Here, men for the moſt part, doe all things according to their greateſt capacity; If they be Biſhops, if they be Counſellors, if they be Juſtices, nay if they be but Conſtables, they will doe every thing according to that capacity; As though that authority, confined to certaine places, limited in certaine perſons, and determined in certaine times, gave them alwaies the ſame power, in all actions; And, becauſe to ſome purpoſes hee may be my ſuperiour, he will be my equall no where in nothing. Chriſt ſtill withdrew himſelfe to his lower capacity; And, howſoever worldly men engroſſe the thanks of the world to themſelves, Chriſt caſt all the honour of all the benefits that he beſtowed upon others, upon his Father; And in his Veruntamen, (Yet not my will, but thine O Father be done) He humbled himſelfe, as low as David in his Non nobis Domine, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us; but unto thy Name be all glory given. They would have made him King; He would not; and Judge, to divide the Inheritance; and he would not. He ſent the Holy Ghoſt; And yet, he ſaies, I will pray the Father to ſend him. So the Holy Ghoſt was ſent by them both; Father and Son; But not ſo, as that he was ſubject to a joynt command of both, or to a diverſe command of either, or that he came unwillingly, or had not a hand even in his owne ſending. But, howſoever he were perfect God, and had alwaies an abſolute power in himſelfe, and had ever a deſire to aſſiſt the ſalvation of man, yet he ſubmitted himſelfe to the Order of the Decree; He diſordered nothing, prevented nothing, anticipated nothing, but ſtaid, till all that which lay upon Chriſt, from his Incarnation, to his Aſcenſion, was executed, and then in the due and appointed time, iſſued his Miſſion.

It is a bleſſed Termination, Miſſion; It determines and ends many words in our Language; as Permiſſion, Commiſſion, Remiſſion, and others, which may afford good inſtruction, that as the Holy Ghoſt, did for his, ſo we may be content to ſtay Gods leaſure, for all thoſe Miſſions. A conſideration, which, I preſume, S. Bernard, who evermore embraced all occaſions of exalting devotion from the melodious fall of words, would not have let paſſe; Nor S. Auguſtine, for all his holy and reverend gravity, would have thought Nimis juvenile, Too light a conſideration to have inſiſted upon. And therefore I may have leave, to ſtay your meditations a little, upon this Termination, theſe Miſſions. — Miſſio.

D

You may have a Permiſſion; Many things are with ſome circumſtances Permitted, which yet in diſcretion are better forborne. Moſes permitted divorces, but that was for the hardneſſe of their hearts; and Chriſt withdrew that Permiſſion. S. Paul ſaies, he had a Permiſſion; Liberty to forbeare working with his owne hands, and ſo to live upon the Church; but yet he did not. What Permiſſion ſoever thou have, by which thou maiſt lawfully eaſe thy ſelfe, yet forbeare, till thou ſee, that the glory of God, and the good of other men, may be more advanced by the uſe, then by the forbearance of that indulgence, and that Permiſſion, and afford not thy ſelfe all the liberty that is afforded thee, but in ſuch caſes. The Holy Ghoſt ſtaid ſo for his Miſſion, ſo ſtay thou for the exerciſe of thy Permiſſion. — Permiſſio. — Mat. 19.8. — 1 Cor. 9.6.

Thou maiſt have a Commiſſion too; In that of the Peace, in that for Eccleſiaſticall cauſes, thou maiſt have part. But be not haſty in the execution of theſe Commiſſions; Come to an Inquiſition upon another man, ſo as thou wouldſt wiſh God to enquire into thee. Satan had a Commiſſion upon Iob; but he procured it ſo indirectly, on his part, by falſe ſuggeſtions againſt him, and executed it ſo uncharitably, as that he was as guilty of wrong and oppreſſion, as if he had had no Commiſſion. Thou canſt not aſſiſt in the execution — Commiſſio.

tion of those Commissions, of which thou art, till thou have taken the oathes of Supremacie, and of Allegeance to thy Soveraigne. Do it not, till thou have sworne all that, to thy Super-soveraigne, to thy God, That in all thy proceedings, his glory, and his will, and not thine owne passion, or their purposes, upon whom thou dependest, shall be thy rule. The holy Ghost staid for his Mission; stay thou for thy Commission, till it be sealed over againe in thine owne bosome; sealed on one side, with a cleerenesse of understanding, and on the other, with a rectitude of conscience; that thou know what thou shouldst doe, and doe that. A

Remissio. There is also a Remission; a Remission of sins. It is an Article of Faith, therefore beleeve it. Beleeve it originally, and meritoriously in Christ; and beleeve it instrumentally, and ministerially in the power, constituted by Christ, in the Church. But beleeve it not too hastily, in the execution and in the application thereof to thine owne case. A transitory sin, a sin that spent a few minutes in the doing thereof, was by the penitentiall Canons, (which were the rule of the Primitive Church) punished with many yeares penance. And doest thou thinke, to have Remission of thy seventy yeares sins, for one sigh, one groane, then, when that sigh, and that groane may be more in contemplation of the torment due to that sin, then for the sin it selfe; Nay more, that thou canst sinne that sin no longer, then for that sin? Hast thou sought thy Remission at the Church, that B

August. is, in Gods Ordinances established in the Church? In qua remittuntur, extra quam non remittuntur peccata, In which Ordinances, there is an Infallibility of Remission, upon true repentance, and in a contempt or neglect of which Ordinances, all Repentance is illu-

Hieron. sory, and all Remission but imaginary. For, Quodammodo ante diem Iudicii, judicant, God refers causes to the Church, to be prepared, and mature there, before the great Hearing; and so, hath given the Church a Power to judge, before the day of Judgement. And August. therefore, Nemo sibi dicat, occultè ago, apud Deum ago, Let no man say, I repent in secret; C God sees that I repent; It was scarce in secret, that thou didst sin; and wilt thou repent but in secret? At least let us know thy repentance by the amendment of thy life, and wee shall not much presse the knowing of it any other way. Onely remember that the holy Ghost staid for his Mission; Presume not thou of thy Remission, till thou have done, not onely something towards it, that might induce it from God, that is, Repentance, but something by it, that may testifie it to man, that is, amendment of life.

Manumissio. There is a Manumission also, an emancipation, an enfranchisement from the tyranny, from the thraldome of sin. That which some Saints of God, particularly S. Paul, have importuned at Gods hand, so vehemently, so impatiently, as he did, to be delivered from the messenger of Satan, and from the provocations of the flesh, expresst with that passion,

Rom. 7. 22. O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? He comes immediately there to a thanksgiving, I thanke God, through Iesus Christ our Lord; But his D thanksgiving was not for a Manumission; hee had not received a deliverance from the power, and oppression of tentation; But he had here, as he had every where, an intimation from the Spirit of God, of that Gratia mea sufficit, That God would be as watchfull over him with his grace, as the Devill could be with his tentations. And if thou come to no farther Manumission then this, in this life, that is, to be delivered, though not from tentations by his power, yet in tentations, by his grace, or by his mercy, after tentations have prevailed upon thee, attend Gods leasure for thy farther Manumission, for the holy Ghost staid for his Mission.

Dismissio. There fals lastly into this harmonious consort, occasioned by this Mission of the Holy Ghost, a Dismission; A dismissing out of this world; Not onely in Simeons Nunc dimittis, To be content that we might, but in S. Pauls Cupio dissolvi, To have a desire that we might be dissolved, and be with Christ. But, whether the incumbrances of this E

Psal. 120. 5. World, extort from thee Davids groane, Heu mihi! Woe is me, that I sojourne so long here! Or a slipperinesse contracted by former habits of sin, make every thing a tentation to thee, so that thou canst not performe Jobs covenant with thine eyes, of not looking upon a maid, nor stop at Christs period, which is, Looke, but doe not lust, but that every thing is a tentation to thee, and to be out of this haile-shot, this battery of tentations, thou wouldst faine come to a dismission, to a dissolution, to a transmigration, Or whether a vehement desire of the fruition of the presence and face of God in Heaven, constitute this longing in thee, yet all these reasons arise in thy selfe, and determine in thy selfe, and are referred but to thine owne ease, and to thine owne happinesse, and not primarily,

A marily, to the glory of God, and therefore, since the Holy Ghost staid for his Mission, stay thou for thy Dismission too.

Gather up these scattered eares, and binde up this loose sheafe; Recollect these pieces of this branch. The Holy Ghost was sent by the Son, but the Son, in his exemplar humility, ascribes all to the Father. The Holy Ghost had absolute power to come at his pleasure, but he staid the order of the Decree, and Gods leasure for his Mission. Doe thou so too, for thy Permission, exercise not all thy liberty; And for thy Commission, execute not all thy authority; And for thy Remission, presume not upon thy pardon too soon; And for thy Manumission, hope not for an exemption from tentations, till death; And for thy Dismission, practice not, nay wish not thy death, only in respect of thine own ease, no, nor only in respect of thine own salvation. In this act of the Holy Ghost, That he staid his Mission, we have one instruction, that we relie not upon our selves, but
B accommodate our selves to the disposition of others; And then another in the next, That the Father should send him in the Sons name, The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my Name.

The Holy Ghost comes not so in anothers name, as that he hath not a full interest, in all the names of Power, and of Wisdome, and of Essence it self, that are attributed to God. For (not to extend to the particular attributes) the Radicall name, the name of Essence, That name, The name, Iehovah, is given to the Holy Ghost. Iehovah sayes to Esay, Go, and tell this people, this and this. And then S. Paul making use of those words in the Acts, sayes, Well said the Holy Ghost by the Prophet Esay; So that Esayes Iehovah, is S. Pauls Holy Ghost. And yet, the Holy Ghost being in possession of the highest names, and of the highest power implyed in those names, comes in the name of another. How much more then may the powerfullest men upon earth, the greatest Magistrates, the greatest
C Monarchs, (who though they be by God himself called gods, are but representative gods, but metaphoricall gods, and God knows, sometimes but ungodly gods) confesse, that they are sent in anothers name, inanimated with anothers power, and least of all, their own, or made that that they are, for themselves? How much more are we, we considered in nature, and not in office, men and not Magistrates, Wormes and not men, Serpents and not Wormes, (For we are (as S. Chrysostome speaks) Spontanei damones, Serpents in our own bosomes, devils in our own loynes) bound to confesse, that all the faculties of our soul, are in us, In nomine alieno, In the name of another?

That will, which we call Freewill, is so far from being ours, as that not only that Freedome, but that Will it self is from another, from God. Not only the rectitude of the faculty, but the faculty it self is his. Nay, though God have no part in the perversnesse and the obliquity of my will, but that that perversnesse, and that obliquity are intirely
D mine own, yet I could not have that perversnesse, and that obliquity, but from him, so far, as that that faculty, in which my perversnesse works, is his, and I could not have that perverse will from my self, if I had not that will it self from God first. And that very perversnesse, and obliquity of the will, is so much his, as that, though it were not his, but mine, in the making, yet when it is made by me, he makes it his; that is, he makes it his instrument, and makes his use of it, so far, as to suffer it to flow out into a greater sin, or to determine in a lesser sin, then at first I, in my perversnesse, intended. When I intended but an approach to a sin, and meant to stop there, to punish that exposing of my self to tentation, God suffers me to proceed to the act of that sin; And when I intend the act it self, God interrupts me, and cuts me off, by some intervening occasion, and determines me upon some approach to that sin, that by going so far in the way of that sin, I might see mine own infirmity, and see the power of his mercy, that I went
E no farther. The faculties of my soule are his, and the substance of my soul is his too; And yet, as I pervert the faculties, I subvert the substance; I damnifie the faculties, but I damne the substance it self.

It would taste of uncharitablenesse, to cast more coales of fire upon the devill himself, then are upon him in hell now; Or not to assist him with our prayers, if it were not declared to us, that he is incapable of mercy. If the devill were now but under the guiltinesse of that sin which he committed at first, and not under such an execution of judgement for that sin, as induced, or at least declared an obstination, an obduration, a desperation, and impenitiblenesse, if the devill were but as the worst sinner in this world can be, but In via, and not In exilio, In the way to destruction, and not under destruction it self, ſelf, we might pray for the devill himſelf. And theſe poore ſouls of ours, theſe glorious ſouls of ours, none of ours, but Gods own ſouls, which now at worſt, God loves better then ever he did the devill when he was at beſt, when he was an Angell uncorrupted, and better then he doth thoſe Angels which ſtand uncorrupted ſtil, (for he hath not taken the nature of Angels, but our nature upon him) we think thoſe ſouls our own, to do what we liſt with, and when we have uſurpt them, we damne them. As Pirates take other mens ſubjects, and then make them ſlaves, we uſurp the faculties of the ſoul, and call the will ours, we uſurp the ſoul it ſelf, and call it ours, and then deliver all to everlaſting bondage. Would the King ſuffer his picture to be uſed, as we uſe the Image of God in our ſoules? or his Hall to be uſed, as we uſe the Temple of the Holy Ghoſt, our Bodies? We have nothing but that which we have received; and when we come to think that our own, we have not that; For God will take all from that man, that ſacrifices to his own nets. When thou commeſt to Church, come in anothers name: When thou giveſt an Almes, give it in anothers name; that is, feele all thy devotion, and all thy charity to come from God; For, if it be not in his name, it will be in a worſe; Thy devotion will contract the name of hypocriſie, and thine Almes the name of Vain-glory.

In nomine meo.

The Holy Ghoſt came in anothers name, in Chriſts name; but not ſo, as Montanus, the Father of the Montaniſts, came in the Holy Ghoſts name. Montanus ſaid he was the Holy Ghoſt; The Holy Ghoſt did not pretend to be Chriſt. There is a man, the man of ſin, at Rome, that pretends to be Chriſt, to all uſes. And I would he would be content with that, and ſtop there, and not be a Hyper-Chriſtus, Above Chriſt, more then Chriſt. I would he would no more trouble the peace of Chriſtendome, no more occaſion the aſſaſſinating of Chriſtian Princes, no more binde the Chriſtian liberty, in forbidding Meats, and Marriage, no more ſlacken and diſſolve Chriſtian bands, by Diſpenſations, and Indulgences, then Chriſt did. But if he will needs be more, if he will needs have an addition to the name of Chriſt, let him take heed of that addition, which ſome are apt enough to give him, however he deſerve it, that he is Antichriſt.

Now in what ſenſe the Holy Ghoſt is ſaid to have come in the name of Chriſt, S. Baſil gives us one interpretation; that is, that one principall name of Chriſt belongs to the Holy Ghoſt. For Chriſt is Verbum, The Word, and ſo is the Holy Ghoſt, ſayes that Father, Quia interpres filii, ſicut filius patris, Becauſe as the Son manifeſted the Father, ſo the Holy Ghoſt manifeſts the Son; S. Auguſtine gives another ſenſe; Societas Patris & Filii, eſt Spiritus Sanctus, The Holy Ghoſt is the union of the Father and the Son. As the body is not the man, nor the ſoul is not the man, but the union of the ſoul and body, by thoſe ſpirits, through which, the ſoul exerciſes her faculties in the Organs of the body, makes up the man; ſo the union of the Father and Son to one another, and of both to us, by the Holy Ghoſt, makes up the body of the Chriſtian Religion. And ſo, this interpretation of S. Auguſtine, comes neare to the fulneſſe, in what ſenſe the Holy Ghoſt came in Chriſts name. For when Chriſt ſayes, I am come in my Fathers name, that was, to execute his Decree, to fulfill his Will, for the ſalvation of man, by dying; ſo when Chriſt ſayes here, the Holy Ghoſt ſhall come in my name, that is, to perfect my work, to collect and to govern that Church, in which my ſalvation, by way of ſatisfaction, may be appropriated to particular ſoules by way of application. And for this purpoſe, to do this in Chriſts name, his own name is Paracletus, The Comforter, which is our laſt circumſtance, The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghoſt.

John 17. 12.

The Comforter.

The Comforter is an Euangelicall name. Athanaſius notes, that the Holy Ghoſt is never called Paracletus, The Comforter, in the old Teſtament. He is called Spiritus Dei, The Spirit of God, in the beginning of Geneſis; And he is called Spiritus ſanctus, The holy Spirit, and Spiritus principalis, The principall Spirit, in divers places of the Pſalmes, but never Paracletus, never the Comforter. A reaſon of that may well be, firſt, that the ſtate of the Law needed not comfort; and then alſo, that the Law it ſelf afforded not comfort, ſo there was no Comforter. Their Law was not oppoſed by any enemies, as enemies to their Law. If they had not (by that warrant which they had from God) invaded the poſſeſſion of their neighbours, or grown too great to continue good neighbours, their neighbours had not envyed them that Law. So that in the ſtate of the Law, in that reſpect, they were well enough, and needed no Comforter. Whereas the Goſpell, as it was ſowed in our Saviours blood, ſo it grew up in blood, for divers hundreds of yeares; and therefore needed the ſuſtentation, and the aſſurance of a Comforter. And then, for the

A the ſubſtance of the Law, it was Lex interficiens, non perficiens, ſayes S. Auguſtine, A Law that told them what was ſin, and puniſht them if they did ſin, but could not conferre Remiſſion for ſin; which was a diſcomfortable caſe. Whereas the Goſpel, and the Diſpenſation of the Goſpel in the Church, by the Holy Ghoſt, is Grace, Mercy, Comfort, all the way, and in the end. Therefore Chriſt, v. 17. cals the Holy Ghoſt, Spiritum veritatis, The Spirit of truth; In which he oppoſes him, and preferres him, above all the remedies, and all the comforts of the Law. Not that the Holy Ghoſt in the Law, did not ſpeak truth, but that he did not ſpeak all the truth, in the Law. Origen expreſſes it well, The Types and Figures of the Law, were true Figures, and true Types of Chriſt, in the Goſpel; but Chriſt, and his Goſpel is the truth it ſelf, prefigured in thoſe Types. Therefore the Holy Ghoſt, is Paracletus, The Comforter, in the Goſpel, which he was not in the Law.

In the Records, and Stories, and ſo in the Coynes, and Medals of the Romane Empe-
B rours, we ſee, that even then, when they had gotten the poſſeſſion of the name of Emperours, yet they forbore not to adde to their ſtyle, the name of Conſul, and the name of Pontifex maximus; ſtill they would be called Conſuls, which was an acceptable name to the people, and High-Prieſts, which carried a reverence towards all the world. Where Chriſt himſelfe is called by a name appliable to none but Chriſt, by a name implying the whole nature, and merit of Chriſt, that is, The Propitiation of the ſins of the whole world, 1 John 2. 2. yet there, in that place, he is called by the name of this Text too, Paracletus, the Comforter. He would not forbeare that ſweet, that acceptable, that appliable name, that name that concernes us moſt, and eſtabliſhes us beſt, Paracletus, the Comforter. And yet, he does not take that name, in that full, and whole ſenſe, in which himſelfe gives it to the Holy Ghoſt here. For there it is ſaid of Chriſt, If any man ſin, we have an Advocate with the Father; There, Paracletus, though placed upon Chriſt, is but an Advocate; But here,
C Chriſt ſends Paracletum, in a more intire, and a more internall, and more viſcerall ſenſe, A Comforter. Upon which Comforter, Chriſt imprints theſe two marks of dignity, Firſt, The Father ſhall ſend you another Comforter; Another, then my ſelfe. For, howſoever Ver. 16. Chriſt were the Fountain of comfort, yet there were many drammes, many ounces, many talents of diſcomfort mingled, in that their Comforter was firſt to depart from them by death, and being reſtored to them again by a Reſurrection, was to depart againe, by another Tranſmigration, by an Aſcenſion. And therefore the ſecond mark by which Chriſt dignifies this Comforter, is, That he ſhall abide with us for ever. And in the performance of that promiſe, he is here with you now.

And therefore, as we begun with thoſe words of Eſay, which our Saviour applyed to himſelfe, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, becauſe he hath anointed me, to binde up the broken hearted, and to comfort all them that mourne; So the Spirit of the Lord is upon Eſay 61. 1.
D us of his Miniſtery, in that Commandement of his, in the ſame Prophet, Conſolamini, conſolamini, Comfort ye, comfort yee my people, and ſpeak comfortably unto Ieruſalem. Receive Eſay 40. 1. the Holy Ghoſt, all ye that are the Iſrael of the Lord, in that Doctrine of comfort, that God is ſo farre from having hated any of you, before he made you, as that he hates none of you now; not for the ſins of your Parents; not for the ſins of your perſons; not for the ſins of your youth; not for your yeſter-dayes, not for your yeſter-nights ſins; not for that higheſt provocation of all, your unworthy receiving his Son this day. Onely conſider, that Comfort preſumes Sadneſſe. Sin does not make you incapable of comfort; but inſenſibleneſſe of ſin does. In great buildings, the Turrets are high in the Aire; but the Foundations are deep in the Earth. The Comforts of the Holy Ghoſt work ſo, as that only that ſoule is exalted, which was dejected. As in this place, where you ſtand, there bodies lie in the earth, whoſe ſoules are in heaven; ſo from this place, you
E carry away ſo much of the true comfort of the Holy Ghoſt, as you have true ſorrow, and ſadneſſe for your ſins here. Almighty God erect this building upon this Foundation; Such a Comfort, as may not be Preſumption, upon ſuch a Sorrow, as may not be Diffidence in him. And to him alone, but in three Perſons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, be aſcribed all Honour, &c.

JOHN 14. 26.

But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghoſt, whom the Father will ſend in my Name, Hee ſhall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatſoever I have ſaid unto you.

WEE paſſe from the Perſon to his working; we come from his comming, to his operation, from his Miſſion, and Commiſſion, to his Executing thereof, from the Conſideration, who he is, to what he does. His Specification, his Character, his Title, Paracletus, The Comforter, paſſes through all. Therefore our firſt comfort is, Docebimur, we ſhall be Taught, He ſhall teach you; As we conſider our ſelves, The Diſciples of the Holy Ghoſt, ſo it is a meere teaching, for, we, in our ſelves are meerly ignorant; But wen we conſider the things we are to bee taught, ſo it is but a remembring, a refreſhing of thoſe things, which Chriſt in the time of his converſation in this world, had taught before; He ſhall bring all things to your remembrance, whatſoever I have ſaid unto you. Theſe two then, The comfort in the Action, (we ſhall be Taught) and the comfort in the Way and Manner, (we ſhall not be ſubject to new Doctrines, but taught by remembring, by eſtabliſhing us in things formerly Fundamentally laid) will be our two parts at this time. And in each of theſe, theſe our ſteps; Firſt, in the firſt we ſhall conſider the perſons, that is, the Diſciples, who were to learne; not onely they who were ſo, when Chriſt ſpoke the words, but we, All, who to the end of the world, ſhall ſeek and receive knowledge from him; Vos, ye; firſt Vos ignorantes, you who are naturally ignorant, and know nothing, ſo as you ſhould know it of your ſelves, (which is one Diſcomfort) And yet, Vos, ye, Vos appetentes, you that by nature have a deſire to know, (which is another Diſcomfort, To have a deſire, and no meanes to performe it) Vos docebimini, ye, yethat are ignorant, and know nothing; ye, ye that are hungry of knowledge, and have nothing to ſatisfie that hunger, ye ſhall be fed, ye ſhall be taught, (which is one comfort) And then Ille docebit, He ſhall teach you, He, who cannot onely infuſe true, and full knowledge in every capacity that he findes, but dilate that capacity where he findes it, yea create it, where he findes none, The Holy Ghoſt, who is not onely A Comforter, but The Comforter, and not onely ſo, but Comfort it ſelfe, He ſhall teach you; And in theſe we ſhall determine our firſt Part.

In our ſecond Part, The Way and Manner of this Teaching, (By bringing to our remembrance all things whatſoever Chriſt had ſaid unto us) there is a great largeneſſe, but yet there is a limitation of thoſe things which we are to learne of the Holy Ghoſt; for they are Omnia, All things whatſoever Chriſt hath taught before; But then, Sola ea, Only thoſe things which Chriſt had taught before, and not new Additaments in the name of the Holy Ghoſt. Now this largeneſſe extending it ſelf to the whole body of the Chriſtian Religion, (for Chriſt taught all that) all that being not reducible to that part of an houre, which will be left for this exerciſe, as fitteſt for the celebration of the day in which we arenow, we ſhall binde our ſelves to that particular conſideration, what the Holy Ghoſt, being come from the Father, in Chriſts Name, that is, Purſuing Chriſts Doctrine, hath taught us of Himſelfe, concerning Himſelfe; That ſo ye may firſt ſee ſome inſolencies and injuries offered to the Holy Ghoſt by ſome ancient Heretiques, and ſome of later times, by the Church of Rome; For, truly, it is hard to name, or to imagine any one ſin, nearer to that emphaticall ſin, that ſuperlative ſin, The ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, then ſome offers of Doctrines, concerning the Holy Ghoſt, that have been obtruded, though not eſtabliſhed, and ſome that have beene abſolutely eſtabliſhed in that Church.

And

A And when we ſhall have delivered the Holy Ghoſt out of their hands, we ſhall alſo deliver him into yours, ſo as that you may feele him to ſhed himſelfe upon you all here, and to accompany you all home, with a holy peace, and in a bleſſed calme, in teſtifying to your ſoules, that He, that Comforter, who is the holy Ghoſt, whom the Father hath ſent in his Sons name, hath taught you all things, that is, awakened your memories, to the conſideration of all that is neceſſary to your preſent eſtabliſhment. And to theſe divers particulars, which thus conſtitute our two generall parts, in their order thus propoſed, we ſhall now proceed.

1 Part.

As when our Saviour Chriſt received that confeſſion of all the Diſciples, in the mouth of S. Peter, Thou art Chriſt, the Son of the living God, Chriſt replied thereunto ſome things, which had a more ſpeciall, and a more perſonall reſpect to Peter, then to the reſt, yet were intended of the reſt too; ſo when Chriſt in this text, promiſes the Comforter, he does B that moſt immediately, and moſt perſonally to them, to whom he then ſpoke, but he intends it to us alſo, and the holy Ghoſt ſhall teach us: us, that are in our ſelves Ignorant, which is our firſt Diſcomfort. The Schooles have made ſo many Diviſions, and ſub-diviſions, and re-deviſions, and poſt-diviſions of Ignorance, that there goes as much learning to underſtand ignorance, as knowledg. One, much elder then al they, & elder (as ſome will have it) then any but ſome of the firſt Secretaries of the Holy Ghoſt in the Bible, that is Triſmegiſtus, hath ſaid as much as all, Nequitia anima Ignorantia, Ignorance is not onely the drouſineſſe, the ſillineſſe, but the wickedneſſe of the ſoule: Not onely diſ-eſtimation in this world, and damnification here, but damnation in the next world, proceeds from ignorance. And yet, here in this world, knowledge is but as the earth, and ignorance as the Sea; there is more ſea then earth, more ignorance then knowledge; and as if the ſea do gaine in one place, it loſes in another, ſo is it with knowledge too; if new things be found out, as many, and as good, that were knowne before, are forgotten and loſt. C What Anatomiſt knowes the body of man thorowly, or what Caſuiſt the ſoule? What Politician knowes the diſtemper of the State thorowly; or what Maſter, the diſorders of his owne family? Princes glory in Arcanis, that they have ſecrets which no man ſhall know, and, God knowes, they have hearts which they know not themſelves; Thoughts and purpoſes indigeſted fall upon them and ſurpriſe them. It is ſo in naturall, in morall, in civill things; we are ignorant of more things then we know; And it is ſo in divine and ſupernaturall things too; for, for them, the Scripture is our onely light, and of the Scripture, S. Auguſtine profeſſes, Plura ſe neſcire quam ſcire, That there are more places of Scripture, that he does not, then that he does underſtand.

Ignorantes.

Hell is darkneſſe; & the way to it, is the cloud of Ignorance; hell it ſelf is but condenſed Ignorance, multiplied Ignorance. To that, David aſcribes all the diſtempers of the world, D They doe not know, neither will they underſtand, they walke on in darkneſſe; and therefore, (as he adds there) All the foundations of all the earth are out of courſe. He that had made the moſt abſolute conqueſt of Ignorance in this world, Solomon, is the beſt Judge of it, the beſt Counſellor againſt it, and he ſaies, As thou knoweſt not how thy bones grew in thy Mother, even ſo thou knoweſt not the works of God, who worketh all. We are all equally Ignorant of all, of naturall, of ſpirituall things. What though? This; That man knoweth not his time, but is ſnared in an evill time; If he knew his time, no time would be evill unto him. Yet though he know not the preſent time, but let that paſſe inconſiderately, yet if he conſider the future, he may recover. But he does not that, he cannot doe that; Man cannot tell what ſhall be, ſaies Solomon; But may he not learne? No. For, who can tell him? ſaies he there. For, he knowes not how to goe to the City; In vulgar, in triviall things, he is ignorant of his end, and ignorant of his way. Bene facere neſciverunt, ſaies the Prophet, They have no E knowledge to doe good; and what followes? Erubeſcere neſcierunt, They are not aſhamed when they have done evill. Neſciunt cujus ſpiritus ſunt; It was Chriſts increpation upon his owne Diſciples, They knew not of what ſpirit they were, They diſcerned not betweene a zealous and a vindicative ſpirit. Neſcitis quid petatis, was Chriſts increpation upon his Diſciples too, You know not what you aske. And yet this Nequitia anima, this wickedneſſe of the ſoule, this peſtilence of the ſoule, Ignorance, have men ventured to call The mother of devotion. But miſerable Comforters are they, in reſpect of the Comforter, the Holy Ghoſt: for, as that Cum perverſo perverteris, is ſpoken of God, That God will learne of the froward, to be froward, ſo God will learne of the ignorant, to be ignorant; ignorant of us; and to thoſe that doe not ſtudy him here, he will ſay hereafter, Neſcio vos, I know not you. This then is our first discomfort, of our selves we are ignorant; and yet there is a greater vexation then this, that naturally we have a desire of knowledge, and naturally no meanes to attaine to it. A

Appetentes. Ignorance may be said to worke, as an in-appetency in the stomach, and as an insipidnesse, a tastlesnesse in the palate; But the desire of knowledge, without meanes to attaine to it, is as a hunger in a dearth, or in a wildernesse. Ignorance is a kinde of slumbering, or stupidity, but this desire without meanes, is a continuall racking, a continuall pressing; a far greater vexation, and torment; ignorance may work as a Lethargy, but this desire as a phrensie. This is the day of trouble, (saies Ezechias in the bitternesse and passion of his soule) and of rebuke, and of blasphemy, for the Children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring them forth. To a barrennesse, that is, never to have conceived, there belonged, amongst that people, a kind of shame and contempt, (and that is our case in ignonorance, which is the barrennes of the soule) But to come to the throwes of Childbirth, and then not to have strength, or not to have helpe to be delivered, that is the dangerous, that is the deadly torment; and that represents our soule, in this desire of knowledge, without means to attain to it. And yet, this vexation no man can devest; It is an hereditary, a naturall impression in man; every man naturally, sayes the Philosopher, desires to know, to learne. And yet, nature that imprinted that desire in every man, hath not given every man, not any man, in nature, meanes to satisfie that desire; for, even by nature man hath a desire to know supernaturall things. Solomon was extended with this desire of knowledge, but he found no satisfaction, till upon petition, and contracting all his desires into that One, he obtained it of God. Daniel was Vir desideriorum, A man composed of desires, and of solicitude: He professes that he mourned three full weekes, He eate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh or wine into his mouth, nor oyle upon his body; His comlinesse was turned into corruption, and he retained no strength, till God by his Angel satisfied his desire of knowledge. Consider the anxiety and torture, under which that Eunuch was in the Chariot, till he was taught the meaning of the Prophet Esay. And consider the way that God tooke; God sent an Angel, and that Angel sent Philip to him. Instruction is from God, but yet by the Ministery of man, Philip askes him, Doest thou understand? He would have a confession of his impotency from himselfe. Alas, How can I, sayes he, except some man should guide me? And Philip guides him; and then how soone he comes to that holy cheerefulnesse, and dilatation of the soule, I beleeve that Iesus is the Son of God, and, See, here is water, what doth hinder me, that I be baptized? Nec sanctior fum hoc Eunucho, nec studiosior, saies S. Hierom of himselfe; I cannot have more desire to learne then he had; yet, in my self, I have no more meanes neither; and therefore must be under the same paine, till the same hand, the hand of God relieve me. The soule of man cannot bee considered under a thicker cloud, then Ignorance, nor under a heavier weight, then desire of knowledge. And therefore, for our deliverance in both, our Saviour Christ here comforts us with The Comforter; you, you that are in the darknesse of Ignorance, you, you that are under the oppression of a hunger of knowledge, you shall be satisfied, for, He that comes from my Father, in my name, He shall teach you.

Docebit. That which the Vulgat reads, Eccles. 6. 9. Desiderare quod nescias, To desire to know that which thou knowest not yet, our Translation cals, The wandring of the desire, and in the Originall it is, The walking, the pilgrimage of the Soule; the restlesnesse, and irresolution of the Soule. And when man is taught that which he desired to know, then the Soule is brought home, and laid to rest. Desire is the travaile, knowledge is the Inne; desire is the wheele, knowledge is the bed of the Soule. Therefore we affect society and conversation to know present things; Therefore wee assist our selves with History, to know things past, and with Astrology, and sometimes with worse Arts, to know future things. The name of Master, of Teacher, that passes through the Scripture, is Rabbi, and Rabbi in the roote thereof signifies, Magnum, and Multum; It is a word that denotes Greatnesse; And truly no man should be greater in our eyes, nor be thought to have laid greater obligations upon us, then he that hath taught us. When Christ is promised thus, The Lord shall send them a Saviour, and a Great one, there is this word Rabbi: The Lord shall send them a Saviour, which shall be Rabbi a great Teacher; Christ was a Saviour, as he paid God a ransome for all; As he made man capable of this Salvation, he was this Rabbi, this Teacher; and in this capacity, did those two Disciples of Iohn Baptist, who first applied E plyed themſelves to Chriſt, apply themſelves, Magiſter ubi habitas ? Maſter, where dwelleſt thou ? where may we come to School to thee ? where may we be taught by thee ? S. Paul hath ſhewed us the duty of all true diſciples, in the practiſe of the Galatians; You received me as an Angel of God, even as Chriſt Ieſus, and I beare you record, that if it had been poſsible, you would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me. I thank him that brings me a candle, when it grows dark, and him that aſſiſts me with a ſpectacle, when my ſight grows old; But to him that hath given the eyes of my ſoul, light and ſpectacles, how much a greater debtor am I ? I will not diſpute againſt nature, nor naturall affections, nor diſpute againſt Allegeance, nor civill obligations, nor diſpute againſt gratitude, nor retribution of Benefits; But I willingly pronounce, that I cannot owe more to any Benefactor, to my Father, to my Prince, then I do to them that have taught me; nor can there be a deeper ingratitude, then to turn thy face from that man, or from his children, that hath taught thee. This Chriſt preſents for the firſt Comfort, Docebimini, You are ignorant, but that cloud ſhall be diſperſed, you would learne, but have no help, but that defect ſhall be ſupplyed, you ſhall be taught: And then, this comfort ſhall be exalted to you, in the perſon of the Teacher, Ille docebit, He whom the Father will ſend in my name, He ſhall teach you.

Quintilian requires no more of a School-maſter, but that either he be learned, or doe not think himſelf to be ſo, if he be not: Becauſe if he over-value himſelf, he will admit no Uſher, no aſſiſtant. Here we have a maſter that is both abſolute in himſelf, and yet undertaken for by others too; The Father ſends him, and in the Sons name, that is, to perfect the Sons work. Tertullian (a man of adventurous language) calls him Tertium numen divinitatis, & tertium nomen majeſtatis: The Holy Ghoſt hath but a third place, but the ſame God-head, but a third name, yet the ſame Majeſty, as the firſt, The Father, or the ſecond, The Son. Porphyry that denied the Trinity, is convinced by S. Cyril, to have eſtabliſhed a Trinity, becauſe he acknowledged firſt Deum ſummum, and then, Conditorem omnium, and after them, Animam mundi; One that is a ſupream God, One that was the Creator of all things, and One that quickens and inanimates all, and is the ſoul of the whole world: And this ſoul of the world is the Holy Ghoſt, who doth that office to the ſoule of every Chriſtian, which the ſoul it ſelf doth to every naturall man, informes him, directs him, inſtructs him, makes him be that he is, and do that he doth. And therefore as Tertullian cals Chriſt by the Holy Ghoſts name, (for he calls Chriſt Spiritum Dei, becauſe, as the office of our ſpirits is to unite the body and the ſoul, ſo Chriſt hath united God and man in one Emanuel) S. Baſil gives the Holy Ghoſt Chriſts name, for he calls the Holy Ghoſt Verbum Dei, The word of God, becauſe he undertakes the Pedagogy of the ſoul, to be the ſoules School-maſter, and to teach it as much of God as concernes it, that is, Chriſt crucified. Therefore when the Holy Ghoſt was firſt ſent, he was ſent but to teſtifie of Chriſt; At Chriſts Baptiſme (which was his firſt ſending) he was ſent but to eſtabliſh an aſſurance, and a beliefe, that that Chriſt was the Son of God, in whom he was well pleaſed; And this he did but as a witneſſe, not as a Teacher; for the voice that wrought this, and taught this, came not from the Dove, not from the Holy Ghoſt, but from above; The Holy Ghoſt ſaid nothing then. But when the Holy Ghoſt in performance of Chriſts promiſe in this Text, was ſent as a Teacher, then he came in the form of Tongues, and they that received him, were thereby preſently enabled to ſpeak to others.

Ille.

This therefore is the comming, and this is the teaching of the Holy Ghoſt, promiſed and intended in this Text, and performed upon this Day, that he by his power enables and authoriſes other men to teach thee; That he eſtabliſhes a Church, and Ordinances, and a Miniſtery, by which thou maiſt be taught how to apply Chriſts Merits to thy ſoul. He needed not to have inveſted, and taken the form of a Tongue, if he would have had thee think it enough to heare the Spirit at home, alone; but to let thee ſee, that his way of teaching ſhould be the miniſtery of men, he came in that organ of ſpeech, the Tongue. And therefore learn thou by hearing, what he ſayes: And that that he ſayes, he ſayes here; here in his Ordinance. And therefore heare what he hath declared, inquire not what he hath decreed; Heare what he hath ſaid, there, where he hath ſpoken, ask not what he meant in his unrevealed will, of things whereof he hath ſaid nothing; For they that do ſo, miſtake Gods minde often. God proteſts, It never came into my minde, that they ſhould ſin thus; God never did it, God never meant it, that any ſhould ſin neceſſarily, without

Acts 2.3.

Ier.32.35.

without a willing concurrence in themſelves, or be damned neceſſarily, without relation to ſin willingly committed. Therefore is S. Auguſtine vehement in that expoſtulation, Quis tam ſtultè curioſus eſt, qui filium ſuum mittat in ſcholam, ut quid magiſter cogitat, diſcat? Doth any man put his ſon to ſchoole, to learn what his Maſter thinks? The Holy Ghoſt is ſent to Teach; he teaches by ſpeaking; he ſpeaks by his Ordinance, and Inſtitution in his Church. All knowledge, and all zeale, that is not kindled by him, by the Holy Ghoſt, and kindled here, at firſt is all ſmoke, and then all flame; Zeale without the Holy Ghoſt, is at firſt, cloudy ignorance, all ſmoke; and after, all crackling and clambering flame, Schiſmaticall rage, and diſtemper. Here we, we that are naturally ignorant, we, we that are naturally hungry of knowledge, are taught, a free Schoole is opened unto us, and taught by him, by the Holy Ghoſt ſpeaking in his Delegates, in his Miniſters; (which were the pieces that conſtituted our firſt part) And the ſecond, to which we are now come, is the manner of the Holy Ghoſts comming, and teaching in his Ordinance, that is, by remembring, He ſhall bring to your remembrance, &c.

2 Part. Reminiſcentia.

They had wont to call Pictures in the Church, the lay-mans book, becauſe in them, he that could not reade at all, might reade much. The ignoranteſt man that is, even he that cannot reade a Picture, even a blinde man, hath a better book in himſelf; In his own memory he may reade many a hiſtory of Gods goodneſſe to him. Quid ab initio, How it was in the beginning, is Chriſts Method; To determine things according to former precedents; And truly the Memory is oftner the Holy Ghoſts Pulpit that he preaches in, then the Underſtanding. How many here would not underſtand me, or not reſt in that which they heard, if I ſhould ſpend the reſt of this houre in repeating, and reconciling that which divers authors have ſpoken diverſly of the manner of Chriſts preſence in the Sacrament, or the manner of Chriſts deſcent into Hell, or the manner of the concurrence, and joynt-working of the grace of God, and the free-will of man, in mens actions? But is there any man amongſt us that is not capable of this Catechiſme, Remember to morrow but thoſe good thoughts which you have had within this houre, ſince you came hither now: Remember at your laſt houre, to be but as good as you are this minute; I would ſcarce ask more in any mans behalf, then that he would alwayes be as good, as at ſome times he is; If he would never ſink below himſelf, I would leſſe care, though he did not exceed himſelf: If he would remember his own holy purpoſes at beſt, he would never forget God; If he would remember the comfort he had in having overcome ſuch a tentation yeſterday, he would not be overcome by that tentation to day. The Memory is as the concluſion of a Syllogiſme, which being inferred upon true propoſitions, cannot be denied: He that remembers Gods former bleſſings, concludes infallibly upon his future. Therefore Chriſt places the comfort of this Comforter, the Holy Ghoſt, in this, that he ſhall work upon that pregnant faculty, the Memory; He ſhall bring things to your remembrance; And then, Omnia, All thoſe things which I have ſaid unto you.

Omnia.
Mat. 18. 18.
John 20. 22.
John 15. 15.

Chriſt gave the Holy Ghoſt to the Apoſtles, when he gave them the power of abſolution in his life time. He gave them the Holy Ghoſt more powerfully, when after his Reſurrection, He breathed on them, and ſaid, Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt. He opened himſelf to them, in a large fulneſſe, when he ſaid, All things that I have heard of my Father, I have made knowen unto you; But in a greater largeneſſe then that, when upon this day, according to the promiſe of this Text, the holy Ghoſt was ſent unto them; for this was in the behalf of others. And upon this fulneſſe, out of Tertullian it is argued, Nihil ignorarunt, ergo nihil non docuerunt, As the Apoſtles were taught all things by Chriſt, ſo they taught the Church all things. There is then the ſpheare, and the compaſſe, and the date of our knowledge; not what was thought or taught in the tenth, or fourteenth Century: but what was taught in Chriſt, and in the Apoſtles time. Chriſt taught all things to his Apoſtles, and the Holy Ghoſt brought all things to their remembrance that he had taught them, that they might teach them to others, and ſo it is derived to us.

Sola.
John 15. 26.

But it is Omnia & Sola; It is All, but it is Only thoſe things. He ſhall teſtifie of me, ſaith Chriſt concerning the Holy Ghoſt; Now the office of him that teſtifies, of a witneſſe, is to ſay all the truth, but nothing but the truth. When the Romane Church charges us, not that all is not truth, which we teach, but that we do not teach all the truth, And we charge them, not that they do not teach all the truth, but that all is not truth that they teach, ſo that they charge us with a defective, we them with a ſuperfluous religion, religion, our caſe is the ſafer, becauſe all that we affirm, is by confeſſion of all parts true, but that which they have added, requires proofe, and the proofe lies on their ſide; and it reſts yet unproved. And certainly many an Indian, who is begun to be catechized, and dies, is ſaved, before he come to beleeve all that we beleeve; But whether any be ſaved that beleeve more then we beleeve, and beleeve it as equally fundamentall, and equally neceſſary to ſalvation, with that which we from the expreſſe word of God do beleeve, is a Probleme, not eaſily anſwered, not ſafely affirmed. Truly I had rather put my ſalvation upon ſome of thoſe ancient Creeds, which want ſome of the Articles of our Creed, (as the Nicene Creed doth, and ſo doth Athanaſius) then upon the Trent Creed, that hath as many more Articles as ours hath. The office of the Holy Ghoſt himſelf, the Spirit of all comfort, is but to bring thoſe things to remembrance, which Chriſt taught, and no more.

Spiritus Sanctus.

They are many; too many, for many revolutions of an houre-glaſſe. Therefore wee propoſed at firſt, That when we ſhould come to this Branch, for the proper celebration of the day, we would only touch ſome things, which the Holy Ghoſt had taught of himſelf, that ſo we might detect, and deteſt ſuch things, as ſome ancient, and ſome later Heretiques had ſaid of the Holy Ghoſt. Now thoſe things which the ancient Heretiques have ſaid, are ſufficiently gain-ſaid by the ancient Fathers. The Montaniſts ſaid the Holy Ghoſt was in Chriſt, and in the Apoſtles, but in a farre higher exaltation in Montanus, then in either; but Tertullian oppoſed that. Manes was more inſolent then the Montaniſt, for he avowed himſelfe to be the Holy Ghoſt, and S. Auguſtine overthrew that. Hierarchas was more modeſt then ſo, and did but ſay, That Melchiſedech was the Holy Ghoſt, and S. Cyprian would not indure that. The Arrians ſaid the Holy Ghoſt was but Creatura Creaturæ, made by the Son, which Son himſelfe was but made in time, and not eternally begotten by the Father; but Liberius, and many of the Fathers oppoſed that; as a whole generall Councell did Macedonius, when he refreſhed many Errours formerly condemned, concerning the Holy Ghoſt; and few of theſe have had any Reſurrection, any repululation, or appeared again in theſe later daies. But in theſe later times, two new Hereſies have ariſen concerning the Holy Ghoſt.

About foure hundred yeares ſince, came out that famous infamous Booke in the Roman Church, which they called Euangelium Spiritus Sancti, The Goſpel of the Holy Ghoſt; in which, was pretended, That as God the Father had had his time in the government of the Church, in the Law, And God the Son his time, in the Goſpel, ſo the Holy Ghoſt was to have his time; and his time was to begin within fifty yeares after the publiſhing of that Goſpel, and to laſt to the end of the world; and therefore it was called Euangelium æternum, The everlaſting Goſpel. By this Goſpel, the Goſpel of Chriſt was abſolutely abrogated, and the power of governing the Church, according to the Goſpel of Chriſt, utterly evacuated; for, it was therein taught, that onely the literall ſenſe of the Goſpel had been committed to them, who had thus long governed in the name of the Church, but the ſpirituall and myſticall ſenſe was reſerved to the Holy Ghoſt, and that now the Holy Ghoſt would ſet that on foot: And ſo, (which was the principall intention in that plot) they would have brought all Doctrine, and all Diſcipline, all Government into the Cloyſter, into their religious Orders, and overthrown the Hierarchy of the Church, of Biſhops, and Prieſts, and Deacons, and Cathedrall and Collegiate Churches, and brought all into Monaſteries. He that firſt oppoſed this Book was Waldo, hee that gave the name to that great Body, that great power of Men, who attempted the Reformation of the Church, and were called the Waldenſes, who were eſpecially defamed, and eſpecially perſecuted for this, that they put themſelves in the gap, and made themſelves a Bank, againſt this torrent, this inundation, this impetuouſneſſe, this multiplicy of Fryars, and Monks, that ſurrounded the world in thoſe times. And when this Book could not be diſſembled, and being full of blaſphemy againſt Chriſt, was neceſſarily brought into agitation, yet all that was done by them, who had the government of the Church in their hands then, was but this, That this Book, this Goſpel of the Holy Ghoſt ſhould be ſuppreſſed and ſmothered, but without any noyſe, or diſcredit; and the Booke which was writ againſt it, ſhould be ſolemnly, publiquely, infamouſly burnt. And ſo they kindled a Warre in Heaven, greater then that in the Revelation, where Michael and his Angels fought againſt the Dragon, and his Angels; For, here they brought God the Son into the field, againſt God the Holy Ghoſt, and made the Holy Ghoſt deveſt, de-

Scrinium pectoris.

Now when they could not advance that Hereſie, when they could not bring the Holy Ghoſt to that greatneſſe, when they could not make him King to their purpoſes, that is, King over Chriſt, They are come to an Hereſie cleane contrary to that Hereſie, that is, to impriſon the Holy Ghoſt, And ſince they could not make him King over Chriſt himſelfe, they have made him a Priſoner, and a ſlave to Chriſts Vicar, and ſhut him up there, In ſcrinio pectoris, (as they call it) in that cloſe impriſonment, in the breaſt and boſome of one man, that Biſhop: And ſo, the Holy Ghoſt is no longer a Dove, a Dove in the Ark, a Dove with an Olive-Branch, a Meſſenger of peace, but now the Holy Ghoſt is in a Bull, in Buls worſe then Phalaris his Bull, Buls of Excommunication, Buls of Rebellion, and Depoſition, and Aſſaſſinates of Chriſtian Princes. The Holy Ghoſt is no longer Omni-preſent, as in Davids time, (Whither ſhall I goe from thy Spirit?) but he is onely there, whither he ſhall be ſent from Rome in a Cloak-bagge, and upon a Poſt-horſe, as it was often complained in the Councell of Trent. The Holy Ghoſt is no longer Omniſcient, to know all at once, as in S. Pauls time, when the Spirit of God ſearched all things, yea the deep things of God, but as a Sea-Captaine receives a Ticket, to be opened when he comes to ſuch a height, and thereby to direct his future courſe, ſo the Holy Ghoſt is appointed to aske the Popes Nuntio, his Legate, what he ſhall declare to be truth. So the Holy Ghoſt was ſent into this Kingdome, by Leo the tenth, with his Legate, that brought the Bull of Declaration for Henry the eights Divorce; but the Holy Ghoſt might not know of it, that is, not take knowledge of it, not declare it to be a Divorce, till ſome other conditions were performed by the King, which being never performed, the Holy Ghoſt remained in the caſe of a new created Cardinall, Ore clauſo, he had no voyce; and ſo the Divorce, though paſt all debatements, and all conſents, and all determinations at Rome, was no Divorce, becauſe he that ſent the Holy Ghoſt from Rome, forbad him to publiſh and declare it. So that the ſtyle of the Court is altered from the Apoſtles time; Then it was, Viſum eſt Spiritui Sancto, & nobis, It ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt, and to us; Firſt to the Holy Ghoſt, before others; and when it is brought to others, it is to us, to others in the plurall, to many others. But now it is Viſum eſt mihi, & Spiritui Sancto, It ſeemes good unto me, to one man alone; and when it does ſo, it ſhall ſeeme good to the Holy Ghoſt too. And of theſe two Hereticall violences to the Holy Ghoſt, we complaine againſt that Church, firſt, that they put the Holy Ghoſt in a Rebellion againſt the Son of God, from whom he proceeds; And then, (as for the moſt part, the end of them, who pretend right to a Kingdome, and cannot prove it, is to lie in Priſon) That they have impriſoned the Holy Ghoſt in one mans breaſt, and not ſuffered that winde to breathe where it will, as Chriſt promiſed the Holy Ghoſt ſhould doe: For neither did the Holy Ghoſt bring any ſuch thing to their remembrance, as though Chriſt had taught any ſuch Doctrine, neither can they that teach it, come nearer the ſin, The unpardonable ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, then thus to make him a ſupplanter of Chriſt, or ſupplanted by Antichriſt.

Chariſmata Spiritus.

But we hold you no longer in this ill Aire, blaſphemous and irkſome contumelies againſt the Holy Ghoſt: we promiſed at firſt, to diſmiſſe you at laſt, in a perfume, with the breath of the Holy Ghoſt upon you; and that is, to excite you to a rectified ſenſe, and knowledge, that he offers himſelfe unto you, and is received by you. Facies Dei eſt, qua nobis innoteſcit; That is alwaies the face of God to us, by which God vouchſafes to manifeſt himſelfe to us: So, his Ordinance in the Church, is his face. And Lux Dei, qua nobis illuceſcit, The light of God to us, is that light by which he ſhines upon us; Lex Dei, Lux Dei, his word, in his Church. And then, the Evidence, the Seale, the Witneſſe of all, that this face which I ſee by this light, is directed upon me for my comfort, is, The Teſtimony of the Holy Ghoſt, when that Spirit beares witneſſe with our ſpirit, that he is in us. And therefore in his bleſſed Name, and in the participation of his power, I ſay to you all, Accipite Spiritum ſanctum, Receive ye the holy Ghoſt. Not that I can give it you, but I can tell you, that he offers to give himſelfe to you all. Our ſufficiency is of God, ſayes the Apoſtle; Acknowledge you a ſufficiency in us, a ſufficient power to be in the Miniſtery; for, (as the Apoſtle addes) He hath made us able Miniſters of the New Teſtament: Not able onely in faculties and gifts requiſite for that function, (thoſe faculties and gifts, whether of nature, or of acquiſition, be, in as great meaſure, in ſome that have not that function) but able, by his powerfull Ordinance, (as it is alſo added there) to miniſter, not

Acts 15. 28.

2 Cor. 3. 5.

A not the letter, (not the letter onely) but The Spirit, the Spirit of the New Teſtament, that is, the holy Ghoſt to you. Therefore as God ſaid to Moſes, I will come downe, and talk with thee, and I will take of the Spirit which is upon thee, and put it upon them, God, in his Spirit does come downe to us in his Miniſtery, and talke with us, his Miniſters at home, that is, aſſiſt us in our Meditations, and lucubrations, and preparations, for this ſervice here, and then, here, in this place, he takes of that Spirit from us, and ſheds upon you, imparts the gifts of the holy Ghoſt to you alſo, and makes the holy Ghoſt as much yours, by your hearing, as he made him ours, by our ſtudy: Be not deceived by the letter, by the phraſe of that place; God does not ſay there, that he will take of the Spirit from us, and give it you, that is, fill you with it, and leave us without it; but he will take of that Spirit, that is, impart that Spirit ſo to you, as that by us, and our preſent Miniſtery, he will give you that that ſhall be ſufficient for you, to day, and yet call you to us againe in
B his Ordinance, another day. Learne as much as you can every day, and never thinke that you have learnt ſo much, as that you have no more need of a Teacher; for though you need no more of that man, (you may be perchance as learned as he) yet you need more of that Ordinance: We give you the holy Ghoſt then, when we open your eyes to ſee his offers. Numb. 11.17.

Thoſe words of the Apoſtle, Our ſelves have the firſt fruits of the Spirit, S. Ambroſe interprets ſo, Our ſelves, we the Miniſters of God, have the firſt fruits of the Spirit, the pre-poſſeſſion, the pre-inhabitation, but not the ſole poſſeſſion, nor ſole inhabitation of the Holy Ghoſt; but we have grace for grace, the Spirit therefore, to ſhed the Spirit upon you; that that precious Oyntment, (the Holy Ghoſt is this Unction) which was poured upon the Head, upon Chriſt, may run downe, upon Aarons beard, and from thoſe gray, and grave, and reverend haires of his Miniſters, may alſo go downe to the skirts of
C his garments, to every one of you, who doe not onely make up the garment, that is, the viſible, but the myſticall body it ſelfe of Chriſt Jeſus. The dew of Hermon deſcends upon the mountaines of Sion; But the waters that fall upon the mountaines, fall into the valleyes too from thence; The Holy Ghoſt fals, through us, upon you alſo, ſo, as that you may, ſo, as that you muſt finde it in your ſelves. The Holy Ghoſt was the firſt Perſon, that was declared in the Creation, The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters; that was the firſt motion. This is eternall life, to know God, and him whom he ſent, Chriſt Ieſus. But this you cannot doe, but by him whom they both ſent, the Holy Ghoſt; No man can ſay, that Ieſus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghoſt. Iohn Baptiſt who was to baptize Chriſt, was filled with the holy Ghoſt from the wombe. You, who were baptized in Chriſt, were filled, (in your meaſure) with the holy Ghoſt, from that wombe, from the time that the Church conceived you in Baptiſme. Rom. 8. 23. Pſal. 133. 2. Ver. 3. Gen. 1. 2. 1 Cor. 12. 3.

D And therefore, as the Twelve ſaid to the multitude, Looke yee among ye ſeven men full of the holy Ghoſt, So we ſay to the whole Congregation, Looke every man to himſelfe, that he be one of the ſeven, one of that infinite number, which the holy Ghoſt offers to fall upon; That as ye were baptized in the holy Ghoſt, and as your bodies are Temples of the holy Ghoſt, ſo your ſoules may be Prieſts of the holy Ghoſt, and you, altogether a lively and reaſonable ſacrifice to God, in the holy Ghoſt. That as you have beene ſealed with the holy Spirit of promiſe, you may finde in your ſelves the performance of that promiſe, finde the ſeale of that promiſe, in your love to the Scriptures; for, (as S. Chryſoſtome argues uſefully) Chriſt gave the Apoſtles no Scriptures, but he gave them the holy Ghoſt in ſtead of Scriptures; But to us, who are weaker, hee hath given both, The holy Ghoſt in the Scriptures; and, if we neglect either, we have neither; If we truſt to a pri-
E vate ſpirit, and call that the holy Ghoſt, without Scripture, or to the Scriptures without the holy Ghoſt, that is, without him, there, where he hath promiſed to be, in his Ordinance, in his Church, we have not the ſeale of that Promiſe, the holy Ghoſt. Finde then that promiſe in your holy love, and ſober ſtudie of the Scriptures, and finde the performance, the fruits thereof in your converſation, and then you have an Autumne better then any worldly Spring, A vintage, a gathering of thoſe bleſſed fruits, The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-ſuffering, gentleneſſe, goodneſſe, faith, meekeneſſe, temperance; where (by the way) theſe are not called ſeverally the fruits of the Spirit, as though they were ſo many ſeverall fruits, which might be had one without another, but collectively, all together, they are called the fruit; It is not Love alone, nor Joy alone, no nor Faith alone, that is the fruit of the holy Ghoſt; Love, but not love alone, but that love, when Acts 6. 3. Eph. 1. 13. Gal. 5. 22.

betweene the holy Ghoſt and you, you can joy in that love, and not repent it; Joy, but not joy alone, but that joy, when betweene the holy Ghoſt and you, you can finde peace in that joy, that you be not the ſadder after, for having beene ſo merry before, this, theſe, theſe and all the reſt together are the fruit of the holy Ghoſt; and therefore labour to have them all, or you lacke all.

And then laſtly, as we purſuing Gods Ordinance, have beene able to ſay to you Accipite Spiritum ſanctum, Behold the holy Ghoſt in your ſelves, behold he appeared to you, when he moved you to come hither, behold he appeared to you, as often as he hath opened the window of the Arke, your hearts, to take in this Dove, this houre, ſo we may ſay unto you, as we ſay in the Schoole, There is an infuſion of the holy Ghoſt; liquor is infuſed into a veſſell, if that veſſell hold it, though it doe but cover the bottome and no more: The holy Ghoſt is infuſed into you, if he have made any entry, if he cover any part, if he have taken hold of any corrupt affection. There is alſo a diffuſion of the holy Ghoſt; Liquor is diffuſed into a veſſell, when it fils all the parts of the veſſell, and leaves no emptineſſe, no drineſs: The holy Ghoſt is diffuſed into you, if he overſpread you, and poſſeſſe you all, and rectifie all your perverſneſſes. But then, in the Schoole, we have alſo an effuſion of the holy Ghoſt; And liquor is effuſed then, when it ſo fils the veſſell, as that that overflowes, to the benefit of them, who will participate thereof. Receive therefore the holy Ghoſt, ſo, as that the holy Ghoſt may overflow, flow from your example, to the edification of others; That you may go home, and ſay to your children, receive ye the holy Ghoſt, in the Spirit of contentment, and acquieſcence, and thankfulneſſe to God, and me, in that portion that I can leave you, And ſay to your ſervants, receive ye the holy Ghoſt, in the ſpirit of obedience, and fidelity, And ſay to your neighbours, receive ye the holy Ghoſt, in the ſpirit of peace and quietneſſe, And ſay to your Creditors, receive ye the holy Ghoſt in the ſpirit of patience, and tenderneſſe, and compaſſion, and forbearing, And to your debtors, receive ye the holy Ghoſt in the ſpirit of induſtry, and labour in your calling. You ſee, Preaching it ſelfe, even the Preaching of Chriſt himſelfe, had beene loſt, if the holy Ghoſt had not brought all thoſe things to their remembrance. And if the holy Ghoſt do bring theſe things, which we preach to your remembrance, you are alſo made fiſhers of men, and Apoſtles, and (as the Prophet ſpeaks) Salvatores mundi, men that aſſiſt the ſalvation of the world, by the beſt way of preaching, an exemplar life, and holy converſation. Amen.

Preached upon Whitſunday.

Part of the Goſpell of the Day.

JOHN 14. 20.

At that day ſhall ye know, That I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you.

THe two Volumes of the Scriptures are juſtly, and properly called two Teſtaments, for they are Teſtatio Mentis, The atteſtation, the declaration of the will and pleaſure of God, how it pleaſed him to be ſerved under the Law, and how in the ſtate of the Goſpell. But to ſpeake according to the ordinary acceptation of the word, the Teſtament, that is, The laſt Will of Chriſt Jeſus, is this ſpeech, this declaration of his, to his Apoſtles, of which this text is a part. For, it was ſpoken, as at his Death-bed, his laſt Supper: And it was before his Agony in the garden, ſo that (if we ſhould conſider him as a meere man) there was no inordinateneſſe, no irregularity in his affections; It was teſtified with ſufficient witneſſes, and it was ſealed in blood, in the Inſtitution of the Sacrament. By this Wil then, as a rich, and abundant, and liberall Teſtator, having given them ſo great a Legacy, as a place in the

Ver. 3.

A the kingdome of heaven, yet he adds a codicill, he gives more, he gives them the evidence by which they ſhould maintain their right to that kingdome, that is, the teſtimony of the Spirit, The Comforter, the Holy Ghoſt, whom he promiſes to ſend to them; And ſtill more and more abundant, he promiſes them, that that aſſurance of their right ſhall not be taken from them, till he himſelf return again to give them an everlaſting poſſeſſion, That he may receive us unto himſelf, and that where he is, we may alſo be. The main Legacy, the body of the gift is before: That which is given in this Text, is part of that evidence by which it appeares to us that we have right, and by which that right is maintained, and that is knowledge, that knowledge which we have of our intereſt in God, and his kingdome here; At that day ye ſhall know, &c. Ver. 16. Ver. 3.

And in the giving of this, we ſhall conſider, firſt, the Legacy it ſelf, this knowledge, Cognoſcetis, Ye ſhall know; And ſecondly, the time when this Legacy grows due to us, B In illo die, At that day ye ſhall know; And thirdly, how much of this treaſure is deviſed to us, what portion of this heavenly knowledge is bequeathed to us, and that is in three great ſummes, in three great myſteries; Firſt, ye ſhall know the myſtery of the Trinity, of diſtinct perſons in the Godhead; Ego in patre, That I am in my Father; And then the myſtery of the Incarnation of God, who took our fleſh, Vos in me, That you are in me; And laſtly, the myſtery and working of our Redemption, in our Sanctification, Ego in vobis, That Chriſt (by his Spirit, the Holy Ghoſt) is in us.

Nequitia animæ ignoratio, ſayes Triſmegiſtus; He doth not ſay it is the infirmity of the ſoule, or the impotency of the ſoule, but the iniquity, the wickedneſſe of the ſoule conſiſts in this, that we are ignorant of thoſe wayes, and thoſe ends, upon which we ſhould direct, and by which we ſhould govern our purpoſes: And if ignorance be the corruption, and diſſolution, certainly knowledge is the redintegration, and conſolidation of the C ſoule. From this corruption, from this ignorance God delivered his people at firſt, in ſome meaſure, by the Law; that is, he gave them thereby a way to get out of this ignorance; he put them to Schoole; Lex Pedagogus, ſayes the Apoſtle, The Law was their School-maſter. But in the ſtate of the Goſpell, in the ſhedding of the beames, of the ſtreames of his grace in the blood of Chriſt Jeſus we are graduats, and have proceeded ſo far, as to a manifeſtation of things already done, and ſo our faith is brought in a great part, to conſiſt in matter of fact, and that which was but matter of prophecy to them (in the old Teſtament, they knew not when it ſhould be done) to us in the New, is matter of Hiſtory, and we know when it was done: In the old times God led his people, ſometimes with clouds, ſometimes with fire, ſome lights they had, but ſome hidings, ſome withdrawings of thoſe lights too, the myſteries of their ſalvation were not fully revealed unto them: To us, all is holy fire, all is evident light, all is in the Epiphany, in the ma- D nifeſtation of Chriſt, and in the preſence of the Holy Ghoſt, who is delivered over to us, to remain with us, Vſq; ad conſummationem, Till the end of the world. God hath buried & hidden from us the body of Moſes; he hath removed that cloud, that vaile, the ceremony, the letter of the Law. Yea he hath hidden that which benighted us more, and kept us in more ignorance of him, our infinite ſins, which are clouds of witneſſes to our Conſciences, he hath hidden them in the wounds of his Son our Saviour, ſo that there remaines nothing but clearneſſe, evident clearneſſe; The Goſpell being brought to us all, in that Chriſt is actually and really come, and Chriſt being brought to me, in that he is appliable in the Church to every particular ſoule; ſo that this Legacy that is given in this text, is not only in a poſſibility, and in a probability, and in a veriſimilitude, but in an aſſurance, and in an infallibility, in a knowledge, we know it is thus, and thus. 1. Part. Cognoſcetis.

We ſhall therefore conſider this knowledge, firſt, as it is oppoſed to ignorance, ſecond- E ly, as it is oppoſed to inconſideration, and thirdly, as it is oppoſed to concealing, to ſmothering: Firſt, we muſt have it, and then we muſt know that we have it, and after that we muſt publiſh it, and declare it, ſo that others may know that we know it. Now, as there is a profitable, a wholeſome, a learned ignorance, which is a modeſt, and a reverent abſtinence from ſearching into thoſe ſecrets which God hath not revealed in his word, (whereupon S. Auguſtine ſayes uſefully, Libenter ignoremus, quæ ignorare nos vult Deus, Let not us deſire to know that which God hath no will to reveale) So alſo there is an unprofitable, an infectious, indeed an ignorant knowledge, which puffes, and ſwels us up: that, of which the Prophet ſayes, Stultus factus eſt omnis homo, à ſcientia; Every mans knowledge makes him a foole, when it makes him undervalue, and deſpiſe another. Ignorantia. Jer. 10.

another. And this is one ſtrange and incurable effect of this opinion of wit and knowledge, that whereas every man murmurs, and ſayes to himſelf, ſuch a man hath more land then I, more money then I, more cuſtome, more practiſe then I, (when perchance, in truth it is not ſo) yet every man thinks, that he hath more wit, more knowledge then all the world beſide, when, God knows, it is very far from being ſo. When the Prophet in that place, cals this confident beleever in his own wiſdome, Foole, he hath therein faſtned upon him a name of the greateſt reproach to man, which the Holy Ghoſt, in the mouth of a Prophet, could chooſe; As it appeares beſt in thoſe gradations which Chriſt makes, where, Whoſoever is angry, is made culpable of judgement, whoſoever ſayes Racha, (that is, expreſſes his anger in any contumelious ſpeech) is ſubject to a Councell, but whoſoever ſhall ſay, Foole, ſhall be worthy to be puniſhed in hell fire. For, by calling him Foole, ſayes S. Chryſoſtome there, he takes from him that underſtanding, by which he is a man, and ſo, ſayes he, deſpoiles him of all intereſt in the creature, in this life, and all intereſt in God, in the life to come. It is the deepeſt indignation, the higheſt abomination that Iob in his anguiſh conceived, Stulti deſpiciebant me, They that are but fooles themſelves, deſpiſed me; And after that again, They are the children of fooles, and yet I am their ſong, and their talk: And in that compariſon which God himſelf inſtituted, and propoſed in Deuteronomie, They have moved me to jealouſie, with that which is not God, and I will move them to jealouſie, with thoſe who are no people, I will provoke them to anger with a fooliſh Nation, God intimates ſo much, That a Foole is no more a man, then an Idoll is a God.

Mat. 5. 22.

Iob 19.

Deut. 30.

Now this fooliſhneſſe which we ſpeak of, againſt which God gives us this Legacy of knowledge, is not that bluntneſſe, that dulneſſe, that narrowneſſe of underſtanding, which is oppoſed to ſharpneſſe of wit, or readineſſe of expreſſing, and delivering any matter, for very many very devout and godly men, lack that ſharpneſſe, and that readineſſe, and yet have a good portion of ſpirituall wiſdome, and knowledge. Neither is this fooliſhneſſe, that weakneſſe, or inability, to amaſſe and gather together particulars, as they have fallen out in former times, and in our times, and thereby to judge of future occurrences by former precedents, (which is the wiſdome of States-men, and of civill contemplation, to build up a body of knowledge, from reading ſtories, or obſerving actions) for this wiſdome Solomon cals vanity, and vexation; Nor is this fooliſhneſſe, that precipitation, that over-earneſtneſſe, that animoſity, that heat which ſome men have, and which is oppoſed to diſcretion; for ſometimes zeale it ſelf hath ſuch a heat, and ſuch a precipitation in it, and yet that zeale may not be abſolutely condemned, but may be ſometimes of ſome uſe; The dull man, the weak man, the haſty man is not this foole, but (as the Wiſeman, who knew beſt, hath told us,) The foole is he that truſteth in his own heart. And therefore, againſt this fooliſhneſſe of truſting in our own hearts, of confiding, and relying upon our own plots and devices, and from ſacrificing to our own nets, (as the Prophet Habakkuk ſpeaks) from this attributing of all to our own induſtry, from this ignorance, that all bleſſings, ſpirituall and temporall too, proceed from God, and from God only, and from God manifeſted in Chriſt, and from Chriſt explicated in the Scriptures, and from the Scriptures applyed in the Church, (which is the ſumme of all religion) God hath given us this Legacy of knowledge, Cognoſcetis, At that day you ſhall know, as knowledge is oppoſed to ignorance.

Prov. 28.

Inconſideratio.

As it is oppoſed to inconſideration, it is a great work that it doth too: for, as God hath made himſelf like man in many things, in taking upon him, in Scriptures, our lineaments and proportion, our affections and paſſions, our apparell and garments, ſo hath God made himſelf like man, in this alſo, that as man doth, ſo he alſo takes it worſe to be neglected, then to be really injured; Some of our ſins do not offend God ſo much, as our inconſideration, a ſtupid paſſing him over, as though that we did, that which we had, that which we were, appertained not to him, had no emanation from him, no dependance upon him. As God ſayes in the Prophet, of lame, and blemiſhed, and unperfect Sacrifices, Offer it unto any of your Princes, and ſee if they will accept it at your hands; So I ſay to them that paſſe their lives thus inconſiderately, Offer that to any of your Princes, any of your Superiours; Dares an officer that receives inſtructions from his Prince, when he leaves his commandements unperformed, ſay, I never thought of it? Dares a Subject, a Servant, a Son ſay ſo?

Now beloved, this knowledge, as it is oppoſed to inconſideration, is in this, that God by breeding us in the viſible Church, multiplies unto us ſo many helps and aſſiſtances in the

A the word preached, in the Sacraments, in other Sacramentall, and Rituall, and Ceremoniall things, which are auxiliary, ſubſidiary reliefes, and refreſhings to our conſideration, as that it is almoſt impoſſible to fall into this inconſideration. Here God ſhewes this inconſiderate man, his book of creatures, which he may run and reade; that is, he may go forward in his vocation, and yet ſee that every creature calls him to a conſideration of God. Every Ant that he ſees, askes him, Where had I this providence, and induſtry? Every flowre that he ſees, asks him, Where had I this beauty, this fragrancy, this medicinall vertue in me? Every creature calls him to conſider, what great things God hath done in little ſubjects. But God opens to him alſo, here in his Church, his Booke of Scriptures, and in that Book, every word cries out to him; every mercifull promiſe cries to him, Why am I here, to meet thee, to wait upon thee, to performe Gods purpoſe towards thee, if thou never conſider me, never apply me to thy ſelfe? Every judgement
B of his anger cryes out, Why am I here, if thou reſpect me not. if thou make not thy profit, of performing thoſe conditions, which are annexed to thoſe judgements, and which thou mighteſt performe, if thou wouldeſt conſider it? Yea, here God opens another book to him, his manuall, his boſome, his pocket book, his Vade Mecum, the Abridgement of all Nature, and all Law, his owne heart, and conſcience: And this booke, though he ſhut it up, and claſp it never ſo hard, yet it will ſometimes burſt open of it ſelfe; though he interline it with other ſtudies, and knowledges, yet the Text it ſelfe, in the book it ſelfe, the teſtimonies of the conſcience, will ſhine through and appeare: Though he load it, and choak it with Commentaries and queſtions, that is, perplexe it with Circumſtances, and Diſputations, yet the matter it ſelfe, which is imprinted there, will preſent it ſelfe: yea, though he teare ſome leaves out of the Book, that is, wilfully, yea ſtudiouſly forget ſome ſins that he hath done, and diſcontinue the reading of this
C book, the ſurvay and conſideration of his conſcience, for ſome time, yet he cannot loſe, he cannot caſt away this book, that is ſo in him, as that it is himſelfe, and evermore calls upon him, to deliver him from this inconſideration, by this open and plentifull Library, which he carries about him. Conſider, beloved, the great danger of this inconſideration, by remembring, That even that onely perfect man, Chriſt Jeſus, who had that great way of making him a perfect man, as that he was perfect God too, even in that act of deepeſt devotion, in his prayer in the garden, by permitting himſelfe, out of that humane infirmity, which he was pleaſed to admit in himſelfe, (though farre from ſin) to paſſe one petition in that prayer, without a debated and conſidered will, in his Tranſeat Calix, If it be poſsible, let this Cup paſſe, hee was put to a re-conſideration, and to correct his Prayer, Verumtamen, Yet not my will, but thine bee done. And if then our beſt acts
D of praying, and hearing, need ſuch an exact conſideration, conſider the richneſſe, and benefit of this Legacy, knowledge, as this knowledge is oppoſed to inconſideration.

It is alſo oppoſed to concealing and ſmothering; It muſt be publiſhed to the benefit of others. Paulùm ſepultæ diſtat inertiæ celata virtus, ſayes the Poet; Vertue that is never produced into action, is ſcarce worthy of that name. For that is it, which the Apoſtle, in his Epiſtle to that Church, which was in Philemons houſe, doth ſo much praiſe God for, That the fellowſhip of thy faith may be made fruitfull, and that whatſoever good thing is in you through Ieſus Chriſt, may be knowne: That according to the nature of goodneſſe, and to the roote of goodneſſe, God himſelfe, this knowledge of God may be communicated, and tranſfuſed, and ſhed, and ſpred, and derived, and digeſted upon others. And therefore certainly, as the Philoſopher ſaid of civill actions, Etiam ſimulare Philoſophiam, Philoſophia eſt, That it was ſome degree of wiſedome, to be able to ſeeme wiſe; ſo, though it be no degree of religion, to ſeeme religious, yet even that may be a way of re-
E ducing others, and perchance themſelves: when a man makes a publique, an outward ſhew of being religious, by comming ordinarily to Church, and doing thoſe outward duties, though this be hypocriſie in him, yet ſometimes other men receive profit by his example, and are religious in earneſt, and, ſometimes, Appropinquat & neſcit, (as S. Auguſtine confeſſes that it was his caſe, when he came out of curioſity, and not out of devotion, to heare S. Ambroſe preach) what reſpect ſoever brought that man hither, yet when God findes him here, in his houſe, he takes hold of his conſcience, and ſhewes himſelfe to him, though he came not to ſee him. And if God doe thus produce good out of the hypocrite, and work good in him, much more will he provide a plentifull harveſt, by their labours, who having received this knowledge from God, aſſiſt their weaker bre-

2. Part. In die. This knowledge then, which to work the intended effect in us, is thus opposed to ignorance, and to inconsideration, and to concealing, (which were the pieces that constitute our first Part) in the second Part, which is the time when this Legacy accrues to us, is to be given us, In die illo, at that day, At that day shall yee know, &c. It is the illumination, the illustration of our hearts, and therefore well referred to the Day; The word it selfe affords cheerefulnesse. For when God inflicted that great plague, to kill all the first-borne in Ægypt, that was done at Midnight: And when God would intimate both deaths at once, spirituall, and temporall, he sayes, O foole, this night they will fetch away thy soule. Against all supply of knowledge, he cals him foole; and against all sense of comfort in the day, he threatens night.

Exod. 12. Luke 12.

Illo. It was In die, and In die illo, in the day, and at a certaine day, and at a short day. For, after Christ had made his Will at this supper, & given strength to his Will, by his death, B and proved his Will by his Resurrection, and left the Church possest of his estate, by his Ascension, within ten dayes after that, he poured out this Legacy of knowledge. For, though some take this day mentioned in the Text, to be Tanquam unius diei tenor, à dato Spiritu, ad Resurrectionem; from the first giving of the Holy Ghost, to the Resurrection; And others take this day, to bee from his Resurrection, to the end of his second Conversation upon earth, till his Ascension; and S. Augustine referre it, Ad perfectam visionem in Cœlis, to the perfect fruition of the sight of God in Heaven, yet the most usefull, and best followed acceptation is, This Day of the comming of the Holy Ghost.

Calvin. Osiand.

That day we celebrate this day; and we can never finde the Christian Church (so farre as we can judge by the evidence of Story) to have been without this festivall day. The reason of all Festivals in the Church, was, and is, Ne volumine temporum, ingrata subrepat oblivio, Lest after many ages involved, and wrapped up in one another, Gods particular benefits should bee involved, and wrapped up in unthankfulnesse. And the benefits received this day, were such, as should never be forgotten: for, without this day, all the rest had been evacuated, and uneffectuall: If the Apostles by the comming of the Holy Ghost had not been established in an infallibility in themselves, and in an ability, to deale with all Nations, by the benefit of tongues, the benefit of Christs passion had not been derived upon all Nations. And therefore, to This day, and to Easter-day, all publike Baptismes, in the Primitive Church, were reserved; None were baptized (except in cases of necessity) but upon one of these two dayes: for, as there is an Exaltation, a Resurrection given us in Baptisme, represented by Easter; so there belongs to us a confirmation, an establishing of grace, and the increase thereof, represented in Pentecost, in the comming of the Holy Ghost. As the Jews had an Easter in the memory of their deliverance from Ægypt, and a Pentecost in the memory of the Law given at D Mount Sinai; So at Easter we celebrate the memory of that glorious Passeover, when Christ passed from the grave, and hell, in his Resurrection, and at this Feast of Pentecost we celebrate his giving of the Law to all Nations, and his investing and possessing himselfe of his Kingdome, the Church: for this is Festum Adoptionis, as S. Chrysostome cals it; The cheerefull feast of our Adoption, in which, the Holy Ghost convaying the Son of God to us, enables us to be the Sons of God, and to cry Abba, Father.

Augustt. C

Acts 2. This then is that day, when the Apostles being with one accord, and in one place, (that is, in one faith, and in one profession of that faith, not onely without Heresie, but without Schisme too) the Holy Ghost as a mighty winde, filled them all, and gave them utterance; As a winde, to note a powerfull working; And he filled them, to note the abundance; And he gave them utterance, to inferre that which we spoke of before, The Communication of that knowledge, which they had received, to others. This was that Spirit, whom E it concerned the Apostles so much to have, as that Christ himselfe must goe from them, to send him to them; If I goe not away, sayes Christ, the Comforter will not come to you. How great a comfort must this necessarily be, which must so abundantly recompence the losse of such a comfort, as the presence of Christ was? This is that Spirit, who though hee were to be sent by the Father, and sent by the Son, yet he comes not as a Messenger from a Superiour, for hee was alwaies equall to Father and Son: But the Father sent him, and the Son sent him, as a tree sends forth blossomes, and as those blossomes send forth a sweet smell, and as the Sun sends forth beames, by an emanation from it selfe; He is Spiritus quem nemo interpretari potest, sayes S. Chrysostome; hee hath him not, that doth doth not see he hath him, nor is any man without him, who, in a rectified conscience, thinks he hath him: Illo Prophetæ illustrantur, Illo idiotæ condiuntur, sayes the same Father, The Prophets, as high as their calling was, saw nothing without this Spirit, and with this Spirit, a simple man understands the Prophets. And therefore doth S. Basil attribute that to the Holy Ghost, which seemes to be peculiar to the Son; he cals him Verbum Dei, because sayes he, Spiritus interpres Filii, sicut Filius Patris, As the Son hath revealed to us the will of the Father, and so is the Word of God to us, so the Holy Ghost applies the promises, and the merits of the Son to us, and so is the Word of God to us too, and enables us to come to God, in that voyce of his blessed Servant, S. Augustine, O Deus, secretissime, & patentissime, Though nothing be more mysterious then the knowledge of God in the Trinity, yet nothing is more manifest unto us, then, by the light of this person, the Holy Ghost, so much of both the other Persons, as is necessary for our Salvation, is.

Now, it is not onely to the Apostles, that the Holy Ghost is descended this day, but, as S. Chrysostom saies of the Annunciation, Non ad unam tantùm animam, It is not onely to one Person, that the Angel said then, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and overshadow thee, but, sayes he, that Holy Ghost hath said, Super omnem, I will poure out my selfe upon all men, so I say of this day, This day, if you be all in this place, (concentred, united here in one Faith, and one Religion) If you be of one accord, (that is, in perfect charity) The Holy Ghost shall fill you all (according to your measure, and his purpose) and give you utterance, in your lives and conversations. Qui ita vacat orationibus, ut dignus fiat illo vehementi Spiritu, semper habet diem Pentecostes: He that loves the exercise of prayer so earnestly, as that in prayer he feeles this vehemence of the Holy Ghost, that man dwels in an everlasting Whitsunday: for so he does, he hath it alwayes, that ever had it aright: Oditeos Deus, qui unam putant diem, festum Domini; God hates that man, saies Origen also, that celebrates any Holy-day of his, but one day: that never thinks of the Incarnation of Christ, but upon Christmas-day, nor upon his Passion, and Resurrection, but upon Easter, and Good-friday. If you deale so with your soules, as with your bodies, and as you cloath your selves with your best habits to day, but returne againe to your ordinary apparell to morrow: so for this day, or this houre, you devest the thought of your sins, but returne after to your vomit, you have not celebrated this day of Pentecost; you have not beene truly in this place, for your hearts have beene visiting your profits, or pleasures; you have not beene here with one accord, you have not truly and sincerely joyned with the Communion of Saints; Christ hath sent no Comforter to you this day, neither will he send any, till you be better prepared for him. But if you have brought your sins hither in your memory, and leave them here in the blood of your Saviour, alwaies flowing in his Church, and ready to receive them, if you be come to that heavenly knowledge, that there is no comfort but in him, and in him abundant consolation, then you are this day capable of this great Legacy, this knowledge, which is all the Christian Religion, That Christ is in the Father, and you in him, and he in you.

Ioel 2.

Origen.

3 Part.

We are now come to our third part, Our portion in this Legacy, the measure of the knowledge of these mysteries, which we are to receive: of which, S. Chrysostome sayes well, Scientiæ magnum argumentum est, nolle omnia scire, It is a good argument, that that man knowes much, who desires not to know all; In pursuing true knowledge, he is gone a good way, that knowes where to give over. When that great Manichean Felix would needs prove to S. Augustine, that Manes was the holy Ghost, because it was said that the holy Ghost should teach all truths, and that Manes did so, because he taught many things that they were ignorant of before, concerning the frame, and motion, and nature of the heavens and their stars, S. Augustine answered, Spiritus sanctus facit Christianos, non Mathematicos, The Holy Ghost makes us Christians, not Mathematicians. If any man thinke, by having his station at Court, that it is enough for him to have studied that one booke, and that if in that booke, The knowledge of the Court, he be come to an apprehension, by what meanes and persons businesses are likeliest to be carried, If he by his foresight have provided perspective glasses, to see objects a far off, and can make Almanacks for next yeare, and tell how matters will fall out then, and thinke that so he hath received his portion, as much knowledge as he needs, Spiritus sanctus facit Christianos, non Politicos, He must remember that the Holy Ghost makes Christians, and not Polititians. So if a man have a good foundation of a fortune from his Parents, and thinke that all his ſtudy muſt be, to proceed in that, and ſtill to adde a Cyphar more to his accounts, to make tens, hundreds, and hundreds, thouſands, Spiritus ſanctus facit Chriſtianos, non Arithmeticos, The Holy Ghoſt makes Chriſtians, and not ſuch Arithmeticians. If men who deſire a change in Religion, and yet thinke it a great wiſdome, to diſguiſe that deſire, and to temporiſe, leſt they ſhould be made leſſe able to effect their purpoſes, if they ſhould manifeſt themſelves; but yet hope to ſee that tranſmutation of Religion, from that copper, which they eſteeme ours to be, to that gold, which, (perchance for the venality thereof) they eſteeme theirs: If others, who are alſo working in the fire, (though not in the fire of envy and of powder, yet in the fire of an indiſcreet zeale, and though they pretend not to change the ſubſtance of the metall, the body of our Religion, yet they labour to blow away much of the ceremony, and circumſtances, which are Vehicula, and Adminicula, if not Habitacula Religionis, They are, though not the very fuell, yet the bellowes of Religion) If theſe men, I ſay, of either kinde, They who call all differing from themſelves, Error, and all error damnable; or they, who, as Tertullian expreſſes their humour, and indiſpoſition prophetically, Qui vocant proſtrationem Diſciplinæ, ſimplicitatem, which call the aboliſhing and extermination of all Diſcipline and Ceremony, pureneſſe and holineſſe; If they thinke they have received their portion of this legacie, their meaſure of true knowledge, in labouring onely to accuſe, and reforme, and refine others, Spiritus ſanctus facit Chriſtianos, non Chymiſtas, The holy Ghoſt makes men Chriſtians, and not Alchymiſts. To contract this, If a man know wayes enow to diſguiſe all his ſins, If no Exchequer take hold of his uſurious contracts, no High Commiſſion of his licentiouſneſſe, no Star-chamber of his miſdemeanors, If he will not to ſleepe, till he can hold up his eyes no longer, for feare his ſins ſhould meet him in his bed, and vexe his conſcience there, If he will not come to the Sacrament, but at that time of the yeare, when Laws compel him, or good company invite him, or other civill reſpects and reaſons provoke him, If he have avoydances, to hide his ſins from others, and from himſelf too, by ſuch diſguiſings, This is all but Deceptio viſus, a blinding of his owne internall eyes, and Spiritus ſanctus facit Chriſtianos, non Circulatores, The Holy Ghoſt makes men Chriſtians, and not Jugglers.

This knowledge then which we ſpeake of, is to know the end and the way, Heaven and Chriſt, The Kingdome to which he is gone, and the meanes which he hath taught us to follow. Now, in all our wayes, in all our journies, a moderate pace brings a man moſt ſurely to his journies end, and ſo doth a ſober knowledge in matters of Divinity, and in the myſteries of Religion. And therefore the Fathers ſay, that this comming of the Holy Ghoſt upon the Apoſtles, this day, though it were a vehement comming, did not give them all kinde of knowledge, a knowledge of particular Arts, and Sciences; But he gave them knowledge enough for their preſent worke, and withall a faithfull confidence, that if at any time, they ſhould have to doe, with learned Heathens, with Philoſophers, the Holy Ghoſt would either inſtantly furniſh them, with ſuch knowledge, as they had not before, (as wee ſee in many relations in the Eccleſiaſticall Story, That men ſpoke upon the ſudden, in divers caſes, otherwiſe, then in any reaſon their education could promiſe or afford) or elſe he would blunt the ſharpneſſe of the Adverſaries weapons, and caſt a damp upon their underſtandings, as wee ſee he did in the Councell of Nice, when after many diſputations, amongſt the great Men of great eſtimation, the weakeſt Man in the Councell roſe up, and he, of whom his owne party were afraid, leſt his diſcourſe ſhould diſadvantage the cauſe, overthrew, and converted, that great Advocate, and defender of Arius, whom all the reſt could never ſhake; for though this man ſaid no more then other men had ſaid, yet God at this time diſpoſed the underſtanding, and the abilities of the Adverſaries, otherwiſe then before; ſometimes God will have glory, in arming his friends, ſometimes in diſarming his enemies, ſometimes in exalting our abilities, and ſometimes in evacuating or enfeebling theirs.

And ſo, as the Apoſtles were, as many of us, as celebrate this day, as they did, are filled with the Holy Ghoſt, that is, with ſo much knowledge, as is neceſſary to Gods purpoſe in us. Enough for our ſelves, if we be private men, and enough for others, if wee have charge of others: private men ſhall have knowledge enough where to ſeeke for more, and the Prieſt ſhall have enough to communicate his knowledge to others. And though this knowledge were delivered to the Apoſtles, as from a print, from a ſtampe, all at once, and to us, but as by writing, letter after letter, ſyllable after ſyllable, by Catechiſmes,

A chiſmes, and Sermons, yet both are ſuch knowledges, as are ſufficient for each. As the glory of heaven ſhall fall upon us all, and though we be not all of equall meaſure, and capacity, yet we ſhall be equally full of that glory; ſo the way to that glory, this knowledge, ſhall be manifeſt to us all, and infallible to us all, though we do not all know alike; The ſimpleſt ſoul that heares me, ſhall know the way of his ſalvation, as well as the greateſt of thoſe Fathers, whom he heares me cite; And upon us all (ſo diſpoſed) the holy Ghoſt ſhall fall, as he did here, In fire, and In tongues; In fire, to inflame us in a religious zeal, and in Tongues, to utter that in confeſſion, and in profeſſion, that is, to glorifie God, both in our words, and in our actions. This then is our portion in this Legacy, A ſober ſeeking after thoſe points of knowledge which are neceſſary for our ſalvation, and theſe, in this text, Chriſt derived into theſe three, That I am in my Father, That you are in me, That I am in you.

B The firſt of theſe is the knowledge of diſtinction of perſons, and ſo of the Trinity. Principale munus ſcientiæ eſt, cognoſcere Trinitatem, ſaith Origen: The principall uſe and office of my knowledge, is to know the Trinity; for, to know an unity in the Godhead, that there is but one God, naturall reaſon ſerves our turn: & to know a creation of the world of nothing, reaſon ſerves us too; we know by reaſon, that either neither of them is infinite, if there be two Gods, (and then neither of them can be God) or if both be infinite, (which is an impoſſibility) one of them is ſuperfluous, becauſe whatſoever is infinite, can alone extend to all. So alſo we can collect infallibly, that if the world were not made of nothing, yet that of which the world ſhall be pretended to have been made of, muſt have been made of nothing, or elſe it muſt be ſomething eternall, and uncreated; & whatſoever is ſo, muſt neceſſarily be God it ſelf. To be ſure of thoſe two, an unity in the Godhead, and a creation of the world, I need no Scriptures; but to know this diſtinction of Perſons, That C the Son is in the Father, I need the Scriptures, and I need more then the Scriptures, I need this Pentecoſt, this comming, this illuſtration of the holy Ghoſt, to inſpire a right underſtanding of theſe Scriptures into me. For, if this knowledge might be had without Scriptures, why ſhould not the heathen beleeve the Trinity, as well as I, ſince they lack no naturall faculties which Chriſtians have? And if the Scriptures themſelves, without the operation of the holy Ghoſt, ſhould bring this clearneſſe, why ſhould not the Jews and the Arians conform themſelves to this doctrine of the Trinity, as well as I, ſince they accept thoſe Scriptures, out of which I prove the Trinity to mine own cõſcience? We muſt then attend his working in us; we muſt not admit ſuch a vexation of ſpirit, as either to vex our ſpirit, or the Spirit of God, by inquiring farther then he hath been pleaſed to reveale.

Ego in Patre. Trinitas.

If you conſider that Chriſt ſayes here, You ſhall know That I am in the Father, and doth not ſay, You ſhall know How I am in the Father, and this to his Apoſtles themſelves, and to D the Apoſtles after they were to be filled with the holy Ghoſt, which ſhould teach them all truth, it will cut off many perplexing queſtions, and impertinent anſwers which have been produced for the expreſſing of the manner of this generation, and of the diſtinction of the perſons in the Trinity; you ſhall know That it is, you ſhall not ask How it is. It is enough for a happy ſubject to enjoy the ſweetneſſe of a peaceable government, though he know not Arcana Imperii, The wayes by which the Prince governes; So is it for a Chriſtian to enjoy the working of Gods grace, in a faithfull beleeving the myſteries of Religion, though he inquire not into Gods bed-chamber, nor ſeek into his unrevealed Decrees. It is Odioſa & exitialis vocula, Quomodo, ſayes Luther, A hatefull, a damnable Monoſyllable, How, How God doth this or that: for, if a man come to the boldneſſe of propoſing ſuch a queſtion to himſelf, he will not give over till he finde ſome anſwer: and then, others will not be content with his anſwer, but every man will have a ſeverall E one. When the Church fell upon the Quomodo in the Sacrament, How, in what manner the body of Chriſt was there, we ſee what an inconvenient anſwer it fell upon, That it was done by Tranſubſtantiation; That ſatisfied not, (as there was no reaſon it ſhould) And then they fell upon others, In, Sub, and Cum, and none could, none can give ſatisfaction. And ſo alſo have our times, by asking Quomodo, How Chriſt deſcended into Hell, produced ſo many anſwers, as that ſome have thought it no Article at all, ſome have thought that it is all one thing to have deſcended into hell, and to have aſcended into heaven, and that it amounts to no more, then a departing into the ſtate of the dead. But Servate depoſitum, Make much of that knowledge which the holy Ghoſt hath truſted you withall, and beleeve the reſt. No man knows how his ſoul came into him; whether by infuſion from God, or by generation from Parents, no man knows ſo, but that ſtrong arguments will be produced on the other ſide; And yet no man doubts but he hath a ſoul. No man knows ſo, as that ſtrong arguments may not be brought on the other ſide, how he ſees, whether by reception of ſpecies from without, or by emiſſion of beames from within; And yet no man doubts whether he ſee or no. The holy Ghoſt ſhall tell you, when he tels you the moſt that ever he ſhall tell you, in that behalf, That the Son is in the Father, but he will not tell you how.

Incarnatio. Our ſecond portion in this Legacy of knowledge, is, That we are in Chriſt; And this is the myſtery of the Incarnation. For ſince the devill had ſo ſurprized us all, as to take mankinde all in one lump, in a corner, in Adams loynes, and poyſoned us all there in the fountain, in the roote, Chriſt, to deliver us as intirely, took all mankinde upon him, and ſo took every one of us, and the nature, and the infirmities, and the ſins, and the puniſhment of every ſingular man. So that the ſame pretence which the devill hath againſt every one of us, you are mine, for you ſinned in Adam, we have alſo for our diſcharge, we are delivered, for we paid our debt in Chriſt Jeſus. In all his tentations, ſend him to look upon the Records of that proceſſe, of Chriſts paſſion, and he ſhall finde there, the names of all the faithfull recorded: That ſuch a day, that day when Chriſt dyed, I, and you, and all that ſhall be ſaved, ſuffered, dyed, and were crucified, and in Chriſt Jeſus ſatisfied God the Father, for thoſe infinite ſins which we had committed: And now, Second death, which is damnation, hath no more title to any of the true members of his myſticall body, then corruption upon naturall, or violent death, could have upon the members of his naturall body.

Redemptio. The aſſurance of this grows from the third part of this knowledge, That Chriſt is in us; for that is ſuch a knowledge of Chriſts generall Redemption of mankinde, as that it is alſo an application of it to us in particular. For, for his Incarnation, by which we are in him, that may have given a dignity to our humane nature; But Quæ beneficiorum magnitudo fuiſſet erga nos, ſi hominem ſolummodo, quem aſſumpſerat, ſalvaret? What great benefit (how ever the dignity had been great to all mankinde) had mankinde had, if Chriſt had ſaved no more then that one perſon whom he aſſumed? The largeneſſe and bounty of Chriſt is, to give us of his beſt treaſure, knowledge, and to give us moſt at laſt, To know Chriſt in me. For, to know that he is in his Father, this may ſerve me to convince another, that denies the Trinity; To know that we are in Chriſt, ſo as that he took our nature, this may ſhew me an honour done to us, more then the Angels; But what gets a lame wretch at the poole, how ſoveraign ſoever the water be, if no body put him in? What gets a naked beggar by knowing that a dead man hath left much to pious uſes, if the Executors take no knowledge of him? What get I by my knowledge of Chriſt in the Father, and of us in Chriſt ſo, if I finde not Chriſt in me?

Cyril.

How then is Chriſt in us? Here the queſtion De modo, How it is, is lawfull: for, he hath revealed it to us. It is, by our obedience to his inſpiration, and by our reverent uſe of thoſe viſible meanes, which he hath ordained in his Church, his Word and Sacraments: As our fleſh is in him, by his participation thereof, ſo his fleſh is in us, by our communication thereof; And ſo is his divinity in us, by making us partakers of his divine nature, and by making us one ſpirit with himſelf, which he doth at this Pentecoſt, that is, whenſoever the holy Ghoſt viſits us with his effectuall grace: for this is an union, in which, Chriſt in his purpoſe hath married himſelf to our ſouls, inſeparably, and Sine ſolutione vinculi, Without any intention of divorce on his part: But if we will ſeparate him à menſa & toro, If either we take the bed of licentiouſneſſe, or the board of voluptuouſneſſe, or if when we eat or drink, or ſleep or wake, we do not all to the glory of God, if we ſeparate, he will divorce.

If then we be thus come to this knowledge, let us make Ex ſcientia conſcientiam, Enlarge ſcience into conſcience: for, Conſcientia eſt Syllogiſmus practicus, Conſcience is a Syllogiſme that comes to a concluſion; Then only hath a man true knowledge, when he can conclude in his own conſcience, that his practiſe, and converſation hath expreſſed it. Who will beleeve that we know there is a ditch, and know the danger of falling into it, and drowning in it, if he ſee us run headlong towards it, and fall into it, and continue in it? Who can beleeve, that he that ſeparates himſelf from Chriſt, by continuing in his ſin, hath any knowledge, or ſenſe, or evidence, or teſtimony of Chriſts being in him? As Chriſt proceeds by enlarging thy knowledge, and making thee wiſer and wiſer, ſo enlarge

A enlarge thy teſtimony of it, by growing better and better, and let him that is holy, bee more holy. If thou have paſſed over the firſt heats of the day, the wantonneſſes of youth, and the ſecond heat, the fire of ambition, if theſe be quenched in thee, by preventing grace, or by repenting grace, be more and more holy, for thine age will meet another ſin of covetouſneſſe, or of indevotion, that needs as much reſiſtance. God ſtaid not in any leſſe degree of knowledge towards thee, then in bringing himſelfe to thee; Doe not thou ſtay by the way neither; not in the conſideration of God alone, for that Cœli enarrant, all creatures declare it; ſtay not at the Trinity; Every comming to Church, nay thy firſt being brought to Church, at thy Baptiſme, is, and was a profeſſion of that; ſtay not at the Incarnation; That the Devill knowes, and teſtifies: But come to know that Chriſt is in thee, and expreſſe that knowledge in a ſanctified life: For though he be in us all, in the work of his Redemption, ſo as that he hath poured out
B balme enough in his blood, to ſpread over all mankinde, yet onely he can enjoy the chearfulneſſe of this unction, and the inſeparableneſſe of this union, who, (as S. Auguſtine purſues this contemplation) Habet in memoria, & ſervat in vita, who alwayes remembers that he ſtands in the preſence of Chriſt, and behaves himſelfe worthy of that glorious preſence; Qui habet in Sermonibus, & ſervat in operibus, That hath Chriſt alwaies at his tongues end, and alwaies at his fingers ends, that loves to diſcourſe of him, and to act his diſcourſes; Qui habet audiendo, & ſervat faciendo, That heares Gods will here in his houſe, and does his will at home in his owne houſe; Qui habet faciendo, & ſervat perſeverando, who having done well from the beginning, perſevers in well doing to the end, he, and he onely ſhall finde Chriſt in him.

GEN. 1. 2.

And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

D THE Church of God celebrates this day the third Perſon of the Holy, Bleſſed, and Glorious Trinity, The Holy Ghoſt. The Holy Ghoſt is the God, the Spirit of Comfort; A Comforter; not one amongſt others, but the Comforter; not the principall, but the intire, the onely Comforter; and more then all that, The Comfort it ſelfe. That is an attribute of the Holy Ghoſt, Comfort; And then the office of the Holy Ghoſt is to gather, to eſtabliſh, to illumine, to governe that Church which the Son of God, from whom together with the Father, the Holy Ghoſt proceeds, hath purchaſed with his blood. So that, as the Holy Ghoſt is the Comforter, ſo is this Comfort exhibited by him to us, and exerciſed by him upon us, in this eſpecially, that he hath gathered us, eſtabliſhed us, illumined us, and does governe us, as members of that body, of which Chriſt Jeſus is the Head; that he hath brought us, and bred us, and fed us with E the meanes of ſalvation, in his application of the merits of Chriſt to our ſoules, in the Ordinances of the Church.

In this Text is the firſt mention of this Third Perſon of the Trinity; And it is the firſt mention of any diſtinct Perſon in the God-head; In the firſt verſe, there is an intimation of the Trinity, in that Bara Elohim, That Gods, Gods in the plurall are ſaid to have made heaven, and earth; And then, as the Church after having celebrated the memory of All Saints, together in that one day, which we call All Saints day, begins in the celebration of particular Saints, firſt with Saint Andrew, who firſt of any applied himſelf to Chriſt out of Saint Iohn Baptiſts Schoole after Chriſts Baptiſme; ſo Moſes having given us an intimation of God, and the three Perſons altogether in that Bara Eloim, before, gives us first notice of this Person, the Holy Ghost, in particular, because he applies to us the Mercies of the Father, and the Merits of the Son, and moves upon the face of the waters, and actuates, and fecundates our soules, and generates that knowledge, and that comfort, which we have in the knowledge of God. Now the moving of the Holy Ghost upon the face of the waters in this Text, cannot be literally understood of his working upon man; for man was not yet made; but when man is made, that is, made the man of God in Christ; there, in that new Creation the Holy Ghost begins again, with a new moving upon the face of the waters in the Sacrament of Baptisme, which is the Conception of a Christian in the wombe of the Church. A

Therefore we shall consider these words, And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters; first, literally in the first, and then spiritually in the second Creation; first how the Holy Ghost moved upon the face of the Waters in making this world for us, And then how he moves upon the face of the Waters againe, in making us for the other world. In which two severall parts we shall consider these three termes in our Text, both in the Macrocosme, and Microcosme, the Great and the Lesser world, man extended in the world, and the world contracted, and abridged into man; first, Quid Spiritus Dei? what this Power, or this Person, which is here called the Spirit of God, is, for whether it be a Power, or a Person, hath been diversly disputed; And secondly, Quid ferebatur? what this Action, which is here called a Moving, was; for whether a Motion, or a Rest, an Agitation, or an Incubation, of that Power, or that Person, hath been disputed too; And lastly, Quid super faciem aquarum? what the subject of this Action, the face of the waters, was; for, whether it were a stirring, and an awakening of a power that was naturally in those waters, to produce creatures, or whether it were an infusing a new power, which till then those waters had not, hath likewise beene disputed. And in these three, the Person, the Action, the Subject, considered twice over, in the Creation first, and in our regeneration in the Christian Church after, we shall determine all that is necessary for the literall, and for the spirituall sense of these words, And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. B C

1 Part. First then, undertaking the consideration of the literall sense, and after, of the spirituall, we joyne wih S. Augustine, Sint casta delicia mea Scriptura tua; Lord I love to be conversant in thy Scriptures, let my conversation with thy Scriptures be a chast conversation; that I discover no nakednesse therein; offer not to touch any thing in thy Scriptures, but that, that thou hast vouchsafed to unmask, and manifest unto me: Nec fallar in eis, nec fallam ex eis; Lord, let not me mistake the meaning of thy Scriptures, nor mis-lead others, by imputing a false sense to them. Non frustra scribuntur, sayes he; Lord, thou hast writ nothing to no purpose; thou wouldst be understood in all: But not in all, by all men, at all times; Confiteor tibi quicquid invenero in libris tuis; Lord, I acknowledge that I receive from thee, whatsoever I understand in thy word; for else I doe not understand it. This that blessed Father meditates upon the word of God; he speakes of this beginning of the Book of Genesis; and he speaks lamenting, Scripsit Moses & abiit, a little Moses hath said, and alas he is gone; Si hic esset, tenerem eum, & per te rogarem, If Moses were here, I would hold him here, and begge of him, for thy sake to tell me thy meaning in his words, of this Creation. But sayes he, since I cannot speake with Moses, Te, quo plenus vera dixit, Veritas, rogo, I begge of thee who art Truth it selfe, as thou enabledst him to utter it, enable me to understand what he hath said. So difficult a thing seemed it to that intelligent Father, to understand this history, this mystery of the Creation. But yet though he found, that divers senses offered themselves, he did not doubt of finding the Truth: For, Deus meus lumen oculorum meorum in occulto, sayes he, O my God, the light of mine eyes, in this dark inquisition, since divers senses, arise out of these words, and all true, Quid mihi obest, si aliud ego sensero, quam sensit alius, eum sensisse, qui scripsit? What hurt followes, though I follow another sense, then some other man takes to be Moses sense? for his may be a true sense, and so may mine, and neither be Moses his. Hee passes from prayer, and protestation, to counsell, and direction; In diversitate sententiarum verarum, concordiam pariat ipsa veritas, Where divers senses arise, and all true, (that is, that none of them oppose the truth) let truth agree them. But what is Truth? God; And what is God? Charity; Therefore let Charity reconcile such differences. Legitimè legetur amur, sayes he, let us use the Law lawfully; Let us use our liberty of reading Scriptures according to the Law of liberty; that is, charitably to leave others

A others to their liberty, if they but differ from us, and not differ from Fundamentall Truths.

Si quis quærat ex me, quid horum Moses senserit, If any man ask me, which of these, which may be all true, Moses meant, Non sunt sermones isti confessionis, Lord, sayes hee, This that I say is not said by way of Confession, as I intend it should, if I doe not freely confesse, that I cannot tell, which Moses meant; But yet I can tell, that this that I take to be his meaning is true; and that is enough. Let him that findes a true sense of any place, rejoyce in it, Let him that does not beg it of thee, Vt quid mihi molestus es? Why should any man presse me, to give him the true sense of Moses here, or of the holy Ghost, in any darke place of Scripture? Ego illuminem illam hominem, venientem in mundum? saies he; Is that said of me, that I am the light, that enlightned every man, any man, that comes into this world? So far I will goe, saies he, so far will we, in his modesty and

B humility accompany him, as still to propose, Quod luce veritatis, quod fruge utilitatis excellit, such a sense as agrees with other Truths, that are evident in other places of Scripture, and such a sense as may conduce most to edification. For to those two, does that heavenly Father reduce the foure Elements, that make up a right exposition of Scripture; which are, first, the glory of God, such a sense as may most advance it; secondly, the analogie of faith, such a sense as may violate no confessed Article of Religion; and thirdly, exaltation of devotion, such a sense, as may carry us most powerfully upon the apprehension of the next life; and lastly, extension of charity, such a sense, as may best hold us in peace, or reconcile us, if we differ from one another. And within these limits wee shall containe our selves, The glory of God, the analogie of faith, the exaltation of devotion, the extension of charity. In all the rest, that belongs to the explication or application, to the literall, or spirituall sense of these words, And the Spirit of God moved upon

C the face of the waters, to which, having stopped a little upon this generall consideration, the exposition of darke places, we passe now.

Within these rules we proceed to enquire, who this Spirit of God is, or what it is; whether a Power, or a Person. The Jews who are afraid of the Truth, lest they should meete evidences of the doctrine of the Trinity, and so of the Messias, the Son of God, if they should admit any spirituall sense, admit none, but cleave so close to the letter, as that to them the Scripture becomes Litera occidens, A killing Letter, and the savour of death unto death. They therefore, in this Spirit of God, are so far from admitting any Person, that is, God, as they admit no extraordinary operation, or vertue proceeding from God in this place; but they take the word here (as in many other places of Scripture it does) to signifie onely a winde, and then that that addition of the name of God (The Spirit of God) which is in their Language a denotation of a vehemency, of a high degree, of a superlative, (as D when it is said of Saul, Sopor Domini, A sleepe of God was upon him, it is intended of a deepe, a dead sleepe) inforces, induces no more but that a very strong winde blew upon the face of the waters, and so in a great part dryed them up. And this opinion I should let flye away with the winde, if onely the Jews had said it. But Theodoret hath said it too, and therefore we afford it so much answer, That it is a strange anticipation, that Winde, which is a mixt Meteor, to the making whereof, divers occasions concurre with exhalations, should be thus imagined, before any of these causes of Winds were created, or produced, and that there should be an effect before a cause, is somewhat irregular. In Lapland, the Witches are said to sell winds to all passengers; but that is but to turne those windes that Nature does produce, which way they will; but in our case, the Jews, and they that follow them, dreame winds, before any winds, or cause of winds was created; The Spirit of God here cannot be the Wind.

E It cannot be that neither, which some great men in the Christian Church have imagined it to be; Operatio Dei, The power of God working upon the waters, (so some) or, Efficientia Dei, A power by God infused into the waters, so others. And to that S. Augustine comes so neare, as to say once in the negative, Spiritus Dei hic, res dei est, sed non ipse Deus est, The Spirit of God in this place is something proceeding from God, but it is not God himselfe; And once in the affirmative, Posse esse vitalem creaturam, quâ universus mundus movetur; That this Spirit of God may be that universall power, which sustaines, and inanimates the whole world, which the Platoniques have called the Soule of the world, and others intend by the name of Nature, and we doe well, if we call The providence of God.

But there is more of God, in this Action, then the Instrument of God, Nature, or the Vice-

Vice-roy of God, Providence; for as the person of God, the Son, was in the Incarnation, so the person of God, the Holy Ghost was in this Action; though far from that manner of becomming one and the same thing with the waters, which was done in the Incarnation of Christ, who became therein perfect man. That this word the Spirit of God, is intended of the Person of the Holy Ghost, in other places of Scripture, is evident, undeniable, unquestionable, and that therefore it may be so taken here. Where it is said, Esay 11.2. The Spirit of God shall rest upon him, (upon the Messiah) where it is said by himselfe, The Lord and his Spirit is upon me, And, the Lord and his Spirit hath anointed me, there it is certainly, and therefore here it may be probably spoken of the Holy Ghost personally. It is no impossible sense, it implies no contradiction; It is no inconvenient sense, it offends no other article; it is no new sense; nor can we assigne any time, when it was a new Basil. sense: The eldest Fathers adhere to it, as the ancientest interpretation. Saint Basil saies not onely, Constantissimè asseverandum est, We must constantly maintaine that interpretation, (for all that might be his owne opinion) not onely therefore, Quia verius est, (for that might be, but because he found it to be the common opinion of those times) but Quia à majoribus nostris approbatum, because it is accepted for the true sense, by the Ancients; The Ancients, saies that ancient Father Basil; which reason prevailes upon Ambrose. S. Ambrose too, Nos cum sanctorum, & fidelium sententia congruentes, We beleeve, and beleeve it, because the Ancients beleeved it to be so, that this is spoken generally of the Hieron. Holy Ghost. S. Basil, and S. Ambrose assume it, as granted, S. Hierom disputes it, argues, concludes it, Vivificator, ergo Conditor, ergo Deus; This Spirit of God gave life, therefore this Spirit was a Creator; therefore God. S. Augustine prints his seale deepe; Secundùm quod ego intelligere possum, ita est, as far as my understanding can reach, it is so; and his understanding reached far. But he addes, Nec ullo modo, &c. Neither can it possibly be Tertul. otherwise. We cannot tell, whether that Poem which is called Genesis, be Tertullians, Cypr. or Cyprians; It hath beene thought an honour to the learnedest of the Fathers, to have beene the Author of a good Poem; In that Poem this text is paraphrased thus, Immensusque Deus super æquora vastabat; God, God personally moved upon the waters. Truly the later Schoole is (as they have used it) a more Poeticall part of divinity, then any of the Poems of the Fathers are, (take in Lactantius his Poem of the Phenix, and all the rest) and for the Schoole, there Aquinas saies, Secundùm Sanctos, intelligimus Spiritum sanctum, As the holy Fathers have done, we also understand this personally of the Holy Ghost.

To end this, these words doe not afford such an argument for the Trinity, or the third Person thereof, the Holy Ghost, as is strong enough to convert, or convince a Jew, because it may have another sense; but we, who by Gods abundant goodnesse have otherwise an assurance, and faith in this doctrine, acknowledge all those other places, Thou Psal. 104.30. sendest forth thy Spirit, and they are created, Iob 26.13. By his Spirit he hath garnished the Heavens, and the rest of that kinde, to be all but ecchoes from this voyce, returnes from Iob, and from David, and the rest, of this doctrine of all comfort, first, and betimes delivered from Moses, that there is a distinct person in the Godhead, whose attribute is goodnesse, whose office is application, whose way is comfort. And so we passe from our first, That it is not onely the Power of God, but the Person of God, To the second, in this branch, His Action, Ferebatur.

Ferebatur. The Action of the Spirit of God, the Holy Ghost, in this place, is expressed in a word, of a double, and very diverse signification; for it signifies motion, and it signifies rest. Psal. 139.2. And therefore, as S. Augustine argues upon those words of David, Thou knowest my downe sitting, and my uprising, That God knew all that he did, betweene his downe sitting and his uprising; So in this word which signifies the Holy Ghosts first motion, and his last rest, we comprehend all that was done in the production, and creation of the Creatures. This word, we translate, As the Eagle fluttereth over her young ones, so it is a word Deut. 32.11. of Motion; And S. Hierom upon our Text expresses it by Incubabat, to sit upon her young Hier. ones, to hatch them, or to preserve them, so it is a word of rest. And so, the Jews take this Cyprian. word to signifie, properly the birds hatching of eggs. S. Cyprian unites the two significations well, Spiritus sanctus dabat aquis motum, & limitem; The Holy Ghost enabled the waters to move, and appointed how, and how far they should move. The beginnings, and the waies, and the ends, must proceed from God, and from God the Holy Ghost: That is, by those meanes, and those declarations, by which God doth manifest himselfe to us, for that is the office of the holy Ghoſt, to manifeſt and apply God to us. Now the word in our Text is not truly Ferebatur, The Spirit moved, which denotes a thing paſt; but the word is Movens, Moving, a Participle of the preſent; So that we aſcribe firſt Gods manifeſtation of himſelf in the creation, and then the continuall manifeſtation of himſelf in his providence, to the holy Ghoſt; for God had two purpoſes in the creation, Vt ſint, ut maneant, That the creature ſhould be, and be ſtill; That it ſhould exiſt at firſt, and ſubſiſt after; Be made, and made permanent. God did not mean that Paradiſe ſhould have been of ſo ſmall uſe when he made it; he made it for a perpetuall habitation for man. God did not mean that man ſhould be the ſubject of his wrath when he made him; he made him to take pleaſure in, and to ſhed glory upon him. The holy Ghoſt moves, he is the firſt author; the holy Ghoſt perpetuates, ſettles, eſtabliſhes, he is our reſt, and acquieſcence, and center; Beginning, Way, End, all is in this word, Recaph; The Spirit of God moved, and reſted. And upon what? And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

S. Auguſtine obſerving aright, That at this time, of which this Text is ſpoken, The waters enwrapped all the whole ſubſtance, the whole matter, of which all things were to be created, all was ſurrounded with the waters, all was embowelled, and enwombed in the waters; And ſo the holy Ghoſt moving, and reſting upon the face of the waters, moved, and reſted, did his office upon the whole Maſſe of the world, and ſo produced all that was produced; and this admits no contradiction, no doubt, but that thus the thing was done, and that this, this word implies. But whether the holy Ghoſt wrought this production of the ſeverall creatures, by himſelf, or whether he infuſed, and imprinted a naturall power in the waters, and all the ſubſtance under the waters, to produce creatures naturally of themſelves, hath received ſome doubt. It need not: for the worke aſcribed to the holy Ghoſt here, is not the working by nature, but the creating of nature; Not what nature did after, but how nature her ſelf was created at firſt. In this action, this moving, and reſting upon the face of the waters, (that is, all involved in the waters) the Spirit of God, the holy Ghoſt, hatched, produced then all thoſe creatures; For no power infuſed into the waters, or earth then, could have enabled that earth, then to have produced Trees with ripe fruits, in an inſtant, nor the waters to have brought forth Whales, in their growth, in an inſtant. The Spirit of God produced them then, and eſtabliſhed and conſerves ever ſince, that ſeminall power which we call nature, to produce all creatures (then firſt made by himſelfe) in a perpetuall Succeſſion.

And ſo have you theſe words, And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, literally, hiſtorically: And now theſe three termes, The Spirit of God, Moved, Vpon the face of the waters, You are alſo to receive in a ſpirituall ſenſe, in the ſecond world, the Chriſtian Church: The Perſon, the Action, the Subject, the holy Ghoſt, and him moving, and moving upon the waters, in our regeneration.

2. Part. Spiritus ſanctus.

Here, as before, our firſt Terme, and Conſideration, is the name, The Spirit of God; And here God knows, we know too many, even amongſt the outward profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion, that in this name, The Spirit of God, take knowledge only of a power of God, and not of a perſon of God; They ſay it is the working of God, but not God working. Mira profunditas eloquiorum tuorum; The waters in the creation, were not ſo deep as the word of God, that delivers that creation. Ecce, ante nos ſuperficies blandiens pueris, ſayes that Father; We, we that are but babes in underſtanding, as long as we are but naturall men, ſee the ſuperficies, the top, the face, the outſide of theſe waters, Sed mira profunditas, Deus meus, mira profunditas, But it is an infinite depth, Lord my God, an infinite depth to come to the bottome. The bottome is, to profeſſe, and to feele the diſtinct working of the three diſtinct perſons of the Trinity, Father, Son, and holy Ghoſt. Rara anima, quæ cum de illa loquitur, ſciat quid loquatur, Not one man, not one Chriſtian amongſt a thouſand, who when he ſpeaks of the Trinity, knows what he himſelf meanes. Naturall men will write of lands of Pygmies, and of lands of Giants; and write of Phœnixes, and of Unicornes; But yet adviſedly they do not beleeve, (at leaſt confidently they do not know) that there are ſuch Giants, or ſuch Pygmies, ſuch Unicorns or Phœnixes in the world. Chriſtians ſpeak continually of the Trinity, and the holy Ghoſt, but alas, adviſedly, they know not what they mean in thoſe names. The moſt know nothing, for want of conſideration; They that have conſidered it enough, and ſpent thoughts enough upon the Trinity, to know as much as needs be knowen thereof,

Contendunt

C. 11. Contendunt & dimicant, & nemo ſine pace vidit iſtam viſionem, They diſpute, and they wrangle, and they ſcratch, and wound one anothers reputations, and they aſſiſt the common enemy of Chriſtianity by their uncharitable differences, Et ſine pace, And without peace, and mildneſſe, and love, and charity, no man comes to know the holy Ghoſt, who is the God of peace, and the God of love. Id. l. 11. 2. & 12. Da quod amo; amo enim, nam & hoc tu dediſti; I am loath to part from this father, and he is loath to be parted from, for he ſayes this in more then one place; Lord thou haſt enamoured mee, made me in love; let me enjoy that that I love; That is, the holy Ghoſt: That as I feele the power of God (which ſenſe, is a gift of the holy Ghoſt) I may without diſputing reſt in the beliefe of that perſon of the Trinity, that that Spirit of God, that moves upon theſe waters, is not only the power, but a perſon in the Godhead. A

Ferebatur. This is the perſon, without whom there is no Father, no Son of God to me, the holy Ghoſt. And his action, his operation is expreſſed in this word, Ferebatur, The Spirit of God moved; Which word, as before, is here alſo a comprehenſive word, and denotes both motion, and reſt; beginnings, and wayes, and ends. We may beſt conſider the motion, the ſtirring of the holy Ghoſt in zeale, and the reſt of the holy Ghoſt in moderation; If we be without zeale, we have not the motion; If we be without moderation, we have not the reſt, the peace of the holy Ghoſt. The moving of the holy Ghoſt upon me, is, as the moving of the minde of an Artificer, upon that piece of work that is then under his hand. A Jeweller, if he would make a jewell to anſwer the form of any flower, or any other figure, his minde goes along with his hand, nay prevents his hand, and he thinks in himſelf, a Ruby will conduce beſt to the expreſſing of this, and an Emeraud of this. The holy Ghoſt undertakes every man amongſt us, and would make every man fit for Gods ſervice, in ſome way, in ſome profeſſion; and the holy Ghoſt ſees, that one man profits moſt by one way, another by another, and moves their zeal to purſue thoſe wayes, and thoſe meanes, by which, in a rectified conſcience, they finde moſt profit. And except a man have this ſenſe, what doth him moſt good, and a deſire to purſue that, the holy Ghoſt doth not move, nor ſtir up a zeale in him. B C

But then if God do afford him the benefit of theſe his Ordinances, in a competent meaſure for him, and he will not be ſatisfied with Manna, but will needs have Quailes, that is, cannot make one meale of Prayers, except he have a Sermon, nor ſatisfied with his Gomer of Manna, (with thoſe Prayers which are appointed in the Church) nor ſatisfied with thoſe Quailes which God ſends, (the preaching of ſolid and fundamentall doctrines) but muſt have birds of Paradiſe, unrevealed myſteries out of Gods own boſome preached unto him, howſoever the holy Ghoſt may ſeem to have moved, yet he doth not reſt upon him; and from the beginning, the office and operation of the holy Ghoſt was double; He moved, and reſted upon the waters in the creation; he came, and tarried ſtill upon Chriſt in his Baptiſme: He moves us to a zeale of laying hold upon the meanes of ſalvation which God offers us in the Church; and he ſettles us in a peacefull conſcience, that by haying well uſed thoſe meanes, we are made his. A holy hunger and thirſt of the Word and Sacraments, a remorſe, and compunction for former ſins, a zeale to promove the cauſe, and glory of God, by word, and deed, this is the motion of the holy Ghoſt: And then, to content my ſelf with Gods meaſure of temporall bleſſings, and for ſpirituall, that I do ſerve God faithfully in that calling which I lawfully profeſſe, as far as that calling will admit, (for he, upon whoſe hand-labour the ſuſtentation of his family depends, may offend God in running after many working dayes Sermons) This peace of conſcience, this acquieſcence of having done that that belongs to me, this is the reſt of the Spirit of God. And this motion, and this reſt is ſaid to be done Super faciem, And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, which is our laſt conſideration. D E

Facies aquarum. In the moving of the Spirit of God upon the waters, we told you before, it was diſputed, whether the Holy Ghoſt did immediatly produce thoſe creatures of himſelfe, or whether he did fecundate, and inanimate, and inable thoſe ſubſtances, (the water, and all contained under the waters) to produce creatures in their divers ſpecifications. In this moving of the Spirit of God upon the waters, in our regeneration, it hath alſo been much diſputed, How the Holy Ghoſt works, in producing mans ſupernaturall actions; whether ſo immediately, as that it be altogether without dependance, or relation to any faculty in man, or man himſelfe have ſome concurrence, and co-operation therein. There

A we found, that in the first creation, God wrought otherwise for the production of creatures, then he does now; At first he did it immediatly, intirely, by himselfe; Now, he hath delegated, and substituted nature, and imprinted a naturall power in every thing to produce the like. So in the first act of mans Conversion, God may be conceived to work otherwise, then in his subsequent holy actions; for in the first, man cannot be conceived to doe any thing; in the rest he may: not that in the rest God does not all; but that God findes a better disposition, and soupleness, and maturity, and mellowing, to concurre with his motion in that man, who hath formerly been accustomed to a sense, and good use of his former graces, then in him, who in his first conversion, receives, but then, the first motions of his grace.

But yet, even in the first creation, the Spirit of God did not move upon that nothing, which was before God made heaven and earth: But he moved upon the waters; though B those waters had nothing in themselves, to answer his motion, yet he had waters to move upon: Though our faculties have nothing in themselves to answer the motions of the Spirit of God, yet upon our faculties the Spirit of God works; And as out of those waters, those creatures did proceed, though not from those waters, so out of our faculties, though not from our faculties, doe our good actions proceed too. All in all, is from the love of God; but there is something for God to love; There is a man, there is a soul in that man, there is a will in that soul; and God is in love with this man, and this soul, and this will, & would have it. Non amor ita egenus & indigus, ut rebus quas diligit subjiciatur, sayes S. Aug. Aug. excellently: The love of God to us is not so poore a love, as our love to one another; that his love to us should make him subject to us, as ours does to them whom we love; but Superfertur, sayes that Father, and our Text, he moves above us; He loves us, but with a Powerfull, a Majesticall, an Imperiall, a Commanding love; He offers those, whom he C makes his, his grace; but so, as he sometimes will not be denyed. So the Spirit moves spiritually upon the waters; He comes to the waters, to our naturall faculties; but he moves above those waters, He inclines, he governes, he commands those faculties; And this his motion, upon those waters, we may usefully consider, in some divers applications and assimilations of water, to man, and the divers uses thereof towards man. We will name but a few; Baptisme, and Sin, and Tribulation, and Death, are called in the Scripture, by that name, Waters; and we shall onely illustrate that consideration, how this Spirit of God, moves upon these Waters, Baptisme, Sin, Tribulation, and Death, and we have done.

The water of Baptisme, is the water that runs through all the Fathers; All the Fa- Baptismus. thers that had occasion to dive, or dip in these waters (to say any thing of them) make these first waters, in the Creation, the figure of baptisme. Therefore Tertullian makes the Tertul. water, Primam sedem Spiritus Sancti, The progresse, and the setled house, The voyage, D and the harbour, The circumference, and the centre of the Holy Ghost: And therefore S. Hierome calls these waters, Matrem Mundi, The Mother of the World; and this in Hieron. the figure of Baptisme. Nascentem Mundum in figura Baptismi parturiebat, The waters brought forth the whole World, were delivered of the whole World, as a Mother is delivered of a childe; and this, In figura Baptismi, To fore-shew, that the waters also should bring forth the Church; That the Church of God should be borne of the Sacrament of Baptisme: So sayes Damascen, And he establishes it with better authority Damasc. then his owne, Hoc Divinus asseruit Basilius, sayes he, This Divine Basil said, Hoc factum, Basil. quia per Spiritum Sanctum, & aquam voluit renovare hominem; The Spirit of God wrought upon the waters in the Creation, because he meant to doe so after, in the regeneration of man. And therefore Pristinam sedem recognoscens conquievit, Till the Holy Tertul. Ghost have moved upon our children in Baptisme, let us not think all done, that belongs E to those children; And when the Holy Ghost hath moved upon those waters, so, in Baptisme, let us not doubt of his power and effect upon all those children that dye so. We know no meanes how those waters could have produced a Menow, a Shrimp, without the Spirit of God had moved upon them; and by this motion of the Spirit of God, we know they produce Whales, and Leviathans. We know no ordinary meanes of any saving grace for a child, but Baptisme; neither are we to doubt of the fulnesse of salvation, in them that have received it. And for our selves, Mergimur, & emergimus, In Aug. Baptisme we are sunk under water, and then raised above the water againe; which was the manner of baptizing in the Christian Church, by immersion, and not by asperson, till of late times: Affectus, & amores, sayes he, our corrupt affections, and our inor- Idem. dinate dinate love of this world is that, that is to be drowned in us; Amor ſecuritatis, A love of peace, and holy aſſurance, and acquieſcence in Gods Ordinance, is that that lifts us above water. A

Therefore that Father puts all upon the due conſideration of our Baptiſme: And as Hier. S. Hierome ſayes, Certainly he that thinks upon the laſt Judgement adviſedly, cannot ſin
Aug. then, So he that ſayes with S. Auguſtine, Procede in confeſſione, fides mea, Let me make every day to God, this confeſſion, Domine Deus meus, Sancte, Sancte, Sancte Domine Deus meus, O Lord my God, O Holy, Holy, Holy Lord my God; In nomine tuo Baptizatus ſum, I conſider that I was baptized in thy name, and what thou promiſedſt me, and what I promiſed thee then, and can I ſin this ſin? can this ſin ſtand with thoſe conditions, thoſe ſtipulations which paſſed between us then? The Spirit of God is motion, the Spirit of God is reſt too; And in the due conſideration of Baptiſme, a true Chriſtian is moved, and ſetled too; moved to a ſenſe of the breach of his conditions, ſetled in the ſenſe of the Mercy of his God, in the Merits of his Chriſt, upon his godly ſorrow. So theſe waters B are the waters of Baptiſme.

Aqua peccatum. Apoc. 17. Aquin. Sin alſo is called by that name in the Scriptures, Water. The great whore ſitteth upon many waters; ſhe ſits upon them, as upon Egges, and hatches Cockatrices, venomous and ſtinging ſins; and yet pleaſing, though venomous; which is the worſt of ſin, that it deſtroyes, and yet delights; for though they be called waters, yet that is ſaid alſo, That the inhabitants of the earth were made drunk with the wine. Sin is wine at firſt, ſo farre as to
Ver. 2. allure, to intoxicate: It is water at laſt, ſo farre as to ſuffocate, to ſtrangle. Chriſt Jeſus way is to change water into wine; ſorrow into joy: The Devils way is to change wine into water; pleaſure, and but falſe pleaſure neither, into true bitterneſſe. The watriſh wine, which is ſpoken of there, and called fornication, is idolatry, and the like. And in
Jer. 2. 18. ſuch a reſpect, God ſayes to his people, What haſt thou to doe in the way of Egypt? In the C way of Egypt we cannot chuſe but have ſomething to doe; ſome converſation with men of an Idolatrous religion, we muſt needs have. But yet, What haſt thou to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke of the waters of Sihor? Or what haſt thou to doe in the wayes of Aſſyria, to drink the waters of the River? Though we be bound to a peaceable converſation with men of an Idolatrous perſwaſion, we are not bound to take in, to drink, to taſte their errours. For this facility, and this indifferency to accompany men of divers religions, in
Ver. 13. the acts of their religion, this multiplicity will end in a nullity, and we ſhall hew to our ſelves Ciſternes, broken Ciſternes, that can hold no water; We ſhall ſcatter one religion into many, and thoſe many ſhall vaniſh into none. Praiſe we God therefore, that the Spirit of God hath ſo moved upon theſe waters; theſe ſinfull waters of ſuperſtition and idolatry, wherein our fore-Fathers were overwhelmed; that they have not ſwelled over Eccluſ. 43. 20. us; For, then the cold North-winde blowes, and the water is congealed into Ice; Af- D fliction overtakes us, damps us, ſtupifies us, and we finde no Religion to comfort us.

Tribulatio. Eſay 43. 2. Affliction is as often expreſſed in this word, Waters, as ſin. When thou paſſeſt through waters I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they ſhall not overflow thee. But then, the Spirit of God moves upon theſe waters too; and grace againſt ſin, and deliverance from affliction, is as often expreſſed in waters, as either. Where God takes another Metaphore
Ezek. 36. 5. for judgement, yet he continues that of water for his mercy; In the fire of my jealouſie
Ver. 25. have I ſpoken againſt them, (ſpeaking of enemies; but then ſpeaking of Iſrael) I will ſprinkle cleane water upon you, and you ſhall be cleane. This is his way, and this is his meaſure; He ſprinkles enough at firſt to make us cleane; even the ſprinkling of Baptiſme cleanſes us from originall ſin; but then he ſets open the windowes of heaven, and he inlarges his Eſay 44. 3. Flood-gates, I will poure out water upon the thirſty, and floods upon the dry ground: To them that thirſt after him, he gives grace for grace; that is, preſent grace for an earneſt of E future grace; of ſubſequent grace, and concomitant grace, and auxiliant grace, and effectuall grace; grace in more formes, more notions, and in more operations, then the Schoole it ſelfe can tell how to name.

Mat. 14. Thus the Spirit of God moves upon our waters. By faith Peter walked upon the waters;
Acts 27. 43. ſo we prevent occaſions of tentation to ſin, and ſinke not in them, but walke above them. By godly exerciſes we ſwim through waters; ſo the Centurion commanded that they that could ſwim, ſhould caſt themſelves into the ſea; Men exerciſed in holineſſe, can meet a tentation, or tribulation in the face, and not be ſhaked with it; weaker men, men that cannot ſwim, muſt be more wary of expoſing themſelves to dangers of tentation;

A A Court does ſome man no harme, when another finds tentation in a Hermitage. By repentance we ſaile through waters, by the aſſiſtance of Gods ordinances in his Church, (which Church is the Arke) we attaine the harbour, peace of conſcience, after a ſin; But this Arke, this helpe of the Church we muſt have. God can ſave from dangers, though a man went to Sea without art, Sine rate, ſaies the Vulgat, without a Ship. But God would not that the worke of his Wiſedome ſhould be idle; God hath given man Prudentiam navifactivam, ſaies our Holkot upon that place, and he would have that wiſdome exerciſed. God can ſave without Preaching, and Abſolution, and Sacraments, but he would not have his Ordinance neglected. Wiſd. 14.4.

To end all with the end of all, Death comes to us in the name, and notion of waters too, in the Scriptures. The Widow of Tekoah ſaid to David in the behalfe of Abſalon, by the Counſaile of Ioab, The water of death overflowes all; We muſt needs dye, ſaies ſhe, B and are as water ſpilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up againe: yet God deviſes meanes, that his baniſhed, be not expelled from him. So the Spirit of God moves upon the face of theſe waters, the Spirit of life upon the danger of death. Conſider the love, more then love, the ſtudy, more then ſtudy, the diligence of God; he deviſes meanes, that his baniſhed, thoſe whom ſins, or death had baniſhed, be not expelled from him. I ſinned upon the ſtrength of my youth, and God deviſed a meanes to reclaime me, an enfeebling ſickneſſe. I relapſed after my recovery, and God deviſed a meanes, an irrecoverable, a helpleſs Conſumption to reclaime me; That affliction grew heavy upon me, and weighed me down even to a diffidence in Gods mercy, and God deviſed a meanes, the comfort of the Angel of his Church, his Miniſter, The comfort of the Angel of the great Counſell, the body and blood of his Son Chriſt Jeſus, at my tranſmigration. Yet he lets his correction proceed to death; I doe dye of that ſickneſſe, and God deviſes a meanes, that C I, though baniſhed, baniſhed into the grave, ſhall not be expelled from him, a glorious Reſurrection. We muſt needs dye and be as water ſpilt upon the ground, but yet God deviſes meanes, that his baniſhed ſhall not be expelled from him. Mors. 2 Sam. 14.14.

And this is the motion; and this is the Reſt of the Spirit of God upon thoſe waters in this ſpirituall ſenſe of theſe words, He brings us to a deſire of Baptiſme, he ſettles us in the ſenſe of the obligation firſt, and then of the benefits of Baptiſme. He ſuffers us to goe into the way of tentations, (for Coluber in via, and every calling hath particular tentations) and then he ſettles us, by his preventing, or his ſubſequent grace. He moves, in ſubmitting us to tribulation, he ſettles us in finding, that our tribulations, do beſt of all conforme us to his Son Chriſt Jeſus. He moves in removing us by the hand of Death, and he ſettles us in an aſſurance, That it is he that now lets his Servants depart in peace; And he, who as he doth preſently lay our ſoules in that ſafe Cabinet, the Boſome of Abraham, ſo he keepes an eye upon every graine, and atome of our duſt, whither ſoever it be blowne, and keepes a roome at his owne right hand for that body, when that D ſhall be re-united in a bleſſed Reſurrection; And ſo The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

1 COR. 12.3.

Alſo no man can ſay, that Ieſus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghoſt.

Iudg. 20.16. WE read that in the Tribe of Benjamin, which is, by interpretation Filius dextræ, The Son of the right hand, there were ſeven hundred left-handed Men, that could ſling ſtones at a haires breadth, and not faile. S. Paul was of that Tribe; and though he were from the beginning, in the purpoſe of God, Filius dextræ, A man ordained to be a dextrous Inſtrument of his glory, yet he was for a time a left-handed man, and tooke ſiniſter wayes, and in thoſe wayes, a good marke-man, a laborious and exquiſite perſecutor of Gods Church; And therefore it is, that Tertullian ſayes of him, Paulum mihi etiam Geneſis olim repromiſit, I had a promiſe of Paul Gen 49. in Moſes; Then, when Moſes ſaid, Iacob bleſſed Benjamin thus, Benjamin ſhall ravin as a Wolfe, In the morning he ſhall devoure the prey, and at night he ſhall divide the ſpoile, that is, At the beginning Paul ſhall ſcatter the flocke of Chriſt, but at laſt, he ſhall gather, and Acts 9.1. re-unite the Nations to his ſervice: As he had breathed threatnings, and ſlaughter againſt Chryſoſt. the Diſciples of the Lord, ſo he became Os orbi ſufficiens, A mouth loud enough for all the world to heare: And as he had drawne and ſucked the blood of Chriſts myſticall body, the Church, ſo, in that proportion that God enabled him to, he recompenſed that Coloſ. 1.24. damage, by effuſion of his owne blood, He fulfilled the ſufferings of Chriſt, in his fleſh, as himſelfe ſaies, to the Coloſsians; And then he bequeathed to all poſterity theſe Epiſtles, which are, as S. Auguſtine cals them, Vbera Eccleſiæ, The Paps, the Breaſts, the Udders Numb. 13.24. of the Church, And which are, as that cluſter of Grapes of the Land of Canaan, which was borne by two; for here, every couple, every paire, may have their load, Jew and Gentile, Learned and Ignorant, Man and Wife, Maſter and Servant, Father and Children, Prince and People, Counſaile and Client, how diſtinct ſoever they thinke their callings to be towards the world, yet here every paire muſt equally ſubmit their necks to this ſweet and eaſie yoake, of confeſſing Jeſus to be the Lord, and acknowledging that Confeſſion to proceed from the working of the Holy Ghoſt, for No man can ſay, that Ieſus is the Lord, without the Holy Ghoſt.

Diviſio. In which words, theſe ſhall be the three things, that we will conſider now; firſt, The generall impotency of man, in ſpirituall duties, Nemo poteſt, no man can do this, no man can doe any thing; ſecondly, How, and what thoſe ſpirituall duties are expreſſed to be, It is a profeſſion of Jeſus to be the Lord, to ſay it, to declare it; And thirdly, the meanes of repairing this naturall impotency, and rectifying this naturall obliquity in man, That man by the Holy Ghoſt may be enabled to do this ſpirituall duty, to profeſſe ſincerely Jeſus to be the Lord. In the firſt we ſhall ſee firſt, the univerſality of this flood, the generality of our loſſe in Adam, Nemo, none, not one, hath any, any power; which notes their blaſphemy, that exempt any perſon from the infection of ſin: And ſecondly, we ſhall ſee the impotency, the infirmity where it lies, It is in homine, no man; which notes their blaſphemy, that ſay, Man may be ſaved by his naturall faculties, as he is man: And thirdly, by juſt occaſion of that word, Poteſt, he can, he is able, we ſhall ſee alſo the lazineſſe of man, which, though he can doe nothing effectually and primarily, yet he does not ſo much as he might doe; And in thoſe three, we ſhall determine our firſt part. In the ſecond, what this ſpirituall duty, wherein we are all ſo impotent, is, It is firſt, an outward act, a profeſſion; not that an outward act is enough, but that the inward affection alone is not enough neither; To thinke it, to beleeve it, is not enough, but we muſt ſay it, profeſſe it: And what? why, firſt, That Jeſus is; not only aſſent to the hiſtory, and matter

A of fact, that Jeſus was, and did all that is reported, and recorded of him, but that he is ſtill that which he pretended to be; Ceſar is not Ceſar ſtill, nor Alexander, Alexander; But Jeſus is Jeſus ſtill, and ſhall be for ever. This we muſt profeſſe, That he is; And then, That he is the Lord; He was not ſent hither as the greateſt of the Prophets, nor as the greateſt of the Prieſts; His worke conſiſts not only in having preached to us, and inſtructed us, nor in having ſacrificed himſelfe, thereby to be an example to us, to walk in thoſe wayes after him; but he is Lord, he purchaſed a Dominion, he bought us with his Blood, He is Lord; And laſtly, he is The Lord, not only the Lord Paramount, the higheſt Lord, but The Lord, the only Lord, no other hath a Lordſhip in our ſoules, no other hath any part in the ſaving of them, but he: And ſo far we muſt neceſſarily enlarge our ſecond conſideration. And in the third part, which is, That this cannot be done but by the holy Ghoſt, we ſhall ſee, that in that But, is firſt implyed an excluſion of all means
B but one; And therefore that one muſt neceſſarily be hard to be compaſſed, The knowledge and diſcerning of the holy Ghoſt, is a difficult thing; And yet, as this But hath an excluſion of all meanes but one, ſo it hath an incluſion, an admiſſion, an allowance of that one, It is a neceſſary duty; nothing can effect it, but the having of the holy Ghoſt, and therefore the holy Ghoſt may be had: And in thoſe two points, The hardneſſe of it, And the poſſibility of it, will our laſt conſideration be employed.

For the firſt branch of the firſt part, The generality, that reaches to us all, and to us all over; to all our perſons, and to all our faculties; Perdidimus per peccatum, bonum poßibilitatis, ſayes S. Auguſtine, We have loſt our poſſeſſion, and our poſſibility of recovering, by Adams ſin. Adam at his beſt had but a poſſibility of ſtanding; we are fallen from that, and from all poſſibility of riſing by any power derived from him: We have not only by this fall broke our armes, or our legs, but our necks; not our ſelves, not a-
C ny other man can raiſe us; Every thing hath in it, as Phyſitians uſe to call it, Naturale Balſamum, A naturall Balſamum, which, if any wound or hurt which that creature hath received, be kept clean from extrinſique putrefaction, will heale of it ſelf. We are ſo far from that naturall Balſamum, as that we have a naturall poyſon in us, Originall ſin: for that, originall ſin, (as it hath relation to God, as all ſin is a violating of God) God being the God of mercy, and the God of life, becauſe it deprives us of both thoſe, of mercy, and of life, in oppoſition to mercy, it is called anger and wrath (We are all by nature the children of wrath) And in oppoſition to life, it is called death, Death enters by ſin, and death is gone over all men; And as originall ſin hath relation to our ſouls, It is called that indeleble foulneſſe, and uncleanneſſe which God diſcovers in us all, (Though thou waſh thee with nitre, and take thee much ſope, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, ſaith the Lord) And which every man findes in himſelf, as Iob did, If I waſh my ſelf in Snow-water, and purge
D my hands never ſo cleane, yet mine own clothes ſhall make me filthy. As it hath relation to our bodies, ſo it is not only called Lex carnis, A law which the fleſh cannot diſobey. And Lex in membris, A law written and imprinted naturally in our bodies, and inſeparably inherent there, but it is a law that hath got Poſſe comitatus, All our ſtrength, and munition into her own hands, all our powers, and faculties to execute her purpoſes againſt us, and (as the Apoſtle expreſſes it fully) Hath force in our members, to bring forth fruits unto death.

Conſider our originall weakneſſe, as God lookes upon it, ſo it is inexcuſable ſin; conſider it, as our ſoules ſuffer by it, ſo it is an indeleble foulneſſe; conſider it as our bodies contribute to it, and harbour it, and retain it, and ſo it is an unquenchable fire, and a brand of hell it ſelf; It hath baniſhed me out of my ſelf, It is no more I that do any thing, but ſin that dwelleth in me: It doth not only dwell, but reign in theſe mortall bodies; not only reign, but tyrannize, and lead us captives under the law of ſin, which is in our members. So
E that we have utterly loſt Bonum poßibilitatis, for as men, we are out of all poſſibility, not only of that victorious, and triumphant gratulation and acclamation to our ſelves, as for a delivery, I thank God through Ieſus Chriſt, but we cannot come to that ſenſe of our miſery, as to cry out in the Apoſtles words, immediately preceding, O wretched man that I am, who ſhall deliver me from the body of this death?

Now as this death hath invaded every part and faculty of man, underſtanding, and will, and all, (for though originall ſin ſeem to be contracted without our will, yet Sicut omnium natura, ita omnium voluntates fuere originaliter in Adam, ſayes S. Auguſtine, As the whole nature of mankinde, and ſo of every particular man, was in Adam, ſo alſo were the faculties, and ſo the will of every particular man in him) ſo this death hath invaded every particular man; Death went over all men, for as much as all men had ſinned. And therefore they that do blaſphemouſly exempt ſome perſons from ſin, they ſet them not above the Law, but without the Law: They out-law them, in taking from them the benefit of the new Law, the Goſpel, and of the author of that Law, Chriſt Jeſus, who came a Phyſitian to the ſick, and was ſent only to ſave ſinners; for them that are none, it is well that they need no Redeemer, for if they did, they could have no part in ours, for he came only to redeem ſinners, and they are none. God brought his Son out of Ægypt, not out of Goſhen in Ægypt; not out of a priviledged place in Ægypt, but out of Ægypt; God brought his Son Chriſt Jeſus out of the Virgin Mary without ſin, but he brought not her ſo, out of her mother. If they might be beleeved that the bleſſed Virgin, and Iohn Baptiſt, and the Prophet Ieremy were without all ſin, they would goe about at laſt to make us beleeve, that Ignatius were ſo too. For us, in the higheſt of our ſanctification, ſtill let us preſſe with that, Dimitte nobis debita noſtra, O Lord forgive us our treſpaſſes, and confeſſe that we needed forgiveneſſe, even for the ſins which we have not done; Dimiſſa fateor, & quæ mea ſponte feci, & quæ te duce, non feci, ſayes S. Auguſtine, I confeſſe I need thy mercy, both for the ſins which I have done, and for thoſe, which if thy grace had not reſtrained me, I ſhould have done. And therefore if another think he hath ſcaped thoſe ſins that I have committed, Non me derideat ab eo medico ægrum ſanari, à quoei præſtitum ne ægrotaret; Let him not deſpiſe me, who am recovered, ſince it is the ſame phyſitian who hath wrought upon us both, though by a diverſe method, for he hath preſerved him, and he hath recovered me: for, for himſelfe, we ſay ſtill with the ſame Father, Perdiderat bonum poſſibilitatis, As well he as I, had loſt all poſſibility of ſtanding, or riſing after our fall.

Auguſt.

This was our firſt branch, The univerſall impotency; And our ſecond is, That this is In homine, In man, no man (as man) can make this profeſſion, That Ieſus is the Lord: and therefore, we conſider firſt, wherein, and how far man is diſabled. In every Age, ſome men have attributed to the power of nature, more then a naturall man can doe, and yet no man doth ſo much as a naturall man might doe. For the over-valuing of nature, and her power, there are impreſſions in the Fathers themſelves, which (whether miſ-underſtood by the Readers, or by the Authors) have led and prevailed much. When Iuſtin Martyr ſayes, Ratio pro fide Græcis & Barbaris, That rectified reaſon did the ſame office in the Gentiles, as faith did in the Chriſtians; when Clement ſayes, Philoſophia per ſeſe juſtificavit Græcos, That the Gentiles to whom the Law and Goſpell was not communicated, were juſtified by their Philoſophy; when Chryſoſtome ſayes, Satis fuit Gentibus abſtinuiſſe ab Idololatria, It was ſufficient for the Gentiles, if they did not worſhip falſe gods, though they underſtood not the true; when S. Auguſtine ſayes, Rectè facis, nihil quærere ampliùs, quàm quod docet ratio, He doth well that ſeeks no farther, then his reaſon leads them, theſe impreſſions in the Fathers have tranſported later men farther; ſo far, as that Andradius in the Romane Church, ſaves all honeſt Philoſophers, that lived morally well without Chriſt: And Toſtatus takes all impediments out of their way, That originall ſin is abſolutely remitted to them, In prima bona operatione in charitate, In their firſt good morall work that they do. So that they are in an eaſier way then we, who are but Chriſtians; for in the opinion of Toſtatus himſelfe, and that whole Church, we cannot be delivered from originall ſin, but by baptiſme; nothing leſſe then a Sacrament would deliver us from originall ſin, and any good worke ſhall deliver any of the Gentiles ſo diſpoſed.

Quid homo poteſt.

In all ages, in all Churches, there have been men, who have been Ingrati gratiæ, as S. Auguſtine calls them, that have been unthankfull to the grace of God, and attributed that to nature, which belonged to grace. But we have an univerſall concluſion, God hath made of one blood all mankinde, And no man can adopt himſelfe into the family of God; man is excluded, and all power in man, and all aſſiſtance from man; neither your owne reaſon, nor the reaſon of your Maſters, whom you relie upon, can raiſe you to this knowledge: for, Ægyptus homo, non Deus, The Egyptians are men, and not Gods, and their horſes are fleſh, and not ſpirit; and when the Lord ſhall ſtretch out his hand, the helper ſhall fall, and he that is holpen ſhall fall, and they ſhall fall together. The Atheiſt and all his Philoſophy, Helper and hee that is Holpen, Horſe and Man, Nature and Art, Reaſon mounted and advanced upon Learning, ſhall never be able to leap over, or breake thorough this wall, No man, no naturall man can doe any thing towards a ſupernaturall work.

Act. 17. 26.

Eſay 31. 3.

Quid homo facit.

This was our ſecond Branch, That too much is ordinarily attributed by man to man,

And

A And our third is, That too little is done by any man, and that is worſe then the other. When Nebuchadnezzar had made his Image of gold of ſixtie Cubits, it had been a madneſſe in him, not to have celebrated the Dedication thereof, with all the pomp, and ſolemnity that he did: To have gone ſo farre, and not to have made it ſerve his farther uſes, had been a ſtrange impertinence. So is it a ſtrange contemplation, to ſee a man ſet up a golden Image, to attribute even Divinity to our nature, and to imagine it to be able to doe, whatſoever the grace of God can doe, and yet with this Angelicall nature, with this celeſtiall ſoule, to contribute leſſe to the glory of God, then an Ant, or a plant, or a ſtone. As the counſell of the Philoſopher Epictetus directs thee, if thou take any new action in hand, conſider what Socrates would doe in that caſe; that is, diſpoſe thy ſelfe therein, according to the example, and precedent of ſome wiſe man: So if thou wilt take this new action in hand, (that which is new, but ſhould be ordinary unto thee) if
B thou wilt take a view of thy ſins that are paſt, doe but conſider, if ever thou didſt any ſin, which Socrates, or Seneca would not have forborne. And whatſoever thou ſeeſt another can doe, by the power of that reaſon, and that perſwaſion which thou art able to miniſter, who art not able to infuſe faith, nor inſpire grace into him, but muſt work by thy reaſon, and upon his reaſon, why ſhouldeſt not thou be as powerfull upon thy ſelfe, and as ſtrong in thine owne behalfe, and obey that counſell from thy ſelfe, which thou thinkeſt another man mad, if he doe not obey, when thou giveſt it? Why ſhouldeſt thou pretend Reaſon, why another ſhould forbeare any particular ſin, and not preſent that Reaſon to thy ſelfe, or not obey it? To love the Scriptures of God better then any other booke; to love the houſe of God better then any other Court; to love the Communion of Saints better then any other Converſation; to ſtudy to know the revealed will of God, rather then the ſecrets of any Princes; to conſider the direct purpoſes of God againſt his
C enemies, rather then the ſiniſter ſupplantations of pretenders to places in Court; briefly to Reade, to Heare, to Beleeve the Bible, is a worke within the ability of nature, within the power of a morall man.

He that attributes more to nature, he that allowes her any ability of diſpoſing her ſelfe before hand, without prevention of grace, or concurrence and co-operation after, without continuall aſſiſtance of particular graces, he ſets upan Idoll, and magnifies nature beyond that which appertaines unto her. But he that goes not ſo farre as this, That the reaſon of man, and his naturall faculties, are the Inſtruments and Organs that God works in by his grace, howſoever he may in diſcourſe and in argument exalt nature, howſoever he may ſo give too much to her, yet he does not ſo much with her, as he might doe: He hath made her a Giant, and then, as though he were afraid of her, hee runs away from her: He will not doe that which is in his power, and yet he thinks it is in his power to
D repent when he liſts, and when he liſts to apply the merits of Chriſt to himſelfe, and to doe all thoſe duties which are implyed in our next Part, To ſay that Ieſus is the Lord.

In this, our firſt duty is an outward act, Dicere, to profeſſe Chriſt Jeſus. Non erubeſco, ſayes S. Paul, I am not aſhamed of the Goſpel of Chriſt Ieſus, for it is the power of God unto ſalvation: And, Qui erubuerit, ſayes Chriſt, Whoſoever ſhall be aſhamed of me, and of my word, of him ſhall the Son of Man be aſhamed, when he ſhall come in glory. This is a neceſſary duty, but is it the duty of this place? for here it is not non vult, but non poteſt; not that he is loath to profeſſe Jeſus, but that he is not able to doe it. We ſee that ſome could ſay that, and ſay it aloud, preach it, and yet without the Holy Ghoſt; Some (ſayes the Apoſtle) preach Chriſt through envy and ſtrife, ſuppoſing to adde more afflictions unto my bands. Which may well be, that ſome Jews and Gentiles, to exaſperate the State againſt
E Paul, fained themſelves alſo to be converted to his religion, becauſe when they had made him odious by drawing off others, they who pretended to have been drawen by him, could alwayes ſave themſelves with recanting, and renouncing their new profeſſion: So they could ſay Dominum Ieſum, That Ieſus was the Lord, and never meane it. And of thoſe twelve whom Chriſt choſe to preach, Iudas was one, of whom Chriſt ſayes, Have I not choſen you twelve, and one of you is a devill? So that this devill Iudas, and that devill that made him a devill, the devill himſelf, could ſay as much as this, Ieſus I know, and Paul I know; They ſaid it, they cryed it, Thou art the Chriſt, the Son of God, and that inceſſantly, Till Ieſus rebuked them, and ſuffered them not to ſay, That they knew him to be The Chriſt.

2. Part. Dicere. Rom. 1. 16. Luke 9. 26.

Philem. 15.

John 6. 70.

Acts 19. 15. Luke 4. 41.

But beſides that, even this confeſſing of Chriſt, is not Sine omni impulſu Spiritus ſancti,

Altogether without any motion of the holy Ghoſt (for the holy Ghoſt, even in theſe caſes, had a purpoſe to draw teſtimonies for Chriſt, out of the mouthes of his adverſaries) this is not the profeſſing required here; When Tiberius had a purpoſe to canonize Chriſt Jeſus, and to admit him into the number of the Romane Gods, and to make him beholden to him for that honour, he therefore propoſed it to the Senate, that ſo that honour, which Jeſus ſhould have, might bee derived from him; And when the Senate had an inclination of themſelves to have done Chriſt that honour, but yet forbore it, becauſe the intimation came not from themſelves, but from the Emperour, who ſtill wrought and gained upon their priviledges; neither of theſe, though they meant collaterally and obliquely to doe Chriſt an honour, neither of them did ſay Ieſum Dominum, that is, profeſſe Jeſus, ſo as is intended here, for they had their owne ends, and their own honors principally in Contemplation. A

There is firſt an open profeſſion of the tongue required; And therefore the Holy Ghoſt deſcended in fiery tongues, Et lingua propria Spiritui Sancto, ſayes S. Gregory, The tongue is the fitteſt Inſtrument for the Holy Ghoſt to worke upon, and to worke by; Qui magnam habet cognationem cum Verbo, ſayes he, The Son of God is the Word, and the Holy Ghoſt proceeds from him, And becauſe that faith that unites us to God, is expreſſed in the tongue, howſoever the heart be the center in which the Holy Ghoſt reſts, the tongue is the Spheare, in which he moves: And therefore, ſayes S. Cyril, as God ſet the Cherubim with a fiery ſword, to keep us out of Paradiſe, ſo he hath ſet the Holy Ghoſt in fiery tongues to let us in againe. As long as John Baptiſt was unborne, Zachary was dumbe; when hee was borne, Zachary ſpoke; Chriſt is not borne in us, we are not regenerate in him, if we delight not to ſpeake of his wondrous mercyes, and infinite goodneſſe to the ſons of men; as ſoone as he is borne in us, his Spirit ſpeakes in us, and by us; in which, our firſt profeſſion is Ieſum eſſe, That Jeſus is, That there is a Jeſus. B C

Ieſus; Eſay 4.2. This is to profeſſe with Eſay, That he is Germen Iehovæ, The Bud of the Lord, The Bloſſome of God himſelfe; for this Profeſſion is a two-edged ſword; for it wounds the Arians on one ſide, That Jeſus is Jehovah, (becauſe that is the name that ſignifies the very Eſſence of God) And then it wounds the Jews on the other ſide, becauſe if Jeſus be Germen Iehovæ, The Bud, the Bloſſome, the Off-ſpring of God, then there is a plurality of Perſons, Father and Son in the God-head. So that it is a Compendiary and Summary Abridgement, and Catechiſme of all our Religion, to profeſſe that Jeſus is, for that is a profeſſion of his everlaſting Eſſence, that is, his God-head. It hath been denyed that he was ſuch as he was pretended to be, that is, borne of a Virgin; for the firſt Heretiques of all, Gerinthus, and Ebion, who occaſioned S. Johns Goſpel, affirmed him to be a meere man, made by ordinary generation, between Ioſeph and Mary. It hath been denyed, that he was ſuch a man, as thoſe Heretiques allowed him to bee, for Apelles his Hereſie was, That he made himſelfe a Body out of the Elements, as hee came downe from Heaven, through them. It hath been denyed, that he had any Body at all; Cerdon and Marcion ſaid, That he lived and dyed, but in Phantaſmate, in apparance, and onely in a forme and ſhape of a Body aſſumed; but, in truth, no Body, that did live or dye, but did onely appeare, and vaniſh. It hath beene denyed that that Body which hee had, though a true and a naturall Body did ſuffer, for Baſilides ſaid, That when he was led to Execution, and that on the way, the Croſſe was laid upon Simon of Cyren, Chriſt caſt a miſt before their eyes, by which they tooke Simon for him, and crucified Simon, Chriſt having withdrawne himſelfe inviſibly from them, as at other times he had done. It hath been denyed, (though he had a true Body, and ſuffered truly therein) that he hath any Body now in Heaven, or ſhall returne with any, for hee that ſaid hee made his Body of the Elements as hee came downe from Heaven, ſayes alſo that hee reſolved that Body into thoſe Elements againe, at his returne. It hath beene denyed, That hee was, That he is, That he ſhall be; but this Profeſſion, that Jeſus is, includes all, for, He of whom that is alwayes true, Eſt, He is, He is Eternall, and He that is Eternall, is God: This is therefore a Profeſſion of the God-head of Chriſt Jeſus. D E

Dominus; A Lord. Now, in the next, as we profeſſe him to be Dominus, A Lord, we profeſſe him to be God and man, we behold him as he is a mixt perſon, and ſo made fit to be the Meſſias, the Anointed high Prieſt, King of that Church, which he hath purchaſed with his blood, And the anointed King of that Kingdome which he hath conquered with his Croſſe.

As

A As he is Germen Iehovæ, The off-ſpring of Jehovah, ſo he muſt neceſſarily be Jehovah, & that is the name, which is evermore tranſlated The Lord; So alſo as he is Jehovah, which is the fountaine of all Eſſence and of all Beeing, ſo he is Lord, by his intereſt, and his concurrence, in our Creation; It is a devoute exerciſe of the ſoule, to conſider, how abſolute a Lord he is, by this Title of Creation. If the King give a man a Creation by a new Title, the King found before in that man, ſome vertuous and fit diſpoſition, ſome preparation, ſome object, ſome ſubject of his favour. The King gives Creations to men, whom the Univerſities, or other Societies had prepared; They Created perſons whom other lower Schooles had prepared; At loweſt, he that deales upon him firſt, finds a man, begotten and prepared by Parents, upon whom he may worke. But remember thy Creator, that called thee, when thou waſt not, as though thou hadſt beene, and brought thee out of nothing; which is a condition (if we may call it a condition, to be nothing, not to be) farther removed from Heaven, then hell it ſelfe: Who is the Lord of life, and breathed this life into thee, and ſweares by that eternall life, which he is, that he would have this life of thine immortall, As I live, ſaith the Lord, I would not the death of a ſinner.

B

This Contemplation of Jeſus, as a Lord, by Creating us, is a devout, and an humble Contemplation, but to contemplate him as Lord by Redeeming us, and breeding us in a Church, where that Redemption is applied to us, this is a devout, and a glorious Contemplation. As he is Lord over that which his Father gave him, (his Father gave him all power in Heaven and in earth, and Omne Indicium, His Father put all Judgement into his hands, all judiciary and all military power was his; He was Lord Judge, and Lord of Hoſts) As he is Lord over his owne purchaſe, Quod acquiſivit ſanguine, That Church which he purchaſed with his owne blood: So he is more then the Heretiques of our time have made him, That he was but ſent as a principall Prophet to explaine the Law, and make that cleare to us in a Goſpel; Or as a Prieſt, to ſacrifice himſelfe, but not for a Ranſome, not for a Satisfaction, but onely for a lively example, thereby to incline us to ſuffer for Gods glory, and for the edification of one another. If we call him Dominum, A Lord, we call him Meſsiam, Unctum, Regem, anointed with the oyle of gladneſſe by the Holy Ghoſt, to bee a cheerefull conquerour of the world, and the grave, and ſin, and hell, and anointed in his owne blood, to be a Lord in the adminiſtration of that Church, which he hath ſo purchaſed. This is to ſay that Jeſus is a Lord; To profeſſe that he is a perſon ſo qualified, in his being compoſed of God and Man, that he was able to give ſufficient for the whole world, and did give it, and ſo is Lord of it.

C

When we ſay Ieſus eſt, That Jeſus is, There we confeſſe his eternity, and therein, his Godhead: when we ſay Ieſus Dominus, that he is a Lord, therein we confeſſe a dominion which he hath purchaſed; And when we ſay Ieſum Dominum, ſo, as that we profeſſe him to be the Lord, Then we confeſſe a vigilancy, a ſuperintendency, a reſidence, and a permanency of Chriſt, in his Dominion, in his Church, to the worlds end. If he be the Lord, in his Church, there is no other that rules with him, there is no other that rules for him. The temporall Magiſtrate is not ſo Lord, as that Chriſt and he are Collegues, or fellow-Conſuls, that if he command againſt Chriſt, he ſhould be as ſoone obeyed as Chriſt; for a Magiſtrate is a Lord, and Chriſt is the Lord, a Magiſtrate is a Lord to us, but Chriſt is the Lord to him, and to us, and to all, None rules with him, none rules for him; Chriſt needs no Vicar, he is no non-reſident; He is nearer to all particular Churches at Gods right hand, then the Biſhop of Rome, at his left. Direct lines, direct beames doe alwaies warme better, and produce their effects more powerfully, then oblique beames doe; The influence of Chriſt Jeſus directly from Heaven upon the Church, hath a truer operation, then the oblique and collaterall reflections from Rome: Chriſt is not ſo far off, by being above the Clouds, as the Biſhop of Rome is, by being beyond the Hils. Dicimus Dominum Ieſum, we ſay that Jeſus is the Lord, and we refuſe all power upon earth, that will be Lord with him, as though he needed a Coadjutor, or Lord for him, as though he were abſent from us.

Dominus. The Lord.

To conclude this ſecond part, To ſay that Ieſus is the Lord, is to confeſſe him to bee God from everlaſting, and to have beene made man in the fulneſſe of time, and to governe ſtill that Church, which he hath purchaſed with his blood, and that therefore hee lookes that we direct all our particular actions to his glory. For this voice, wherein thou ſaieſt Dominus Ieſus, The Lord Ieſus, muſt be, as the voyce of the Seraphim in Eſay, thrice repeated, repeated, Sanctus, ſanctus, ſanctus, Holy, holy, holy; our hearts muſt ſay it, and our tongue, and our hands too, or elſe we have not ſaid it. For when a man will make Jeſus his companion, and be ſometimes with him, and ſometimes with the world, and not direct all things principally towards him; when he will make Jeſus his ſervant, that is, proceed in all things, upon the ſtrength of his outward profeſſion, upon the colour, and pretence, and advantage of Religion, and devotion, would this man be thought to have ſaid Ieſum Dominum, That Ieſus is the Lord? Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and doe not the things I ſpeake to you? ſaies Chriſt; Chriſt places a tongue in the hands; Actions ſpeake; and Omni tuba clarior per opera Demonſtratio, ſayes S. Chryſoſtome, There is not onely a tongue, but a Trumpet, in every good worke. When Chriſt ſees a diſpoſition in his hearers, to doe according unto their profeſſing, then only he gives allowance to that that they ſay, Diciti me Dominum, & bene dicitis, You call me Lord, and you doe well in doing ſo, doe ye therefore, as I have done to you. To call him Lord, is to contemplate his Kingdome of power, to feele his Kingdome of grace, to wiſh his Kingdome of glory. It is not a Domine uſque quò, Lord how long before the Conſummation come, as though we were weary of our warfare: It not a Domine ſi fuiſſes, Lord if thou hadſt beene here, our brother had not died, as Martha ſaid of Lazarus, as though, as ſoon as we ſuffer any worldly calamity, we ſhould thinke Chriſt to be abſent from us, in his power, or in his care of us; It is not a Domine vis mandemus, Lord wilt thou that we command fire from Heaven to conſume theſe Samaritans, as though we would ſerve the Lord no longer, then he would revenge his owne and our quarrel; for, (that we may come to our laſt part) to that fiery queſtion of the Apoſtles, Chriſt anſwered, You know not of what ſpirit you are; It is not the Spirit of God, it is not the Holy Ghoſt, which makes you call Jeſus the Lord onely to ſerve your own ends, and purpoſes; and No man can ſay, that Ieſus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghoſt.

Luke 6.46. Iohn 13.14. Iohn 11.21. Luke 9.54.

For this Part, we propoſed onely two Conſiderations, firſt that this But, excluding all meanes but one, that one muſt therefore neceſſarily be difficult, and ſecondly that that But, admitting one meanes, that one muſt therefore neceſſarily be poſſible; ſo that there is a difficulty, but yet a poſſibility in having this working by the Holy Ghoſt. For the firſt, of thoſe hereticall words of Fauſtus the Manichean, That in the Trinity, the Father dwelt In illa luce inacceſsibili, In that light which none can attaine to, And the Son of God dwelt in this created light, whoſe fountaine and roote is the Planet of the Sun, And the Holy Ghoſt dwelt in the Aire, and other parts illumined by the Sun, we may make this good uſe, that for the knowledge of the Holy Ghoſt, wee have not ſo preſent, ſo evident light in reaſon, as for the knowledge of the other bleſſed Perſons of the glorious Trinity. For, for the Son, becauſe he aſſumed our nature, and lived and dyed with us, we conceive certaine bodily impreſſions, and notions of him; and then naturally, and neceſſarily, as ſoon as we heare of a Son, we conceive a Father too. But the knowledge of the Holy Ghoſt is not ſo evident, neither doe we bend our thoughts upon the conſideration of the Holy Ghoſt, ſo much as we ought to doe. The Arians enwrapped him in double clouds of darkneſſe, when they called him Creaturam Creaturæ; That Chriſt himſelfe, from whom (ſay they) the Holy Ghoſt had his Creation, was but a Creature, and not God, and ſo the Holy Ghoſt, the Creature of a Creature. And Maximus ille Gigas, (as Saint Bernard cals Plato) That Giant in all kinde of Learning, Plato, never ſtopped at any knowledge, till he came to conſider the holy Ghoſt: Vnum inveni, quod cuncta operatur, I have (ſaies Plato) found One, who made all things; Et unum per quod cuncta efficiuntur, And I have found another, by whom all things were made; Tertium autem non potui invenire, A Third, beſides thoſe two, I could never finde.

Though all the myſteries of the Trinity be things equally eaſie to faith, when God infuſes that, yet to our reaſon, (even as reaſon ſerves faith, and preſents things to that) things are not ſo equall, but that S. Baſil himſelfe ſaw, that the eternall generation of the Son, was too hard for Reaſon; but yet it is in the proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt, that he clearely profeſſes his ignorance: Si cuncta putarem noſtra cogitatione poſſe comprehendi, vererer fortè ignorantiam profiteri, If I thought that all things might bee knowne by man, I ſhould bee as much afraid, and aſhamed, as another man, to be ignorant; but, ſaies he, ſince we all ſee, that there are many things whereof we are ignorant, Cur non de Spiritu ſancto, abſq; rubore, ignorantiam fatear? Why ſhould I be aſhamed to confeſſe mine ignorance in many things concerning the Holy Ghoſt?

There

Possibilitas.

There is then a difficulty, no leſſe then an impoſſibility, in ſearching after the Holy Ghoſt, but it is in thoſe things which appertain not to us; But in others, there is a poſſibility, a facility and eaſineſſe. For, there are two proceſſions of the holy Ghoſt, Æterna, and Temporaria, his proceeding from the Father, and the Son, and his proceeding into us. The firſt we ſhall never underſtand, if we reade all the books of the world, The other we ſhall not chooſe but underſtand, if we ſtudy our own conſciences. In the firſt, the darkneſſe, and difficulty is recompenced in this, That though it be hard to finde any thing, yet it is but little that we are to ſeek; It is only to finde that there is a holy Ghoſt, proceeding from Father, and Son; for in ſearching farther, the danger is noted by S. Baſil, to be thus great, Qui quomodo interrogas, & ubi ut in loco, & quando ut in tempore, interrogabis; If thou give thy curioſity the liberty to ask How the holy Ghoſt proceeded, thou wilt ask where it was done, as though there were ſeverall roomes, and diſtinct places, in that which is infinite, And thou wilt ask when it was done, as though there were pieces of time, in that which is eternall: Et quares, non ut fidem, ſed ut infidelitatem invenias, (which is excellently added by that Father) The end of thy enquiring will not be, that thou mighteſt finde any thing to eſtabliſh thy beliefe, but to finde ſomething that might excuſe thine unbeliefe; All thy curious queſtions are not in hope that thou ſhalt receive ſatisfaction, but in hope that the weakneſſe of the anſwer may juſtifie thy infidelity.

Thus it is, if we will be over curious in the firſt, the eternall proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt. In the other, the proceeding of the holy Ghoſt into us, we are to conſider, that as in our naturall perſons, the body and ſoul do not make a perfect man, except they be united, except our ſpirits (which are the active part of the blood) do fit this body, and ſoule for one anothers working; So, though the body of our religion may ſeem to be determined in theſe two, our Creation, which is commonly attributed to the Father, Tanquam fonti Deitatis, As the fountaine of the Godhead, (for Chriſt is God of God) And our Redemption, which belongs to the Son, yet for this body there is a ſpirit, that is, the holy Ghoſt, that takes this man, upon whom the Father hath wrought by Creation, and the Son included within his Redemption, and he works in him a Vocation, a Juſtification, and a ſanctification, and leads him from that Eſſe, which the Father gave him in the Creation, And that Bene eſſe which he hath in being admitted into the body of his Son, the viſible Church, and Congregation, to an Optimè eſſe, to that perfection, which is an aſſurance of the inhabitation of this Spirit in him, and an inchoation of eternall bleſſedneſſe here, by a heavenly and ſanctified converſation, without which Spirit No man can ſay, that Ieſus is the Lord, becauſe he is not otherwiſe in a perfect obedience to him, if he embrace not the means ordained by him in his Church.

So that this Spirit diſpoſes, and diſpenſes, diſtributes, and diſperſes, and orders all the power of the Father, and all the wiſdome of the Son, and all the graces of God. It is a Center to all; So S. Bernard ſayes upon thoſe words of the Apoſtle, We approve our ſelves as the Miniſters of God; But by what? By watching, by faſting, by ſuffering, by the holy Ghoſt, by love unfained. Vide, tanquam omnia ordinantem, quomodo in medio virtutum, ſicut cor in medio corporis, conſtituit Spiritum Sanctum: As the heart is in the midſt of the body, ſo between theſe vertues of faſting and ſuffering before, and love unfained after, the Apoſtle places the holy Ghoſt, who only gives life and ſoule to all Morall, and all Theologicall vertues. And as S. Bernard obſerves that in particular men, ſo doth S. Auguſtine of the whole Church; Quod in corpore noſtro anima, id in corpore Chriſti, Eccleſia, Spiritus Sanctus; That office which the ſoule performes to our body, the holy Ghoſt performes in the body of Chriſt, which is the Church.

And therefore ſince the holy Ghoſt is thus neceſſary, and thus neare, as at the Creation the whole Trinity was intimated in that plurall word, Elohim, creavit Dii, but no perſon of the Trinity is diſtinctly named in the Creation, but the holy Ghoſt, The Spirit of God moved upon the waters, As the holy Ghoſt was firſt conveyed to our knowledge in the Creation, ſo in our Regeneration, by which we are new creatures, though our Creation, and our Redemption be religious ſubjects of our continuall meditation, yet let us be ſure to hold this that is neareſt us, to keep a neare, a familiar, and daily acquaintance, and converſation with the holy Ghoſt, and to be watchfull to cheriſh his light, and working in us. Homines docent quærere, ſolus ipſe, qui docet invenire, habere, frui; Men can teach us wayes how to finde ſomethings; The Pilot how to finde a Land, The Aſtronomer nomer how to finde a Star; Men can teach us wayes how to finde God, The naturall man in the book of creatures, The Morall man in an exemplar life, The Jew in the Law, The Christian in generall in the Gospell, But Solus ipse, qui docet invenire, habere, frui, Only the holy Ghost enables us to finde God so, as to make him ours, and to enjoy him. First you must get more light then nature gives, for, The naturall man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit: When that light is so mended, that you have some sparkes of faith, you must also leave the works of the flesh, For, Fleshly men have not the Spirit: When the Spirit offers it self in approaches, Resist it not, as Stephen accuses them to have done, Act. 7. When it hath prevailed, and sealed you to God, Grieve not the holy Spirit, by whom ye are sealed unto Redemption. For this preventing the Spirit, by trusting to nature, and morality, this infecting the Spirit, by living ill in a good profession, this grieving of the Spirit, by neglecting his operations, induces the last desperate work of Quenching the Spirit, which is a smothering, a suffocating of that light, by a finall obduration.

1 Cor. 2. 14. Iud. 19. Ephes. 4. 30. 1 Thes. 5.

Spiritus ubi vult spirat, sayes our Saviour Christ; which S. Augustine, (and indeed most of the Fathers) interpret of the holy Ghost, and not of the winde, though it may also properly enough admit that interpretation too. But The holy Ghost, sayes he, breathes where it pleases him; Et vocem ejus audis, sayes Christ, You heare the voice of the holy Ghost; for, (sayes S. Augustine upon those words of Christ) Sonat psalmus, vox est Spiritus sancti, When you heare a Psalme sung, you heare the voice of the holy Ghost; Sonat Euangelium, sonat sermo Divinus, You heare the Gospell read, you heare a Sermon preached, still you heare the voice of the holy Ghost; And yet, as Christ sayes in that place, Nescis unde venit, Thou knowest not from whence that voice comes, Thou canst finde nothing in thy self, why the holy Ghost should delight to entertain thee, and hold discourse with thee, in so familiar, and so frequent, and so importunate a speaking to thee; Nescis unde venit, Thou knowest not from whence all this goodnesse comes, but meerly from his goodness; So also, as Christ adds there, Nescis quò vadat, Thou knowest not whither it goes, how long it will last and goe with thee. If thou carry him to darke and foule corners, if thou carry him back to those sins, of which, since he began to speake to thee, at this time, thou hast felt some remorse, some detestation, he will not goe with thee, he will give thee over. But as long as he, The Spirit of God, by your cherishing of him, staies with you, when Jesus shall say to you, (in your consciences) Quid vos dicitis? Whom doe you say that I am? You can say Iesus Dominus, We say, we professe, That thou art Iesus, and that Iesus is the Lord: If he proceed, Si Dominus, ubi timor? If I be Lord, where is my feare? You shall shew your feare of him, even in your confidence in him, In timore Domini, fiducia fortitudinis, In the feare of the Lord, is an assured strength: You shall not only say Iesum Dominum, professe Jesus to be the Lord, but Veni Domine Iesu, You shall invite, and solicite Jesus to a speedy judgement, and be able, in his right, to stand upright in that judgement. This you have, if you have this Spirit; and you may have this Spirit, if you resist it not, now; For, As when Peter spake, the holy Ghost fell upon all that heard, So in the Ministery of his weaker instruments, he conveyes, and diffuses, and seales his gifts upon all, which come well disposed to the receiving of him, in his Ordinance.

ACTS 10.44.

While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on all them, which heard the word.

Part of the second Lesson of that day.

THat which served for an argument amongst the Jews, to diminish, and under-value Christ, Have any of the Rulers believed in him? had no force amongst the Gentiles, for amongst them, the first persons that are recorded to have applied themselves to the profession of the Christian Religion, were Rulers, Persons of place, and quality: Sunt propter hoc Dignitates positæ sunt, ut major pietas ostendatur, sayes S. Chrysostome, This is the true reason why men are Ennobled, why men are raised, why men are inriched, that they might glorifie God the more, by that eminency; This is truly to be a good Student, Scrutari Scripturas, To search the Scriptures, in which is eternall life: This is truly to be called to the Barre, to be Crucified with Christ Jesus: And to be called to the Bench, to have part in his Resurrection, and raigne in glory with him: and to be a Judge, to judge thy selfe, that thou beest not judged to condemnation, by Christ Jesus: Offices and Titles, and Dignities, make thee, in the eye, and tongue of the world, a better man; be truly a better man, between God and thee, for them, and they are well placed. Those Pyramides and Obelisces, which were raised upon high, in the Aire, but supported nothing, were vaine testimonies of the frivolousnesse, and impertinency of those men that raised them; But when we see Pillars stand, we presume that something is to be placed upon them. They, who by their rank and place, are pillars of the State, and pillars of the Church, if Christ and his glory be not raised higher by them, then by other men, put Gods building most out of frame, and most discompose Gods purposes, of any others. And therefore S. Chrysostome hath noted usefully, That the first of the Gentiles, which was converted to Christianity, was that Eunuch, which was Treasurer to the Queen of Æthiopia; And the second was this Centurion, in whose house S. Peter preached this fruitfull Sermon, at which, While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell upon all them that heard the word. John 7.48. Acts 8.27.

Our Parts will be two; first some Circumstances that preceded this act, this miraculous descent and infusion of the Holy Ghost, And then the Act, the Descent it selfe. In the first, we shall consider first, the time, it was when Peter was speaking, when Gods Ordinance was then in executing, preaching; And secondly, what made way to this descent of the Holy Ghost, that is, what Peter was speaking, and preaching, These words, true and necessary Doctrine; And here also we shall touch a little, the place, and the Auditory, Cornelius, and his family. When from hence we shall descend to the second Part, The descent of the Holy Ghost, we shall looke first, (so as it may become us) upon the Person, (the third Person in the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity) And then upon his action, as it is expressed here, Cecidit, He fell; As of Christ it is said, Deliciæ ejus cum filiis hominum, His delight is to be with the sons of men, And, (to speak humanely, a perverse delight, for it was to be with the worst men, with Publicans & sinners) so, (to speak humanely) the Holy Ghost had an extraordinary, a perverse ambition, to goe downewards, to inlarge himselfe, in his working, by falling; He fell: And then, he fell so, as a showre of rain falls, that does not lie in those round drops in which it falls, but diffuses, and spreads and inlarges it selfe, He fell upon all; But then, it was because all heard, They came not to see a new action, preaching, nor a new Preacher, Peter, nor to see one another at a Sermon, He fell upon all that heard; where also, I think, it will not be impertinent, Divisio.

nent, to make this note, That Peter is ſaid to have ſpoke thoſe words, but they, on whom the holy Ghoſt fell, are ſaid to have heard The word; It is not many words, long Sermons, nor good words, witty and eloquent Sermons that induce the holy Ghoſt, for all theſe are words of men; and howſoever the whole Sermon is the Ordinance of God, the whole Sermon is not the word of God: But when all the good gifts of men are modeſtly employ'd, and humbly received, as vehicula Spiritus, as S. Auguſtine calls them, The chariots of the holy Ghoſt, as meanes afforded by God, to convey the word of life into us, in Thoſe words we heare The word, and there the word and the Spirit goe together, as in our caſe in the Text, While Peter yet ſpake thoſe words, the holy Ghoſt fell upon all them that heard The word.

1 Part. Tempus.

When we come then to conſider in the firſt place, the Time of this miracle, we may eaſily ſee that verified in S. Peters proceeding, which S. Ambroſe ſayes, Neſcit tarda molimina Spiritus ſancti gratia, The holy Ghoſt cannot goe a ſlow pace; It is the devill in the ſerpent that creeps, but the holy Ghoſt in the Dove flyes: And then, in the proceeding with the Centurion, we may ſee that verified which Leo ſayes, Vbi Deus Magiſter, quàm citò diſcitur? Where God teaches, how faſt a godly man learnes? Chriſt did almoſt all his miracles in an inſtant, without dilatory circumſtances; Chriſt ſayes to the man ſick of the palſey, Tolle grabatum, Take up thy bed and walk, and immediately he did ſo: To the deafe man he ſayes, Ephphatha, Be thine eares opened, and inſtantly they were opened: He ſayes to the woman with the iſſue of bloud, Eſto ſana à plagatua, and ſhe was not onely well immediately upon that, but ſhe was well before, when ſhe had but touched the hem of his garment. Upon him who had lyen in his infirmity thirty eight yeares, at the poole, Chriſt makes a little ſtop; but it was no longer then to try his diſpoſition with that queſtion, Vis ſanus fieri? Chriſt was ſure what his anſwer would be; and as ſoone as he gives that anſwer, immediately he recovered. Where Chriſt ſeems to have ſtayed longeſt, which was upon the blind man, yet at his firſt touch, that man ſaw men walke, though not diſtinctly, but at the ſecond touch he ſaw perfectly. As Chriſt proceeds in his miracles, ſo doth the holy Ghoſt in his powerfull inſtructions. It is true, Scientiæ ſunt profectus, There is a growth in knowledge, and we overcome ignorances by degrees, and by ſucceſſion of more and more light: Chriſt himſelfe grew in knowledge, as well as in ſtature: But this is in the way of experimentall knowledge, by ſtudy, by converſation, by other acquiſitions. But when the holy Ghoſt takes a man into his ſchoole, he deales not with him, as a Painter, which makes an eye, and an eare, and a lip, and paſſes his pencill an hundred times over every muſcle, and every haire, and ſo in many ſittings makes up one man, but he deales as a Printer, that in one ſtraine delivers a whole ſtory.

Mark 2.11. Mark 7.34. Mark 5.34. John 5.5. Mark 8. Chryſoſt.

We ſee that in this example of S. Peter, S. Peter had conceived a doubt, whether it were lawfull for him to preach the Goſpell to any of the Gentiles, becauſe they were not within the Covenant; This was the ſanus fieri, This very ſcruple was the voyce and queſtion of God in him: to come to a doubt, and to a debatement in any religious duty, is the voyce of God in our conſcience: Would you know the truth? Doubt, and then you will inquire: And facile ſolutionem accipit anima, quæ prius dubitavit, ſayes S. Chryſoſt. As no man reſolves of any thing wiſely, firmely, ſafely, of which he never doubted, never debated, ſo neither doth God withdraw a reſolution from any man, that doubts with an humble purpoſe to ſettle his owne faith, and not with a wrangling purpoſe to ſhake another mans. God rectifies Peters doubt immediately, and he rectifies it fully; he preſents him a Book, and a Commentary, the Text, and the Expoſition: He lets downe a ſheet from heaven with all kinde of beaſts and fowles, and tels him, that Nothing is uncleane, and he tells him by the ſame ſpirit, that there were three men below to aske for him, who were ſent by God to apply that viſible Parable, and that God meant, in ſaying Nothing was uncleane, that the Gentiles generally, and in particular, this Centurion Cornelius, were not incapable of the Goſpell, nor unfit for his Miniſtery. And though Peter had beene very hungry; and would faine have eaten, as appeares in the tenth verſe, yet after he received this inſtruction, we heare no more mention of his deſire to eat; but, as his Maſter had ſaid, Cibus meus eſt, My meat is to doe my Fathers will that ſent me, ſo his meat was to doe him good that ſent for him, and ſo he made haſte to goe with thoſe Meſſengers.

Ver. 11. Ver. 19.

Cum locutus

The time then was, when Peter thus prepared by the Holy Ghoſt, was to prepare others for the Holy Ghoſt, and therefore it was, Cum locutus, When he ſpoke, that is, preached

A ched to them. For, Si adsit palatum fidei, cui sapiat mel Dei, saies S. Augustine, To him who hath a spirituall taste, no hony is so sweet, as the word of God preached according to his Ordinance. If a man taste a little of this honey at his rods end, as Ionathan did, though he thinke his eyes enlightned, as Ionathan did, he may be in Ionathans case, I did but taste a little honey with my rod, Et ecce, morior, and behold, I dye. If a man read the Scriptures a little, superficially, perfunctorily, his eyes seeme straight-waies enlightned, and he thinks he sees every thing that he had pre-conceived, and fore-imagined in himselfe, as cleare as the Sun, in the Scriptures: He can finde flesh in the Sacrament, without bread, because he findes Hoc est Corpus meum, This is my Body, and he will take no more of that hony, no more of those places of Scripture, where Christ saies, Ego vitis, and Ego porta, that he is a Vine, and that he is a Gate, as literally as he seemes to say, that that is his Body. So also he can finde wormewood in this honey, because he finds in this Scripture, Stipendium peccati mors est, that The reward of sin is death, and he will take no more of that hony, not the Quandocunque, That at what time soever a sinner repents, he shall have mercy. As the Essentiall word of God, the Son of God, is Light of light, So the written Word of God is light of light too, one place of Scripture takes light of another: and if thou wilt read so, and heare so, as thine owne affections transport, and misse-lead thee; If when a corrupt confidence in thine owne strength possesses thee, thou read onely those passages, Quare moriemini, domus Israel? Why will ye dye, O house of Israel? and conclude out of that, that thou hast such a free will of thine owne, as that thou canst give life to thy selfe, when thou wilt; If when a vicious dejection of spirit, and a hellish melancholy, and declination towards desperation possesses thee, thou read only those passages, Impossibile est, That it is impossible, that he that fals, after he hath beene enlightned, should be renewed againe; And if thou heare Sermons so, as that thou art glad, when those sins are declamed C against, which thou art free from, but wouldst heare no more, wouldst not have thine owne sin touched upon, though all reading, and all hearing be honey, yet if thou take so little of this honey, Ionathans case will be thy case, Ecce, morieris, thou wilt dye of that hony; for the Scriptures are made to agree with one another, but not to agree to thy particular taste and humour.

But yet, the counsell is good, on the other side too, Hast thou found honey? eate so much thereof as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it. Prov. 25. 16. Content thy selfe with reading those parts of Scriptures, which are cleare, and edifie, and perplex not thy selfe with Prophesies not yet performed; and content thy selfe with hearing those Sermons, which rectifie thee In credendis, and In agendis, in all those things, which thou art bound to beleeve, and bound to practise, and run not after those Men, who pretend to know those things, which God hath not revealed to his Church. Too little, or too much D of this honey, of this reading, and of this hearing, may be unwholesome: God hath chosen waies of mediocrity; He Redeemed us not, by God alone, nor by man alone, but by him, who was both. He instructs us not, by the Holy Ghost alone, without the Ministery of man, nor by the Minister alone, without the assistance of the Holy Ghost. An Angel appeared to Cornelius, but that Angel bid him send for Peter: The Holy Ghost visits us, and disposes us, but yet the Holy Ghost sends us to the Ministery of man: Non dedignatur docere per hominem, qui dignatus est esse homo, sayes S. Augustine; He that came to us, as Man, is content that we go to men, for our instruction. Preaching is the ordinary meanes, that which S. Peter wrought upon them, was, Cum locutus, when he had, and because he had preached unto them.

And it was also Dum locutus est, Whilst he yet spake those words; Non permittit Spiritus absolvi Sermonem, saies S. Chrysostome; The Holy Ghost did not leave them to future E meditations, to future conferences, he did not stay till they told one another after the Sermon, That it was a learned Sermon, a conscientious Sermon, a usefull Sermon, but whilst the Preacher yet spoke, the Holy Ghost spoke to their particular consciences. And as a Gardiner takes every bough of a young tree, or of a Vine, and leads them, and places them against a wall, where they may have most advantage, and so produce, most, and best fruit: So the Holy Ghost leads and places the words, and sentences of the Preacher, one upon an Usurer, another upon an Adulterer, another upon an ambitious person, another upon an active or passive Briber, when the Preacher knowes of no Usurer, no Adulterer, no ambitious person, no Briber active or passive, in the Congregation. Nay, it is not onely whilst he was yet speaking, but, as S. Peter himselfe reports the same Story, Dum locutus.

Ver. 15. in the next Chapter, As I began to speake, the Holy Ghost fell upon them. A

Perchance in the beginning of a Sermon, the reprehension of the Preacher fals not upon me, it is not come to me; But, when as the duties of the Preacher are expressed by the Apostle, to be these three, To reprove, or convince by argument, to settle truths, to overthrow errors; And to exhort, to rectifie our manners; And to rebuke, to denounce Gods Judgements upon the refractary; whatsoever he sayes the two first wayes, by Convincing, and by Exhorting, all that belongs to all, from the beginning; And for that which he shall say, the third way, by way of Rebuking, As I know at midnight, that the Sun will breake out upon me to morrow, though I know not how it works upon those places, where it shines then, So, though I know not how the rebukes of the Preacher worke upon their consciences, whose sins he rebukes at the beginning; yet I must make account that he wil meet with my sin too; & if he do not meet with my present sin; that sin which is my second wife, that sin which I have married now, (not after a divorce frō my former sin, so, as that I have put away that sin, but after the death of that sin, which sickness or poverty hath made me unable to continue in) yet if he bend himselfe upon that sin, which hath been my sin, or may be my sin, I must be sensible that the Holy Ghost hath offered himselfe to me, whilst he yet speaks, and ever since he began to speake; And, Cum locutus, Because Preaching is the ordinary meanes, and, Dum loquitur, Because the Holy Ghost intends all for my edification, I must embrace and entertaine the Holy Ghost, who exhibits himselfe to me, from the beginning, and not say, This concernes not me; for whatsoever the Preacher can say of Gods mercy in Christ Jesus to any man, all that belongs to me, for no man hath received more of that, then I may doe; And whatsoever the Preacher can say of sinne, all the way, all that belongs to me, for no man hath ever done any sin, which I should not have done, if God had left me to my selfe, and to mine own perversnesse towards sin, and to mine own insatiableness in sin. B

2 Tim. 4. 2.

Hæc verba. It was then, when he preached, and whilst he preached, and as soone as he preached, but when, and whilst, and as soon as he preached Thus, thus as is expressed here, Whilest hee spake these words: In which, we shall onely touch, but not much insist upon, his manner first, and then his matter; And for his manner, we consider onely here, his preparation, and no other circumstance. Though S. Peter say to them, when he came, I aske therefore, for what intent you have sent for me, yet God had intimated to him before, That it was to Preach the Gospell to the Gentiles; And therefore some time of meditation he had; Though in such a person as S. Peter, so filled with all gifts necessary for his function, and to such persons as Cornelius was, who needed but Catechizing in the rudiments of the Gospell, much preparation needed not. The ease was often of the same sort, after, in the Primitive Church; The persons were very able, and the people very ignorant; and therefore it is easie to observe a far greater frequency of Preaching amongst the Ancient Fathers, then ordinarily, men that love ease, will apprehend. We see evidently in S. Augustines hundred forty fourth Sermon De Tempore, And in S. Ambroses forty fourth Sermon De sancto Latrone, And in S. Bernards twelve Sermons upon one Psalme, that all these blessed and Reverend Fathers, preached more then one day, divers dayes together, without intermission: And we may see in S. Basils second Homilie upon the six dayes worke, that he preached in the after-noone; And so, by occasion of his often preaching, it seemes by his second Homilie De Baptismo, that he preached sometimes extemporally. But of all this, the reason is as evident as the fact, The Preachers were able to say much, The people were capable but of little: And where it was not so, the Clergy often assisted themselves with one anothers labours; as S. Cyrils Sermons were studied without book, and preached over againe to their severall Congregations, by almost all the Bishops of the Easterne Church. Sometimes we may see Texts extended to very many Sermons, and sometimes Texts taken of that extent and largeness, as onely a paraphrase upon the Text would make the Sermon; for we may see by S. Augustines tenth Sermon De verbis Apostoli, that they tooke sometimes the Epistle and Gospell of the day, and the Psalme before the Sermon for their text. C

Ver. 29.

But in these our times, when the curiosity, (allow it a better name, for truly, God be blessed for it, it deserves a better name) when the capacity of the people requires matter of more labour, as there is not the same necessity, so there is not the same possibility of that assiduous, and that sudden preaching. No man will think that we have abler Preachers then the Primitive Church had; no man will doubt, but that we have learneder, and more D E

A more capable auditories, and congregations then theirs were. The Apoſtles were not negligent, when they mended their nets: A preacher is not negligent, if he prepare for another Sermon, after he hath made one; nor a hearer is not negligent, if he meditate upon one Sermon, though he heare not another within three houres after. S. Peters Sermon was not extemporall; neither if it had (his perſon, and the quality of the hearers, being compared with our times) had that been any precedent, or patterne for our times, to do the like. But yet, Beloved, ſince our times are ſuch, as are overtaken with another neceſſity, that our adverſaries dare come, Cum locutus eſt, As ſoon as the Preacher hath done, and meet the people comming out of the Church, and deride the Preacher, and offer an anſwer to any thing that hath been ſaid; ſince they are come to come to Church with us, and Dum locutus eſt, Then when the Preacher is ſpeaking, to ſay to him, that ſits next him, That is falſe, that is heretical; ſince they are come to joyn with us at the Com-
B munion, ſo that it is hard to finde out the Iudas, and if you do finde him, he dares anſwer, Your Miniſter is no Prieſt, and ſo your Bread and Wine no Sacrament, and therefore I care not how much of it I take; ſince they are come to boaſt, that with all our aſſiduity of preaching, we cannot keep men from them; ſince it is thus, as we were alwayes bound by Chriſts example, To gather you as a hen gathers her chickens, (to call you often to this aſſembling of your ſelves) ſo are we now much more bound to hide and cover you, as a hen doth her chickens, and becauſe there is a Kite hovering in every corner, (a ſeducer lurking in every company) to defend and arme you, with more and more inſtructions againſt their inſinuations. And if they deride us, for often preaching, and call us fooles for that, as David ſaid, He would be more vile, he would Dance more, So let us be more fooles, in this fooliſhneſſe of preaching, and preach more. If they think us mad, ſince we are mad for our ſoules, (as the Apoſtle ſpeakes) let us be more mad; Let him that hath
C preached once, do it twice, and him that hath preached twice, do it thrice. But yet, not this, by comming to a negligent, and extemporall manner of preaching, but we will bee content to take ſo many hours from our reſt, that we, with you, may reſt the ſafelyer in Abrahams boſome, and ſo many more houres from our meat, that we, with you, may the more ſurely eat, and drink with the Lamb, in the kingdome of heaven. Chriſt hath undertaken, that his word ſhall not paſſe away, but he hath not undertaken that it ſhall not paſſe from us: There is a Ne exeas mundum ſerved upon the world, The Goſpell cannot goe, nor be driven out of the world, till the end of the world; but there is not a Ne exeas regnum, The Goſpell may go out of this, or any Kingdome, if they ſlacken in the doing of thoſe things which God hath ordained for the meanes of keeping it, that is, a zealous, and yet a diſcreet; a ſober, and yet a learned aſſiduity in preaching.

Thus far then we have been juſtly carried, in conſideration of this circumſtance in the D manner of his preaching, his preparation; In deſcending to the next, which is the matter of his Sermon, we ſee much of that in his Text. S. Peter tooke his Text here, ver. 34. out of Deuteronomy, Of a truth I perceive, that God is no reſpecter of perſons. Where, becauſe the words are not preciſely the ſame in Deuteronomy, as they are in this Text, we finde juſt occaſion to note, That neither Chriſt in his preaching, nor the holy Ghoſt in penning the Scriptures of the new Teſtament, were ſo curious as our times, in citing Chapters and Verſes, or ſuch diſtinctions, no nor in citing the very, very words of the places. Heb. 4. 4. There is a ſentence cited thus indefinitely, It is written in a certaine place, without more particular note: And, to paſſe over many, conducing to that purpoſe, if we conſider that one place in the Prophet Eſay, (Make the heart of this people fat, make their eyes heavy, and ſhut them, leſt they ſee with their eyes, and heare with their eares, and underſtand with their hearts, and convert, and be healed) and conſider the ſame place,
E as it is cited ſix ſeverall times in the new Teſtament, we ſhall ſee, that they ſtood not upon ſuch exact quotations, and citing of the very words. But to that purpoſe, for which S. Peter had taken that text, he follows his text. Now, Beloved, I doe not goe about to include S. Peters whole Sermon into one branch, of one part, of one of mine; Only I refreſh to your memories, that which I preſume you have often read in this Story, and this Chapter, that though S. Peter ſay, That God is no ſuch accepter of perſons, but that in every Nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteouſneſſe, is accepted with him, yet it is upon this ground, Chriſt Jeſus is Lord of all; And, (as it is, ver. 42.) He hath commanded us to preach; that is, he hath eſtabliſhed a Church, and therein, viſible meanes of ſalvation; And then, this is our generall text, the ſubject of all our Sermons, That through his name, whoſoever

Deut. 10. 17.

Eſay 6. 10.

Ver. 34, 35, 36.

Ver. 43.

whosoever beleeveth in him shall have remission of sins. So that this is all that we dare avow concerning salvation, that howsoever God may afford salvation to some in all nations, yet he hath manifested to us no way of conveying salvation to them, but by the manifestation of Christ Jesus in his Ordinance of preaching. A

And such a manifestation of Christ, had God here ordained for this Centurion Cornelius. But why for him? I doe not ask reasons of Gods mercy to particular men; for if I would do so, when should I finde a reason, why he hath shewed mercy to me? But yet, Chrysost. Audite omnes, qui in Militia estis, & Regibus assistitis, All that serve in Wars, or Courts, may finde something to imitate in this Centurion: He was a devout man; A Souldier, and yet devout; God forbid they were so incompatible, as that courage, and devotion might not consist: A man that feared God; A Souldiers profession is fearlesnesse; And only he that feares God, feares nothing else: He and all his house; A Souldier, yet kept a house, and did not alwayes wander; He kept his house in good order, and with good meanes: He gave much almes; Though Armes be an expensive profession for outward splendor, yet he reserved for almes, much almes: And he prayed to God alwayes; Though Armes require much time for the duties thereof, yet he could pray at those times; In his Trenches, at the Assault, or at the defence of a Breach, he could pray: All this the holy Ghost testifies of him together, ver. 2. And this was his generall disposition; and then, those who came from him to Peter, adde this, That he had a good report amongst all the Nation of the Iews, ver. 22. And this to a stranger, (for the Jews loved not strangers) and one that served the State, in such a place, as that he could not choose but be heavy to the Jews, was hard to have. And then, himself, when Peter comes to him, addes thus much more, That this first mercy of God in having sent his Angel, and that farther mercy, that that Angel named a man, and then that man came, was exhibited to him, then, B

Ver. 30. when he was fasting. And then, this man, thus humbled and macerated by fasting, thus C soupled and entendered with the feare of God, thus burnt up and calcined with zeal and devotion, thus united to God by continuall prayer, thus tributary to God by giving almes, thus exemplar in himself at home, to lead all his house, and thus diffusive of himselfe to others abroad, to gain the love of good men, this man prostrates himselfe to Peter at his comming, in such an over-reverentiall manner, as Peter durst not accept, but

Ver. 26. took him up, and said, I my selfe am also a man; Sudden devotion comes quickly neare superstition.

This is a misery, which our time hath been well acquainted with, and had much experience of, and which grows upon us still, That when men have been mellowed with the feare of God, and by heavy corrections, and calamities, brought to a greater tendernesse of conscience then before, in that distemper of melancholy, and inordinate sadnesse, they have been easiliest seduced and withdrawne to a superstitious and Idolatrous religion. I D speak this, because from the highest to the lowest place, there are Sentinels planted in every corner, to watch all advantages, and if a man lose his preferment at Court, or lose his childe at home, or lose any such thing as affects him much, and imprints a deep sadnesse for the losse thereof, they work upon that sadnesse, to make him a Papist. When men have lived long from God, they never think they come neare enough to him, except they go beyond him; because they have never offered to come to him before, now when they would come, they imagine God to be so hard of accesse, that there is no comming to him, but by the intervention, and intercession of Saints; and they thinke that that Church, in which they have lived ill, cannot be a good Church; whereas, if they would accustome themselves in a daily performing of Christian duties, to an ordinary presence of God, Religion would not be such a stranger, nor devotion such an Ague unto them. But when Peter had rectified Cornelius, in this mistaking, in this over-valuing of any person, and then saw Cornelius his disposition, who had brought materials to erect a Church in his house, by calling his kinsmen, and his friends together to heare Peter, Peter spoke those words, Which whilest he yet spake, the holy Ghost fell upon all them that heard the word. And so we are fallen into our second part. E

2. Part. In this, the first Consideration falls upon the person that fell: And as the Trinity is the most mysterious piece of our Religion, and hardest to be comprehended, So in the Trinity, the Holy Ghost is the most mysterious person, and hardest to be expressed. We are called the houshold of God, and the family of the faithfull; and therefore out of a contemplation, and ordinary acquaintance with the parts of families, we are apter to conceive

A conceive any ſuch thing in God himſelf, as we ſee in a family. We ſeeme not to goe ſo farre out of our way of reaſon, to beleeve a father, and a ſon, becauſe father and ſon are pieces of families: nor in beleeving Chriſt and his Church, becauſe husband and wife are pieces of families. We goe not ſo farre in beleeving Gods working upon us, either by miniſtring ſpirits from above, or by his ſpirituall miniſters here upon earth, for maſter and ſervants are pieces of families. But does there ariſe any ſuch thing, out of any of theſe couples, Father and Son, Husband and Wife, Maſter and Servant, as ſhould come from them, and they be no whit before neither? Is there any thing in naturall or civill families, that ſhould aſſiſt our underſtanding to apprehend this, That in heaven there ſhould be a Holy Spirit, ſo, as that the Father, and the Son, being all Spirit, and all Holy, and all Holineſſe, there ſhould be another Holy Spirit, which had all their Eſſentiall holineſſe in him, and another holineſſe too, Sanctitatem Sanctificantem, a holineſſe, that ſhould B make us holy?

It was a hard work for the Apoſtles, and their ſucceſſors, at firſt, to draw the God-head, into one, into an unity: when the Gentiles had been long accuſtomed to make every power and attribute of God, and to make every remarkable creature of God a ſeverall God, and ſo to worſhip God in a multiplicity of Gods, it was a great work to limit, and determine their ſuperſtitious, and ſuperfluous devotion in one God. But when all theſe lines were brought into one center, not to let that center reſt, but to draw lines out of that againe, and bring more perſons into that one centricall God-head, this was hard for reaſon to digeſt: But yet to have extended that from that unity, to a duality, was not ſo much, as to a triplicity. And thereupon, though the Arians would never be brought to confeſſe an equality between the Son and the Father, they were much farther from confeſſing it in the Holy Ghoſt: They made, ſayes S. Auguſtine, Filium creaturam, Hæreſ. 49.
C The Son, they accounted to be but a creature; but they made the Holy Ghoſt Creaturam Creaturæ, not onely a Creature, and no God, but not a Creature of Gods, but a Creature, a Meſſenger of the Son, who was himſelfe (with them) but a Creature. But theſe myſteries are not to be chawed by reaſon, but to be ſwallowed by faith; we profeſſed three perſons in one God, in the ſimplicity of our infancy, at our baptiſme, and we have ſealed that contract, in the other Sacrament often ſince; and this is eternall life to die in that beliefe. There are three that beare witneſſe in heaven, The Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghoſt, and theſe three are one; And in that teſtimony we reſt, that there is a Holy Ghoſt, and in the teſtimony of this text, that this Holy Ghoſt falls down upon all that heare the word of God. 1 John 5.7.

Now, it is as wonderfull that this Holy Ghoſt ſhould fall down from heaven, as that he ſhould be in heaven. Quomodo cecidiſti? How art thou fallen from heaven, O Luciſer, Cecidit.
D thou ſon of the morning? was a queſtion asked by the Prophet, of him, who was ſo fallen, as that he ſhall never returne againe. But the Holy Ghoſt, (as myſterious in his actions, as in his Eſſentiall, or in his Perſonall beeing) fell ſo from heaven, as that he remained in heaven, even then when he was fallen. This Dove ſent from heaven, did more then Eſay 14.12. that Dove, which was ſent out of the Arke; That went and came, but was not in both places at once; Noah could not have ſhewed that Dove to his ſons and daughters, in the Arke, then, when the Dove was flowne out: But now, when this Dove, the Holy Ghoſt, fell upon theſe men, at Peters Sermon, Stephen, who was then come up to heaven, ſaw the ſame Dove, the ſame Holy Ghoſt, whom they, whom he had left upon the earth, felt upon the earth then: As if the Holy Ghoſt fall upon any in this Congregation now, now the Saints of God ſee that Holy Ghoſt in heaven, whom they that are here, feele falling upon them here. In all his workings, the Holy Ghoſt deſcends, for Gen 8.7.
E there is nothing above him. There is a third heaven; but no ſuch third heaven, as is above the heaven of heavens, above the ſeat and reſidence of the Holy Ghoſt: ſo that whatſoever he doth, is a deſcent, a diminution, a humiliation, and an act of mercy, becauſe it is a Communication of himſelfe, to a perſon inferiour to himſelfe.

But there is more in this Text, then a deſcent. When the Holy Ghoſt came upon Chriſt himſelfe, after his Baptiſme, there it is ſaid, He deſcended: Though Chriſt as the Son of God, were equall to him, and ſo it was no deſcent for the Holy Ghoſt to come to him, yet becauſe Chriſt had a nature upon him, in which he was not equall to the Holy Ghoſt, here was a double deſcent in the Holy Ghoſt, That he who dwells with the Father and the Son, In luce inacceſſibili, In light inacceſſible, and too bright to be ſeene, would deſcend in a viſible form, to be ſeene by men, And that he deſcended and wrought upon a mortall man, though that man were Chriſt. Chriſt alſo had a double deſcending too; He deſcended to be a man, and he deſcended to be no man; He deſcended to live amongſt us, and he deſcended to die amongſt us; He deſcended to the earth, and he deſcended to hell: Every operation of every perſon of the holy, and bleſſed, and glorious Trinity, is a Deſcending; But here the Holy Ghoſt is ſaid to have fallen, which denotes a more earneſt communicating of himſelfe, a throwing, a pouring out of himſelfe, upon thoſe, upon whom he falls: He falls as a fall of waters, that covers that it falls upon; as a Hawk upon a prey, it deſires and it will poſſeſſe that it falls upon; as an Army into a Country, it Conquers, and it Governes where it fals. The Holy Ghoſt fals, but farre otherwiſe, upon the ungodly. Mat. 21. 44. Whoſoever ſhall fall upon this ſtone, ſhall be broken, but upon whomſoever this ſtone ſhall fall, it will grinde him to powder. Indeed, he fals upon him ſo, as haile fals upon him; he fals upon him ſo, as he fals from him, and leaves him in an obduration, and impenitibleneſſe, and in an irrecoverable ruine of him, that hath formerly deſpiſed, and deſpighted the Holy Ghoſt. But when the Holy Ghoſt fals not thus in the nature of a ſtone, but puts on the nature of a Dove, and a Dove with an Olive-braneh, and that in the Ark, that is, teſtimonies of our peace, and reconciliation to God, in his Church, he fals as that kinde of lightning, which melts ſwords, and hurts not ſcabbards; the Holy Ghoſt ſhall melt thy ſoule, and not hurt thy body; he ſhall give thee ſpirituall bleſſings, and ſaving graces, under the temporall ſeales of bodily health, and proſperity in this world: He ſhall let thee ſee, that thou art the childe of God, in the obedience of thy children to thee, And that thou art the ſervant of God, in the faithfulneſſe of thy ſervants to thee, And that thou ſtandeſt in the favour of God, by the favor of thy ſuperiours to thee; he ſhall fall upon thy ſoul, and not wound thy body, give thee ſpirituall proſperity, and yet not by worldly adverſity, and evermore over-ſhadow and refreſh thy ſoul, & yet evermore keep thee in his Sunſhine, and the light of his countenance.

But there is more then this, in this falling of the Holy Ghoſt, in this Text. For, it was not ſuch a particular inſinuation of the Holy Ghoſt, as that he convaied himſelfe into thoſe particular men, for their particular good, and ſalvation, and determined there; but ſuch a powerfull, and diffuſive falling, as made his preſence, and his power in them, to work upon others alſo. So when he came upon Chriſt, it was not to adde any thing to Chriſt, but to informe others, that that was Chriſt: So when Chriſt breathed his ſpirit into the Apoſtles, it was not meerly to infuſe ſalvation into them, but it was eſpecially to ſeale to them that Patent, that Commiſſion, Quorum remiſeritis, That others might receive remiſſion of ſins, by their power. So the Holy Ghoſt fell upon theſe men here, for the benefit of others, that thereby a great doubt might be removed, a great ſcruple deveſted, a great diſputation extinguiſhed, whether it were lawfull to preach the Goſpel to the Gentiles, or no; for, as we ſee in the next Chapter, Peter himſelfe was Ver. 2. reproved of the Jews, for this that he had done: and therefore, God ratified, and gave teſtimony to this ſervice of his, by this miraculous falling of the Holy Ghoſt, as S. Auguſtine makes the reaſon of this falling, very juſtly to have been; ſo then, this falling of the Holy Ghoſt, was not properly, or not meerly an infuſing of juſtifying grace, but an infuſing of ſuch gifts, as might edifie others: for, S. Peter ſpeaking of this very action, in Ver. 15. the next Chapter, ſayes, The Holy Ghoſt fell on them, as on us, in the beginning; Which was, when he fell upon them, as this day. This doth not imply Graduum æqualitatem, an equall meaſure of the ſame gifts, as the Apoſtles had, who were to paſſe over the whole world, and work upon all men, But it implies Doni identitatem, it was the ſame miraculous expreſſing of the preſence, and working of the Holy Ghoſt, for the confirmation of Peter, that the Gentiles might be preached unto, and for the conſolation of the Gentiles, that they might be enabled to preach to one another: for ſo it is expreſly ſaid in this Ver 46. Chapter, That they heard theſe men ſpeake with divers tongues; they that heard the Preacher, were made partakers of the ſame gifts that the Preacher had; A good hearer becomes a good Preacher, that is, able to edifie others.

It it true, that theſe men were not to be literally Preachers, as the Apoſtles (upon whom the Holy Ghoſt fell, as upon them) were, and therefore the gift of tongues may ſeeme not to have beene ſo neceſſary to them. But it is not onely the Preacher, that hath uſe of the tongue, for the edification of Gods people, but in all our diſcourſes, and conferences with one another, we ſhould preach his glory, his goodneſſe, his power, that every

A every man might ſpeake one anothers language, and preach to one anothers conſcience; that when I accuſe my ſelfe, and confeſſe mine infirmities to another man, that man may underſtand, that there is, in that confeſſion of mine, a Sermon, and a rebuke, and a reprehenſion to him, if he be guilty of the ſame ſin; Nay, if he be guilty of a ſin contrary to mine. For, as in that language in which God ſpoke, the Hebrew, the ſame roote will take in words of a contrary ſignification, (as the word of Jobs wife ſignifies bleſſing and curſing too) ſo the covetous man that heares me confeſſe my prodigality, ſhould argue to himſelf, If prodigality, which howſoever it hurt a particular perſon, yet ſpreads mony abroad, which is the right and naturall uſe of money, be ſo heavy a ſin, how heavy is my covetouſneſſe, which, beſides that it keepes me all the way in as much penuriouſneſſe, as the prodigall man brings himſelfe to at laſt, is alſo a publique ſin, becauſe it empriſons that money which ſhould be at liberty, and employed in a free courſe abroad?

B And ſo alſo when I declare to another, the ſpirituall and temporall bleſſings which God hath beſtowed upon me, he may be raiſed to a thankfull remembrance, that he hath received all that from God alſo. This is not the uſe of having learnt divers tongues, to be able to talke of the wars with Dutch Captains, or of trade with a French Merchant, or of State with a Spaniſh Agent, or of pleaſure with an Italian Epicure; It is not to entertaine diſcourſe with ſtrangers, but to bring ſtrangers to a better knowledge of God, in that way, wherein we, by his Ordinance, do worſhip and ſerve him.

Now this place is ill detorted by the Roman Church, for the confirmation of their Sacrament of Confirmation: That becauſe the Holy Ghoſt fell upon men, at another time then at Baptiſme, therefore there is a leſſe perfect giving of the Holy Ghoſt, in Baptiſme. It is too forward a triumph in him, who ſayes of this place, Locus inſignis ad aſſertionem Sacramenti manus impoſitionis: That is an evident place for Confirmation of Pamelius Annot. in Cypr. Epiſt. 72.

C the Sacrament of Confirmation: It is true, that S. Cyprian ſayes there, That a man is not truly ſanctified, Niſi utroque Sacramento naſcatur, Except he be regenerate by both Sacraments: And he tels us what thoſe two Sacraments are, Aqua & Spiritus, Water and the Spirit, That except a man have both theſe ſeales, inward and outward, he is not ſafe: And S. Cyprian requires (and uſefully truly) an outward declaration of this inward ſeale, of this giving of the Holy Ghoſt: For, he inſtances expreſly in this, which was done in this Text, That there was both Baptiſme, and a giving of the Holy Ghoſt. Neither would S. Cyprian forbeare the uſe of Confirmation, becauſe it was alſo in uſe amongſt ſome Heretiques, Quia Novatianus facere audet, non putabimus nos eſſe faciendum? Shall we give over a good cuſtome, becauſe the Novatians doe the like? Quia Novatianus extra Eccleſiam, vendicat ſibi veritatis imaginem, relinquemus Eccleſiæ veritatem? Shall the Church forbeare any of thoſe cuſtomes, which were induced to good purpoſes, becauſe Cypr. Epiſt. 72.

D ſome Heretiques, in a falſe Church, have counterfaited them, or corrupted them? And therefore, ſayes that Father, It was ſo in the Apoſtles time, Et nunc quoque apud nos geritur, We continue it ſo in our time, That they who are Baptized, Signaculo Dominico conſummentur, That they may have a ratification, a conſummation in this ſeale of the Holy Ghoſt: Which was not in the Primitive Church (as in the later Roman Church) a confirmation of Baptiſme, ſo, as that that Sacrament ſhould be but a halfe-Sacrament, but it was a Confirmation of Chriſtians, with an encreaſe of grace, when they came to ſuch yeares, as they were naturally expoſed to ſome tentations.

Our Church acknowledges the true uſe of this Confirmation; for, in the firſt Collect in the office of Confirmation, it confeſſes, that that child is already regenerated by water and the holy Ghoſt; and prayes onely for farther ſtrength: And having like a good mother, taught us the right uſe of it, then our Church, like a ſupreme Commander too,

E enjoyns expreſly, that none be admitted to the Communion, till they have received their Confirmation. And though this injunction be not in rigour and exactneſſe purſued and executed, yet it is very neceſſary that the purpoſe thereof ſhould be maintained; That is, that none ſhould be received to the Communion, till they had given an account of their faith and proficiencie. For, he is but an interpretative, but a preſumptive Chriſtian, who, becauſe he is ſo old, ventures upon the Sacrament. A beard does not make a man fit for the Sacrament, nor a Husband, a woman: a man may be a great officer in the State, and a woman may be a grandmother in the family, and yet not be fit for that Sacrament, if they have never conſidered more in it, but onely to doe as others doe. The Church enjoynes a precedent Confirmation; where that is not, wee require yet a precedent Examination,

before any bee admitted, at firſt, to the Sacrament. A

Super omnes. This was then the effectuall working of the Holy Ghoſt, Non ſpiravit, He did not only breathe upon them, and try whether they would receive the ſavour of life unto life, or no: Non ſibilavit, He did not onely whiſper unto them, and try whether they had a diſpoſition to heare, and anſwer; Non incubabat, He did not onely hover over them, and ſit upon them, to try what he could hatch, and produce out of them; Non deſcendit, He did not onely deſcend towards them, and try whether they would reach out their hand to receive him; But Cecidit, He fell, ſo, as that he poſſeſſed them, enwrapped them, inveſted them with a penetrating, with a powerfull force; And ſo, he fell upon them All. As we have read of ſome Generals, in ſecular ſtory, that in great Services have knighted their whole Army, So the Holy Ghoſt Sanctifies, and Canonizes whole Congregations.

They are too good husbands, and too thrifty of Gods grace, too ſparing of the Holy Ghoſt; that reſtraine Gods generall propoſitions, Venite omnes, Let all come, and Vult omnes ſalvos, God would have all men ſaved, ſo particularly, as to ſay, that when God ſayes All, he meanes ſome of all ſorts, ſome Men, ſome Women, ſome Jews, ſome Gentiles, ſome rich, ſome poore, but he does not meane, as he ſeemes to ſay, ſimply All. Yes; God does meane, ſimply All, ſo as that no man can ſay to another, God meanes not thee, no man can ſay to himſelfe; God meanes not me. Nefas eſt dicere, Deum aliquid, niſi bonum prædeſtinare; It is modeſtly ſaid by S. Auguſtine, and more were immodeſty; There is no predeſtination in God, but to good. And therefore it is Durus ſermo, They are hard words, to ſay, That God predeſtinated ſome, not onely Ad damnationem, but Ad cauſas damnationis, Not onely to damnation becauſe they ſinned, but to a neceſſity of ſinning, that they might the more juſtly be damned; And to ſay, That God rejected ſome Odio libero, Out of a hate, that aroſe primarily in himſelfe, againſt thoſe perſons, before thoſe perſons were created, (ſo much as in Gods intention) and not out of any hate of their ſins, which he foreſaw. B C

Beloved, we are to take in no other knowledge of Gods Decrees, but by the execution thereof; How ſhould we know any Decree in God, of the creation of Man, according to his Image, but by the execution? Becauſe I ſee that Man is created ſo, as I conceive to be intended in this phraſe, After his Image, I beleeve that he Decreed to Create him ſo: becauſe God does nothing extemporally, but according to his owne moſt holy, and eternall preconceptions, and Ideas, and Decrees. So, we know his Decree of Election, and Reprobation, by the execution; And how is that? Does God ever ſay, that any ſhall be ſaved or damned, without relation, without condition, without doing, (in the Old Teſtament) and, in the New Teſtament, without beleeving in Chriſt Jeſus? If faith in Chriſt Jeſus be in the Execution of the Decree, faith in Chriſt Jeſus was in the Decree it ſelfe too. Chriſt wept for the imminent calamities, temporall, and ſpirituall, which hung over Jeruſalem; And Lacryma Legati doloris, ſaies S. Cyprian, Teares are the Ambaſſadours of ſorrow; And they are Sanguis animi vulnerati, ſaies S. Auguſtine, Teares are the bloud of a wounded ſoule; And would Chriſt bleed out of a wounded ſoule, and weepe out of a ſad heart, for that, which himſelfe, and onely himſelfe, by an abſolute Decree, had made neceſſary and inevitable? The Scribes and Phariſees rejected the Counſell of God, ſayes S. Luke: In this new language we muſt ſay, They fulfilled the Counſell of God, if poſitively, and primarily, and abſolutely, Gods determinate Counſell were, that they ſhould do ſo. But this is not Gods Counſaile upon any, to be ſo far the Author of ſin, as to impoſe ſuch a neceſſity of ſinning, as ariſes not out of his owne will. Perditio noſtra ex nobis, Our deſtruction is from our owne ſin, and the Devill that infuſes it; not from God, or any ill purpoſe in him that enforces us. The blood of Chriſt was ſhed for all that will apply it, And the Holy Ghoſt is willing to fall, with the ſprinkling of that blood, upon all that do not reſiſt him; And that is, as follows in our text, Qui audiunt, The Holy Ghoſt fell upon all that heard. D E

Luke 7. 30.

Qui audiunt. Faith in Chriſt is in the Execution of Gods Decree, and Hearing is the meanes of this faith: And the propoſition is not the leſſe generall, if it except them, who will not be included in it, if the Holy Ghoſt fall not on them, who will not come to heare. Let no man thinke that he hath heard enough, and needs no more; why did the Holy Ghoſt furniſh his Church with foure Euangeliſts, if it were enough to reade one? And yet every one of the foure, hath enough for ſalvation, if Gods abundant care had not enriched the Church with more: Thoſe Nations which never heard of Chriſt, or of Euangeliſt, ſhall

A shall rise up in judgement against us, and though they perish themselves, thus far aggravate our condemnation, as to say, you had foure Euangelists, and have not beleeved, if we had had any one of them, we would have been saved. It is the glory of Gods Word, not that it is come, but that it shall remain for ever: It is the glory of a Christian, not that he hath heard, but that he desires to heare still. Are the Angels weary of looking upon that face of God, which they looked upon yesterday? Or are the Saints weary of singing that song, which they sung to Gods glory yesterday? And is not that Alleluiah, that song which is their morning and evening sacrifice, and which shall be their song, world without end, called still A new song?

Be not you weary of hearing those things which you have heard from others before: Do not say, if I had knowne this, I would not have come, for I have heard all this before; since thou never thoughtest of it since that former hearing, till thou heardst it a-
B gain now, thou didst not know that thou hadst heard it before. Gideons Fleece, that had Iud. 6. 38.
all the dew of heaven in it self alone, and all about it dry, one day, next day was all dry in it self, though all about it had received the dew: He that hath heard, and beleeved, may lose his knowledge, and his faith too, if he will heare no more. They say there is a way of castration, in cutting off the eares: There are certain veines behinde the eares, which, if they be cut, disable a man from generation. The Eares are the Aqueducts of the water of life; and if we cut off those, that is, intermit our ordinary course of hearing, this is a castration of the soul, the soul becomes an Eunuch, and we grow to a rust, to a mosse, to a barrennesse, without fruit, without propagation. If then God have placed thee under such a Pastor, as presents thee variety, blesse God, who enlarges himselfe, to afford thee that spirituall delight, in that variety; even for the satisfaction of that holy curiosity of thine. If he have placed thee under one, who often repeates, and often re-
C members thee of the same things, blesse God even for that, that in that he hath let thee see, that the Christian Religion is Verbum abbreviatum, A contracted doctrine, and that they are but a few things which are necessary to salvation, and therefore be not loath to heare them often.

Our errand hither then, is not to see; but much lesse not to be able to see, to sleep: Verbum.
It is not to talk, but much lesse to snort: It is to heare, and to heare all the words of the Preacher, but, to heare in those words, the Word, that Word which is the soule of all that is said, and is the true Physick of all their soules that heare. The Word was made flesh; that is, assumed flesh; but yet the Godhead was not that flesh. The Word of God is made a Sermon, that is, a Text is dilated, diffused into a Sermon; but that whole Sermon is not the word of God. But yet all the Sermon is the Ordinance of God. Delight thy self in the Lord, and he will give thee thy hearts desire; Take a delight in Gods Ordi-
D nance, in mans preaching, and thou wilt finde Gods Word in that. To end all in that Metaphor which we mentioned at beginning, As the word of God is as hony, so sayes Solomon, Pleasant words are as the hony combe: And when the pleasant words of Gods ser- Prov. 16. 24.

ing is enlightned with the words of the Preacher, and my faith is strengthned with the word of God; I glorifie God much in the gifts of the man, but I glorifie God much more in the gifts of his grace; I am glad I have heard him, but I am gladder I have heard God in him; I am happy that I have heard those words, but thrice happy, that in those words, I have heard the Word; Blessed be thou that camest in the name of the Lord, but blessed be the Lord, that is come to me in thee; Let me remember how the Preacher said it, but let me remember rather what he said. And beloved, all the best of us all, all
E that all together, all the dayes of our life shall be able to say unto you, is but this, That if ye will heare the same Jesus, in the same Gospell, by the same Ordinance, and not seeke an imaginary Jesus, in an illusory sacrifice, in another Church, If you will heare so, as you have contracted with God in your Baptisme, The holy Ghost shall fall upon you, whilest you heare, here in the house of God, and the holy Ghost shall accompany you home to your own houses, and make your domestique peace there, a type of your union with God in heaven; and make your eating and drinking there, a type of the abundance, and fulnesse of heaven; and make every dayes rising to you there, a type of your joyfull Resurrection to heaven; and every nights rest, a type of your eternall Sabbath; and your very dreames, prayers, and meditations, and sacrifices to Almighty God.

Preached upon Whitſunday.

ROM. 8.16.

The Spirit it ſelfe beareth witneſſe with our ſpirit, that we are the children of God.

I Take theſe words, to take occaſion by them, to ſay ſomething of the holy Ghoſt: Our order propoſed at firſt, requires it, and our Text affords it. Since we ſpeak by Him, let us love to ſpeak of Him, and to ſpeak for Him: but in both, to ſpeak with Him, that is, ſo, as he hath ſpoken of himſelfe to us in the Scriptures. God will be viſited, but he will not be importuned; He will be looked upon, but he will not be pryed into. A man may flatter the beſt man; If he do not beleeve himſelf, when he ſpeaks well of another, and when he praiſes him, though that which he ſayes of him be true, yet he flatters; So an Atheiſt, that temporiſes, and ſerves the company, and ſeemes to aſſent, flatters. A man may flatter the Saints in heaven, if he attribute to them that which is not theirs; and ſo a Papiſt flatters. A man may flatter God himſelf; If upon pretence of magnifying Gods mercy, he will ſay with Origen, That God at laſt will have mercy upon the devill, he flatters. So, though God be our buſineſſe, we may be too buſie with God; and though God be infinite, we may go beyond God, when we conceive, or ſpeak otherwiſe of God, then God hath revealed unto us. By his own light therefore we ſhall look upon him; and with that reverence, and modeſty, that That Spirit may beare witneſſe to our ſpirit, that we are the children of God.

Diviſio. That which we ſhall ſay of theſe words, will beſt be conceived, and retained beſt, if we handle them thus; That whereas Chriſt hath bidden us to judge our ſelves, that we be not judged, to admit a triall here, leſt we incurre a condemnation hereafter, This text is a good part of that triall, of that judiciall proceeding. For, here are firſt, two perſons that are able to ſay much, The Spirit it ſelf, and Our ſpirit; And ſecondly, their office, their ſervice, They beare witneſſe; And thirdly, their teſtimony, That we are the children of God; And theſe will be our three parts. The firſt will have two branches, becauſe there are two perſons, The Spirit, and Our ſpirit; And the ſecond, two branches, They witneſſe, and They witneſſe together, for ſo the word is; And the third alſo two branches, They teſtifie of us, their teſtimony concernes us, and they teſtifie well of us, That we are the children of God. The perſons are without exception, the Spirit of God cannot be deceived, and the ſpirit of man will not deceive himſelf: Their proceeding is Legall, and faire, they do not libell, they do not whiſper, they do not calumniate; They teſtifie, and they agree in their teſtimony: And laſtly, the caſe is not argued ſo, as amongſt practiſers at the Law, that thereby, by the light of that they may after give Counſell to another in the like, but the teſtimony concernes our ſelves, it is our own caſe, The verdict upon the teſtimony of the Spirit, and our ſpirit, is upon our ſelves, whatſoever it bee; And, bleſſed be the Father, in the Son, by the Holy Ghoſt, The verdict is, That we are the children of God. The Spirit beareth, &c.

1 Part. Firſt then, a ſlackneſſe, a ſupineneſſe, in conſideration of the divers ſignifications of this word Spirit, hath occaſioned divers errours, when the word hath been intended in one ſenſe, and taken in another. All the ſignifications will fall into theſe foure, for theſe foure are very large; It is ſpoken of God, or of Angels, or of men, or of inferiour creatures. And firſt, of God, it is ſpoken ſometimes Eſſentially, ſometimes Perſonally. God is a Spirit, and they that worſhip him, muſt worſhip him in ſpirit and truth. So alſo, The Ægyptians are men, and not God, and their horſes fleſh, and not ſpirit; For, if they were God, they were Spirit. So, God altogether, and conſidered in his Eſſence, is a Spirit: but

A but when the word Spirit is ſpoken, not eſſentially of all, but perſonally of one, then that word deſigneth Spiritum ſanctum, The holy Ghoſt: Goe and baptize, In the name of the Father, and Sonne, & Spiritus ſancti, and the holy Ghoſt. And as of God, ſo of Angels alſo it is ſpoken in two reſpects; of good Angels, Sent forth to miniſter for them, that ſhall be heires of ſalvation, And evill Angels, The lying Spirit, that would deceive the King by the Prophet; The Spirit of Whoredome, ſpirituall whoredome, when the people ask counſell of their ſtocks, And Spiritus vertiginis, The ſpirit of giddineſſe, of perverſities, (as we tranſlate it) which the Lord doth mingle amongſt the people, in his judgement. Of man alſo, is this word Spirit, ſpoken two wayes; The Spirit is ſometimes the ſoule, Into thy hands I commend my Spirit, ſometimes it ſignifies thoſe animall ſpirits, which conſerve us in ſtrength, and vigour, The poyſon of Gods arrowes drinketh up my ſpirit; And alſo, the ſuperiour faculties of the ſoule in a regenerate man, as there, My ſoule doth magnifie the
B Lord, and my ſpirit rejoyceth in God my Saviour. And then laſtly, of inferiour creatures it is taken two wayes too, of living creatures, The God of the ſpirits of all fleſh; and of creatures without life, (other then a metaphoricall life) as of the winde often, and of Ezekiels wheeles, The Spirit of life was in the wheeles. Now in this firſt Branch of this firſt Part of our Text, it is not of Angels, nor of men, nor of other creatures, but of God, and not of God Eſſentially, but Perſonally, that is, of the Holy Ghoſt.

Origen ſayes, Anteceſſores noſtri, The Ancients before him had made this note, That where we finde the word Spirit without any addition, it is alwayes intended of the Holy Ghoſt. Before him, and after him, they ſtuck much to that note; for S. Hierome makes it too, and produces many examples thereof; but yet it will not hold in all. Didymus of Alexandria, though borne blinde, in this light ſaw light, and writ ſo of the Holy Ghoſt, as S. Hierome thought that work worthy of his Tranſlation; And hee gives this note,
C That whereſoever the Apoſtles intend the Holy Ghoſt, they adde to the word Spirit, Sanctus, Holy Spirit, or at leaſt the Article The, The Spirit. And this note hath good uſe too, but yet it is not univerſally true. If we ſupply theſe notes with this, That whenſoever any ſuch thing is ſaid of the Spirit, as cannot conſiſt with the Divine nature, there it is not meant of the Holy Ghoſt, but of his gifts, or of his working; (as, when it is ſaid, The Holy Ghoſt was not yet, (for his perſon was alwayes) And where it is ſaid, Quench not the Holy Ghoſt (for the Holy Ghoſt himſelfe cannot be quenched) we have enough for our preſent purpoſe. Here, it is Spirit without any addition, and therefore fitteſt to bee taken for the Holy Ghoſt; And it is Spirit, with that emphaticall article, The, The Spirit, and in that reſpect alſo fitteſt to be ſo taken. And though it be fitteſt to underſtand the Holy Ghoſt here, not of his perſon, but his operation, yet it gives juſt occaſion to looke piouſly, and to conſider modeſtly, who, and what this perſon is, that doth thus
D worke upon us. And to that purpoſe, we ſhall touch upon foure things: Firſt, His Univerſality, He is All, He is God; Secondly, His Singularity, He is One, One Perſon; Thirdly, His roote from whence he proceeded, Father and Son; And fourthly, His growth; his emanation, his manner of proceeding; for our order propoſed at firſt, leading us now to ſpeak of this third perſon of the Trinity, it will be almoſt neceſſary, to ſtop a little upon each of theſe.

Firſt then, the Spirit mentioned here, the Holy Ghoſt is God, and if ſo, equall to Father and Son, and all that is God. He is God, becauſe the Eſſentiall name of God is attributed to him; He is called Jehovah; Iehovah ſayes to Eſay, Goe and tell this people, &c. And S. Paul making uſe of theſe words, in the Acts, he ſayes, Well ſpake the Holy Ghoſt, by the Prophet Eſay. The Eſſentiall name of God is attributed to him, and the Eſſentiall Attributes of God. He is Eternall; ſo is none but God; where we heare of the making
E of every thing elſe, in the generall Creation; we heare that the Spirit of God moved, but never that the Spirit was made. He is every where; ſo is none but God; whither ſhall I goe from thy Spirit? He knowes all things; ſo doth none but God; The Spirit ſearcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. He hath the name of God, the Attributes of God, and he does the works of God. Is our Creator, our Maker, God? The Spirit of God hath made me. Is he that can change the whole Creation, and frame of nature, in doing miracles, God? The Spirit lead the Iſraelites miraculouſly through the wilderneſſe. Will the calling and the ſending of the Prophets, ſhew him to be God? The Lord God, and his Spirit hath ſent me. Is it argument enough for his God-head, that he ſent Chriſt himſelfe? Chriſt himſelfe applies to himſelfe that, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, and hath anointed

All that which S. Iohn intends, in the ſeaven Spirits, which are about the Throne, is in this One, in this onely Spirit, who is Vnicus & ſeptiformis, ſolus & multiplex; One and yet ſeaven, Auguſt. 1 Cor. 12. 4. that is infinite; for, Though there be diverſity of gifts, yet there is but one Spirit. He is God, becauſe the eſſentiall name of God is his; Therefore let us call upon his name: And becauſe the Attributes of God are his; Therefore let us attribute to him, All Might, Majeſty, Dominion, Power, and Glory: And he is God, becauſe the Works of God are his; Therefore let us co-operate, and work with this Spirit, and we ſhall be the ſame 1 Cor. 6. 17. Spirit with him.

Perſona. He is God, That was our firſt ſtep, and our ſecond is, that he is a diſtinct Perſon in the God-head. He is not Virtus à Deo in homine exaltata, Not the higheſt and powerfulleſt working of God in man; Not Afflatus Divinus, The breathing of God into the ſoule of man; Theſe are low expreſſions; for they are all but Dona, Chariſmata, The gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, not the Holy Ghoſt himſelfe: But he is a diſtinct perſon, as the taking of the ſhape of a Dove, and the ſhape of fiery tongues doe declare, which are acts of a diſtinct perſon. It is not the Power of the King, that ſignes a pardon, but his Perſon. When the power of the Government was in two Perſons, in the two Conſuls at Rome, yet the ſeverall acts were done by their ſeverall Perſons. Wilt thou ask me, What needs theſe three Perſons? Is there any thing in the three Perſons, that is not in the one God? Yes, The Father, the Son, the Holy Ghoſt, fals not in the bare conſideration of that one God. Wilt thou ſay, What if they doe not? What lack we if we have one Almighty God? Though that God had no Son, nor they two, no Holy Ghoſt? We lacked our redemption; we lacked all our direction; wee lacked the revealed will of God, the Scriptures; we have not God, if we have him not, as he hath delivered himſelfe; and he hath done that in the Scriptures; and we imbrace him, as we finde him there; and we finde him there, to be one God in three Perſons, and the Holy Ghoſt to bee one of thoſe three; and in them we reſt.

Ex filio. He is one; but one that proceeds from two, from the Father, and from the Son. Some in the Greek Church, in later times, denied the proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt from the Son; but this was eſpecially a jealouſie in termes; They thought that to make him proceed from two, were to make duo principia, two roots, two beginnings from whence the Holy Ghoſt ſhould proceed, and that might not be admitted, for the Father, and the Son are but one cauſe of the Holy Ghoſt, (if we may uſe that word, Cauſe, in this myſtery.) And therefore it is as ſuſpiciouſly, and as dangerouſly ſaid by the Maſter of the Sentences, and by the later Schoole, That the Holy Ghoſt proceeds Minùs Principaliter, Not ſo radically from the Son, as from the Father; for, in this action, The Father and the Son are but one roote, and the Holy Ghoſt equally from both: In the generation

A ration of the Son, the Father is in order before the Son, but in the proceſſion of the holy Ghoſt, he is not ſo. He is from both; for where he is firſt named, he is called Spiritus Elohim, The Spirit of Gods, in the plurall. In this Chapter, in the ninth verſe, he is the Spirit of the Son, If any man have not the Spirit of Chriſt, he is none of his; And ſo in the Apoſtle, God hath ſent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts. God ſent him, and Chriſt ſent him, If I depart, I will ſend the Comforter unto you. He ſent him after he went, and he gave him when he was here, He breathed upon his Apoſtles, and ſaid, Receive ye the holy Ghoſt. So he is of both.

But by what manner comes he from them? By proceeding. That is a very generall word; for, Creation is proceeding, and ſo is Generation too: Creatures proceed from God, and ſo doth God the Son proceed from God the Father; what is this proceeding of the holy Ghoſt, that is not Creation, nor Generation? Exponant cur & quomodo Spiritus pulſat in arteriis, & tum in proceſſionem Spiritus ſancti inquirant: When they are

B able clearly, and with full ſatisfaction to tell themſelves how and from whence that ſpirit proceeds, which beats in their pulſe, let them inquire how this Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Sonne. And let them think till they be mad, and ſpeak till they be hoarce, and reade till they be blind, and write till they be lame, they muſt end with S. Auguſtine, Diſtinguere inter Proceſsionem, & Generationem, neſcio, non valeo, non ſufficio, I cannot diſtinguiſh, I cannot aſſigne a difference between this Generation, and this Proceeding. We uſe to ſay, they differ principio, That the Son is from the Father alone, the holy Ghoſt from both: but when this is ſaid, that muſt be ſaid too, That both Father and Son are but one beginning. We uſe to ſay, They differ ordine, becauſe the Son is the ſecond, and the holy Ghoſt the third perſon; but the ſecond was not before the third in time, nor is above him in dignity.

C There is proceſsio corporalis, ſuch a bodily proceeding, as that that which proceeds is utterly another thing then that from which it proceeds: frogs proceed (perchance) of ayre, and miſe of duſt, and worms of carkaſſes; and they reſemble not that ayre, that duſt, thoſe carkaſſes that produced them. There is alſo proceſsio Metaphyſica, when thoughts proceed out of the minde; but thoſe thoughts remaine ſtill in the mind within, and have no ſeparate ſubſiſtence in themſelves: And then there is proceſsio Hyperphyſica, which is this which we ſeek and finde in our ſoules, but not in our tongues, a proceeding of the holy Ghoſt ſo from Father and Son, as that he remaines a ſubſiſtence alone, a diſtinct perſon of himſelfe. This is as far as the Schoole can reach, Ortu, qui relationis eſt, non eſt à ſe; Actu, qui perſona eſt, per ſe ſubſiſtit: Conſider him in his proceeding, ſo he muſt neceſſarily have a relation to another, Conſider him actually in his perſon, ſo he ſubſiſts of himſelfe. And De modo, for the manner of his proceeding, we need, we can ſay but this,

D As the Son proceeds per modũ intellectus, (ſo as the mind of man conceives a thought) ſo the holy Ghoſt proceeds per modum voluntatis; when the mind hath produced a thought, that mind, and that diſcourſe and ratiocination produce a will; firſt our underſtanding is ſetled, and that underſtanding leads our will. And nearer then this (though God knows this be far off) we cannot goe, to the proceeding of the holy Ghoſt.

This then is The Spirit, The third perſon in the Trinity, but the firſt perſon in our Text, The other is our ſpirit, The Spirit beareth witneſſe with our ſpirit. I told you before, that amongſt the manifold acceptations of the word ſpirit, as it hath relation particularly to man, it is either the ſoul it ſelf, or the vitall ſpirits, (the thin and active parts of the bloud) or the ſuperiour faculties of the ſoul, in a regenerate man; & that is our ſpirit in this place. So S. Paul diſtinguiſhes ſoul and ſpirit, The word of God pierces to the dividing aſunder ſoule and ſpirit; where The ſoule is that which inanimates the body, and enables the organs of

Heb. 4. 12.

E the ſenſes to ſee and heare; The ſpirit is that which enables the ſoule to ſee God, and to heare his Goſpel. The ſame phraſe hath the ſame uſe in another place, I pray God your ſpirit, and ſoule, and body may be preſerved blameleſſe: Where it is not ſo abſurdly ſaid, (though a very great man call it an abſurd expoſition) That the ſoule, Anima, is that, qua animales homines, (as the Apoſtle calls them) that by which men are men, naturall men, carnall men, And the ſpirit is the ſpirit of Regeneration, by which man is a new creature, a ſpirituall man, But that, that Expoſitor himſelfe hath ſaid enough to our preſent purpoſe, The ſoule is the ſeat of Affections, The ſpirit is rectified Reaſon. It is true, this Reaſon is the Soveraigne, theſe Affections are the Officers, this Body is the Executioner: Reaſon authorizes, Affections command, the Body executes: And when we conceive in our mind,

1 Theſ. 5. 23. Calvin.

deſire in our heart, performe in our body nothing that diſpleaſes God, then have we had benefit of S. Pauls prayer, That in body, and ſoule, and ſpirit we may be blameleſſe. In ſumme, we need ſeek no farther for a word to expreſſe this ſpirit, but that which is familiar to us, Rom. 9. 1. The Conſcience: A rectified conſcience is this ſpirit; My conſcience bearing me witneſſe, ſayes the Apoſtle: And ſo we have both the perſons in this judiciall proceeding; The Spirit is the holy Ghoſt; Our ſpirit is our Conſcience: And now their office is to teſtifie, to beare witneſſe, which is our ſecond generall part, The Spirit bears witneſſe, &c.

2 Part. To be a witneſſe, is not an unworthy office for the holy Ghoſt himſelfe: Heretiques in their peſtilent doctrines, Tyrans in their bloody perſecutions, call God himſelfe ſo often, ſo far into queſtion, as that he needs ſtrong and pregnant teſtimony to acquit him. Firſt, againſt Heretiques, we ſee the whole Scripture is but a Teſtament; and Teſtamentum is Teſtatio mentis, it is but an atteſtation, a proofe what the will of God is: And therefore when Tertullian deprehended himſelfe to have ſlipped into another word, and to have called the Bible Inſtrumentum, he retracts and corrects himſelfe thus, Magis uſui eſt dicere Teſtamentum quàm Inſtrumentum, It is more proper to call the Scripture a Teſtament, then a Conveyance or Covenant: All the Bible is Teſtament, Atteſtation, Declaration, Proofe, Evidence of the will of God to man. And thoſe two witneſſes ſpoken of Apoc. 11. 2. in the Revelation, are very conveniently, very probably interpreted to be the two Teſtaments; And to the Scriptures Chriſt himſelfe refers the Jews, Search them, for they Iohn 5. 39. beare witneſſe of me. The word of God written by the holy Ghoſt is a witneſſe, and ſo the holy Ghoſt is a witneſſe againſt Heretiques. Againſt Tyrans and Perſecuters, the office of a witneſſe is an honourable office too; for that which we call more paſſionately, and more gloriouſly Martyrdome, is but Teſtimony; A Martyr is nothing but a Witneſſe. He that pledges Chriſt in his own wine, in his own cup, in bloud; He that waſhes away his ſins in a ſecond Baptiſme, and hath found a lawfull way of Re-baptizing, even in bloud; He that waters the Prophets ploughing, and the Apoſtles ſowing with bloud; He that can be content to bleed as long as a Tyran can foame, or an Executioner ſweat; He that is pickled, nay embalmed in bloud, ſalted with fire, and preſerved in his owne aſhes; He that (to contract all, nay to enlarge beyond all) ſuffers in the Inquiſition, when his body is upon the rack, when the rags are in his throat, when the boots are upon his legs, when the ſplinters are under his nailes, if in thoſe agonies he have the vigour to ſay, I ſuffer this to ſhew what my Saviour ſuffered, muſt yet make this difference, He ſuffered as a Saviour, I ſuffer but as a witneſſe. But yet to him that ſuffers as a Martyr, as a witneſſe, a crowne is reſerved; It is a happy and a harmonious meeting in Stephens martyrdome; Proto-martyr, and Stephanus; that the firſt Martyr for Chriſt ſhould have a Crown in his name. Such a bleſſed meeting there is in Ioaſh his Coronation, Poſuit ſuper eum Diadema & Teſtimonium, They put the Crowne upon his head, and the Teſtimony; 2 King. 11. 12. that is, The Law, which teſtified, That as he had the Crowne from God, ſo he had it with a witneſſe, with an obligation, that his Government, his life, and (if need were) his death ſhould teſtifie his zeale to him that gave him that Crowne.

Thus the holy Ghoſt himſelfe is a witneſſe againſt Heretiques in the word; and thoſe men who are full of the holy Ghoſt, (as Stephen was) are witneſſes againſt perſecution, in action, in paſſion. At this time, and by occaſion of theſe words, we conſider principally the firſt, The teſtification of the holy Ghoſt himſelfe; and therein we conſider thus much more, That a witneſſe ever teſtifies of ſome matter of fact, of ſomething done before; The holy Ghoſt, the Spirit here, (as we ſhall ſee anon) witneſſes that we are the children of God. Now if a Witneſſe prove that I am a Tenant to ſuch Land, or Lord of it, I doe not become Lord nor Tenant by this Witneſſe, but his teſtimony proves that I was ſo before. I have therefore a former right to be the child of God, that is, The eternall Election of God in Chriſt Jeſus. Chriſt Jeſus could as well have diſobeyed his Father, and ſaid, I will not goe, or diſappointed his Father, and ſaid, I will not goe yet, as he could have diſ-furniſhed his Father, and ſaid, He would not redeem me. The holy Ghoſt bears witneſſe, that is, he pleads, he produces that eternall Decree for my Election. And upon ſuch Evidence ſhall I give ſentence againſt my ſelfe? Si teſtaretur Angelus, vel Archangelus, poſſet quiſquam addubitare? I ſhould not doubt the teſtimony of an Angel, or Archangel, and yet Angels and Archangels, all ſorts of Angels were deceivers in the Serpent. And therefore the Apoſtle preſents it (though impoſſible in it ſelfe) as a thing Gal. 1. 8. that might fall into our miſ-apprehenſion: If we, (that is, the Apoſtles) or if an Angel from

A from heaven preach any other Goſpel, Anathema ſit, let him be accurſed. But Quando Deus teſtatur, quis locus relinquitur dubitationi? when God teſtifies to me, it is a rebellious ſin to doubt: And therefore how hyperbolically ſoever S. Paul argue there, If Apoſtles, If Angels teach the contrary, teach falſe Doctrine, it never entred into his argument (though an argument ab Impoſsibili) to ſay, If God ſhould teach, or teſtifie falſe doctrine. Though then there be a former evidence for my being the child of God, a Decree in heaven, yet it is not enough that there is ſuch a Record, but it muſt be produced, it muſt be pleaded, it muſt be teſtified to be that, it muſt have the witneſſe of the Spirit, and by that, Innoteſcit, though it doe not become my Election then, it makes my election appeare then, and though it be not Introductory, it is Declaratory. The Root is in the Decree, the firſt fruits are in the teſtimony of the Spirit; but even that ſpirit will not be teſtis ſingularis, he will not be heard alone, and ſingle, but it is Cum ſpiritu noſtro, The Spirit teſtifies with
B our ſpirit, &c.

The holy Ghoſt will fulfill his owne law, In ore duorum, In the mouth of two witneſſes. Sometimes our ſpirit bears witneſſe of ſome things appertaining to the next world, without the teſtimony of the holy Ghoſt: Tertullian in that excellent Book of his, De teſtimonio Animæ, Of the teſtimony which the ſoule of man gives of it ſelfe to it ſelfe, where he ſpeaks of the ſoule of a naturall, an unregenerate man, gives us juſt occaſion to ſtop a little upon that conſideration. If, ſayes he, we for our Religion produce your own Authors againſt you, (he ſpeaks to naturall men, ſecular Philoſophers) and ſhew you out of them, what Paſſions, what Vices even they impute to thoſe whom you have made your Gods, then you ſay, they were but Poetæ vani, Thoſe Authors were but vaine, and frivolous Poets: But when thoſe Authors ſpeake any thing which ſound againſt our Religion, then they are Philoſophers, and reverend and claſſique Authors. And therefore,
C ſayes he, I will draw no witneſſe from them, Perverſæ fælicitatis, quibus in falſo potiùs creditur, quàm in vero, Becauſe they have this perverſe, this left-handed happineſſe, to be beleeved when they lye, better then when they ſay true. Novum teſtimonium adduco, ſaies he; I wayve all them, and I call upon a new witneſſe: A witneſſe, Omni literaturi notius, More legible then any Character, then any text hand, for it is the intimation of mine owne ſoule, and conſcience; and Omni Editione vulgatius, More publique, more conſpicuous then any Edition, any impreſſion of any Author, for Editions may be called in, but who can call in the teſtimony of his owne ſoule? He proceeds, Te ſimplicem, & Idioticum compello, I require but a ſimple, an unlearned ſoule, Qualem te habent, qui te ſolam habent, Such a ſoule, as that man hath, who hath nothing but a ſoule, no learning; Imperitia tua mihi opus eſt, quoniam aliquantula peritiæ tuæ nemo credit; I ſhall have the more uſe of thy teſtimony, the more ignorant thou art, for, in ſuch caſes, Art is ſuſpicious, and from them
D who are able to prove any thing, we beleeve nothing; And therefore, ſaies he, Nolo Academiis, bibliothecis inſtructam, I call not a ſoule made in an Univerſity, or nurſed in a Library, but let this ſoule come now, as it came to me in my Mothers wombe, an inartificiall, an unexperienced ſoule; And then, (to contract Tertullians Contemplation) he proceeds to ſhew the notions of the Chriſtian Religion, which are in ſuch a ſoule naturally, and which his ſpirit, that is, his rectified reaſon, rectified but by nature, is able to infuſe into him. And certainly, ſome of that, which is proved by the teſtimony mentioned in this text, is proved by the teſtimony of our owne naturall ſoule, in that Poet whom the Apoſtle cites, that ſaid, Genus ejus, We are the off-ſpring of God. Acts 17.28.

So then our ſpirit beares witneſſe ſometimes when the Spirit does not; that is, Nature teſtifies ſome things, without addition of particular grace: And then the Spirit, the Holy Ghoſt oftentimes teſtifies, when ours does not: How often ſtands he at the doore,
E and knocks? How often ſpreads he his wings, to gather us, as a Hen her chickens? How often preſents he to us the power of God in the mouth of the Preacher, and we beare witneſſe to one another of the wit and of the eloquence of the Preacher, and no more? How often he bears witneſſe, that ſuch an action is odious in the ſight of God, and our ſpirit beares witneſſe, that it is acceptable, profitable, honourable in the ſight of man? How often he beares witneſſe, for Gods Judgements, and our ſpirit depoſes for mercy, by preſumption, and how often he teſtifies for mercy, and our ſpirit ſweares for Judgement, in deſperation? But when the Spirit, and our ſpirit agree in their teſtimony, That he hath ſpoke comfortably to my ſoule, and my ſoule hath apprehended comfort by that ſpeech, That, (to uſe Chriſts ſimilitude) He hath piped, and we have danced, He hath ſhewed me my Saviour, and my Spirit hath rejoyced in God my Saviour, He depoſes for the Decree of my Election, and I depoſe for the ſeales and marks of that Decree, Theſe two witneſſes, The Spirit, and My ſpirit, induce a third witneſſe, the world it ſelfe, to teſtifie that which is the teſtimony of this text, That I am the child of God. And ſo we paſſe from the two former parts, The perſons, The Spirit, and our ſpirit, And their office, to witneſſe, and to agree in their witneſſe, and we are fallen into our third part, The Teſtimony it ſelfe, That we are the Children of God.

3. Part. This part hath alſo two branches; Firſt, That the Teſtimony concernes our ſelves, We are, And then, That that which we are is this, We are the Children of God. And in the firſt branch, there will be two twiggs, two ſub-conſiderations; [1] Wee, A perſonall appropriation of the grace of God to our ſelves, [2] We are, we are now, a preſent poſſeſſion of thoſe Graces. Firſt, conſider we the Conſolation in the particle of appropriation, Wee. In the great Ant-hill of the whole world, I am an Ant; I have my part in the Creation, I am a Creature; But there are ignoble Creatures. God comes nearer; In the great field of clay, of red earth, that man was made of, & mankind, I am a clod; I am a man, I have my part in the Humanity; But Man was worſe then annihilated again. When ſatan in that ſerpent was come, as Hercules with his club into a potters ſhop, and had broke all the veſſels, deſtroyed all mankind, And the gracious promiſe of a Meſſias to redeeme all mankind, was ſhed and ſpread upon all, I had my drop of that dew of Heaven, my ſparke of that fire of heaven, in the univerſall promiſe, in which I was involved; But this promiſe was appropriated after, in a particular Covenant, to one people, to the Jewes, to the ſeed of Abraham. But for all that I have my portion there; for all that profeſſe Chriſt Jeſus are by a ſpirituall engrafting, and tranſmigration, and tranſplantation, in and of that ſtock, and that ſeed of Abraham; and I am one of thoſe. But then, of thoſe who doe profeſſe Chriſt Jeſus, ſome grovell ſtill in the ſuperſtitions they were fallen into, and ſome are raiſed, by Gods good grace, out of them; and I am one of thoſe; God hath afforded me my ſtation, in that Church, which is departed from Babylon.

Now, all this while, my ſoule is in a cheerefull progreſſe; when I conſider what God did for Goſhen in Egypt, for a little parke in the midſt of a foreſt; what he did for Jury, in the midſt of enemies, as a ſhire that ſhould ſtand out againſt a Kingdome round about it: How many Sancerraes he hath delivered from famins, how many Genevaes from plots, and machinations againſt her; all this while my ſoule is in a progreſſe: But I am at home, when I conſider Buls of excommunications, and ſolicitations of Rebellions, and piſtols, and poyſons, and the diſcoveries of thoſe; There is our Nos, We, teſtimonies that we are in the favour, and care of God; We, our Nation, we, our Church; There I am at home; but I am in my Cabinet at home, when I conſider, what God hath done for me, and my ſoule; There is the Ego, the particular, the individuall, I. This appropriation is the conſolation, We are; But who are they? or how are we of them? Teſtimonium eſt clamor ipſe, ſayes S. Chryſoſtome to our great advantage, Even this, that we are able to cry Ver. 15. Abba, Father, by the Spirit of Adoption, is this teſtimony, that we are his Children; if we can truly do that, that teſtifies for us. The Spirit teſtifies two wayes; Directly, expreſly, Luke 5.20. perſonally, as in that, Man, thy ſins are forgiven thee, And ſo to David by Nathan, Tranſtulit, The Lord hath taken away thy ſin; And then he teſtifies, Per indicia, by conſtant marks, and infallible evidences. We are not to looke for the firſt, for it is a kind of Revelation, nor are we to doubt of the ſecond, for the marks are infallible. And therefore, as S. Auguſtine ſaid of the Maniches, concerning the Scriptures, Inſani ſunt adverſus Antidotum, quo ſani eſſe poſſunt, They are enraged againſt that, which onely can cure them of their rage, that was, the Scriptures; ſo there are men, which will ſtill be in ignorance of that which might cure them of their ignorance, becauſe they will not labour to finde in themſelves, the marks and ſeales of thoſe who are ordained to ſalvation, they will needs thinke, that no man can have any ſuch teſtimony.

Summus. They ſay, It is true, there is a bleſſed comfort, in this appropriation, if we could be ſure of it; They may; we are; we are already in poſſeſſion of it. The marks of our ſpirituall filiation, are leſſe ſubject to error, then of temporall. Shall the Mothers honeſty be the Evidence? Alas, we have ſome ſuch examples of their falſhood, as will diſcredit any argument, built meerely upon their truth. He is like the Father; Is that the evidence? Imagination may imprint thoſe Characters: He hath his land; A ſuppoſititious child may have that. Spirituall marks are not ſo fallible as theſe: They have ſo much in them,

A as creates even a knowledge, Now we are the Sons of God, and we know that we ſhall be like him; And we know, that we are of God. Is all this but a conjecturall knowledge, but a morall certitude? No tincture of faith in it? Can I acquire, and muſt I bring Certitudinem fidei, an aſſurance out of faith, That a Councell cannot erre; And then, ſuch another faithfull aſſurance, That the Councell of Trent was a true councell; And then another, That the Councell of Trent did truly and duly proceed in all wayes eſſentiall to the truth of a Councell, in conſtituting their Decree againſt this doctrine? And may I not bring this aſſurance of faith to S. Paul, and S. Iohn when they ſay the contrary? Is not S. Pauls ſumus, and S. Iohns ſcimus, as good a ground for our faith, as the ſervile and mercenary voices of a herd of new penſionary Biſhops, ſhovelled together at Trent for that purpoſe, are for the contrary? 1 Iohn 3. 2. 5. 19.

A particular Biſhop in the Romane Church, cites an univerſall Biſhop, a Pope himſelfe in this point, and he ſayes well, Legem credendi ſtatuit lex ſupplicandi, Whatſoever we may pray for, we may, we muſt beleeve Certitudine fidei, With an aſſurance of faith; If I may pray, and ſay Pater noſter, if I may call God Father, I may beleeve with a faithfull aſſurance, that I am the childe of God. Stet invicta Pauli ſententia, Let the Apoſtles doctrine, ſayes that Biſhop, remain unſhaked; Et velut ſagitta, ſayes he, This doctrine, as an arrow ſhot at them, will put out their eyes that think to ſee beyond S. Paul. It is true, ſayes that Biſhop, there are differences, Inter Catholicos, Amongſt Catholiques themſelves in this point; And then, why do they charge us, whom they defame, by the name of Heretiques, with beginning this doctrine, which was amongſt themſelves before we were at all, if they did date us aright? Atteſtatur ſpiritus, & ei damus fidem, & inde certi ſumus, ſayes that Biſhop: The holy Ghoſt beares witneſſe, and our ſpirit with him, and thereby we are ſure: but, ſayes he, they will needs make a doubt whether this be a knowledge out of faith; which doubt, ſayes he, Secum fert abſurditatem, There is an abſurdity, a contradiction in the very doubt: Ex Spiritu ſancto, & humana? Is it a knowledge from the holy Ghoſt, and is it not a divine knowledge then? But, ſay they, (as that Biſhop preſſes their objections) The holy Ghoſt doth not make them know, that it is the holy Ghoſt that aſſures them; This is, ſayes he, as abſurd as the other; For, Niſi ſe teſtantem inſinuet, non teſtatur, Except he make them diſcern, that he is a witneſſe, he is no witneſſe to them: He ends it thus, Suſtinere coguntur quod excidit; and that is indeed their caſe, in very many things controverted; Then when it conduced to their advantage in argument, or to their profit in purſe, ſuch and ſuch things fell from them, and now that oppoſition is made againſt ſuch ſayings of theirs, their profit lyes at ſtake, and their reputation too, to make good, and to maintain that which they have once, how undiſcreetly ſoever, ſaid. Some of their ſevereſt later men, even of their Jeſuits, acknowledges that we may know our ſelves to be the children of God, with as good a knowledge, as that there is a Rome, or a Conſtantinople, And ſuch an aſſurance as delivers them from all feare that they ſhall fall away; and is not this more then that aſſurance which we take to our ſelves? We give no ſuch aſſurance as may occaſion ſecurity, or ſlackneſſe in the ſervice of God, and they give ſuch an aſſurance as may remove all feare and ſuſpition of falling from God. Catarinus. Idem. Vegas. Pererius.

It was truly good counſell in S. Gregory, when, writing to one of the Empreſſes bedchamber, a religious Lady of his own name, who had written to him, that ſhe ſhould never leave importuning him, till he ſent her word, that he had received a revelation from God that ſhe was ſaved: for, ſayes he, Rem difficilem poſtulas, & inutilem, It is a hard matter you require, and an impertinent, and uſeleſſe matter: for I am not a man worthy to receive revelations, and beſides, ſuch a revelation as you require, might make you too ſecure: And Mater negligentiæ ſolet eſſe ſecuritas, (ſayes he) Such a ſecurity might make you negligent in thoſe duties which ſhould make ſure your ſalvation. S. Auguſtine felt the witneſſe of The Spirit, but not of his ſpirit, when he ſtood out ſo many ſolicitations of the holy Ghoſt, and deferred, and put off the outward meanes, his Baptiſme. In that ſtate, when he had a diſpoſition to Baptiſme, he ſayes of himſelfe, Inferbui exultando, ſed inhorrui timendo; Still I had a fervent joy in me, becauſe I ſaw the way to thee, and intended to put my ſelfe into that way, but yet, becauſe I was not yet in it, I had a trembling, a jealouſie, a ſuſpition of my ſelf. Inſinuati ſunt mihi in profundo nutus tui, In that halfe darkneſſe, in that twi-light I diſcerned thine eye to be upon me; Et gaudens in fide, laudavi nomen tuum, And this, ſayes he, created a kinde of faith, a confidence in me, and this induced an inward joy, and that produced a praiſing of thy goodneſſe, Sed ea fides ſecurum me non eſſe ſinebat, But all this did not imprint, and eſtabliſh that ſecurity, that aſſurance which I found as ſoon as I came to the outward ſeales, and marks, and teſtimonies of thine inſeparable preſence with me, in thy Baptiſme, and other Ordinances. S. Bernard puts the marks of as much aſſurance, as we teach, in theſe words of our Saviour, Surge, tolle grabatum, & ambula, Ariſe, Take up thy bed, and walk. Surge ad divina, Raiſe thy thoughts upon the next world; Tolle corpus, ut non te ferat, ſed tu illud, Take up thy body, bring thy body into thy power, that thou govern it, and not it thee; And then, Ambula, non retroſpicias, Walk on, proceed forward, and looke not backe with a delight upon thy former ſins: And a great deale an elder man then Bernard, expreſſes it well, Bene viventibus perhibet teſtimonium, quòd jam ſumus filii Dei, To him that lives according to a right faith, the Spirit teſtifies that he is now the childe of God, Et quòd talia faciendo, perſeverabimus in ea filiatione, He carries this teſtimony thus much farther, That if we endeavour to continue in that courſe, we ſhall continue in that ſtate, of being the children of God, and never be caſt off, never diſinherited. Herein is our aſſurance, an election there is; The Spirit beares witneſſe to our ſpirit, that it is ours; We teſtifie this in a holy life; and the Church of God, and the whole world joynes in this teſtimony, That we are the children of God; which is our laſt branch, and concluſion of all.

Remigius.

The holy Ghoſt could not expreſſe more danger to a man, then when he calls him Filium ſæculi, The childe of this world; Nor a worſe diſpoſition, then when he cals him, Filium diffidentiæ, The childe of diffidence, and diſtruſt in God; Nor a worſe purſuer of that ill diſpoſition, then when he calls him Filium diaboli, (as S. Peter calls Elymas) The childe of the devill; Nor a worſe poſſeſſing of the devill, then when he calls him Filium perditionis, The childe of perdition; Nor a worſe execution of all this, then when he calls him Filium gehennæ, The childe of hell: The childe of this world, The childe of deſperation, The childe of the devill, The childe of perdition, The childe of hell, is a high expreſſing, a deep aggravating of his damnation; That his damation is not only his purchaſe, as he hath acquired it, but it is his inheritance, he is the childe of damnation. So is it alſo a high exaltation, when the holy Ghoſt draws our Pedegree from any good thing, and calls us the children of that: As, when he cals us Filios lucis, The children of light, that we have ſeen the day-ſtar ariſe, when he cals us Filios ſponſi, The children of the bride-chamber, begot in lawfull marriage upon the true Church, theſe are faire approaches to the higheſt title of all, to be Filii Dei, The children of God; And not children of God, Per filiationem veſtigii, (ſo every creature is a childe of God) by having an Image, and impreſſion of God, in the very Beeing thereof, but children ſo, as that we are heires, and heires ſo, as that we are Co-heires with Chriſt, as it follows in the next verſe, and is implyed in this name, Children of God.

Luk. 16.18. Ephes. 5.6. Acts 13.10. John 17. Mat. 23.15.

John 12.36. Mat. 9.15.

Heires of heaven, which is not a Gavel-kinde, every ſon, every man alike; but it is an univerſall primogeniture, every man full, ſo full, as that every man hath all, in ſuch meaſure, as that there is nothing in heaven, which any man in heaven wants. Heires of the joyes of heaven; Joy in a continuall dilatation of thy heart, to receive augmentation of that which is infinite, in the accumulation of eſſentiall and accidentall joy. Joy in a continuall melting of indiſſoluble bowels, in joyfull, and yet compaſſionate beholding thy Saviour; Rejoycing at thy being there, and almoſt lamenting (in a kinde of affection, which we can call by no name) that thou couldſt not come thither, but by thoſe wounds, which are ſtill wounds, though wounds glorified. Heires of the joy, and heires of the glory of heaven; where if thou look down, and ſee Kings fighting for Crownes, thou canſt look off as eaſily, as from boyes at ſtool-ball for points here; And from Kings triumphing after victories, as eaſily, as a Philoſopher from a Pageant of children here. Where thou ſhalt not be ſubject to any other title of Dominion in others, but Ieſus of Nazareth King of the Iews, nor ambitious of any other title in thy ſelfe, but that which thou poſſeſſeſt, To be the childe of God. Heires of joy, heires of glory, and heires of the eternity of heaven; Where, in the poſſeſſion of this joy, and this glory, The Angels which were there almoſt 6000. yeares before thee, and ſo preſcribe, and thoſe ſoules which ſhall come at Chriſts laſt comming, and ſo enter but then, ſhall not ſurvive thee, but they, and thou, and all, ſhall live as long as he that gives you all that life, as God himſelfe.

Heires to heaven, and co-heires with Chriſt: There is much to be ſaid of that circumſtance;

A ſtance; but who ſhall ſay it? I that ſhould ſay it, have ſaid ill of it already, in calling it a Circumſtance. To be co-heires with Chriſt, is that Eſſentiall ſalvation it ſelfe; and to that he intitled us, when after his Reſurrection he ſaid of us, Goe tell my brethren that I am gone. When he was but borne of a woman, and ſubmitted to the law, when in his minority, he was but a Carpenter, and at full age, but a Preacher, when they accuſed him in generall, that he was a Malefactor, or elſe they would not have delivered him, but they knew not the name of his fault, when a fault of ſecular cognizance was objected to him, that he moved ſedition, that he denied tribute, And then a fault of Eccleſiaſticall cognizance, that he ſpoke againſt the Law, and againſt the Temple, when Barrabas a ſeditious murderer was preferred before him, and ſaved, and yet two theeves left to accompany him, in his torment and death, in theſe diminutions of Chriſt, there was no great honour, no great cauſe why any man ſhould have any great deſire to be of his kindred; B to be brother, or co-heire to his Croſſe. But if to be his brethren, when he had begun his triumph in his Reſurrection, were a high dignity, what is it to be co-heires with him in heaven, after his Aſcenſion? But theſe are inexpreſſible, unconceivable things; bring it backe to that which is neareſt us; to thoſe ſeales and marks which wee have in this life; That by a holy, a ſanctified paſſage through this life, and out of this life, from our firſt ſeale in Baptiſme, to our laſt ſeale upon our death-bed, The Spirit may beare witneſſe to our ſpirit, that we are the children of God. Amen.

SERM. XXXV.

Preached upon Whitſunday.

MAT. 12. 31.

Wherefore I ſay unto you, All manner of ſin and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven unto men; But the blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt ſhall not be forgiven unto men.

D AS when a Merchant hath a faire and large, a deep and open Sea, into that Harbour to which hee is bound with his Merchandize, it were an impertinent thing for him, to ſound, and ſearch for lands, and rocks, and clifts, which threaten irreparable ſhipwrack; ſo we being bound to the heavenly City, the new Jeruſalem, by the ſpacious and bottomleſſe Sea, the blood of Chriſt Jeſus, having that large Sea opened unto us, in the beginning of this Text, All manner of ſin, and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven unto men, It may ſeeme an impertinent diverſion, to turne into that little Creek, nay upon that deſperate, and irrecoverable rock, The blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhall not be forgiven to men. But there muſt be Diſcoverers, as well as Merchants; for the ſecurity of Merchants, who by ſtorme and tempeſt, or other accidents, may be caſt upon thoſe ſands, and rocks, if they be not knowne, they muſt be knowne. So though we ſaile on, with a merry gale and full ſailes, with the breath of the holy Ghoſt in the firſt Part, All manner of ſin, and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven unto men, yet we ſhall not leave out the diſcovery of that fearfull and ruinating rock too, E But the blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt ſhall not be forgiven unto men.

I would divide the Text, and fewer Parts then two, we cannot make, and this Text hath ſcarce two Parts: The whole Text is a conveiance; it is true; but there is a little Proviſo at the end: The whole Text is a rule; it is true; but there is an exception at the end; The whole text is a Royall Palace; it is true; but there is a Sewar, a Vault behinde it; Chriſt had ſaid all, that of himſelfe he would have ſaid, when he ſaid the firſt part, All manner of ſin and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven to men, But the iniquity of the Phariſees extorted thus much more, But the blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt ſhall not be forgiven unto men: The firſt part is the ſentence, the propoſition, and the ſenſe is perfect in that, All manner of ſin, &c. The laſt part is but a Parentheſis, which Chriſt had rather might have been been left out, but the Phariſees, and their perverſeneſſe inſerted, But the blaſphemy, &c. But ſince it deſerves, and requires our conſideration, as well, that the mercy of God can have any ſtop, any rub, determine any where, as that it can extend, and ſpread it ſelfe ſo farre, as it doth in this text, let us make them two parts: And in the firſt conſider with comfort, the largeneſſe, the expanſion of Gods mercy, that there is but one ſin, that it reacheth not to; And in the ſecond let us conſider with feare, and trembling, that there is one ſin, ſo ſwelling, ſo high, as that even the mercy of God does not reach to it. And in the firſt we ſhall proceed thus, in the magnifying Gods mercy, firſt, in the firſt terme, Sin, we ſhall ſee that ſin is even a wound, a violence upon God; and then Omne peccatum, Every ſin is ſo; and nothing is ſo various, ſo divers as ſin; and even that ſin, that amounts to Blaſphemy, a ſin not onely conceived in the thought, but expreſſed in contumelious words; and thoſe contumelious and blaſphemous words uttered againſt the Son, (for ſo it is expreſſed in the very next verſe) All this ſhall be forgiven: But yet it is in futuro, They ſhall be: No mans ſins are forgiven him, then when he ſins them; but by repentance they ſhall be forgiven; forgiven unto men; that is, firſt, unto any man, and then, unto none but men; for the ſin of the Angels ſhall never be forgiven: And theſe will be the Branches of the firſt Part. And in the ſecond Part, we ſhall looke as farre as this text occaſions it, upon that debated ſin, the ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt, and the irremiſſibleneſſe of that; of which Part, we ſhall derive and raiſe the particular Branches anon, when we come to handle them.

Firſt then, for the firſt terme, Sin, we uſe to ask in the Schoole, whether any action of mans can have rationem demeriti, whether it can be ſaid to offend God, or to deſerve ill of God: for whatſoever does ſo, muſt have ſome proportion with God. With things which are inanimate, things that have no will, and ſo no good nor bad purpoſe, as duſt, or the winde, or ſuch, a man cannot properly be ſo offended, as to ſay that they deſerve ill of him. With thoſe things which have no uſe, no command of their will, as children, and fooles, and mad men, it is ſo too; And then, there is no creature ſo poore, ſo childiſh, ſo impotent in reſpect of man, as the beſt man is in reſpect of God: How then can he ſin, that is, offend, that is, deſerve ill of him? The queſtion begun not in the Schoole; It was asked before of Iob: If thou ſinneſt, what doeſt thou againſt him? or if thy tranſgreſſions be multiplied, what doeſt thou unto him? Thy wickedneſſe may hurt a man as thou art; but what is it to God? for, as Gregory ſayes upon that place, Humana impietas ei nocet, quem pervertendo inquinat, Our ſins hurt them, whom our example leads into tentation; but our ſins cannot draw God to be acceſſory to our ſins, or to make him ſin with us. Our ſin cannot hurt him ſo; nor hurt him directly any way; not his perſon: But his Subjects, whom he hath taken into his protection, it may; His Law, which he hath given for direction, it may; His Honour, of which he is jealous, which Honour conſiſts much in our honouring of him, it may. Wherein is a Kings Perſon violated, by coyning a falſe peny, or counterfaiting a ſeale? and yet this is Treaſon. God cannot be robbed, he cannot be damnified; whatſoever is taken from him (and there is a ſacriledge in all unjuſt takings) whereſoever it be laid, he ſees it, and it is ſtill in his poſſeſſion, and in his houſe, and in his hands. God cannot be robbed, nor God cannot be violated, he cannot be wounded, for he hath no limmes. But God is Vltimus finis, The end to which we all goe, and his Law is the way to that end; And tranſilire lineam, to tranſgreſſe that Law, to leave that way, is a neglecting of him: and even negligences, and pretermiſſions, and ſlightings, are as great offences, as actuall injuries. So God is communis Pater, the Father of all creatures; and ſo the abuſe of the creature reflects upon God, as the injuries done to the children, doe upon the Parents.

Iob 35.6.

If then we can ſin ſo againſt God, as we can againſt the King, and againſt the Law, and againſt Propriety, and againſt Parents; wee have wayes enow of ſinning againſt God. Sin is not therefore ſo abſolutely nothing, as that it is (in no conſideration) other then a privation, onely Abſentia recti, and nothing at all in it ſelfe: but, not to enter farther into that inextricable point, we reſt in this, that ſin is Actus inordinatus, It is not only an obliquity, a privation, but it is an action deprived of that rectitude, which it ſhould have; It does not onely want that rectitude, but it ſhould have that rectitude, and therefore hath a ſinfull want. We ſhall not dare to call ſin meerly, abſolutely nothing, if we conſider either the puniſhment due to ſin, or the pardon of that puniſhment, or the price of that pardon. The puniſhment is everlaſting; why ſhould I beleeve it to be ſo? Os

Domini

A domini locutum, The mouth of the Lord hath ſaid it. But why ſhould it be ſo? Iuſtum eſt ut qui in ſuo æterno peccavit contra Deum, in Dei æterno puniatur, It is but juſtice, that he that ſins in his eternity, ſhould be puniſhed in Gods eternity: Now to ſin in our eternity, is to ſin as long as we live, and if we could live eternally, to deſire to ſin eternally. God can cut off our eternity, he can ſhorten our life; If wee could cut off his eternity, and quench hell, our puniſhment were not eternall. We conſider ſin to be Quoddam infinitum; as it is an averſion from God, who is infinite goodneſſe, it is an infinite thing: and as it is a turning upon the Creature, it is finite, and determined; for all pleaſure taken in the creature, is ſo: and accordingly ſin hath a finite, and an infinite puniſhment: That which we call Pœnam ſenſus, The torment which we feele, is not infinite; (otherwiſe, then by duration) for that torment is not equall in all the damned, and that which is infinite muſt neceſſarily be equall; but that which we call Pœnam damni, The everlaſting
B loſſe of the ſight of the everliving God, that is infinite, and alike, and equall in all the damned. Sin is ſomething then, if we conſider the puniſhment; and ſo it is, if we conſider our deliverance from this puniſhment: That which God could not pardon in the way of juſtice without ſatisfaction, that for which nothing could be a ſatisfaction, but the life of all men, or of one man worth all, the Sonne of God, that that tore the Son out of the armes of his Father, in the Quid dereliquiſti, when he cryed out, why haſt thou forſaken me? That which imprinted in him, who was anointed with the Oyle of gladneſſe above his fellowes, a deadly heavineſſe, in his Triſtis anima, when his ſoule was heavy unto death, That which had power to open Heaven in his deſcent hither, and to open hell, in his deſcent thither, to open the wombe of the Virgin in his Incarnation, and the wombe of the Earth in his Reſurrection, that which could change the frame of Nature in Miracles, and the God of Nature in becomming Man, that that deſerved that puniſhment,
C that that needed that ranſome (ſay the Schoole men what they will of privations) cannot be meerely, abſolutely nothing, but the greateſt thing that can be conceived, and yet that ſhall be forgiven.

That, and all that; Sin, and all ſin: And there is not ſo much of any thing in the world, as of ſin. Every vertue hath two extreames, two vices oppoſed to it; there is two to one; But Abrahams taske was an eaſie taske to tell the ſtars of Heaven; ſo it were to tell the ſands, or haires, or atomes, in reſpect of telling but our owne ſins. And will God ſay to me, Confide Fili, My Son, be of good cheere, thy ſins are forgiven thee? Does he meane all my ſins? He knowes what originall ſin is, and I doe not; and will he forgive me ſin in that roote, and ſin in the branches, originall ſin, and actuall ſin too? He knowes my ſecret ſins, and I doe not; will he forgive my manifeſt ſins, and thoſe ſins too? He knowes my relapſes into ſins repented; and will he forgive my faint repentances, and my rebel-
D lious relapſes after them? will his mercy dive into my heart, and forgive my ſinfull thoughts there, and ſhed upon my lips, and forgive my blaſphemous words there, and bathe the members of this body, and forgive mine uncleane actions there? will he contract himſelfe into himſelfe, and meet me there, and forgive my ſins againſt himſelfe, And ſcatter himſelfe upon the world, and forgive my ſins againſt my neighbour, and empriſon himſelfe in me, and forgive my ſins againſt my ſelfe? Will he forgive thoſe ſins, wherein my practiſe hath exceeded my Parents, and thoſe wherein my example hath miſ-led my children? Will he forgive that dim ſight which I have of ſin now, when ſins ſcarce appeare to be ſins unto me, and will he forgive that over-quick ſight, when I ſhall ſee my ſins through Satans multiplying glaſſe of deſperation, when I ſhall thinke them greater then his mercy, upon my death-bed? In that he ſaid all, he left out nothing, is the Apoſtles argument: and, he is not almighty, if he cannot; his mercy endures not

Sin, and all ſin, even blaſphemy: now blaſphemy is not reſtrained to God alone; other perſons beſides God, other things, beſides perſons, may be blaſphemed. The word of God, the Doctrine, Religion may be blaſphemed. Magiſtracy and Dignities may be blaſphemed. Nay, Omnia quæ ignorant, ſaies that Apoſtle, They blaſpheme all things which they know not. And for perſons, the Apoſtle takes it to his owne perſon, Being blaſphemed, yet we intreat; and he communicates it to all men, Neminem blaſphemare, Blaſpheme no man. Blaſphemy, as it is a contumelious ſpeech, derogating from any man, that good that is in him, or attributing to any man, that ill that is not in him, may be faſtned upon any man. For the moſt part it is underſtood a ſin againſt God, and that directly; and here, by by the manner of Christ expressing himselfe, it is made the greatest sin; All sin, even blasphemy. And yet, a drunkard that cannot name God, will spue out a blasphemy against God: A child that cannot spell God, will stammer out a blasphemy against God: If we smart, we blaspheme God, and we blaspheme him if we be tickled; If I lose at play, I blaspheme, and if my fellow lose, he blasphemes, so that God is alwayes sure to be a loser. An Usurer can shew me his bags, and an Extortioner his houses, the fruits, the revenues of his sinne; but where will the blasphemer shew mee his blasphemy, or what hee hath got by it? The licentious man hath had his love in his armes, and the envious man hath had his enemy in the dust, but wherein hath the blasphemer hurt God? A

In the Schoole we put it for the consummation of the torment of the damned, that at the Resurrection, they shall have bodies, and so be able, even verbally, to blaspheme God; herein we exceed the Devill already, that we can speake blaspemously. There is a rebellious part of the body, that Adam covered with figge leaves, that hath damned many a wretched soule; but yet, I thinke, not more then the tongue; And therefore the B whole torment that Dives suffered in hell, is expressed in that part, Father Abraham, have mercy upon me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and coole my tongue. The Jews that crucified God, will not sound the name of God, and we for whom he was Crucified, belch him out in our surfets, and foame him out in our fury: An Impertinent sin, without occasion before, and an unprofitable sin, without recompence after, and an incorrigible sin too; for, almost what Father dares chide his son for blasphemy, that may not tell him, Sir I learnt it of you? or what Master his servant, that cannot lay the same recrimination upon him? How much then do we need this extent of Gods mercy, that he will forgive sin, and all sin, and even this sin of blasphemy, and (which is also another addition) blasphemy against the Son. C

This emphaticall addition arises out of the connexion in the next verse, A word, (that is, a blasphemous word) against the Son, shall be forgiven. And here wee carry not the word Son so high, as that the Son should be the eternall Son of God, Though words spoken against the eternall Son of God by many bitter and blasphemous Heretiques have beene forgiven: God forbid that all the Photinians who thought that Christ was not at all, till he was borne of the Virgin Mary, That all the Nativitarians, that thought he was from all eternity with God, but yet was not the Son of God, That all the Arians, that thought him the Son of God, but yet not essentially, not by nature, but by grace and adoption, God forbid that all these should be damned, and because they once spoke against the Son, therefore they never repented, or were not received upon repentance. We carry not the word, Son, so high, as to be the eternall Son of God, for it is in the text, Filius hominis, The Son of Man; And, in that acceptation, we doe not meane it, of all D blasphemies that have beene spoken of Christ, as the Son of man, that is, of Christ invested in the humane nature; though blasphemies in that kind have beene forgiven too: God forbid that all the Arians, that thought Christ so much the Son of Man as that he tooke a humane body, but not so much, as that he tooke a humane soule, but that the Godhead it selfe (such a Godhead as they allowed him) was his soule; God forbid that all the Anabaptists that confesse he tooke a body, but not a body of the substance of the Virgin; That all the Carpocratians, that thought onely his soule, and not his body ascended into Heaven, God forbid all these should be damned, and never called to repentance, or not admitted upon it: There were fearfull blasphemies against the Son, as the Son of God, and as the Son of Man, against his Divine, and against his Humane Nature, and those in some of them, by Gods grace forgiven too. But here we consider him onely as the Son of Man, meerely as Man; but as such a Man, so good a Man, as to calumniate him, to blaspheme him, was an inexcusable sin. To say of him, who had fasted E who was The Prince of Peace, should indure such contradiction, This was an inexcusable sin. If any man therefore have had his good intentions mis-construed, his zeale to assist Gods bleeding and fainting cause, called Innovation, his proceeding by wayes good in themselves, to ends good in themselves, called Indiscretion, let him be content to forgive them, any Calumniator, against himselfe, who is but a worme and no man, since God himselfe

A ſelfe forgave them againſt Chriſt, who was ſo Filius hominis, The Son of Man, as that he was the Son of God too.

There is then forgiveneſſe for ſin, for all ſin, even for blaſphemy, for blaſphemy againſt the Son, but it is Infuturo remittetur, It ſhall be forgiven. It is not Remittebatur, It was forgiven; Let no man antidate his pardon, and ſay, His ſins were forgiven in an Eternall Decree, and that no man that hath his name in the book of life, hath the addition, ſinner; that if he were there from the beginning, from the beginning he was no ſinner. It is not, in ſuch a ſenſe, Remittebatur, It was forgiven; nor it is not Remittitur, that even then, when the ſin is committed, it is forgiven, whether the ſinner think of it or no, That God ſees not the ſins of his Children, That God was no more affected with Davids adultery, or his murder, then an indulgent Father is to ſee his child do ſome witty waggiſh thing, or ſome ſportfull ſhrewd turne. It is but Remittetur, Any ſin ſhall be, that is, may be forgiven, if the B meanes required by God, and ordained by him, be entertained. If I take into my contemplation, the Majeſty of God, and the uglineſſe of ſin, If I deveſt my ſelfe of all that was ſinfully got, and inveſt my ſelf in the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt Jeſus, (for elſe I am ill ſuted, and if I clothe my ſelf in Mammon, the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt is no Cloke for that doublet) If I come to Gods Church for my abſolution, and the ſeale of that reconciliation, the bleſſed Sacrament, Remittetur, by thoſe meanes ordained by God any ſin ſhall be forgiven me. But if I relie upon the Remittebatur, That I had my Quietus eſt before hand, in the eternall Decree, or in the Remittuntur, and ſo ſhut mine eyes, in an opinion that God hath ſhut his, and ſees not the ſins of his children, I change Gods Grammer, and I induce a dangerous ſoleciſme, for, it is not They were forgiven before they were committed, nor They are forgiven in the committing, but, They ſhall be, by uſing the meanes ordained by God, they may be; And ſo, They ſhall be forgiven unto men, ſaies C the Text, and that is, firſt, unto every man.

In futuro.

Omni homini

The Kings of the earth are faire and glorious reſemblances of the King of heaven; they are beames of that Sun, Tapers of that Torch, they are like gods, they are gods: The Lord killeth and maketh alive, He bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up: This is the Lord of heaven; The Lords anointed, Kings of the earth do ſo too; They have the diſpenſation of judgement, and of mercy, they execute, and they pardon: But yet, with this difference amongſt many other, that Kings of the earth (for the moſt part, and the beſt, moſt) binde themſelves with an oath, not to pardon ſome offences; The King of heaven ſweares, and ſweares by himſelfe, That there is no ſinner but he can, and would pardon. At firſt, Illuminat omnem hominem, He is the true light, which lightneth every man that commeth into the world; Let that light (becauſe many do interpret that place ſo) let that be but that naturall light, which only man, and every man hath; yet that D light makes him capable of the ſuper-naturall light of grace; for if he had not that reaſonable ſoule, he could not have grace; and even by this naturall light, he is able to ſee the inviſible God, in the viſible creature, and is inexcuſable if he do not ſo. But becauſe this light is (though not put out) brought to a dimneſſe, by mans firſt fall, Therefore John Baptiſt came to beare witneſſe of that light, that all men, through him, might beleeve: God raiſes up a John Baptiſt in every man; every man findes a teſtimony in himſelfe, that he draws curtaines between the light and him; that he runs into corners from that light; that he doth not make that uſe of thoſe helpes which God hath afforded him, as he might.

1 Sam. 2. 6.

John 1. 9.

Ver. 7.

Thus God hath mercy upon all before, by way of prevention; thus he enlightneth every man that commeth into the world: but, becauſe for all this men do ſtumble, even at noon, God hath given Collyrium, an Eye-ſalve to all, by which they may mend their E eye-ſight; He hath opened a poole of Bethesda to all, where not only he that comes at firſt, but he that comes even at laſt, he that comes waſhed with the water of Baptiſme in his infancy, and he that comes waſhed with the teares of Repentance in his age, may receive health and cleanneſſe; For, the Font at firſt, and the death-bed at laſt, are Ciſterns from this poole, and all men, and at all times, may waſh therein: And from this power, and this love of God, is derived both that Catholique promiſe, Quandocunq;, At what time ſoever a ſinner repents, And that Catholique and extenſive Commiſſion, Quorum remiſeritis, Whoſe ſins ſoever you remit, ſhall be remitted. All men were in Adam, becauſe the whole nature, mankinde, was in him; and then, can any be without ſin? All men were in Chriſt too, becauſe the whole nature, mankinde, was in him; and then, can any man be

be excluded from a poſſibility of mercy? There were whole Sects, whole bodies of Heretiques, that denied the communication of Gods grace to others; The Cathari denied that any man had it but themſelves: The Novatians denied that any man could have it again, after he had once loſt it, by any deadly ſin committed after Baptiſme, But there was never any Sect that denied it to themſelves, no Sect of deſpairing men. We have ſome ſomewhere ſprinkled; One in the old Teſtament, Cain, and one in the new, Iudas, and one in the Eccleſiaſtique Story, Iulian; but no body, no Sect of deſpairing men. And therefore he that abandons himſelf to this ſin of deſperation, ſins with the leaſt reaſon of any, for he prefers his ſin above Gods mercy, and he ſins with the feweſt examples of any, for God hath diffuſed this light, with an evidence to all, That all ſins may be forgiven unto men, that is, unto all men; and then, herein alſo is Gods mercy to man magnified, that it is to man, that is, only to man. A Non Angelis Nothing can fall into this compariſon, but Angels; and Angels ſhall not be forgiven: We ſhall be like the Angels, we ſhall participate of their glory which ſtand; But the Angels ſhall never be like us; never return to mercy, after they are fallen. They were Primogeniti Dei, Gods firſt born, and yet diſinherited; and diſinherited without any power, at leaſt, without purpoſe of revocation, without annuities, without penſions, without any preſent ſupply, without any future hope. When the Angels were made, and when they fell, we diſpute; but when they ſhall return, falls not into queſtion. Howſoever Origen vary in himſelfe, or howſoever he fell under that jealouſie, or miſinterpretation, that he thought the devill ſhould be ſaved at laſt, I am ſure his books that are extant, have pregnant and abundant teſtimony of their everlaſting, and irreparable condemnation. To judge by our evidence, (the evidence of Scriptures, for their ſin, and the evidence of our conſcience, for ours, there is none of us that hath not ſinned more then any of them at firſt; and yet Chriſt hath not taken the nature of Angels, but of man, B

Iude 6. and redeemed us, having reſerved them in everlaſting chaines, under darkneſſe: How long? Vnto the judgement of the great day, ſayes that Apoſtle; And is it but till then, then to have an end? Alas no; It is not untill that day, but unto that day; not that that day ſhall end or eaſe their torments which they have, but inflict accidentall torments, which they have not yet; That is, an utter evacuation of that power of ſeducing, which, till that day come, they ſhall have leave to exerciſe upon the ſons of men: To that are they reſerved, and we to that glory, which they have loſt, and loſt for ever; and upon us, is C

Ver. 2. that prayer of the Apoſtle fallen effectually, Mercy, and peace, and love is multiplied unto us; for, ſin, and all ſin, blaſphemy, and blaſphemy againſt the Son, ſhall be, that is, is not, nor was not, but may be forgiven to men, to all men, to none but men; And ſo we paſſe to our ſecond part.

2. Part. Diviſio. In this ſecond part, which ſeemes to preſent a banke even to this Sea, this infinite Sea of the blood of Chriſt Jeſus; And an Horizon even to this heaven of heavens, to the mercy of God, we ſhall proceed thus: Firſt, we ſhall inquire, but modeſtly, what that blaſphemy, which is commonly called The ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt, is: And ſecondly, how, and wherein it is irremiſſible, that it ſhall never be forgiven: And then thirdly, upon what places of Scripture it is grounded; amongſt which, if this text do not conſtitute and eſtabliſh that ſin, The ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt, yet we ſhall finde, that that ſin which is directly intended in this text, is a branch of that ſin, The ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt: And therefore we ſhall take juſt occaſion from thence, to arme you with ſome inſtructions againſt thoſe wayes which leade into that irrecoverable deſtruction, into that irremiſſible ſin: for though the ſin it ſelf be not ſo evident, yet the limmes of the ſin, and the wayes to the ſin, are plain enough. D

Quid. S. Auguſtine ſayes, There is no queſtion in the Scripture harder then this, what this ſin is: And S. Ambroſe gives ſome reaſon of the difficulty in this, Sicut una divinitas, una offenſa: As there is but one Godhead, ſo there is no ſin againſt God (and all ſin is ſo) but it is againſt the whole Trinity: and that is true; but as there are certain attributes proper to every ſeverall perſon of the Trinity, ſo there are certaine ſins, more directly againſt the ſeverall attributes and properties of thoſe perſons, and in ſuch a conſideration, againſt the perſons themſelves. Of which there are divers ſins againſt power, and they are principally againſt the Father; for to the Father we attribute power; and divers ſins againſt wiſdome, and wiſdome we attribute to the Son; and divers againſt goodneſſe, and love, and theſe we attribute to the holy Ghoſt. Of thoſe againſt the holy Ghoſt, conſider- E

A ed in that attribute of goodneſſe, and of love, the place to ſpeak, will be in our concluſion. But for this particular ſin, The ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt, as hard as S. Auguſtine makes it, and juſtly, yet he ſayes too, Exercere nos voluit difficultate quæſtionis, non decipere falſitate ſententiæ, God would exerciſe us with a hard queſtion, but he would not deceive us with a falſe opinion: Quid ſit quæri voluit, non negari; God would have us modeſtly inquire what it is, not peremptorily deny that there is any ſuch ſin.

„ It is (for the moſt part) agreed, that it is a totall falling away from the Goſpell of „ Chriſt Jeſus formerly acknowledged and profeſſed, into a verball calumniating, and a „ reall perſecuting of that Goſpel, with a deliberate purpoſe to continue ſo to the end, „ and actually to do ſo, to perſevere till then, and then to paſſe away in that diſpoſition. It fals only upon the profeſſors of the Goſpell, and it is totall, and it is practicall, and it is deliberate, and it is finall. Here we have that ſin, but, by Gods grace, that ſinner no B where.

It is therefore ſomewhat early, ſomewhat forwardly pronounced, though by a reverend man, Certum reprobationis ſignum, in ſpiritum blaſphemiæ, That it is an infallible aſſurance, that that man is a Reprobate that blaſphemes the holy Ghoſt. For, whatſoever is an infallible ſigne, muſt be notorious to us; If we muſt know another thing by that, as a ſigne, we muſt know that thing which is our ſigne, in it ſelfe: And can we know what this blaſpheming of the holy Ghoſt is? Did we ever heare any man ſay, or ſee any man doe any thing againſt the holy Ghoſt, of whom we might ſay upon that word, or upon that action, This man can never repent, never be received to mercy? And yet, ſayes he, Tenendum eſt, quod qui exciderint, nunquam reſurgent; We are bound to hold, that they who fall ſo, ſhall never riſe again. I preſume, he grounded himſelfe in that ſevere judgement of his, upon ſuch places, as that to the Romanes, When they did not like C to retaine God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate minde: That that is the ordinary way of Gods juſtice, to withdraw his Spirit from that man that blaſphemes his Spirit; but S. Paul blaſphemed, and S. Peter blaſphemed, and yet were not divorced from God.

Calvin. Rom. 1. 28.

S. Auguſtines rule is good; not to judge of this ſin, and this ſinner eſpecially, but à poſteriori, from his end, from his departing out of this world. Neither though I doe ſee an ill life, ſealed with an ill death, dare I be too forward in this judgement. He was not a Chriſtian in profeſſion, but worſe then he are called Chriſtians, that ſaid, Qui pius eſt, ſummè Philoſophatur; The charitable man is the great Philoſopher; and it is charity not to ſuſpect the ſtate of a dead man. Conſider in how ſudden a minute the holy Ghoſt hath ſometimes wrought upon thee; and hope that he hath done ſo upon another. It is a moderation to be imbraced, that Peter Martyr leads us to: The Primitive Church had D the ſpirit of diſcerning ſpirits; we have not; And therefore, though by way of definition, we may ſay, This is that ſin, yet by way of demonſtration, let us ſay of no man, This is that ſinner: I may ſay of no man, This ſin in thee is irremiſſible.

Triſmeg.

Now, in conſidering this word, Irremiſſible, That it cannot be forgiven, wee finde it to be a word, rather uſurped by the Schoole, then expreſſed in the Scriptures: for in all thoſe three Euangeliſts, where this fearfull denunciation is interminated, ſtill it is in a phraſe, of ſomewhat more mildneſſe, then ſo; It is, It ſhall not be forgiven, It is not, it cannot be forgiven: It is an irremiſſion, it is not an irremiſſibleneſſe. Abſolutely there is not an impoſſibility, and irremiſſibleneſſe on Gods part: but yet ſome kinde of impoſſibility there is on his part, and on ours too. For, if he could forgive this ſin, he would; or elſe, his power were above his mercy; and his mercy is above all his works. But God can doe nothing that implies contradiction; and God having declared, by what E meanes onely his mercy and forgiveneſſe ſhall be conveyed to man, God ſhould contradict himſelfe, if he ſhould give forgiveneſſe to them, who will fully exclude thoſe meanes of mercy. And therefore it were not boldly, nor irreverently ſaid, That God could not give grace to a beaſt, nor mercy to the Devill, becauſe either they are naturally deſtitute, or have wilfully deſpoiled themſelves of the capacity of grace, and mercy. When we conſider, that God the Father, whom, as the roote of all, we conſider principally in the Creation, created man in a poſſibility, and ability, to perſiſt in that goodneſſe, in which he created him, And conſider that God the Son came, and wrought a reconciliation for man to God, and ſo brought in a treaſure, in the nature thereof, a ſufficient ranſome for all the world, but then a man knowes not this, or beleeves not this, otherwiſe wise then Historically, Morally, Civilly, and so evacuates, and shakes off God the Son, And then consider that the holy Ghost comes, and presents meanes of applying all this, and making the generall satisfaction of Christ, reach and spread it selfe upon my soule, in particular, in the preaching of the Word, in the seales of the Sacraments, in the absolution of the Church, and I preclude the wayes, and shut up my selfe against the holy Ghost, and so evacuate him, and shake him off, when I have resisted Father, Son, and holy Ghost, is there a fourth person in the God-head to work upon me? If I blaspheme, that is, deliberately pronounce against the holy Ghost, my sin is irremissible therefore, because there is no body left to forgive it, nor way left, wherein forgivenesse should work upon me; So farre it is irremissible on Gods part, and on mine too.

And then, take it there, in that state of irremissibleneſſe, and consider seriously the fearefulnesse of it. I have been angry; and then, (as Christ tells me) I have been in danger of a judgement; but in judgement, I may have counsell, I may be heard; I have said Racha, expressed my anger and so been in danger of a Councell; but a Councell does but consult, what punishment is fit to be inflicted; and so long there is hope of mitigation, and commutation of penance; But I have said fatue, I have called my brother foole, and so am in danger of hell fire. In the first, there is Ira, an inward commotion, an irregular distemper; In the second, there is Ira & vox; In the first it is but Ira carnis, non animi, It is but my passion, it is not I that am angry, but in the second I have suffered my passion to vent and utter it selfe; but in the third, there is Ira, vox & vituperatio, A distemper within, a declaration to evill example without, and an injury and defamation to a third person, and this exalts the offence to the height: But then when this third Person comes to be the third Person in the Trinity, the Holy Ghost, in all the other cases, there is danger, danger of judgement, danger of a Councell, danger of hell, but here is irremissibleneſſe, hell it selfe, and no avoiding of hell, no cooling in hell, no deliverance from hell; Irremissible; Those hands that reached to the ends of the world, in creating it, & span the world in preserving it, and stretched over all in redeeming it, those hands have I manacled, that they cannot open unto me: That tenderneſſe that is affected to all, have I damped, retarded that proneneſſe, stupified that alacrity, confounded that voyce, diverted those eyes, that are naturally disposed to all: And all this, Irremissibly, for ever; not, though he would, but because he will not shew mercy; not, though I would, but because I cannot ask mercy: And therefore beware all approaches towards that sin, from which there is no returning, no redemption.

Mat. 5. 22.

August. Chrysost.

In quibus Script.

We are come now, in our order, to our third and last Branch of this last Part, That this Doctrine of a sin against the Holy Ghost, is not a dreame of the Schoole-men, though they have spoken many things frivolously of it, but grounded in evident places of Scriptures: Amongst which, we looke especially, how farre this Text conduces to that Doctrine. There are two places ordinarily cited, which seeme directly to concerne this sin; and two others, which to me seeme not to doe so. Those of the first kinde, are both in the Epistle to the Hebrewes: There the Apostle sayes, For those who were once inlightned, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, If they fall away, it is impossible to renew them by repentance. Now, if finall impenitence had been added, there could have been no question, but that this must be The sin against the Holy Ghost; And because the Apostle speaks of such a totall falling away, as precludes all way of repentance, it includes finall impenitence, and so makes up that sin. The other place from which it rises most pregnantly, is, Of how sore a punishment shall they be thought worthy, who have trodden under foot the Son of God, and have done despite unto the Spirit of grace? As he had said before, If we sin wilfully, after we have received the knowledge of truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearfull looking for of judgement, and fiery indignation. But yet, though from these places, there arises evidence, that such a sin there is, as naturally shuts out repentance, and so is thereby irremissible, yet there arise no markes, by which I can say, This man is such a sinner; not though hee himselfe would sweare to me, that he were so now, and that he would continue so, till death.

Heb. 6. 4.

Heb. 10. 29.

Ver. 26.

The other places that doe not so directly concerne this sin, and yet are sometimes used in this affaire, are, one in S. Iohn, and this text another. That in S. Iohn is, There is a sin unto death, I doe not say, that he shall pray for it. It is true, that the Master of the Sentences, and from him, many of the Schoole, and many of our later Interpreters too, doe understand understand this, of the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe we are (almoſt) forbidden to pray for it; but yet we are not abſolutely forbidden, in that we are not bidden. And if we were forbidden, when God ſayes to Ieremy, Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry, nor prayer for them, neither make interceſsion to me, for I will not heare thee, And againe, Pray not for them, for I will not heare them, Not them, though they ſhould come to pray for themſelves, God forbid that we ſhould therefore ſay, that all that people had committed the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt. And for this particular place of S. Iohn, that anſwer may ſuffice, which very good Divines have given, Pray not for them, is indeed pray not with them, admit them to no part in the publique prayers of the Congregation, but if they ſin a ſin unto death, a notorious, an inexcuſable ſin, let them be perſons excommunicated to thee. Ier. 7. 16. 11. 14.

For the words in this text, which ſeeme to many appliable to that great ſin, it is not cleare, it is not much probable, that they can be ſo applied. Take the words inveſted in their circumſtance, in the context and coherence, and it will appeare evident. Chriſt ſpeaks this to the Phariſees, upon occaſion of that which they had ſaid to him, and of him before, and he carries it, intends it no farther. That appeares by the firſt word of our text, Propterea, Therefore I ſay unto you; Therefore, that is, Becauſe you have uſed ſuch words unto me. And S. Marke makes it more cleare, He ſaid this to them, becauſe they ſaid, He had an uncleane ſpirit; becauſe they ſaid he did his Miracles by the power of the Devill. Now, this was certainely a ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, ſo far, as that it was diſtinguiſhed from the ſins againſt the Son of Man; But it was not the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt; for, Chriſt being a mixt perſon, God and Man, did ſome things, in which his Divinity had nothing to doe, but were onely actions of a meere naturall man, and when they ſlandered him in theſe, they blaſphemed the Son of Man. Some things he did in the power of his Godhead, in which his humanity contributed nothing; as all his Miracles; and when they attributed theſe works to the Devill, they blaſphemed the Holy Ghoſt. And therefore S. Auguſtine ſayes, That Chriſt in this place, did not ſo much accuſe the Phariſees, that they had already incurred the ſin of the Holy Ghoſt, as admoniſh them, that by adventuring upon ſuch ſins as were ſins againſt the Holy Ghoſt, they might at laſt fall into The ſin, that impenitible, and therfore irremiſſible ſin. But that ſin, this could not be, becauſe the Phariſees had not embraced the Goſpel before, and ſo this could not be a falling from the Goſpel, in them: Neither does it appeare to have continued to a finall impenitence; ſo far from it, as that S. Chryſoſt. makes no doubt, but that ſome of theſe Phariſees did repent upon Chriſts admonition. Marke 3. 30.

Now, beloved, ſince we ſee by this collation of places, that it is not ſafe to ſay of any man, he is this ſinner, nor very conſtantly agreed upon, what is this ſin, but yet we are ſure, that ſuch a ſin there is, that captivates even God himſelf, and takes from him the exerciſe of his mercy, and caſts a dumneſſe, a ſpeechleſneſſe upon the Church it ſelfe, that ſhe may not pray for ſuch a ſinner; and ſince we ſee, that Chriſt, with ſo much earneſtneſſe, rebukes the Phariſees for this ſin in the text, becauſe it was a limbe of that ſin, and conduced to it, let us uſe all religious diligence, to keep our ſelves in a ſafe diſtance from it. To which purpoſe, be pleaſed to caſt a particular, but ſhort and tranſitory glaunce, upon ſome ſuch ſins, as therefore, becauſe they conduce to that, are ſometimes called ſins againſt the holy Ghoſt. Sins againſt Power, (that is the Fathers Attribute) ſins of infirmity are eaſily forgiven; ſins againſt Wiſdome, (that is the Sons Attribute) ſins of Ignorance are eaſily forgiven; but ſins againſt Goodneſſe, (that is the Holy Ghoſts Attribute,) ſins of an hard and ill nature are hardly forgiven: Not at all, when it comes to be The ſin; not eaſily, when they are Thoſe ſins, thoſe that conduce to it, and are branches of it.

For branches, the Schoolemen have named three couples, which they have called ſins againſt the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe naturally they ſhut out thoſe meanes by which the Holy Ghoſt might work upon us. The firſt couple is, preſumption and deſperation; for preſumption takes away the feare of God, and deſperation the love of God. And then, they name Impenitence, and hardneſſe of heart; for Impenitence removes all ſorrow for ſins paſt, and hardneſſe of heart all tenderneſſe towards future tentations. And laſtly, they name The reſiſting of a truth acknowledged before, and the envying of other men, who have made better uſe of Gods grace then we have done; for this reſiſting of a Truth, is a ſhutting up of our ſelves againſt it, and this envying of others, is a ſorrow, that that Truth ſhould prevaile upon them. And truly (to reflect a very little upon theſe three couples again) To preſume upon upon God, that God cannot damne me eternally in the next world, for a few half-houres in this; what is a fornication, or what is an Idolatry to God? what is a jeſt, or a ballad, or a libel to a King? Or to deſpaire, that God will not ſave me, how well ſoever I live, after a ſin? what is a teare, what is a ſigh, what is a prayer to God? what is a petition to a King? To be impenitent, ſenſleſſe of ſins paſt; I paſt yeſterday in riot, and yeſternight in wantonneſſe, and yet I heare of ſome place, ſome office, ſome good fortune fallen to me to day; To be hardned againſt future ſins; ſhall I forbeare ſome company, becauſe that company leads me into tentation? Why, that very tentation wil lead me to preferment; To forſake the truth formerly profeſſed, becauſe the times are changed, and wiſer men then I change with them; To envy and hate another, another State, another Church, another man, becauſe they ſtand out in defence of the truth, (for, if they would change, I might have the better colour, the better excuſe of changing too) al theſe are ſhrewd and ſlippery approaches towards the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and therefore the Schoolemen have called all theſe ſix, (not without juſt reaſon, and good uſe) by that heavy name.

And ſome of the Fathers have extended it farther, then to theſe ſix. S. Bernard, in particular, ſayes, Nolle obedire, To reſiſt lawfull Authority; And another, Simulata pœnitentia, To delude God with relapſes, & counterfait repentances; and another alſo, Omne ſchiſma, All ſchiſmaticall renting of the peace of the Church, All theſe they call in that ſenſe, Sins againſt the Holy Ghoſt. Now, all ſins againſt the Holy Ghoſt, are not irremiſſible. Stephen told his perſecutors, They reſiſted the Holy Ghoſt, and yet he prayed for them. But becauſe theſe ſins may, and ordinarily doe come to that ſin, ſtop betimes. David was far from the murder of Vriah, when he did but looke upon his Wife, as ſhe was bathing. A man is far from defying the holy Ghoſt, when he does but neglect him; and yet David did come, and he will come to the bottome quickly. It may make ſome impreſſion in you, to tell, and to apply a ſhort ſtory. In a great Schiſme at Rome, Ladiſlaus tooke that occaſion to debauch and corrupt ſome of the Nobility; It was diſcerned; and then, to thoſe ſeven Governors, whom they had before, whom they called Sapientes, Wiſe men, they added ſeven more, and called them Bonos, Good men, honeſt men, and relied, and confided in them. Goodneſſe is the Attribute of the Holy Ghoſt; If you have Greatneſs, you may ſeeme to have ſome of the Father, for Power is his: If you have Wiſdome, you may ſeeme to have ſome of the Son, for that is his: If you have Goodneſſe, you have the Holy Ghoſt, who ſhall lead you into all truth. And Goodneſſe is, To be good and eaſie in receiving his impreſſions, and good and conſtant in retaining them, and good and diffuſive in deriving them upon others: To embrace the Goſpel, to hold faſt the Goſpel, to propagate the Goſpel, this is the goodneſſe of the Holy Ghoſt. And to reſiſt the entrance of the Goſpel, to abandon it after we have profeſſed it, to forſake them, whom we ſhould aſſiſt and ſuccour in the maintenance of it, This is to depart from the goodneſſe of the Holy Ghoſt: and by theſe ſins againſt him, to come too neare the ſin, the irremiſſible ſin, in which the calamities of this world ſhall enwrap us, and deliver us over to the everlaſting condemnation of the next. This is as much as theſe words do juſtly occaſion us to ſay of that ſin; and into a more curious ſearch thereof, it is not holy ſobriety to pierce.

Of judgement, becauſe the Prince of this world is judged.

OUr Panis quotidianus, Our daily bread, is that Iuge ſacrificium, That daily ſacrifice of meditating upon God; Our Panis hodiernus, This dayes bread, is to meditate upon the holy Ghoſt. To day if ye will heare his voice, to day ye are with him in Paradiſe; For, whereſoever the holy Ghoſt is, he creates a Paradiſe. The day is not paſt yet; As our Saviour ſaid to Peter, Hodie, in nocte hac, This day, even in this night thou ſhalt deny me, ſo, Hodie in nocte hac, Even now, though evening, the day-ſpring from on high viſits you, God carries back the ſhadow of your Sun-dyall, as to Hezechias; And now God brings you to the beginning of this day, if now you take knowledge, that he is come, who, when he comes, Reproves the world of ſin, &c. Luk. 23. 43. Mar. 14. 10. Eſay 38. 8.

Diviſio.

The ſolemnity of the day requires, and the method of the words offers for our firſt conſideration, the Perſon; who is not named in our text; but deſigned by a moſt emphaticall denotation, Ille, He, He who is all, and doth all. But the word hath relation to a name, proper to the holy Ghoſt: for, in the verſe immediatly preceding, our Saviour tels his diſciples, That he will ſend them the Comforter. So, forbearing all other myſterious conſiderations of the holy Ghoſt, we receive him in that notion, and function in which Chriſt ſends him, The Comforter. And therefore, in this capacity, as The Comforter, we muſt conſider his action, Arguet, He ſhall reprove; Reprove, and yet Comfort; nay, therefore comfort, becauſe reprove: And then the ſubject of his action, Mundum, The world, the whole world; no part left unreproved, yet no part left without comfort: And after that, what he reproves the world of; That multiplies; Of ſin, of righteouſneſſe, of judgement. Can there be comfort in reproofe for ſin? Or can there lie a reproofe upon righteouſneſſe, or upon judgement? Very juſtly; Though the evidence ſeem at firſt, as ſtrange as the crime; for, though that be good evidence againſt the ſin of the world, That they beleeve not in Chriſt, (Of ſin, becauſe ye beleeve not on me) yet to be Reproved of righteouſneſſe, becauſe Chriſt goes to his Father, and they ſee him no more, And to be Reproved of judgement, becauſe the Prince of this world is judged, this ſeemes ſtrange, and yet this muſt be done, and done to our comfort; For, this muſt be done, Cum venerit, Then when the holy Ghoſt, and he in that function, as the Comforter, is come, is preſent, is working.

Beloved, Reproofes upon others without charity, rather to defame them, then amend them, Reproofes upon thy ſelfe, without ſhewing mercy to thine own ſoule, diffidences, and jealouſies, and ſuſpitions of God, either that he hated thee before thy ſin, or hates thee irremediably, irreconciliably, irrecoverably, irreparably for thy ſin, Theſe are Reproofes, but they are Abſente ſpiritu, In the abſence of the holy Ghoſt, before he comes, or when he is gone; When he comes, and ſtayes, He ſhall reprove, and reprove all the world, and all the world of thoſe errours, ſin, and righteouſneſſe, and judgement, and thoſe errours upon thoſe evidences, Of ſin, becauſe ye beleeve not on me, &c. But, in all this proceeding he ſhall never deveſt the natute of a Comforter; In that capacity he is ſent, in that he comes, and works. I doubt I ſhall ſee an end of my houre, and your patience, before before I ſhall have paſſed thoſe branches, which appertaine moſt properly to the celebration of this day, the Perſon, the Comforter, his action, Reproofe, the ſubject thereof, the world, and the Time, Cum venerit, When he comes. The inditement, of what the accuſation is, and the evidence, how it is proved, may exerciſe your devotion at other times. This day, the holy Ghoſt is ſaid to have come ſuddenly, and therefore in that pace we proceed, and make haſte to the conſideration of the Perſon, Ille, When he, He the holy Ghoſt, the Comforter, is come.

Spiritus ſanctus. Gen.3.15.

Ille, Ille alone, He, is an emphaticall denotation; for to this purpoſe Ille and Ipſe is all one; And then, you know the Emphaſis of that Ipſe; Ipſe conteret, He or It ſhall bruiſe the Serpents head, denotes the Meſſias, though there be no Meſſias named: This Ipſe is ſo emphaticall a denotation, as that the Church of Rome, and the Church of God ſtrives for it; for they will needs reade it Ipſa, and ſo refer our ſalvation, in the bruiſing of the Serpents head, to the Virgin Mary; we refer it according to the truth of the doctrine, and of the letter, to Chriſt himſelfe, and therefore reade it Ipſe, He. If there were no more but that in David, It is He that hath made us, every man would conclude, that that He is God. And if S. Paul had ſaid Ipſe alone, and not Ipſe ſpiritus, That He, and not He the Spirit beares witneſſe with our ſpirit, every ſpirit would have underſtood this to be the holy Spirit, the holy Ghoſt. If in our text there had been no more, but ſuch a denotation of a perſon that ſhould ſpeak to the hearts of all the world, that that Ille, that He would proceed thus, we muſt neceſſarily have ſeen an Almighty power in that denotation; But becauſe that denotation might have carried terrour in it, being taken alone, therefore we are not left to that, but have a relation to a former name, and ſpecification of the holy Ghoſt, The Comforter.

Pſal.100.3. Rom.8.16.

For the eſtabliſhment of Chriſts divinity, Chriſt is called The mighty God; for his relation to us, he hath divers names. As we were all In maſſa damnata, Forfeited, loſt, he is Redemptor, A Redeemer; for that that is paſt, The Redeemer ſhall come to Sion, ſayes the Prophet, and ſo Iob ſaw His Redeemer, one that ſhould redeem him from thoſe miſeries that oppreſſed him. As Chriſt was pleaſed to provide for the future, ſo he is, Salvator, A Saviour, Therefore the Angel gave him that name Ieſus, For he ſhall ſave his people from their ſins. So, becauſe to this purpoſe Chriſt conſiſts of two natures, God and man, he is called our Mediator, There is one Mediator between God and man, the man Chriſt Ieſus. Becauſe he preſents thoſe merits which are his, as ours, and in our behalfe, he is called an Advocate, If any man ſin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Ieſus Chriſt the righteous. And becauſe every man is to expect according to his actions, he is called the Judge, We teſtifie that it is he, that is ordained of God to bee the Iudge of quick and dead. Now, for Chriſts firſt name, which is the roote of all, which is, The mighty God, No man can ſay that Ieſus is the Lord, but by the holy Ghoſt; And there is our firſt comfort, in knowing that Chriſt is God; for, he were an Intruder for that which is paſt, no Redeemer, he were a weak Saviour for the future, an inſufficient Mediator, a ſilenced Advocate, and a Judge that might be miſinformed, if he were not God. And though he were God, he might be all theſe to my diſcomfort, if there were not a holy Ghoſt to make all theſe offices comfortable unto me. To be a Redeemer and not a Saviour, is but to pay my debts, and leave me nothing to live on. To be a Mediator, a perſon capable by his compoſition of two natures, to intercede between God and man, and not to be my Advocate, is but to be a good Counſellor, but not of counſell with me; To be a Judge of quick and dead, and to proceed out of outward evidence, and not out of his boſome mercy, is but an acceleration of my conviction; I were better lie in Priſon ſtill, then appeare at that Aſſize; better lye in the duſt of the grave for ever, then come to that judgement. But, as there is Mens in anima, There is a minde in the ſoule, and every man hath a ſoule, but every man hath not a minde, that is, a Conſideration, an Actuation, an Application of the faculties of the ſoule to particulars; ſo there is Spiritus in Spiritu, a Holy Ghoſt in all the holy offices of Chriſt, which offices, being, in a great part, directed upon the whole world, are made comfortable to me, by being, by this holy Spirit, turned upon me, and appropriated to me; for ſo, even that name of Chriſt, which might moſt make me afraid, The name of Judge, becomes a comfort to me. To this purpoſe does S. Baſil call the holy Ghoſt, Verbum Dei, quia interpres filii: The Son of God is the word of God, becauſe he manifeſts the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt is the word of God, becauſe he applies the Son. Chriſt comes with that loud Proclamation, Ecce auditum fecit, Behold the

Eſay 62.11.

A the Lord hath proclaimed it, to the end of the world, Ecce Salvator, and Ecce Merces, Behold his Salvation, Behold thy Reward, (This is his publication in the manifest Ordinances of the Church) And then the Holy Ghost whispers to thy soule, as thou standest in the Congregation, in that voyce that he promises, Sibilabo populum meum, I will hisse, I will whisper to my people by soft and inward inspirations. Christ came to tell us all, That to as many as received him, he gave power to become the Sons of God, The Holy Ghost comes to tell thee, that thou art one of them. The Holy Ghost is therefore Legatus, and Legatum Christi, He is Christs Ambassadour sent unto us, and he is his Legacy bequeathed unto us by his Will; his Will made of force by his death, and proved by his Ascension. Zach. 10. 8. Iohn 1. 12.

Now, when those dayes were come, that the Bridegroome was to bee taken from them, Christ Jesus to be removed from their personall sight, and conversation, and therefore
B even the children of the mariage Chamber were to mourne, and fast; when that Church that mourned, and lamented his absence, when she was but his Spouse, must necessarily mourn now in a more vehement manner, when she was to be, (in some sense) his Widow, when that Shepheard was not onely to be smitten, and so the flock dispersed, (this was done in his passion) but he was to be taken away, in his Ascension; what a powerfull Comforter had that need to be, that should be able to recompence the absence of Christ Jesus himselfe, and to infuse comfort into his Orphans, the children of his mariage Chamber, into his Widow, the desolate, and disconsolate Church, into his flock, his amazed, his distressed, and, (as we may, properly enough, say in this case) his beheaded Apostles and Disciples? Quantus ergo Deus, qui dat Deum? Lesse then God could not minister this comfort; How great a God is he, that sends a God to comfort us? and how powerfull a Comforter hee, who is not onely sent by God, but is God? Therefore does the Apo-
C stle inlarge, and dilate, and delight his soule upon this comfort, Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulations, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any affliction, by that comfort, wherewith our selves are comforted of God. The Apostle was loath to depart from the word, Comfort; And therefore, as God, because he could sweare by no greater, sware by himselfe, So, because there is no stronger adjuration, then the comfort it selfe, to move you to accept this comfort, as the Apostle did, so we intreat you by that, If there be any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels, and mercie, Lay hold upon this true comfort, the comming of the Holy Ghost, and say to all the deceitfull comforts of this world, not onely Vanæ consolationes, Your comforts are frivolous, but Onerosi consolatores, Your comforts are burdensome; there is not onely a disappointing of hopes, but an aggravating of sin, in entertaining the comforts of this
D world. As Barnabas, that is, Filius consolationis, The son of consolation, that he might bee capable of this comfort, devested himselfe of all worldly possessions, so, as such sons, Suck and be satisfied, at the breasts of this consolation, that you may milke out, and be delighted with the abundance of his glory; And as one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you, and you shall be comforted in Ierusalem. Heaven is Glory, and heaven is Joy; we cannot tell which most; we cannot separate them; and this comfort is joy in the Holy Ghost. This makes all Iobs states alike; as rich in the first Chapter of his Booke, where all is suddenly lost, as in the last, where all is abundantly restored. This Consolation from the Holy Ghost makes my mid-night noone, mine Executioner a Physitian, a stake and pile of Fagots, a Bone-fire of triumph; this consolation makes a Satyr, and Slander, and Libell against me, a Panegyrique, and an Elogy in my praise; It makes a Tolle an Ave, a Va an Euge, a Crucifige an Hosanna; It makes my death-bed, a mariage-
E bed, And my Passing-Bell, an Epithalamion. In this notion therefore we receive this Person, and in this notion we consider his proceeding, Ille, He, He the Comforter, shall reprove. Matt. 9. 15. Cant. Mat. 26. 31. Aug. 2 Cor. 1. 3. Heb. 6. 13. Phil. 2. 1. Zach. 10. 2. Job 16. 2. Acts 4. 36. Esay 66. 11. Ver. 13.

This word, that is here translated To reprove, Arguere, hath a double use and signification in the Scriptures. First to reprehend, to rebuke, to correct, with Authority, with Severity; So David, Ne in furore arguas me, O Lord rebuke me not in thine anger: And secondly, to convince, to prove, to make a thing evident, by undeniable inferences, and necessary consequences; So, in the instructions of Gods Ministers, the first is To reprove, and then To rebuke; So that reproving is an act of a milder sense, then rebuking is. S. Augustine interprets these words twice in his Works; and in the first place he followes the first Arguet. Psal. 6. 1. 2 Ti. Augu.

first signification of the word, That the Holy Ghost should proceed, when he came, by power, by severity against the world. But though that sense will stand well with the first act of this Reproofe, (That he shall Reprove, that is, reprehend the world of sin) yet it will not seeme so properly said, To reprehend the world of Righteousnesse, or of Judgement; for how is Righteonsnesse, and Judgement the subject of reprehension? Therefore S. Augustine himselfe in the other place, where he handles these words, imbraces the second sense, Hoc est arguere mundum, ostendere vera esse, quæ non credidit; This is to reprove the world, to convince the world of her errours, and mistakings; And so (scarce any excepted) doe all the Ancient Expositors take it, according to that, All things are reproved of the light, and so made manifest; The light does not reprehend them, not rebuke them, not chide, not upbraid them; but to declare them, to manifest them, to make the world see clearely what they are, this is to reprove. A Ephes. 5. 13.

Elenchus. That reproving then, which is warrantable by the Holy Ghost, is not a sharp increpation, a bitter proceeding, proceeding onely out of power, and authority, but by inlightning, and informing, and convincing the understanding. The signification of this word, which the Holy Ghost uses here for reproofe, Elenchos, is best deduced, and manifested to us, by the Philosopher who had so much use of the word, who expresses it thus, Elenchus est Syllogismus contra contraria opinantem; A reproofe, is a proofe, a proofe by way of argument, against another man, who holds a contrary opinion. All the pieces must be laid together: For, first it must be against an opinion, and then an opinion contrary to truth, and then such an opinion held, insisted upon, maintained, and after all this, the reproofe must lie in argument, not in force, not in violence. B

Opinio. First it must come so farre, as to be an opinion; which is a middle station, betweene ignorance, and knowledge; for knowledge excludes all doubting, all hesitation; opinion does not so; but opinion excludes indifferency, and equanimity; I am rather inclined to one side then another, when I am of either opinion. Id opinatur quisque quod nescit: A man may have an opinion that a thing is so, and yet not know it. S. Bernard proposes three wayes for our apprehending Divine things; first, understanding, which relies upon reason; faith, which relies upon supreme Authority; and opinion, which relies upon probability, and verisimilitude. Now there may arise in some man, some mistakings, some mis-apprehensions of the sense of a place of Scripture, there may arise some scruple in a case of conscience, there may arise some inclinations to some person, of whose integrity and ability I have otherwise had experience, there may arise some Paradoxicall imaginations in my selfe, and yet these never attaine to the setledness of an opinion, but they float in the fancy, and are but waking dreames; and such imaginations, and fancies, and dreames, receive too much honour in the things, and too much favour in the persons, if they be reproved, or questioned, or condemned, or disputed against. For, often times, even a condemnation nourishes the pride of the author of an opinion; and besides, begets a dangerous compassion, in spectators and hearers; and then, from pitying his pressures and sufferings, who is condemned, men come out of that pity, to excuse his opinions; and from excusing them, to incline towards them; And so that which was but straw at first, by being thus blown by vehement disputation, sets fire upon timber, and drawes men of more learning and authority to side, and mingle themselves in these impertinencies. Every fancy should not be so much as reproved, disputed against, or called in question. C D

Lactant.
Bernard.

Contra. As it must not be only a fancy, an imagination, but an opinion, (in which, though there be not a Certò, yet there is a Potiùs, Though I be not sure, yet I doe rather thinke it) so we consider Contraria opinantem, That it must be an opinion contrary to something that we are sure of; that is, to some received article, or to some evident religious duty; contrary to religion, as religion is matter of faith, or as religion is matter of obedience, to lawfull Authority. Though fancies grow to be opinions, that men come to thinke they have reasons for their opinions, and to know they have other men on their side, in those opinions; yet, as long as these are but opinions of a little too much, or a little too little, in matter of Ceremony and Circumstance, as long as they are but deflectings, and deviations upon collaterall matters, no foundation shaked, no corner-stone displaced, as long as they are but preteritions, not contradictions, but omissions, not usurpations, they are not worthy of a reproofe, of a conviction, and there may be more danger then profit in bringing them into an over-vehement agitation. Those men whose end is schisme, and sedition, E

A sedition, and distraction, are brought so neare their owne ends, and the accomplishment of their owne desires, if they can draw other men together by the eares: As some have all they desire, if they can make other men drunke, so have these if they can make sober men wrangle.

They must be Opinions, not fancies, and they must have a contrariety, an opposition to certaine truths, and then they must be held, persisted in, before it be fit to give a reproofe, either by calling in question, or by confutation. As some men are said to have told a lye so often, as that at last, they beleeve it themselves, so a man admits sometimes an opinion to lodge so long, as that Transit in intellectum, It fastens upon his understanding, and that that he did but think before, now he seems to himself to know it, and he beleeves it. And then, Fides si habet hæsitationem, infirma est, As that faith that admits a scruple is weake, and so, without scruple he comes peremptorily to beleeve it. But so, Opinio si habet assertionem, temeraria est, When that which is but an opinion comes to be published and avowed for a certaine, and a necessary truth, then it becomes dangerous; And that growes apace; for scarcely does any man beleeve an opinion to be true, but he hath a certaine appetite and itch to infuse it into others too.

Tenenda. Bernard. Idem.

Now when these pieces meet, when these atomes make up a body, a body of Error, that it come to an Opinion, a halfe-assurance, and that in some thing contrary to foundations, and that it be held stiffely, publiquely persisted in, then enters this reproofe; but yet even then reproofe is but Syllogismus, it is but an argument, it is but convincing, it is not destroying; it is not an Inquisition, a prison, a sword, an axe, a halter, a fire; It is a syllogisme, not a syllogisme, whose major is this, Others, your Ancestors beleeved it, and the minor this, We that are your Superiours beleeve it, Ergo you must, or else be banisht or burnt. With such syllogismes the Arians abounded, where they prevailed in the Primitive Church, and this is the Logique of the Inquisition of Rome. But our syllogisme must be a syllogisme within our Authors definition, when out of some things which are agreed on all sides, other things that are controverted, are made evident and manifest. Hell is presented to us by fire, but fire without light: Heaven by light, and light without any ill effect of fire in it. Where there is nothing but an Accuser, (perchance not that) and fire, citation and excommunication, here is Satan, (who is an Accuser, but an invisible one) and here is Hell it selfe, a devilish and a darke proceeding. But when they, to whom this reproofe belongs, take Christs way, not to treadout smoaking flaxe, that a poore soule, mis-led by ignorant zeale, and so easily combustible and apt to take fire, be not troden downe with too much power, and passion, when they doe not breake a bruised reed, that is, not terrifie a distracted conscience, which perchance a long ill conversation with schismaticall company, and a spirituall melancholy, and over-tender sense of sin hath cast too low before, then does this reproofe worke aright, when it is brought in with light before fire, with convenient instruction, and not hasty condemnation.

Syllogismus.

We may well call this Viam Christi, and Viam Spiritus sancti, Christs way, and the Holy Ghosts way, for he had need be a very good Christian, and a very sanctified man, that can walke in that way; Perfectorum est, nihil in peccatore odisse præter peccata: He that hates nothing in an Heretique, or in a Schismatique, but the Schisme, or the Heresie, He that sets bounds to that sea, and hath said to his affections, and humane passions, Stay there, go no farther, hath got far in the steps of Christian perfection. The slipperinesse, the precipitation is so great on the other side, that commonly we begin to hate the person first, and then grow glad, when he growes guilty of any thing worthy our hate; and we make God himselfe the Devils instrument, when we pretend zeale to his service, in these reproofes and corrections, and serve onely our owne impotent passion, and inordinate ambition. For therein Plerumque cum tibi videris odisse inimicum, fratrem odisti, & nescis; Thou thinkest or pretendest to hate an enemy, and hatest thine owne brother, and knowest it not; Thou knowest not, considerest not, that he, by good usage and instruction, might have beene made thy Brother, a fellow-member in the Visible Church, by outward conformity, and in the Invisible too, by inward. Etiam fictilia vasa confringere, Domino soli concessum, If thou be a vessell of gold or silver, and that other of clay, thou of a cleere, and rectified, he of a darke and perverted understanding, yet even vessels of clay are onely in the power of that Potters hand that made them, or bought them, to breake, and no bodies else: Still, as long as it is possible, proceed we with the moderation of that blessed Father, Sic peccata Hæreticorum compesce, ut sint quos pœniteat peccasse,

Take

Take not away the ſubject of the error, (the perverſeneſſe of the man) ſo, as that thou take away the ſubject of repentance, the man himſelfe; If thou require fruit, leave a tree; If thou wouldſt have him repent, take not away his life, ſayes he. We ſee the leaſurely pace that Gods Juſtice walks in: When Daniel had told Nebuchadnezzar his danger, yea the Decree of God upon him, (as hee cals it) yet he told him a way how to revoke it; by workes of mercy to the poore, and breaking off his ſinnes; And after all this, hee had a yeares ſpace to conſider himſelfe, before the judgement was executed upon him.

Dan. 4. 24.

But now beloved, all that we have ſaid, or can be ſaid to this purpoſe, conduces but to this, That though this reproof, which the Holy Ghoſt leads us to, be rather in convincing the underſtanding by argument, and other perſwaſions then by extending our power to the deſtruction of the perſon, yet this hath a modification, how it muſt be, and a determination where it muſt end, for, there are caſes in which we may, we muſt go farther. For, for the underſtanding, we know how to worke upon that; we know what arguments have prevayled upon us, with what arguments we have prevailed upon others, and thoſe we can uſe: ſo far, Vt nihil habeant contra, & ſi non aſſentiantur, That though they will not be of our minde, yet they ſhall have nothing to ſay againſt it. So far we can go upon that faculty, the underſtanding. But the will of man is ſo irregular, ſo unlimited a thing, as that no man hath a bridle upon anothers will, no man can undertake nor promiſe for that; no Creature hath that faculty but man, yet no man underſtands that faculty. It hath beene the exerciſe of a thouſand wits, it hath beene the ſubject, yea the knot and perplexity of a thouſand diſputations, to find out, what it is that determines, that concludes the will of man ſo, as that it aſſents thereunto. For, if that were abſolutely true which ſome have ſaid, (and yet perchance that is as far as any have gone) that Vltimus actus intellectus eſt voluntas, That the laſt act of the Underſtanding is the Will, then all our labour were ſtill to worke upon the Underſtanding, and when that were rectified, the Will muſt follow. But it is not ſo; As we feele in our ſelves that we doe many ſins, which our underſtanding, and the ſoule of our underſtanding, our conſcience, tels us we ſhould not doe, ſo we ſee many others perſiſt in errors, after manifeſt convincing, after all reproofe which can be directed upon the underſtanding.

When therefore thoſe errors which are to be reproved, are in that faculty, which is not ſubject to this reproofe by argument, in a perverted will, becauſe this wilfull ſtubbornneſſe is alwaies accompanied with pride, with ſingularity, with faction, with ſchiſme, with ſedition, we muſt remember the way which the Holy Ghoſt hath directed us in, If the iron be blunt, we muſt either put to more ſtrength, or whet the edge. Now, when the fault is in the perverſeneſſe of the will, we can put to no more ſtrength, no argument ſerves to overcome that; And therefore the holy Ghoſt hath admitted another way, To whet the iron; And in that way does the Apoſtle ſay, Vtinam abſcindantur, I would they were even cut off which trouble you. There is an incorrigibility, in which, when the reproofe cannot lead the will, it muſt draw blood; which is, where pretences of Religion are made, and Treaſons, and Rebellions, and Invaſions, and Maſſacres of people, and Aſſaſinates of Princes practiſed. And this is a reproofe (which, as we ſhall ſee of the reſt, in the following branches is) from the Holy Ghoſt, in his function in this text, as he is a Comforter; This therefore is our comfort, That our Church was never negligent in reproving the Adverſary, but hath from time to time ſtrenuouſly and confidently maintained her truths againſt all oppoſitions, to the ſatisfying of any underſtanding, though not to the reducing of ſome perverſe wils. So Gregor: de Valentia profeſſes of our arguments, I confeſſe theſe reaſons would conclude my underſtanding, Niſi didiciſſem captivare intellectum meum ad intellectum Eccleſiæ, But that I have learnt to captivate my underſtanding to the underſtanding of the Church, and, ſay what they will, to beleeve as the Church of Rome beleeves; which is Maldonats profeſſion too, upon divers of Calvins arguments, This argument would prevaile upon me, but that he was an Heretique that found it. So that here is our comfort, we have gone ſo far in this way of Reproofe, Vt nihil habeant contra, etſi nobiſcum non ſentiant. This is our comfort, that as ſome of the greateſt Divines in forraine parts, ſo alſo, in our Church at home, ſome of the greateſt Prelates, who have beene traduced to favour Rome, have written the moſt ſolidly and effectually againſt the hereſies of Rome of any other. But it muſt be a comfort upon them that are reproved. And this is their comfort, that the State never drew drop of blood

A blood for Religion; But then, this is our comfort ſtill, that where their perverſneſſe ſhall endanger either Church or State, both the State and Church may, by the holy Ghoſts direction, and will return to thoſe means which God allows them for their preſervation, that is, To whet the edge of the Iron, in execution of the laws. And ſo we paſſe from our ſecond conſideration, The Action, Reproofe, to the ſubject of Reproofe, The world, He ſhall reprove the world.

Mundus.

It is no wonder that this word Mundus ſhould have a larger ſignification then other words, for it containes all, embraces, comprehends all: But there is no word in Scripture, that hath not only not ſo large, but ſo diverſe a ſignification, for it ſignifies things contrary to one another. It ſignifies commonly, and primarily, the whole frame of the world; and more particularly all mankinde; and oftentimes only wicked men; and ſometimes only good men, As Dilexit mundum, God loved the world, And Hic eſt verè John 3.16.

world, but not of this world. Now in every ſenſe, the world may well be ſaid to bee ſubject to the reproofe of God, as reproof is a rebuke: for He rebuked the winde, and it Luk.8.24.

theſe caſes, there is a working of the holy Ghoſt; and that, as the holy Ghoſt is a Comforter; for it is a comfort to them, for whoſe deliverances God executes theſe judgements upon others, that they are executed; but we conſider a rebuke, a reproofe that miniſters comfort even to them upon whom it fals; and ſo in that ſenſe, we ſhall ſee that this Comforter reproves the world, in all thoſe ſignifications of the world which wee named before.

As the world is the whole frame of the world, God hath put into it a reproofe, a rebuke, leſt it ſhould ſeem eternall, which is, a ſenſible decay and age in the whole frame of the world, and every piece thereof. The ſeaſons of the yeare irregular and diſtempered; the Sun fainter, and languiſhing; men leſſe in ſtature, and ſhorter-lived. No addi-
D tion, but only every yeare, new ſorts, new ſpecies of wormes, and flies, and ſickneſſes, which argue more and more putrefaction of which they are engendred. And the Angels of heaven, which did ſo familiarly converſe with men in the beginning of the world, though they may not be doubted to perform to us ſtill their miniſteriall aſſiſtances, yet they ſeem ſo far to have deſerted this world, as that they do not appeare to us, as they did to thoſe our Fathers. S. Cyprian obſerved this in his time, when writing to Demetri- Cyprian.
anus, who imputed all thoſe calamities which afflicted the world then, to the impiety of the Chriſtians who would not joyne with them in the worſhip of their gods, Cyprian went no farther for the cauſe of theſe calamities, but Ad ſeneſcentem mundum, To the age and impotency of the whole world; And therefore, ſayes he, Imputent ſenes Chri- ſtianis, quòd minùs valeant in ſenectutem; Old men were beſt accuſe Chriſtians, that they are more ſickly in their age, then they were in their youth; Is the fault in our religion, E or in their decay? Canos in pueris videmus, nec ætas in ſenectute deſinit, ſed incipit à ſene- ctute; We ſee gray haires in children, and we do not die old, and yet we are borne old. Leſt the world (as the world ſignifies the whole frame of the world) ſhould glorifie it ſelfe, or flatter, and abuſe us with an opinion of eternity, we may admit uſefully (though we do not conclude peremptorily) this obſervation to be true, that there is a reproofe, a rebuke born in it, a ſenſible decay and mortality of the whole world.

Conſolatio.

But is this a reproofe agreeable to our Text? A reproofe that carries comfort with it? Comfort to the world it ſelfe, that it is not eternall? Truly it is; As S. Paul hath moſt Rom.8.19.
pathetically expreſſed it; The creature (that is, the world) is in an earneſt expectation, The creature waiteth, The whole creation groaneth, and travelleth in pain. Therefore the creature

ture (that is, the world) receives a perfect comfort, in being delivered at last, and an inchoative comfort, in knowing now, that it shall be delivered; From what? From subjection to vanity, from the bondage of corruption; That whereas the world is now subject to mutability and corruption, at the Resurrection it shall no longer be so, but in that measure, and in that degree which it is capable of, It shall enter into the glorious liberty of the children of God, that is, be as free from corruption, or change in that state, wherein it shall be glorified, as the Saints shall be in the glory of their state; for, The light of the Moon shall be as the light of the Sun, and the light of the Sun shall be sevenfold; And there shall be new heavens, and new earth; Which is a state, that this world could not attaine to, if it were eternally to last, in that condition, in which it is now, a condition subject to vanity, impotency, corruption, and therefore there is a comfort in this reproofe, even to this world, That it is not eternall; This world is the happier for that.

Ver. 20. & 21.

Ver. 21.

Esay 30. 26.

2 Pet. 3. 13.

Mundus, homines. Mat. 18. 7.

As the world, in a second sense, signifies all the men of the world, (so it is, Wo unto the world, because of offences) There is a reproofe born in every man; which reproofe is an uncontrollable sense, and an unresistible remorse, and chiding of himselfe inwardly, when he is about to sin, and a horrour of the Majesty of God, whom, when he is alone, he is forced (and forced by himselfe) to feare, and to beleeve, though he would fain make the world beleeve, that he did not beleeve in God, but lived at peace, and subsisted of himselfe, without being beholding to God. For, as in nature, heavy things will ascend, and light descend rather then admit a vacuity, so in religion, the devill will get into Gods roome, rather then the heart of man shall be without the opinion of God; There is no Atheist; They that oppose the true, do yet worship a false god; and hee that sayes there is no God, doth for all that, set up some God to himselfe. Every man hath this reproofe borne in him, that he doth ill, that he offends a God, that he breaks a law when he sins. And this reproofe is a reproofe within our Text, for it hath this comfort with it, That howsoever some men labour to overcome the naturall tendernesse of the conscience, and so triumph over their own ruine, and rejoyce when they can sleep, and wake again without any noise in their conscience, or sense of sin, yet, in truth this candle cannot be blowne out, this remorse cannot be overcome; But were it not a greater comfort to me if I could overcome it? No. For though this remorse (which is but a naturall impression, and common to all men) be not grace, yet this remorse, which is the naturall reproofe of the soule, is that, that grace works upon. Grace doth not ordinarily work upon the stifnesse of the soule, upon the silence, upon the frowardnesse, upon the aversnesse of the soule, but when the soule is soupled and mellowed, and feels this reproofe, this remorse in it self, that reproofe, that remorse becomes as the matter, and grace enters as the form, that becomes the body, and grace becomes the soule; and that is the comfort of this naturall reproofe of the world, that is, of every man: First, that it will not be quenched in it selfe, and then, that ordinarily it induces a nobler light then it selfe, which is effectuall and true Repentance.

Mundus, mali. Heb. 11. 7. 2 Pet. 2. 5.

As the world, in a third sense, signifies only the wicked world (so it is, Noah in preparing an Ark, condemned the world; And so, God spared not the old world) That world, the world of the wicked suffer many reproofes, many rebukes in their hearts, which they will not discover, because they envy God that glory. We reade of divers great actors in the first persecutions of the Christians, who being fearefully tormented in body and soule, at their deaths, took care only, that the Christians might not know what they suffered, lest they should receive comfort, and their God glory therein. Certainly Herod would have been more affected, if he had thought that we should have knowne how his pride was punished with those sudden wormes, then with the punishment it selfe. This is a self-reproofe; even in this, though he will not suffer it to break out to the edification of others, there is some kinde of chiding himself for some thing mis-done. But is there any comfort in this reproofe? Truly, beloved, I can hardly speak comfortably of such a man, after he is dead, that dyes in such a dis-affection, loath that God should receive glory, or his servants edification by these judgements. But even with such a man, if I assisted at his death-bed, I would proceed with a hope to infuse comfort, even from that dis-affection of his: As long as I saw him in any acknowledgement (though a negligent, nay though a malignant, a despitefull acknowledgement) of God, as long as I found him loath that God should receive glory, even from that loathnesse, from that reproofe, from that acknowledgement, That there is a God to whom glory is due, I would hope to

Acts 12. 23.

Consolatio.

A to draw him to glorifie that God before his last gasp; My zeale should last as long as his wives officiousnesse, or his childrens, or friends, or servants obsequiousnesse, or the solicitude of his Physitians should; as long as there were breath, they would minister some help; as long as there were any sense of God, I would hope to do some good. And so much comfort may arise even out of this reproofe of the world, as the world is only the wicked world.

In the last sense, the world signifies the Saints, the Elect, the good men of the world, beleeving and persevering men. Of those Christ sayes, The world shall know that I love the Father; And, That the world may beleeve that thou hast sent me. And this world, that is, the godliest of this world, have many reproofes, many corrections upon them. That outwardly they are the prey of the wicked, and inwardly have that Stimulum carnis, which is the devils Solicitor, and round about them they see nothing but profanation of B his word, mis-imployment of his works, his creatures, mis-constructions of his actions, his judgements, blasphemy of his name, negligence and under-valuation of his Sacraments, violation of his Sabbaths, and holy convocations. O what a bitter reproofe, what a manifest evidence of the infirmity, nay of the malignity of man, is this, (if it be put home, and throughly considered) That even the goodnesse of man gets to no higher a degree, but to have been the occasion of the greatest ill, the greatest cruelty that ever was done, the crucifying of the Lord of life! The better a man is, the more he concurred towards being the cause of Christs death; which is a strange, but a true and a pious consideration. Dilexit mundum, He loved the world, and he came to save the world; That is, most especially, and effectually, those that should beleeve in him, in the world, and live according to that beliefe, and die according to that life. If there had been no such, Christ had not died, never been crucified. So that impenitent men, mis-beleeving men have not put C Christ to death; but it is we, we whom he loves, we that love him, that have crucified him.

In what rank then, of opposition against Christ, shall we place our sins, since even our faith and good works have been so farre the cause why Christ died, that, but for the salvation of such men, Beleevers, Workers, Perseverers, Christ had not died? This then is the reproofe of the world, that is, of the Saints of God in the world, that though I had rather be a doore-keeper in the house of my God, I must dwell in the tents of wickednesse, That though my zeale consume me, because mine enemies have forgotten thy words, I must stay amongst them that have forgotten thy words; But this, and all other reproofes, that arise in the godly, (that we may still keep up that consideration, that he that reproves us, is The Comforter) have this comfort in them, that these faults that I indure in others, God hath either pardoned in me, or kept from me: and that though this world be wicked, yet when I shall come to the next world, I shall finde Noah, that had been drunk; and Lot, D that had been incestuous; and Moses, that murmured at Gods proceedings; and Iob, and Ieremy, and Ionas, impatient, even to imprecations against themselves; Christs owne Disciples ambitious of worldly preferment; his Apostles forsaking him, his great Apostle forswearing him; And Mary Magdalen that had been, I know not what sinner; and David that had been all; I leave none so ill in this world, but I may carry one that was, or finde some that had been as ill as they, in heaven; and that blood of Christ Jesus, which hath brought them thither, is offered to them that are here, who may be successors in their repentance, as they are in their sins. And so have you all intended for the Person, the Comforter, and the Action, Reproofe, and the Subject, the World; remaines only (that for which there remaines but a little time) the Time, Cum venerit, When the Comforter comes he will proceed thus.

We use to note three Advents, three commings of Christ. An Advent of Humiliati- E on, when he came in the flesh; an Advent of glory, when he shall come to judgement; and between these an Advent of grace, in his gracious working in us, in this life; and this middlemost Advent of Christ, is the Advent of the Holy Ghost, in this text; when Christ works in us, the Holy Ghost comes to us. And so powerfull is his comming, that whereas he that sent him, Christ Jesus himself, Came unto his own, and his own received him not; The Holy Ghost never comes to his owne but they receive him; for, onely by receiving him, they are his owne; for, besides his title of Creation, by which we are all his, with the Father, and the Son, as there is a particular title accrewed to the Son by Redemption, so is there to the Holy Ghost, of certaine persons, upon whom he sheds the comfort of his application. The Holy Ghost picks out and chooses whom he will; Spirat ubi vult; perchance me that ſpeake; perchance him that heares; perchance him that ſhut his eyes yeſter-night, and opened them this morning in the guiltineſſe of ſin, and repents it now: perchance him that hath been in the meditation of an uſurious contract, of an ambitious ſupplantation, of a licentious ſolicitation, ſince he came hither into Gods houſe, and deprehends himſelfe in that ſinfull purpoſe now. This is his Advent, this is his Pentecoſt. As he came this day with a Manifeſtation, ſo, if he come into thee this evening, he comes with a Declaration, a Declaration in operation. Pater meus uſque modo operatur, & ego

John 5.17. operor, My Father works even now, and I work, was Chriſts anſwer, when he was accuſed to have broken the Sabbath day; that the Father wrought that day as well as he. So

Mat.12.3,5. is in danger, and the owner will not relieve him? Nonne legiſtis, Have ye not read how David ate the Shew-bread? And Annon legiſtis, Did not the Prieſts breake the Sabbath, in their ſervice in the Temple? But the Sabbath is the Holy Ghoſts greateſt working day: The Holy Ghoſt works more upon the Sunday, then all the week. In other dayes, he picks and chooſes; but upon theſe dayes of holy Convocation, I am ſurer that God ſpeakes to me, then at home, in any private inſpiration. For, as the Congregation beſieges God in publique prayers, Agmine facto, ſo the Holy Ghoſt caſts a net
Tertul. over the whole Congregation, in this Ordinance of preaching, and catches all that break not out.

If he be come into thee, he is come to reprove thee; to make thee reprove thy ſelfe; But doe that, Cum venerit, when the Holy Ghoſt is come. If thou have beene ſlack in the outward acts of Religion, and findeſt that thou art the worſe thought of amongſt men for that reſpect, & the more open to ſome penall Laws, for thoſe omiſſions, and for theſe reaſons onely beginneſt to correct, and reprove thy ſelfe, this is a reproofe, Antequam Spiritus venerit, before the Holy Ghoſt is come into thee, or hath breathed upon thee, and inanimated thine actions. If the powerfulneſſe, and the piercing of the mercies of thy Saviour, have ſometimes, in the preaching thereof, entendered and melted thy heart, and yet upon the confidence of the readineſſe, and eaſineſſe of that mercy, thou returne to thy vomit, to the re-purſuite of thoſe halfe-repented ſins, and thinkeſt it time enough to goe forward upon thy death-bed, this is a reproofe Poſtquam abierit Spiritus, After the Holy Ghoſt is departed from thee. If the burden of thy ſins oppreſſe thee, if thou beeſt ready to caſt thy ſelfe from the Pinacle of the Temple, from the participation of the comforts afforded thee in the Abſolution, and Sacraments of the Church, If this appeare to thee in a kinde of humility, and reverence to the Majeſty of God, That thou dareſt not come into his ſight, not to his table, not to ſpeake to him in prayer, whom thou haſt ſo infinitely offended, this is a reproofe, Cum Spiritus Sanctus ſimulatur, when the Holy Ghoſt is counterfaited, when Satan is transformed into an Angel of light, and makes thy diſmayed conſcience beleeve, that that affection, which is truly a higher Treaſon againſt God, then all thy other ſins, (which is, a diffident ſuſpecting of Gods mercy) is ſuch a reverend feare, and trembling as he looks for.

Reprove thy ſelfe; but doe it by convincing, not by a downe-right ſtupefaction of the conſcience; but by a conſideration of the nature of thy ſin, and a contemplation of the infinite proportion between God and thee, and ſo between that ſin and the mercy of God; for, thou canſt not be ſo abſolutely, ſo intirely, ſo eſſentially ſinfull, as God is abſolutely, and intirely, and eſſentially mercifull. Doe what thou canſt, there is ſtill ſome goodneſſe in thee, that nature that God made, is good ſtill: Doe God what hee will, hee cannot ſtrip himſelfe, not deveſt himſelfe of mercy. If thou couldſt doe as much as God can pardon, thou wert a Manichæan God, a God of evill, as infinite as the God of goodneſſe is. Doe it, Cum venerit Spiritus, when the Holy Ghoſt pleads on thy ſide; not cum venerit homo, not when mans reaſon argues for thee, and ſayes, It were injuſtice in God, to puniſh one for another, the ſoule for the body: Much leſſe Cum venerit inimicus homo, when the Devill pleads, and pleads againſt thee, that thy ſins are greater then God can forgive. Reprove any over-bold preſumption, that God cannot forſake thee, with remembring who it was that ſaid, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Even Chriſt himſelfe could apprehend a dereliction. Reprove any diſtruſt in God, with remembring to whom it was ſaid, Hodiè mecum eris in Paradiſo; Even the thiefe himſelfe, who never ſaw him, never met him, but at both their executions, was carryed up with him, the firſt day of his acquaintance. If either thy cheerefulneſſe, or thy

thy ſadneſſe bee conceived of the Holy Ghoſt, there is a good ground of thy Noli timere, feare neither. So the Angel proceeded with Ioſeph, Feare not to take Mary, for that which is conceived in her, is of the Holy Ghoſt. Feare not thou, that a chearefulneſſe and alacrity in uſing Gods bleſſings, feare not that a moderate delight in muſique, in converſation, in recreations, ſhall be imputed to thee for a fault, for, it is conceived by the Holy Ghoſt, and is the off-ſpring of a peacefull conſcience. Embrace therefore his working, Qui omnia opera noſtra operatus eſt nobis, Thou, O Lord, haſt wrought all our works in us; And whoſe working none ſhall be able to fruſtrate in us; Operabitur, & quis avertit? I will worke, and who ſhall let it? And as the Son concurred with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt with the Son, in working in our behalfe, ſo Operemur & nos, let us alſo worke out our Salvation with feare and trembling, by reproving the errors in our underſtanding, and the perverſeneſſes of our converſation, that way, in which the Holy Ghoſt is our guide, by reproving, that is, chiding and convincing the conſcience, but ſtill with comfort, that is, ſtedfaſt application of the merits of Chriſt Jeſus.

Preached upon Whitſunday 3 Feb. 1616

SERM. XXXVII.

Preached upon Whitſunday.

JOHN 16. 8, 9, 10, 11.

And when he is come, he will reprove the world of ſin, and of righteouſneſſe, and of judgement.
Of ſin, becauſe ye beleeve not on me.
Of righteouſneſſe, becauſe I goe to my Father, and ye ſee me no more.
Of judgement, becauſe the Prince of this world is judged.

IN a former Sermon upon theſe words, we have eſtabliſhed this, That the Perſon whom our Saviour promiſes here, being by himſelfe promiſed, in the verſe before the text, in the name and quality of The Comforter, All that this Perſon is to do in this text, is to be done ſo, as the World, upon which it is to be done, may receive comfort in it. Therfore this word, Reproof admitting a double ſignification, one by way of authority, as it is a rebuke, an increpation, the other as it is a convincing by argument, by way of inſtruction, and information, becauſe the firſt way cannot be applied to all the parts of this text; and to all that the Holy Ghoſt is to do upon the world, (for, howſoever he may rebuke the world of ſin, he cannot be ſaid to rebuke it of righteouſneſſe, and of judgement) according to S. Auguſtines later interpretation of theſe words, (for in one place of his workes, he takes this word, Reproofe, in the harder ſenſe, for rebuke, but in another, in the milder) we have and muſt purſue the ſecond ſignification of the word, That the Holy Ghoſt ſhall reprove the world of ſin, of righteouſneſſe, of judgement, by convincing the world, by making the world confeſſe and acknowledge all that that the Holy Ghoſt intends in all theſe. And this manifeſtation, and this conviction in theſe three, will be our parts, In the firſt of which, That the Holy Ghoſt ſhall Reprove, that is, convince, the world of ſin, we ſhall firſt looke how all the world is under ſin; and then, whether the Holy Ghoſt, being come, have convinced all the world, made all the world ſee that it is ſo; and in theſe two inquiſitions, we ſhall determine that firſt branch.

For the firſt, (for, of the other two we ſhall reach you the boughes anon, when you come to gather the fruit, and lay open the particulars, then when we come to handle them) That all the world is under ſin, and knowes it not, (for this Reproofe, Elenchus, is, (ſayes the Philoſopher) Syllogiſmus contra contraria opinantem, An argument againſt him that is of a contrary opinion) we condole firſt the miſery of this Ignorance, for, Quid miſerius miſero, non miſerante ſeipſum? What miſery can be ſo great, as to be ignorant, inſenſible inſenſible of our owne miſery? Every act done in ſuch an ignorance as we might overcome, is a new ſin; And it is not onely a new practiſe from the Devill, but it is a new A Auguſt. puniſhment from God; Iuſtiſti Domine, & ſic eſt, ut pœna ſit ſibi omnis inordinatus animus, Every ſinner is an Executioner upon himſelfe; and he is ſo by Gods appointment, who puniſhes former ſins with future. This then is the miſerable ſtate of the world, It might know, and does not, that it is wholly under an inundation, a deluge of ſin. For, ſin is a tranſgreſſion of ſome Law, which, he that ſins may know himſelfe to be bound by: For, if any man could be exempt from all Law, he were impeccable, he could not ſin; And if he could not poſſibly have any knowledge of the Law, it were no Law to him.

1 Part. Mundus ſub peccato.

Lex Humana. Now under the tranſgreſſion of what Law lyes all the World? For the poſitive Laws of the States in which we live, a man may keepe them, according to the intention of them that made thoſe Laws; which is all that is required in any humane Law; (to keepe it, if not according to the letter, yet according to the intention of the Law-maker) Nay B
Seneca. it is not onely poſſible, but eaſie to do ſo; Anguſta innocentia ad legem bonum eſſe, (ſayes the morall mans holy Ghoſt, Seneca) It is but a narrow and a ſhallow honeſty, to be no honeſter then the Law forces him to be. Thus then, in violating the Laws of the State, all the World is not under ſin.

Ceremonialia. If we paſſe from Laws meerely humane, (though, in truth, ſcarce any juſt Law is ſo, meerely humane, for God, that commands obedience to humane Laws, hath a hand in the making of them) to thoſe ceremoniall, and judiciall Laws, which the Jews received immediately from God, (in which reſpect they may be called divine Laws, though they were but locall and but temporary) which were in ſuch a number, as that, though penall Laws in ſome States be ſo many, and ſo heavy, as that they ſerve onely for ſnares, and ſpringes upon the people, yet they are no where equall to the ceremoniall and judiciall
Phil. 3.6. Laws, which lay upon the Jews; yet even for theſe Laws S. Paul ſayes of himſelfe, That touching that righteouſneſſe which is in the Law, he was blameleſſe. Thus therefore (in violating ceremoniall or judiciall Laws) all the World is not under ſin, both becauſe all the World was not bound by that Law, and ſome in the World did keepe it. C

Lex Naturæ. But in two other reſpects it is; firſt, That there is a Law of Nature that paſſes through all the World, a Law in the heart; and of the breach of this, no man can be alwayes ignorant. As every man hath a devill in himſelfe, Spontaneum Dæmonem, A Devill of his Chryſoſt. owne making, ſome particular ſin that tranſports him, ſo every man hath a kinde of God in himſelfe, ſuch a conſcience, as ſometimes reproves him. Carry we this conſideration a little higher, and we may ſee herein, ſome verification, at leaſt, ſome uſefull ap-Origen. plication of Origens extreme error. He thought, that at laſt, after infinite revolutions, (as all other ſubſtances ſhould be) even the Devill himſelfe ſhould be (as it were) ſucked and ſwallowed into God, and there ſhould remaine nothing at laſt, (as there was nothing elſe D at firſt) but onely God; (not by an annihilation of the Creature, that any thing ſhould come to nothing, but by this abſorption, by a tranſmigration of all Creatures into God, that God ſhould be all, and all ſhould be God) So in our caſe, That which is the ſinners devill, becomes his God; That very ſin which hath poſſeſſed him, by the exceſſe of that ſin, or, by ſome loſſe, or paine, or ſhame following that ſin, occaſions that reproofe and remorſe, that withdraws him from that ſin. So all the world is under ſin, becauſe they have a Law in themſelves, and a light in themſelves.

Originale peccatum. Eſay 1.4. Wiſd. 2.23. And it is ſo in a ſecond reſpect, That all being derived from Adam, Adams ſin is derived upon all. Onely that one man, that was not naturally deduced from Adam, Chriſt Jeſus, was guilty of no ſin; All others are ſubject to that maledi&ction, Va genti peccatrici, Wo to this ſinfull World: God made man Inexterminabilem, ſayes the Wiſeman, undiſ-Auguſt. ſeiſible, unexpellible; ſuch, as he could not be thruſt out of his Immortality, whether he would or no: for, that was mans firſt immortality, Poſſe non mori, That he needed not have dyed. When man killed himſelfe, and threw upon all his poſterity the morte morieris, that we muſt dye, and that Death is Stipendium peccati, The wages of ſin, and that Ezech. 18.4. Anima quæ peccaverit, ipſa morietur, that That ſoule, and onely that ſoule that ſins, ſhall dye, Since we ſee the puniſhment fall upon all, we are ſure the fault cleaves to all too; all do dye, therefore all do ſin. And though this Originall ſin that over-flowes us all, may in ſome ſenſe be called peccatum involuntarium, a ſin without any elicite act of the Will, (for ſo it muſt needs be in Children) and ſo properly no ſin, yet as all our other faculties
Auguſt. were, ſo omnium voluntates in Adam, all our wils were in Adam, and we ſinned wilfully,

when

when he did ſo, and ſo Originall ſin is a voluntary ſin: Our will is poyſoned in the fountaine; and, as ſoone as our will is able to exerciſe any election, we are willing to ſin, as ſoone as we can, and ſorry we can ſin no ſooner, and ſorry no longer: we are willing before the Devill is willing, and willing after the Devill is weary, and ſeek occaſions of tentation, when he preſents none. And ſo, as the breach of the Law of Nature, and as the deluge of Originall ſin hath ſurrounded the whole world, the whole world is under ſinne.

That all the world is ſo, requires not much proofe: But then, does the Holy Ghoſt, by his comming, reprove, that is, convince the whole world, that it is ſo? The Holy Ghoſt is able to doe it, and he hath good cauſe to doe it; But does he doe it? Is this Cum venerit, when he comes, come? Is he come to this purpoſe, to make all the world know their ſinfull condition? God knowes they know it not. Howſoever they may have ſome knowledge of the breach of the Law of Nature, yet they have no knowledge of any remedy after, and ſo lack all comfort; and therefore this is no knowledge from the Holy Ghoſt, from the Comforter. And for the knowledge of Originall ſin, which lies more heavy upon them then upon us, (who have the eaſe of Baptiſme, which ſlackens, and weakens Originall ſin in us) they are ſo farre from knowing, that that ſin is derived from Adam, as that they doe not know, that they themſelves are derived from Adam; not that there is ſuch a ſin, not that there was ſuch an Adam. How then doth the Holy Ghoſt, who is come according to Chriſts promiſe, according to his promiſe, Reprove, that is, Convince the world of ſinne, ſince this (being to bee done by the Holy Ghoſt) implies a knowledge of Chriſt, and a way of comfort in the doing thereof? An arguat Spiritus ſanctus?

This one word Arguet, He ſhall reprove, convince, admits three acceptations. Firſt, in the future, as it is here preſented, He ſhall; and ſo the Cum venerit, When he comes, ſignifies Antequam abierit, Before he departs. He came at Pentecoſt, and preſently ſet on foot his Commiſſion, by the Apoſtles, to reprove, convince the world of ſin, and hath proceeded ever ſince, by their ſucceſſors, in reducing Nation after Nation; and, before the conſummation of the world, before he retire, to reſt eternally in the boſome of the Father and the Son, from whom he proceeded, he ſhall reprove the whole world of ſin, that is, bring them to a knowledge, That in the breach of the law of nature, and in the guiltineſſe of originall ſin, they are all under a burthen, which none of them all, of themſelves, can diſcharge. This work S. Paul ſeemes to haſten ſooner: To convince the Jews of their infidelity, he argues thus, Have not they heard the Goſpell? They, that is, the Gentiles; and if They, much more You; And that They had heard it, he proves by the application of thoſe words, In omnem terram, Their voice is gone through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world, That is, the voice of the Apoſtles, in the preaching of the Goſpell. Antequam abierit. Rom. 10. 18. Pſal. 19. 3.

Hence grew that diſtraction, and perplexity which we finde in the Fathers, Whether it could be truly ſaid, that the Goſpell had been preached over all the world in thoſe times. If we number the Fathers, moſt are of that opinion, That before the deſtruction of the Temple of Jeruſalem, this was fulfilled. Of thoſe that think the contrary, ſome proceed upon reaſons ill grounded; particularly Origen; Quid de Britannis & Germanis, qui nec adhuc audierunt verbum Euangelii? What ſhall we ſay of Britanny, and Germany, who have not heard of the Goſpell yet? For, before Origens time, (though Origen were 1400. yeares ſince) in whit darkneſſe ſoever he miſtook us to be, we had a bleſſed and a glorious diſcovery of the Goſpell of Chriſt Jeſus in this Iland. S. Hierome, who denies this univerſall preaching of the Goſpell before the deſtruction of the Temple, yet doubts not but that the fulfilling of that prophecy was then in action, and in a great forwardneſſe; Iam completum, aut brevi terminus complendum; Already we ſee it performed, ſayes he; Or, at leaſt ſo earneſtly purſued, as that it muſt neceſſarily, very ſoon be performed: Nec puto aliquam remanere gentem, quæ Chriſti nomen ignorat; I do not think, (ſayes that Father, more then 1200. yeares ſince) that there is any nation that hath not heard of Chriſt; Et quanquam non habuerit prædicatorem, ex vicinis, &c. If they have not had expreſſe Preachers themſelves, yet from their neighbours they have had ſome Echoes of this voice, ſome reflexions of this light. Origen. Hierom.

The later Divines, and the School, that finde not this early, and generall preaching over the world, to lye in proofe, proceed to a more ſafe way, That there was then Odor Euangelii, A ſweet ſavour of the Goſpell iſſued, though it were not yet arrived to all parts:

parts: As if a plentifull and diffuſive perfume were ſet up in a houſe, we would ſay The houſe were perfumed, though that perfume were not yet come to every corner of the houſe. But not to thruſt the world into ſo narrow a ſtraite, as it is, when a Decree is ſaid to have gone out from Auguſtus, to taxe all the world, (for this was but the Romane world) Nor, That there were men dwelling at Ieruſalem, devout men, of every nation under heaven, (for, this was but of nations diſcovered, and traded withall then) nor, when S. Paul ſayes, That the faith of the Romanes was publiſhed to the world, (for that was as far as he had gone) thoſe words of our Saviour, This Goſpell of the kingdome ſhall be preached in all the world, for a witneſſe to all nations, and then ſhall the end come, have evermore, by all, Ancient and Modern, Fathers and School, Preachers and Writers, Expoſitors and Controverters, been literally underſtood, that before the end of the world, the Goſpell ſhall be actually, really, evidently, effectually preached to all nations; and ſo, Cum venerit, When the holy Ghoſt comes, that is, Antequam abierit, Before he go, he ſhall reprove, convince the whole world of ſin, and this, as he is a Comforter, by accompanying their knowledge of ſin, with the knowledge of the Goſpell, for the remiſſion of ſins.

Luk. 2. 1. Acts 2. 5. Rom. 15. 18. Mat. 24. 14.

It agrees with the nature of goodneſſe to be ſo diffuſive, communicable to all. It agrees with the nature of God, who is goodneſſe, That as all the fountaines of the great Deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, and ſo came the flood over all, ſo there ſhould be Diluvium Spiritus, A flowing out of the holy Ghoſt upon all, as he promiſes, Effundam, I will poure it out upon all, and Diluvium gentium, That all nations ſhould flow up unto him. For, this Spirit, Spirat ubi vult, Breathes where it pleaſes him; and though a naturall winde cannot blow Eaſt and Weſt, North and South together, this Spirit at once breathes upon the moſt contrary diſpoſitions, upon the preſuming, and upon the deſpairing ſinner; and, in an inſtant can denizen and naturalize that ſoule that was an alien to the Covenant, Empale and inlay that ſoule that was bred upon the Common, amongſt the Gentiles, transform that ſoul, which was a Goate, into a Sheep, unite that ſoul which was a loſt ſheep to the fold again, ſhine upon that ſoul that ſits in darkneſſe, and in the ſhadow of death, and ſo melt and poure out that ſoul that yet underſtands nothing of the Divine nature, nor of the Spirit of God, that it ſhall become partaker of the Divine nature, and be the ſame Spirit with the Lord. When Chriſt took our fleſh, he had not all his Anceſtors of the Covenant; he was pleaſed to come of Ruth, a Moabite, a poore ſtranger; As he came, ſo will the holy Ghoſt go to ſtrangers alſo. Shall any man murmur, or draw into diſputation, why this Spirit doth not breath in all nations at once? or why not ſooner then it doth in ſome? Doth this Spirit fall and reſt upon every ſoul in this Congregation now? May not one man finde that he receives him now, and ſuffer him to go away again? May not another who felt no motion of him now, recollect himſelf at home, and remember ſomething then, which hath been ſaid now, to the quickning of this Spirit in him there? Since the holy Ghoſt viſits us ſo, ſucceſſively, not all at once, not all with an equall eſtabliſhment, we may ſafely imbrace that acceptation of this word Arguet, He ſhall, he will, Antequam abierit, Before the end come, Reprove, convince the whole world of ſin, by this his way, the way of comfort, the preaching of the Goſpell. And that is the firſt acceptation thereof.

Gen. 7. 11. Joel. 2. 28. Eſay 2. 2. Joh. 3. 8. 2 Pet. 1. 4. 1 Cor. 6. 17.

Arguit.

The ſecond acceptation of the word is in the preſent; not Arguet, He ſhall, but Arguit, He doth, now he doth reprove all the world. As when the Devill confeſſed Chriſt in the Goſpel, as when Judas, (who was the Devils Devill, for, he had ſold Chriſt to the Chiefe-Prieſts, Mat. 26. 14. before Satan entred into him after the Sop, John 13. 27.) profeſſed this Goſpel, this was not Sine omni impulſu Spiritus Sancti, Altogether without the motion of the Holy Ghoſt, who had his ends, and his purpoſes therein, to draw teſtimonies for Chriſt out of the mouths of his adverſaries; ſo when a naturall man comes to be diſpleaſed with his owne actions, and to diſcerne ſin in them, though his naturall faculties be the Inſtruments in theſe actions, yet the Holy Ghoſt ſets this Inſtrument in tune, and makes all that is muſique and harmony in the faculties of this naturall man. At Epheſus S. Paul found certaine Diſciples which were baptized, and when he asked them, Whether they had received the Holy Ghoſt, they ſaid, That they had not ſo much as heard that there was a Holy Ghoſt. So certainly, infinite numbers of men, in thoſe unconverted Nations have the Holy Ghoſt working in them, though they have never ſo much as heard that there is a Holy Ghoſt. When we ſee any man doe any work well, that belongs to the hand, to write, to carve, to play, to doe any mechanique office well, doe we determine

A mine our conſideration onely upon the Inſtrument, the hand, doe we onely ſay, he hath a good, a fit, a well diſpoſed hand for ſuch a work, or doe we not rather raiſe our contemplation to the ſoule, and her faculties, which enable that hand to do that work? So certainly when a morall man hath any reproofe, any ſenſe of ſin in himſelfe, the holy Ghoſt is the intelligence that moves in that ſpheare, and becomes the ſoule of his ſoule, and works that in him primarily, of which, naturall faculties, or philoſophicall inſtructions, are but miniſteriall inſtruments and ſuppletory aſſiſtances after. And not only in the beginning of good actions, but in the proſecution of ſome eviſſ, the holy Ghoſt hath an intereſt, though we diſcern him not: In the diſpoſing of our ſins, the holy Ghoſt hath a working thus, That when we intended ſome miſchievous ſin to morrow, a leſſe ſin, ſome ſin of pleaſure meets us, and takes hold of us, and diverts us from our firſt purpoſe, and ſo the holy Ghoſt reſcues us from one ſin, by ſuffering us to fall into another. What
B action ſoever hath any degree of good, what action ſoever hath any leſſe evill in it then otherwiſe it would have had, hath received a working of the holy Ghoſt, though that man upon whom he hath wrought, knew not his working, nor his name. As we thinke that we have the differences of ſeaſons, of Winter and Summer, by the naturall motion of the Sun, but yet it is not truly by that naturall motion, but by a contrary motion of a higher ſpheare, which drawes the Sun againſt his naturall courſe; (for, if the Sun were left to himſelfe, we ſhould not have theſe ſeaſons) ſo if the ſoul and conſcience of a meere naturall man have any of theſe reproofes, and remorſes, though perchance fear, or ſhame, or ſickneſſe, or penalties of law, yea though a wearineſſe, and exceſſe of the ſin it ſelfe, may ſeem to him to be the thing that reproves him, and that occaſions this remorſe, becauſe it is the moſt immediate, and therefore moſt diſcernible; yet there is Digitus Dei, The hand of God, and ſpiritus Spiritus ſancti, The breath of the holy Ghoſt, in all this,
C who, as a liberall almes-giver ſends to perſons, that never know who ſends, works upon perſons, who never know who works. So the holy Ghoſt reproves all the world of ſin; that is, all the reproofe, which even the naturall man hath, (and every man hath ſome at ſometimes) is from the holy Ghoſt; and, as in the former ſenſe, the Cum venerit, When he comes, was Antequam abierit, before he goes, ſo here the Cum venerit, is Quia adeſt, becauſe he is alwayes preſent, and alwayes working.

And then there is a third acceptation, where the Arguet is not in the future, That he Operatus eſt.
ſhall do it, nor in the preſent, Arguit, That he doth it now in every naturall man, but it is in the time paſt, Arguit, He hath done it, done it already. And here in this ſenſe, it is not that the holy Ghoſt ſhall bring the Goſpell before the end, to all Nations, that is, Antequam abierit, Nor that the holy Ghoſt doth exalt the naturall faculties of every man in all his good actions, that is, Quia ſemper adeſt, but it is, that he hath infuſed and
D imprinted in all their hearts, whom hee hath called effectually to the participation of the meanes of ſalvation in the true Church, a conſtant and infallible aſſurance, that all the world, that is, all the reſt of the world which hath not imbraced thoſe helps, lies unrecoverably (by any other meanes then theſe which we have imbraced) under ſin, under the waight, the condemnation of ſin. So that the comfort of this reproofe (as all the reproofes of the holy Ghoſt in this Text, are given by him in that quality, as he is The Comforter) is not directly, and ſimply, and preſently upon all the world indeed, but upon thoſe whom the holy Ghoſt hath taken out of this world, to his world in this world, that is, to the Chriſtian Church, them he Reproves, that is Convinces them, eſtabliſhes, delivers them from all ſcruples, that they have taken the right way, that they, and onely they, are delivered, and all the world beſide are ſtill under ſin.

When the Holy Ghoſt hath brought us into the Ark from whence we may ſee all the E world without, ſprawling and gaſping in the flood, (the flood of ſinfull courſes in the world, and of the anger of God) when we can ſee this violent flood, (the anger of God) break in at windowes, and there devoure the licentious man in his ſinfull embracements, and make his bed of wantonneſſe his death-bed; when we can ſee this flood (the anger of God) ſwell as faſt as the ambitious man ſwels, and purſue him through all his titles, and and at laſt ſuddenly, and violently waſh him away in his owne blood, not alwayes in a vulgar, but ſometimes in an ignominious death; when we ſhall ſee this flood (the flood of the anger of God) over-flow the valley of the voluptuous mans gardens, and orchards, and follow him into his Arbours, and Mounts, and Teraſſes, and carry him from thence into a bottomleſſe Sea, which no Plummet can ſound, (no heavy ſadneſſe relieve him) no

anchor

anchor take hold of, (no repentance ſtay his tempeſted and weather-beaten conſcience) when wee finde our ſelves in this Ark, where we have firſt taken in the freſh water of Baptiſme, and then the Bread, and Wine, and Fleſh, of the Body and Blood of Chriſt Jeſus, Then are we reproved, forbidden all ſcruple, then are we convinced, That as the twelve Apoſtles ſhall ſit upon twelve ſeats, and judge the twelve Tribes at the laſt day; So doth the Holy Ghoſt make us Judges of all the world now, and inables us to pronounce that ſentence, That all but they, who have ſincerely accepted the Chriſtian Religion, are ſtill ſub peccato, under ſin, and without remedy. For we muſt not waigh God with leaden, or iron, or ſtone waights, how much land, or metall, or riches he gives one man more then another, but how much grace in the uſe of theſe, or how much patience in the want, or in the loſſe of theſe, we have above others. When we come to ſay, Hi in curribus, Hi in equis, nos autem in nomine Domini Dei noſtri invocabimus, Some truſt in chariots, and ſome in horſes, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God; Ipſi obligati ſunt, & ceciderunt, nos autem ſurreximus, & erecti ſumus, They are brought downe and fallen, but we are riſen, and ſtand upright. Obligati ſunt, & ceciderunt, They are pinion'd and fallen, fettered, and manacled, and ſo fallen; fallen and there muſt lie: Nos autem erecti, Wee are riſen, and enabled to ſtand, now we are up. When we need not feare the mighty, nor envy the rich, Quia ſignatum ſuper nos lumen vultus tui Domine, Becauſe the light of thy countenance O Lord, is (not onely ſhed, but) lifted up upon us, Quia dediſti latitiam in corde noſtro, Becauſe thou haſt put gladneſſe in our heart, more then in the time that their corne and their wine increaſed; when we can thus compare the Chriſtian Church with other States, and ſpirituall bleſſings with temporall, then hath the Holy Ghoſt throughly reproved us, that is, abſolutely convinced us, that there is no other foundation but Chriſt, no other name for ſalvation but Jeſus, and that all the world but the true profeſſors of that name, are ſtill under ſin, under the guiltineſſe of ſin. And theſe be the three acceptations of this word, Arguet, He ſhall carry the Goſpel to all before the end, Arguit, Hee does worke upon the faculties of the naturall man every minute, and Arguit againe, Hee hath manifeſted to us, that that they who goe not the ſame way, periſh. And ſo wee paſſe to the ſecond Reproofe and Conviction, He ſhall reprove the world, De Iuſtitia, of Righteouſneſſe.

Pſal. 20. 7. Ver. 8. Ver. 7.

2 Part. De juſtitia.

This word, Iuſtificare, To juſtifie, may be well conſidered three wayes; Firſt as it is verbum vulgare, as it hath an ordinary and common uſe; And then as it is verbum forenſe, as it hath a civill and a legall uſe; And laſtly, as it is verbum Eccleſiaſticum, as it hath a Church uſe, as it hath been uſed amongſt Divines. The firſt way, To juſtifie, is to averre, and maintaine any thing to be true, as wee ordinarily ſay to that purpoſe, I will juſtifie it; and in that ſenſe the Pſalmiſt ſayes, Iuſtificata judicia Domini in ſemetipſo, The judgements of the Lord juſtifie themſelves, prove themſelves to be juſt: And in this ſenſe men are ſaid to juſtifie God, The Phariſees and Lawyers rejected the counſell of God, but all the people, and the Publicans juſtified God, that is, teſtified for him. In the ſecond way, as it is a judiciall word, To juſtifie is only a verdict of Not guilty, and a Judgement entred upon that, That there is not evidence enough againſt him, and therefore he is juſtified, that is, acquited. In this ſenſe is the word in the Proverbs, He that juſtifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the juſt, even they both are an abomination to the Lord. Now neither of theſe two wayes are we juſtified; we cannot be averred to be juſt; God himſelfe cannot ſay ſo of us; of us, as we are we: Non juſtificabo impium, I will not juſtifie the wicked. God will not ſay it, God cannot doe it; A wicked man cannot be, he cannot, by God, be ſaid to be juſt; they are incompatible, contradictory things. Nor the ſecond way neither; conſider us ſtanding in judgement before God, no man can be acquited for want of evidence; Enter not into Iudgement with thy ſervant, for, in thy ſight ſhall none that liveth be juſtified. For, if we had another ſoule to give the Devill, to bribe him, to give no evidence againſt this, if we had another iron to ſeare up our conſciences againſt giving of evidence againſt our ſelves then, yet who can take out of Gods hands thoſe examinations, and thoſe evidences, which he hath regiſtred exactly, as often as we have thought, or ſaid, or done any thing offenſive to him?

Luke 7. 29. Prov. 17. 14. Exod. 23. 7. Pſal. 143. 2.

It is therefore onely in the third ſenſe of this word, as it is Verbum Eccleſiaſticum, A word which S. Paul, and the other Scriptures, and the Church, and Eccleſiaſticall Writers have uſed to expreſſe our Righteouſneſſe, our Juſtification by: And that is onely by the way of pardon, and remiſſion of ſins, ſealed to us in the blood of Chriſt Jeſus; that what what kinde of ſinners ſoever we were before, yet that is applied to us, Such and ſuch you were before, But ye are juſtified by the name of the Lord Ieſus, and by the Spirit of our God. 1 Cor. 6 11. Now the reproofe of the World, the convincing of the World, the bringing of the World to the knowledg, that as they are all ſub peccato, under ſin, by the ſin of another, ſo there is a righteouſneſſe of another, that muſt prevaile for all their Pardons, this reproof, this convincing, this inſtruction of the World is thus wrought: That the whole World conſiſting of Jews and Gentiles, when the Holy Ghoſt had done enough for the convincing of both theſe, enough for the overthrowing of all arguments, which could either be brought by the Jew for the righteouſneſſe of the Law, or by the Gentile for the righteouſneſſe of Works, (all which is abundantly done by the Holy Ghoſt, in the Epiſtles of S. Paul, and other Scriptures) when the Holy Ghoſt had poſſeſſed the Church of God, of theſe all-ſufficient Scriptures, Then the promiſe of Chriſt was performed, and then, though all the world were not preſently converted, yet it was preſently convinced by the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe the Holy Ghoſt had provided in thoſe Scriptures, of which he is the Author, that nothing could be ſaid in the Worlds behalfe, for any other Righteouſneſſe, then by way of pardon in the blood of Chriſt.

Thus much the Holy Ghoſt tels us; And if we will ſearch after more then hee is pleaſed to tell us, that is to rack the Holy Ghoſt, to over-labour him, to examine him upon ſuch Intergatories, as belongs not to us, to miniſter unto him. Curious men are not content to know, That our debt is paid by Chriſt, but they will know farther, whether Chriſt have paid it with his owne hands, or given us money to pay it our ſelves; whether his Righteouſneſs, before it do us any good, be not firſt made ours by Imputation, or by Inheſion; They muſt know whoſe money, and then what money, Gold or Silver, whether his active obedience in fulfilling the Law; or his paſſive obedience in ſhedding his blood. But all the Commiſſion of the Holy Ghoſt here, is, To reprove the World of righteouſneſſe, To convince all Sects in the World, that ſhall conſtitute any other righteouſneſſe, then a free pardon by the incorruptible, and invaluable, and inexhauſtible blood of Chriſt Jeſus. By that pardon, his Righteouſneſſe is ours: How it is made ſo, or by what name we ſhall call our title, or eſtate, or intereſt in his Righteouſneſſe, let us not enquire. The termes of ſatisfaction in Chriſt, of acceptation in the Father, of imputation to us, or inheſion in us, are all pious and religious phraſes, and ſomething they expreſſe; but yet none of theſe, Satisfaction, Acceptation, Imputation, Inheſion, will reach home to ſatisfie them, that will needs inquire, Quo modo, by what meanes Chriſts Righteouſneſſe is made ours. This is as far as we need go, Ad eundem modum juſti ſumus coram Deo, quo coram eo Chriſtus fuit peccator, So as God made Chriſt ſin for us, we are made the righteouſneſſe of God in him: ſo; but how was that? He that can finde no comfort in this Doctrine, till he finde How Chriſt was made ſin, and we righteouſneſſe, till he can expreſſe Quo modo, robs himſelf of a great deale of peacefull refreſhing, which his conſcience might receive, in taſting the thing it ſelfe in a holy and humble ſimplicity, without vexing his owne, or other mens conſciences, or troubling the peace of the Church with impertinent and inextricable curioſities. 2 Cor. 5. 21.

Thoſe queſtions are not ſo impertinent, but they are in a great part unneceſſary, which are moved about the cauſe of our righteouſneſſe, our juſtification. Alas, let us be content that God is the cauſe, and ſeeke no other. We muſt never ſlacken that proteſtation, That good works are no cauſe of our juſtification. But we muſt alwaies keepe up a right ſignification of that word, Cauſe. For, Faith it ſelfe is no cauſe; no ſuch cauſe, as that I can merit Heaven, by faith. What doe I merit of the King, by beleeving that he is the undoubted Heire to all his Dominions, or by beleeving that he governes well, if I live not in obedience to his Laws? If it were poſſible to beleeve aright, and yet live ill, my faith ſhould doe me no good. The beſt faith is not worth Heaven; The value of it grows Ex pacto, That God hath made that Covenant, that Contract, Crede & vives, onely beleeve and thou ſhalt be ſafe. Faith is but one of thoſe things, which in ſeverall ſenſes are ſaid to juſtifie us. It is truly ſaid of God, Deus ſolus juſtificat, God only juſtifies us; Efficienter, nothing can effect it, nothing can worke towards it, but onely the meere goodneſſe of God. And it is truly ſaid of Chriſt, Chriſtus ſolus juſtificat, Chriſt onely juſtifies us; Materialiter, nothing enters into the ſubſtance and body of the ranſome for our ſins, but the obedience of Chriſt. It is alſo truly ſaid, Sola fides juſtificat, Onely faith juſtifies us; Inſtrumentaliter, nothing apprehends, nothing applies the merit of Chriſt to thee, but thy thy faith. And laſtly it is as truly ſaid, Sola opera juſtificant, Onely our works juſtifie us; Declaratorie, Only thy good life can aſſure thy conſcience, and the World, that thou art juſtified. As the efficient juſtification, the gracious purpoſe of God had done us no good, without the materiall ſatisfaction, the death of Chriſt had followed; And as that materiall ſatisfaction, the death of Chriſt would do me no good, without the inſtrumentall juſtification, the apprehenſion by faith; ſo neither would this profit without the declaratory juſtification, by which all is pleaded and eſtabliſhed. God enters not into our materiall juſtification, that is onely Chriſts; Chriſt enters not into our inſtrumentall juſtification, that is onely faiths; Faith enters not into our declaratory juſtification, (for faith is ſecret) and declaration belongs to workes. Neither of theſe can be ſaid to juſtifie us alone, ſo, as that we may take the chaine in pieces, and thinke to be juſtified by any one link thereof; by God without Chriſt, by Chriſt without faith, or by faith without works; And yet every one of theſe juſtifies us alone, ſo, as that none of the reſt enter into that way and that meanes, by which any of theſe are ſaid to juſtifie us. A B

Conſider we then our ſelves, as men fallen downe into a darke and deepe pit; and juſtification as a chaine, conſiſting of theſe foure links, to be let downe to us, and let us take hold of that linke that is next us, A good life, and keepe a faſt and inſeparable hold upon that; for though in that ſenſe of which we ſpoke, Fides juſtificat ſola, Only faith do juſtifie, yet it is not true in any ſenſe, Fides eſt ſola, that there is any faith, where there is nothing but faith. God comes downeward to us; but we muſt go upward to God; not to get above him in his unrevealed Decrees, but to go up towards him, in laying hold upon that loweſt linke; that as the holy Ghoſt ſhall reprove, that is, convince the world, that there is no other righteouſneſſe but that of Chriſt, ſo he may enable you to paſſe a judgement upon your ſelves, and to teſtifie to the world that you have apprehended that righteouſneſs; Which is that that is principally intended in the third and laſt part, That the holy Ghoſt, when he comes, ſhall reprove the World, as of ſin, & of righteouſneſs, ſo of judgement. C

3. Part.

After thoſe two convictions of the World, that is, Jew, and Gentile, firſt, that they are all under ſin, and ſo in a ſtate of condemnation; And ſecondly, that there is no righteouſneſſe, no juſtification to be had to the Jew by the Law, nor to the Gentile in Nature, but that there is Righteouſneſſe, and Juſtification enough for all the world, Jew, and Gentile in Chriſt; In the third place, the Holy Ghoſt is to reprove, that is, ſtill to convince the world, to acquaint the world with this myſtery, That there is a means ſettled to convey this Righteouſneſſe of Chriſt upon the World, and then an account to be taken of them, who do not lay hold upon this meanes; for, both theſe are intended in this word Judgement, He ſhall reprove them, prove to them this double ſignification of judgement; firſt, that there is a judgement of order, of rectitude, of government, to which purpoſe he hath eſtabliſhed the Church; And then a judgement of account, and of ſentence, and beatification upon them, who did, and malediction upon them who did not apply themſelves to the firſt judgement, that is, to thoſe orderly wayes and meanes of embracing Chriſts righteouſneſſe, which were offered them in the Church. God hath ordered all things in meaſure, and number, and waight; Let all things be done decently and in order for, God is the God of order, and not of confuſion. And this order, is this judgement; The Court, the Tribunall, the Judgment ſeat, in which all mens conſciences and actions muſt be regulated and ordered, the Church. The perfecteſt order was Innocency; that firſt integrity in which God made all. All was diſordered by ſin: For, in ſin, and the author of ſin, Satan, there is no order, no conformity; nothing but diſorder, and confuſion. Though the Schoole doe generally acknowledge a diſtinction of orders in the miniſtring Spirits of Heaven, now; Angels and Archangels, and others, yet they diſpute, and doubt, and (in a great part) deny that this diſtinction of orders was before the fall of thoſe Angels; for, they confeſſe this diſtribution into orders, to have been upon their ſubmiſſion, and recognition of Gods government, which recognition was their very confirmation, and after that they could not fall. And though thoſe fallen Angels, the Devils, concurre in an unanimous conſent to ruin us, (for, Bellum Dæmonum, ſumma pax hominum) we ſhould agree better, if devils did fall out, yet this is not ſuch a peace, ſuch an unity, as gives them any peace, or relaxation, or intermiſſion of anguiſh, but, as they are the Authors of our confuſion, ſo they are in a continuall confuſion themſelves. 1 Cor. 14.40.
Hieron.

There is no order in the Author of ſin, and therfore the God of order cannot, directly nor indirectly, poſitively nor conſecutively, be the Author of ſin. There is no order in ſin

it

it ſelfe. The nature, the definition of ſin, is diſorder. Dictum, factum, concupitum contra legem; God hath ordered a law, and ſin is an act; if we cannot do that, it is a word; if we dare not do that, it is a deſire againſt that law. Forma peccati, deformitas; we can aſſigne ſin no other form, but deformity. So that our affecting of any thing, as our end, which God hath not propoſed for our end, or our affecting of true ends, by any other wayes then he hath propoſed, this is a diſordering of Gods providence, as much as we can, and ſo a ſin. For the Schoole reſolves conveniently, probably, that that firſt ſin that ever was committed, (that peccatum pragnans, peccatum prolificum, That womb and matrice of all ſins that have been committed ſince) The ſin of the Angels, it was a diſorder, an obliquity, a deformity, not in not going to the right end, (for, Illud quæſiverunt, ad quod perveniſſent, ſi ſtetiſſent, ſayes Aquinas out of S. Auguſt. They deſired no more then they were made for, and ſhould have come to, if they had ſtood) but their ſin was in affecting a right end a wrong way, in deſiring to come to their appointed perfection by themſelves, to ſubſiſt of themſelves, & to be independent, without any farther need of God, for that was their deſire, To be like the moſt High, To depend upon nothing, but be all-ſufficient to themſelves. So they diſordered Gods purpoſe; and when they had once broke that chaine, when they had once put that harmony out of tune, then came in diſorder, diſcord, confuſion, and that is ſin. Auguſt.

Gods work is perfect; How appeares that? For all his wayes are Judgement, ſayes Moſes in his victorious ſong. This is Perfection, That he hath eſtabliſhed an order, a judgement. Which is not only that order which S. Auguſtine defines, Ordo eſt, per quem omnia aguntur, quæ Deus conſtituit, The order and the judgement by which God governs the world, according to his purpoſe, (which judgement is Providence) But (as the ſame Father ſayes in the ſame book) it is Ordo, quem ſi tenueris in vita, perducet ad Deum, It is an order and a judgement which he hath manifeſted to thee, (for the order and judgement of his providence, he doth not alwayes manifeſt) by obedience to which order and judgement, thou maiſt be ſaved. The ſame Father ſpeaking of this order and judgement of providence, ſayes, Nihil ordini contrarium, Nothing can be contrary to that order; He is in a holy rapture tranſported with that conſideration, That even diſorders are within Gods order; There is in the order and judgement of his providence an admiſſion, a permiſſion of diſorders: This unſearchable proceeding of God, carries him to that paſſionate exclamation, O ſi poſſem dicere quod vellem! O that I were able to expreſſe my ſelf! Rogo, ubi ubi eſtis verba, ſuccurrite; Where, where are thoſe words which I had wont to have at command? why do ye not ſerve me, help me now? Now, when I would declare this, Bona & mala ſunt in ordine, That even diſorders are done in order, that even our ſins ſome way or other fall within the providence of God. But that is not the order, nor judgement which the holy Ghoſt is ſent to manifeſt to the world. The holy Ghoſt works beſt upon them, which ſearch leaſt into Gods ſecret judgements and proceedings. But the order and judgement we ſpeak of, is an order, a judgement-ſeate eſtabliſhed, by which, every man, howſoever oppreſſed with the burden of ſin, may, in the application of the promiſes of the Goſpel by the Ordinance of preaching, and in the ſeales thereof in the participation of the Sacraments, be aſſured, that he hath received his Abſolution, his Remiſſion, his Pardon, and is reſtored to the innocency of his Baptiſme, nay to the integrity which Adam had before the fall, nay to the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe. In the creation God took red earth, and then breathed a ſoule into it: When Chriſt came to a ſecond creation, to make a Church, he took earth, men, red earth, men made partakers of his blood; (for, Eccleſiam quæſivit, & acquiſivit, Hee deſired a Church, and he purchaſed a Church; but by a bleſſed way of Simony; Adde medium acquiſitionis, Sanguine acquiſivit, He purchaſed a Church with his own blood) And when he had made this body, in calling his Apoſtles, then he breathed the ſoule into them, his Spirit, and that made up all: Quod inſufflavit Dominus Apoſtolis, & dixit, Accipite Spiritum ſanctum, Eccleſiæ poteſtas collata eſt, Then when Chriſt breathed that Spirit into them, he conſtituted the Church. And this power of Remiſſion of ſins, is that order, and that judgement which Chriſt himſelfe calls by the name of the moſt orderly frame in this, or the next world, A Kingdome, Diſpono vobis regnum, I appoint unto you a Kingdome, as my Father hath appointed unto me. Bernard. Acts 20.28. Auguſt. Luk. 22.29.

Now, Faciunt favos & veſpa, faciunt Eccleſias & Marcionita, As Waſpes make combs, but empty ones, ſo do Heretiques Churches, but frivolous ones, ineffectuall ones. And, as we told you before, That errors and diſorders are as well in wayes, as in ends, ſo may Tertul.

we deprive our ſelves of the benefit of this judgement, The Church, as well in circumſtances, as in ſubſtances, as well in oppoſing diſcipline, as doctrine. The holy Ghoſt reproveth thee, convinces thee, of judgement, that is, offers thee the knowledge that ſuch a Church there is; A Jordan to waſh thine originall leproſie in Baptiſme; A City upon a mountaine, to enlighten thee in the works of darkneſſe; a continuall application of all that Chriſt Jeſus ſaid, and did, and ſuffered, to thee. Let no ſoule ſay, ſhe can have all this at Gods hands immediatly, and never trouble the Church; That ſhe can paſſe her pardon between God and her, without all theſe formalities, by a ſecret repentance. It is true, beloved, a true repentance is never fruſtrate: But yet, if thou wilt think thy ſelfe a little Church, a Church to thy ſelfe, becauſe thou haſt heard it ſaid, That thou art a little world, a world in thy ſelfe, that figurative, that metaphoricall repreſentation ſhall not ſave thee. Though thou beeſt a world to thy ſelf, yet if thou have no more corn, nor oyle, nor milk, then growes in thy ſelf, or flowes from thy ſelf, thou wilt ſtarve; Though thou be a Church in thy fancy, if thou have no more ſeales of grace, no more abſolution of ſin, then thou canſt give thy ſelf, thou wilt periſh. Gregor. Per ſolam Eccleſiam ſacrificium libenter accipit Deus: Thou maiſt be a Sacrifice in thy chamber, but God receives a Sacrifice more cheerefully at Church. Sola, quæ pro errantibus fiducialiter intercedit, Only the Church hath the nature of a ſurety; Howſoever God may take thine own word at home, yet he accepts the Church in thy behalfe, as better ſecurity. Joyne therefore ever with the Communion of Saints; Auguſt. Et cum membrum ſis ejus corporis, quod loquitur omnibus linguis, crede te omnibus linguis loqui, Whilſt thou art a member of that Congregation, that ſpeaks to God with a thouſand tongues, beleeve that thou ſpeakeſt to God with all thoſe tongues. And though thou know thine own prayers unworthy to come up to God, becauſe thou lifteſt up to him an eye, which is but now withdrawne from a licentious glancing, and hands which are guilty yet of unrepented uncleanneſſes, a tongue that hath but lately blaſphemed God, a heart which even now breaks the walls of this houſe of God, and ſteps home, or runs abroad upon the memory, or upon the new plotting of pleaſurable or profitable purpoſes, though this make thee thinke thine own prayers uneffectuall, yet beleeve that ſome honeſter man then thy ſelfe ſtands by thee, and that when he prayes with thee, he prayes for thee; and that, if there be one righteous man in the Congregation, thou art made the more acceptable to God by his prayers; and make that benefit of this reproofe, this conviction of the holy Ghoſt, That he convinces thee De judicio, aſſures thee of an orderly Church eſtabliſhed for thy reliefe, and that the application of thy ſelf to this judgement, The Church, ſhall enable thee to ſtand upright in that other judgement, the laſt judgement, which is alſo enwrapped in the ſignification of this word of our Text, Judgement, and is the concluſion for this day.

Judicium finale. Sap. 11. As God begun all with judgement, (for he made all things in meaſure, number, and waight) as he proceeded with judgement, in erecting a judiciall ſeat for our direction, and correction, the Church, ſo he ſhall end all with judgement, The finall, and generall judgement, at the Reſurrection; which he that beleeves not, beleeves nothing; not God; Heb. 11. 6. for, He that commeth to God (that makes any ſtep towards him) muſt beleeve, Deum remuneratorem, God, and God in that notion, as he is a Rewarder; Therefore there is judgement. But was this work left for the Holy Ghoſt? Did not the naturall man that knew no Holy Ghoſt, know this? Truly, all their fabulous Divinity, all their Mythology, their Minos, and their Rhadamanthus, taſted of ſuch a notion, as a judgement. And yet the firſt planters of the Chriſtian Religion found it hardeſt to fixe this roote of all other articles, That Chriſt ſhould come againe to judgement. Miſerable and froward men! They would beleeve it in their fables, and would not beleeve it in the Scriptures; They would beleeve it in the nine Muſes, and would not beleeve it in the twelve Apoſtles; They would beleeve it by Apollo, and they would not beleeve it by the Holy Ghoſt; They would be ſaved Poetically, and fantaſtically, and would not reaſonably, and ſpiritually; By Copies, and not by Originals; by counterfeit things at firſt deduced by their Authors, out of our Scriptures, and yet not by the word of God himſelf. Which Tertull. Tertullian apprehends and reprehends in his time, when he ſayes, Præſcribimus adulteris noſtris, Wee preſcribe above them, which counterfeit our doctrine, for we had it before them, and they have but rags, and thoſe torn from us. Fabulæ immiſſæ, quæ fidem infirmarent veritatis; They have brought part of our Scriptures into their Fables, that all the reſt might ſeem but Fables too. Gehennam prædicantes & judicium, ridemur, decachinnamur, They laugh

A laugh at us when we preach of hell, and judgement, Et tamen Elysii campi fidem præoccupaverunt, And yet they will needs be beleeved when they talk of their Elysian fields. Fideliora nostra, quorum imagines fidem inveniunt, Is it not safer trusting to our substance, then their shadows; To our doctrine of the judgement, in the Scriptures, then their allusions in their Poets?

So far Tertullian considers this; But to say the truth, and all the truth, Howsoever the Gentiles had some glimmering of a judgement, that is, an account to be made of our actions after this life, yet of this judgement which we speak of now, which is a generall Judgement of all together, And that judgement to be executed by Christ, and to be accompanied with a Resurrection of the body, of this, the Gentiles had no intimation, this was left wholly for the holy Ghost to manifest. And of this, all the world hath received a full convincing from him, because he hath delivered to the world those Scriptures,
B which do so abundantly, so irrefragably establish it. And therfore, Memorare novissima & non peccabis; Remember the end, and thou shalt never do amisse. Non dicitur memorare primordia, aut media; If thou remember the first reproofe, that all are under sin, that may give occasion of excusing, or extenuating, How could I avoid that, that all men do? If thou remember the second reproofe, That there is a righteousnesse communicable to all that sin, that may occasion so bold a confidence, Since I may have so easie a pardon, what haste of giving over yet? But Memorare novissima, consider that there is a judgement, and that that judgement is the last thing that God hath to doe with man, consider this, and thou wilt not sin, not love sin, not doe the same sins to morrow thou didst yester-day, as though this judgement were never the nearer, but that as a thousand yeares are as one day with God, so thy threescore yeares should be as one night with thee, one continuall sleep in the practise of thy beloved sin. Thou wilt not think so, if thou re-
C member this judgement.

Now, in respect of the time after this judgement, (which is Eternity) the time between this and it cannot be a minute; and therefore think thy self at that Tribunall, that judgement now: Where thou shalt not onely heare all thy sinfull workes, and words, and thoughts repeated, which thou thy selfe hadst utterly forgot, but thou shalt heare thy good works, thine almes, thy comming to Church, thy hearing of Sermons given in evidence against thee, because they had hypocrisie mingled in them; yea thou shalt finde even thy repentance to condemne thee, because thou madest that but a doore to a relapse. There thou shalt see, to thine inexpressible terror, some others cast downe into hell, for thy sins; for those sins which they would not have done, but upon thy provocation. There thou shalt see some that occasioned thy sins, and accompanied thee in them, and sinned them in a greater measure then thou didst, taken up into heaven, because in the way,
D they remembred the end, and thou shalt sink under a lesse waight, because thou never lookedst towards him that would have eased thee of it. Quis non cogitans hæc in desperationis rotetur abyssum? Who can once thinke of this and not be tumbled into desperation? But who can think of it twice, maturely, and by the Holy Ghost, and not finde comfort in it, when the same light that shewes mee the judgement, shewes me the Judge too? Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we perswade men; but knowing the comforts too, we importune men to this consideration, That as God preceeds with judgement in this world, to give the issue with the tentation, and competent strength with the affliction, as the Wiseman expresses it, That God punishes his enemies with deliberation, and requesting, (as our former Translation had it) and then with how great circumspection will he judge his children? So he gives us a holy hope, That as he hath accepted us in this first judgement, the Church, and made us partakers of the Word
E and Sacraments there, So he will bring us with comfort to that place, which no tongue but the tongue of S. Paul, and that moved by the Holy Ghost, could describe, and which he does describe so gloriously, and so pathetically, You are come unto Mount Sion, and to the City of the living God, The heavenly Ierusalem, And to an innumerable company of Angels, To the generall Assembly and Church of the first borne, which are written in heaven, and to God the Iudge of all, and to Iesus the Mediator of the new Covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaks better things then the blood of Abel. And into this blessed and inseparable society, The Father of lights, and God of all comfort, give you an admission now, and an irremoveable possession hereafter, for his onely Sons onely sake, and by the working of his blessed Spirit, whom he sends to work in you, This reproofe of Sin, of Righteousnesse, and of Iudgement. Amen.

2 COR. 1. 3.

Bleſſed be God, even the Father of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort.

THere was never Army compoſed of ſo many ſeverall Nations, the Towre of Babel it ſelf, in the confuſion of tongues, gave not ſo many ſeverall ſounds as are uttered and muſtered againſt God, and his Religion. The Atheiſt denies God; for, though David call it a fooliſh thing to do ſo, (The foole hath ſaid it in his heart) And though David ſpeake it in the ſingular number, The foole, as though there were not many ſo very fooles, as to ſay, and to ſay in their heart, There is no God, yet ſome ſuch fooles there are, that ſay it in their very heart, and have made ſhift to think ſo indeed; But for ſuch fools as ſay it in their actions, that is, that live as though there were no God, Stultorum plena ſunt omnia; We have ſeen fooles in the Court, and fooles in the Cloiſter, fooles that take no calling, and fooles in all callings that can be taken, fooles that heare, and fooles that preach, fooles at generall Councells, and fooles at Councell-tables, Stultorum plena ſunt omnia, ſuch fooles as deny God, ſo far, as to leave him out, are not in Davids ſingular number, but ſuper-abound in every profeſſion: So that Davids manner of expreſſing it, is not ſo much ſingular, as though there were but one, or few ſuch fooles, but emphaticall, becauſe that foole, that any way denies God, is the foole, the veryeſt foole of all kinds of fooliſhneſſe.

Now, as God himſelfe, ſo his religion amongſt us hath many enemies; Enemies that deny God, as Atheiſts; And enemies that multiply gods, that make many gods, as Idolaters; And enemies that deny thoſe divers perſons in the Godhead, which they ſhould confeſſe, The Trinity, as Jews and Turks: So in his Religion, and outward worſhip, we have enemies that deny God his Houſe, that deny us any Church, any Sacrament, any Prieſthood, any Salvation, as Papiſts; And enemies that deny Gods houſe any furniture, any ſtuffe, any beauty, any ornament, any order, as non-Conformitans; And enemies that are glad to ſee Gods houſe richly furniſhed for a while, that they may come to the ſpoile thereof, as ſacrilegious uſurpers of Gods part. But for Atheiſticall enemies, I call not upon them here, to anſwer me; Let them anſwer their own terrors, and horrors alone at mid-night, and tell themſelves whence that proceeds, if there be no God. For Papiſticall enemies, I call not upon them to anſwer me; Let them anſwer our Laws as well as our Preaching, becauſe theirs is a religion mixt as well of Treaſon, as of Idolatry. For our refractary, and ſchiſmaticall enemies, I call not upon them to anſwer me neither; Let them anſwer the Church of God, in what nation, in what age was there ever ſeen a Church, of that form, that they have dreamt, and beleeve their own dream? And for our ſacrilegious enemies, let them anſwer out of the body of Story, and give one example of proſperity upon ſacriledge.

But leaving all theſe to that which hath heretofore, or may hereafter be ſaid of them, I have bent my meditations, for thoſe dayes, which this Terme will afford, upon that, which is the character and mark of all Chriſtians in generall, The Trinity, the three Perſons in one God; not by way of ſubtile diſputation, as to perſons that doubted, but by way of godly declaration, as to perſons diſpoſed to make uſe of it; not as though I feared your faith needed it, nor as though I hoped I could make your reaſon comprehend it, but becauſe I preſume, that the conſideration of God the Father, and his Power, and the ſins directed againſt God, in that notion, as the Father; and the conſideration of God the Son, and his Wiſedome, and the ſins againſt God, in that apprehenſion, the Son; and the conſideration of God the Holy Ghoſt, and his Goodneſſe, and the ſins againſt God, in that acceptation, may conduce, as much, at leaſt, to our edification, as any Doctrine, more controverted. And of the firſt glorious perſon of this bleſſed Trinity, the Almighty Father, is this Text, Bleſſed be God, &c.

Diviſio. In theſe words, the Apoſtle having taſted, having been fed with the ſenſe of the power, and of the mercies of God, in his gracious deliverance, delivers a ſhort Catechiſme of all our duties: So ſhort, as that there is but one action, Benedicamus, Let us bleſſe; Nor but one object to direct that bleſſing upon, Benedicamus Deum, Let us bleſſe God. It is but one God, to exclude an Idolatrous multiplicity of Gods, But it is one God notified and manifeſted to us, in a triplicity of perſons; of which, the firſt is literally expreſſed here, That he is a Father. And him we conſider In Paternitate æterna, As he is the eternall Father, Even the Father of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, ſayes our Text; And then In Paternitate interna, as we have the Spirit of Adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father; As he is Pater miſerationum, The Father of mercies; And as he expreſſes theſe mercies, by the ſeale and demonſtration of comfort, as he is the God of comfort, and Totius conſolationis, of all comfort. Receive the ſumme of this, and all that ariſes from it, in this ſhort Paraphraſe; The duty required of a Chriſtian, is Bleſſing, Praiſe, Thankſgiving; To whom? To God, to God onely, to the onely God. There is but one; But this one God is ſuch a tree, as hath divers boughs to ſhadow and refreſh thee, divers branches to ſhed fruit upon thee, divers armes to ſpread out, and reach, and imbrace thee. And here beo with thee as a Father: From all eternity a Father of Chriſt Ieſus, and now thy Father in him, in that which thou needeſt moſt, A Father of mercy, when thou waſt in miſery; And a God of comfort, when thou foundeſt no comfort in this world, And a God of all comfort, even of ſpirituall comfort, in the anguiſhes, and diſtreſſes of thy conſcience. Bleſſed bee God, even the Father, &c.

1 Part. Benedictus. First then, the duty which God, by this Apoſtle, requires of man, is a duty ariſing out of that, which God hath wrought upon him: It is not a conſideration, a contemplation of God ſitting in heaven, but of God working upon the earth; not in the making of his eternall Decree there, but in the execution of thoſe Decrees here; not in ſaying, God knowes who are his, and therefore they cannot faile, but in ſaying in a rectified conſcience, God, by his ordinary marks, hath let me know that I am his, and therefore I look to my wayes, that I doe not fall. S. Paul out of a religious ſenſe what God had done for him, comes to this duty, to bleſſe him.

There is not a better Grammar to learne, then to learne how to bleſſe God, and therefore it may be no levity, to uſe ſome Grammar termes herein. God bleſſes man Dativè, He gives good to him; man bleſſes God Optativè, He wiſhes well to him; and he bleſſes him Vocativè, He ſpeaks well of him. For, though towards God, as well as towards man, reall actions are called bleſſings, (ſo Abigail called the preſent which ſhe brought to David, A bleſſing, and ſo Naaman called that which he offered to Eliſha, A bleſſing) though reall ſacrifices to God, and his cauſe, ſacrifices of Almes, ſacrifices of Armes, ſacrifices of Money, ſacrifices of Sermons, advancing a good publique cauſe, may come under the name of bleſſing, yet the word here, Εὐλογία, is properly a bleſſing in ſpeech, in diſcourſe, in conference, in words, in praiſe, in thanks. The dead doe not praiſe thee, ſayes David; The dead (men civilly dead, allegorically dead, dead and buryed in an uſeleſſe ſilence, in a Cloyſter, or Colledge, may praiſe God, but not in words of edification, as it is required here, and they are but dead, and doe not praiſe God ſo; and God is not the God of the dead, but of the living, of thoſe that delight to praiſe and bleſſe God, and to declare his goodneſſe.

1 Sam. 25. 27. 2 King. 5. 15.

We repreſent the Angels to our ſelves, and to the world with wings, they are able to flie;

A flie; and yet when Iacob ſaw them aſcending and deſcending, even thoſe winged Angels had a Ladder, they went by degrees: There is an immediate bleſſing of God, by the heart, but God requires the tongue too, becauſe that ſpreads and diffuſes his glory upon others too. Calicis benedictionis benedicimus, ſayes the Apoſtle, The cup which we bleſſe, is a cup of bleſſing; When we have bleſſed it, according to Chriſts holy inſtitution, then it derives holy bleſſings upon us; and when we bleſſe God according to his Commandement, he bleſſes us according to his promiſe, and our deſire. When God imployed Moſes, and when he imployed Ieremy, Moſes and Ieremy had no excuſe, but the unreadineſſe of their tongues; he that hath a tongue diſpoſed to Gods ſervice, that will ſpeak all he can, and dares ſpeake all he ſhould to the glory of God, is fit for all. As S. Iames ſayes, The tongue is but a little member, but boaſteth great things; ſo truly, as little as it is, it does great things towards our ſalvation. The Son of God, is Λόγος, verbum, The word; B God made us with his word, and with our words we make God ſo farre, as that we make up the myſticall body of Chriſt Jeſus with our prayers, with our whole liturgie, and we make the naturall body of Chriſt Jeſus appliable to our ſoules, by the words of Conſecration in the Sacrament, and our ſoules apprehenſive, and capable of that body, by the word Preached. Bleſſe him therefore in ſpeaking to him, in your prayers: Bleſſe him in ſpeaking with him, in aſſenting, in anſwering that which he ſayes to you in his word: And bleſſe him in ſpeaking of him, in telling one another the good things that he hath done abundantly for you. I will bleſſe the Lord at all times, ſayes David. Is it at all times, ſayes S. Auguſtine, Cum circumfluunt omnia, at all times, when God bleſſes mee with temporall proſperity? Cum minus naſcuntur, cum nata dilabuntur, ſayes that Father, when thy gaine ceaſes for the preſent, when that that thou hadſt formerly got, waſts and periſhes, and threatens penury for the future, ſtill bleſſe thou the Lord, Quia ille dat, ille tollit, ſed ſeipſum à benedicente ſe non tollit; C The Lord gives, and the Lord takes away, but the Lord never takes away himſelfe from him that delights in bleſſing his name. Bleſſe, praiſe, ſpeake; there is the duty, and we have done with that which was our firſt Part: And bleſſe thou God, which is our ſecond Part, and a Part derived into many Branches. Bleſſed be God, even, &c.

Here firſt we ſee the object of our praiſes, whom we muſt bleſſe, Benedictus ſit Deus, God. Firſt, Solus Deus, God onely, that is, God and not man, and then Deus ſolus, the onely God, that is God, and not many Gods. God onely, and not man; not that we may not bleſſe, and wiſh well to one another, for there is a bleſſing from God, belongs to that, Benedicam benedicentibus tibi, ſayes God to Abraham, I will bleſſe them that bleſſe thee: Neither is it that we may not bleſſe, that is, give due praiſe to one another; for as the vices and ſins of great perſons are not ſmothered in the Scriptures, ſo their ver- D tues, and good deeds are publiſhed with praiſe. Noahs drunkenneſſe, and Lots inceſt is not diſguiſed, Iobs righteouſneſſe and holy patience is not concealed neither; Doe that which is good, ſayes the Apoſtle, and thou ſhalt have praiſe for the ſame. Neither is it that we may not bleſſe, that is, pray for one another, of what ſort ſoever; for we are commanded to doe that, for our ſuperiours; inferiours may bleſſe ſuperiours too; Nor that wee ſhould not bleſſe, that is, pray to one another, in petitioning and ſupplicating our ſuperiours for thoſe things which are committed to their diſpenſation; for the importunate ſutor, the widow, is not blamed in the Goſpel for her importunity to the Judge; It is true, the Judge is blamed, for with-holding Juſtice, till importunity extorted it. But to bleſſe, by praiſe, or prayer, the man without relation to God, that is, the man, and not God in the man, to determine the glory in the perſon, without contributing thereby to the glory of God, this is a manner of bleſſing accurſed here, becauſe bleſſing is radi- E cally, fundamentally, originally, here reſerved to God, to God onely, Benedictus ſit Deus, God be bleſſed.

For, properly, truly none is to be thus bleſſed by us, but he upon whom we may depend and rely: and can we depend and rely upon man? upon what man? upon Princes? As far as we can looke for examples, round about us, in our next neighbours, and in France, and in Spaine, and farther, we have ſeene in our age Kings diſcarded, and wee have ſeene in ſome of them, the diſcarded cards taken in againe, and win the game. Upon what man wilt thou rely? upon great perſons in favour with Princes? Have we not ſeen often, that the bed-chambers of Kings have back-doores into priſons, and that the end of that greatneſſe hath beene, but to have a greater Jury to condemne them? wilt thou rely rely upon the Prophet, he can teach thee; or upon thy Brother, he does love thee; or upon thy Son, he ſhould love thee; or the Wife of thy boſome, ſhe will ſay ſhe loves thee; or upon thy Friend, he is as thine owne ſoule: yet Moſes puts a caſe when thou muſt depart from all theſe, not conſent, no not conceale, not pardon, no not reprieve, Thou ſhalt ſurely kill him, ſayes Moſes, even this Prophet, this Brother, this Son, this Wife may encline thee to the ſervice of other Gods; Thou canſt not rely, and therefore doe not bleſſe, not with praiſe, not with prayer and dependance upon him, That Prophet, by what name or title ſoever he be called; that Brother, how willingly ſoever he divide the inheritance with thee; that Son, how dutifull ſoever in civill things; that Wife, how carefull ſoever of her owne honour, and thy children; that Friend, how free ſoever of his favours, and of his ſecrets, that enclines thee to other Gods, or to other ſervice of the true God, then is true. Goodneſſe, as it is morall, is not the object of this bleſſing; but bleſſe God onely; God in the roote, in himſelfe, or God exemplified, and manifeſted in godly men; bleſſe God in them, in whom he appeares, and in them who appeare for him, and ſo thou doeſt bleſſe ſolum Deum, God onely.

This thou muſt doe, Bleſſe God onely, not man, and then the onely God, not other gods. For, this was the wretched and penurious narrowneſſe to which the Gentiles were reduced, that being unable to conſider God intirely, they broke God in pieces, and crumbled, and ſcattered God into as many ſeverall gods, as there are Powers in God, nay almoſt into as many ſeverall gods, as there are Creatures from God; and more then that, as many gods as they could fancie or imagine in making Chimera's of their owne, for not onely that which was not God, but that which was not at all, was made a God. And then, as in narrow channels that cannot containe the water, the water over-flowes, and yet that water that does ſo over flow, flies out and ſpreads to ſuch a ſhallowneſſe, as will not beare a Boat to any uſe; ſo when by this narrowneſſe in the Gentiles, God had over-flowne this bank, this limitation of God in an unity, all the reſt was too ſhallow to beare any ſuch notion, any ſuch conſideration of God, as appertained to him: They could not think him an Omnipotent God, when if one God would not, another would, nor an Infinite God, when they had appeales from one God to another; and without Omnipotence, and without Infiniteneſſe they could not truly conceive a God. They had cantoned a glorious Monarchy into petty States, that could not ſubſiſt of themſelves, nor aſſiſt another, and ſo imagined a God for every ſtate and every action, that a man muſt have applied himſelfe to one God when he ſhipped, and when he landed to another, and if he travailed farther, change his God by the way, as often as he changed coynes, or poſt-horſes. But, Heare O Iſrael, the Lord thy God is one God. As though this were all that were to be heard, all that were to be learned, they are called to heare, and then there is no more ſaid but that, The Lord thy God is one God.

Deut. 6. 4.

There are men that will ſay and ſweare, they do not meane to make God the Author of ſin; but yet when they ſay, That God made man therefore, that he might have ſomething to damne, and that he made him ſin therefore, that he might have ſomething to damne him for, truly they come too neare making God the Author of ſin, for all their modeſt proteſtation of abſtaining. So there are men that will ſay and ſweare, they do not meane to make Saints Gods; but yet when they will aske the ſame things at Saints hands, which they do at Gods, and in the ſame phraſe and manner of expreſſion, when they will pray the Virgin Mary to aſſiſt her Son, nay to command her Son, and make her a Chancellor to mitigate his common Law, truly they come too neare making more Gods then one. And ſo do we too, when we give particular ſins dominion over us; Quot vitia, tot Deos recentes, ſayes Hierom: As the Apoſtle ſayes Covetouſneſſe is Idolatry, ſo, ſayes that Father, is voluptuouſneſſe, and licentiouſneſſe, and every habituall ſin. Non alienum ſayes God, Thou ſhalt have no other God but me, But, Quis ſimilis, ſayes God too, Who is like me? Hee will have nothing made like him, not made ſo like a God as they make their Saints, nor made ſo like a God, as we make our ſins. Wee thinke one King Soveraigne enough, and one friend counſellor enough, and one Wife helper enough, and he is ſtrangely inſatiable, that thinks not one God, God enough: eſpecially, ſince when thou haſt called this God what thou canſt, he is more then thou haſt ſaid of him. Cum definitur, ipſe ſua definitione creſcit; When thou haſt defined him to be the God of juſtice,

A and trembleſt, he is more then that, he is the God of mercy too, and gives thee comfort. When thou haſt defined him to be all eye, He ſees all thy ſins, he is more then that, he is all patience, and covers all thy ſins. And though he be in his nature incomprehenſible, and inacceſſible in his light, yet this is his infinite largeneſſe, that being thus infinitely One, he hath manifeſted himſelfe to us in three Perſons, to be the more eaſily diſcerned by us, and the more cloſely and effectually applied to us.

Now theſe notions that we have of God, as a Father, as a Son, as a Holy Ghoſt, as a Spirit working in us, are ſo many handles by which we may take hold of God, and ſo many breaſts, by which we may ſuck ſuch a knowledge of God, as that by it wee may grow up into him. And as wee cannot take hold of a torch by the light, but by the ſtaffe we may; ſo though we cannot take hold of God, as God, who is incomprehenſible, and inapprehenſible, yet as a Father, as a Son, as a Spirit, dwelling in us, we can. Trinitas.

B There is nothing in Nature that can fully repreſent and bring home the notion of the Trinity to us. There is an elder booke in the World then the Scriptures; It is not well ſaid, in the World, for it is the World it ſelfe, the whole booke of Creatures; And indeed the Scriptures are but a paraphraſe, but a comment, but an illuſtration of that booke of Creatures. And therefore, though the Scriptures onely deliver us the doctrine of the Trinity, clearely, yet there are ſome impreſſions, ſome obumbrations of it, in Nature too. Take but one in our ſelves, in the ſoule. The underſtanding of man (that is as the Father) begets diſcourſe, ratiocination, and that is as the Son; and out of theſe two proceed concluſions, and that is as the Holy Ghoſt. Such as theſe there are many, many ſprinkled in the Schoole, many ſcattered in the Fathers, but, God knowes, poore and faint expreſſions of the Trinity. But yet, Præmiſit Deus naturam magiſtram, ſubmiſſurus & prophetiam, Though God meant to give us degrees in the Univerſity, that is, increaſe of knowledge in his Scriptures after, yet he gave us a pedagogy, he ſent us to Schoole in Nature before; Vt facilius credas prophetiæ diſcipulus naturæ, That comming out of that Schoole, thou mighteſt profit the better in that Univerſity, having well conſidered Nature, thou mighteſt be eſtabliſhed in the Scriptures. Tertul.

C He is therefore inexcuſable, that conſiders not God in the Creature, that comming into a faire Garden, ſayes onely, Here is a good Gardiner, and not, Here is a good God; and when he ſees any great change, ſayes onely, This is a ſtrange accident, and not, a ſtrange Judgement. Hence is it, that in the books of the Platonique Philoſophers, and in others, much ancienter then they, (if the books of Hermes Triſmegiſtus and others, be as ancient as is pretended in their behalfe) we finde as cleare expreſſing of the Trinity, as in the Old Teſtament, at leaſt; And hence is it, that in the Talmud of the Jews, and in the Alcoran of the Turks, though they both oppoſe the Trinity, yet when they handle not

D that point, there fall often from them, as cleare confeſſions of the three Perſons, as from any of the elder of thoſe Philoſophers, who were altogether diſ-intereſted in that Controverſie.

But becauſe God is ſeene Per creaturas, ut per ſpeculum, per verbum ut per lucem, In the creature, and in nature, but by reflection, In the Word, and in the Scriptures, directly, we reſt in the knowledge which we have of the plurality of the perſons, in the Scriptures; And becauſe we are not now in a Congregation that doubts it, nor in a place to multiply teſtimonies, we content our ſelves (being already poſſeſt with the beliefe thereof) with this illuſtration from the old Teſtament, That the name of our one God, is expreſſed in the plurall number, in that place, which we mentioned before, where it is ſaid, The Lord thy God is one God, that is, Elohim, unus Dii, one Gods. And though as much as that ſeem to be ſaid by God to Moſes, Erit Aaroni in Elohim, Thou ſhalt be as Gods to Aaron; Yet Aleuſ. Deut. 6. 4. Exod. 4. 16.

E that was becauſe Moſes was to repreſent God, all God, all the Perſons in God, and therefore it might as well be ſpoken plurally of Moſes, ſo, as of God. But becauſe it is ſaid, Gods appeared unto Iacob; And againe, Dii Sancti ipſe eſt, Hee is the Holy Gods; And ſo alſo, Vbi Deus factores mei? Where is God my Makers? And God ſayes of himſelfe, Faciamus hominem, and Factus eſt ſicut unus ex nobis, God ſayes, Let us make man, and he ſayes, Man is become as one of us, We imbrace humbly, and thankfully, and profitably, this, ſhall we call it Effigiationem anſarum, This making out of handles? Or Protuberationem mammarum, This ſwelling out of breaſts? Or Germinationem gemmarum, This putting forth of buds, and bloſſomes, and fruits, by which we may apprehend, and ſee, and taſte God himſelf, ſo as his wiſedome hath choſen to communicate himſelf to us, in the notion and manifeſtation Gen. 35. 7. Ioſ. 24. 19. Iob 35. 10. Gen. 1. 26. 3. 22.

manifestation of divers persons? Of which in this Text, we lay hold on him, by the first handle, by the name of Father. Blessed be God, even the Father, &c. A

Pater Essentialiter.

Now we consider in God, a two-fold Paternity, a two-fold Father-hood: One, as he is Father to others, another as to us. And the first is two-fold too: One essentially, by which he is a Father by Creation, and so the name of Father belongs to all the three Persons in the Trinity, for, There is one God, and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, Eph. 4. 6. and in you all, Which is spoken of God gathered into his Essence, and not diffused into persons. In which sense, the Son of God, Christ Jesus, is called Father, Vnto us a Son is given, and his name shall be The Everlasting Father: Esay 9. 6. And to this Father, even to the Son of God, in this sense, are the faithfull made sons, Son, be of good cheare, thy sins are forgiven thee, Mat. 9. 2. Mark 5. 34. sayes Christ to the Paralytique, And Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole, sayes he to the woman with the bloody issue; Thus Christ is a Father; And thus Per filiationem vestigii, By that impression of God, which is in the very beeing of every B creature, God, that is, the whole Trinity, is the Father of every creature, as in Iob, Quis pluviæ Pater? Hath the raine a Father? or who hath begotten the drops of dew? Iob 38. 28. And so in the Prophet, Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us? Mal. 2. 10. But the second Paternity is more mysterious in it selfe, and more precious to us, as he is a Father, not by Creation, but by Generation, Even the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Personaliter.

Now, Generationem istam quis enarrabit? who shall declare this generation? who shall tell us how it was? who was there to see it? Since the first-borne of all creatures, the Angels, who are almost sixe thousand yeares old, (and much elder in the opinion of many of the Fathers, who think the Angels to have been created long before the generall Creation) since, I say, these Angels are but in their swathing clouts, but in their cradle, in respect of this eternall generation, who was present? Quis enarrabit? who shall tell us how it was? who shall tell us when it was, when it was so long before any time C was, as that, when time shall be no more, and that, after an end of time, wee shall have lived infinite millions of millions of generations in heaven, yet this generation of the Son of God, was as long before that immortall life, as that Immortality, and Everlastingnesse shall be after this life? It cannot be expressed, nor conceived how long our life shall be after, nor how long this generation was before. Esay 53. 8.

Nazian. Bel.

This is that Father, that hath a Son, and yet is no elder then that Son, for he is à Patre, but not Post Patrem, but so from the Father, as he is not after the Father: He hath from him Principium Originale, but not Initiale, A root from whence he sprung, but no spring-time, when he sprung out of that root. Blessed be God even the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherefore blessed? Quia potuit? Because he could have a Son? Non genera-vit potentia, sed natura; God did not beget this Son because he had alwayes a power to doe so; for then, if this Son had ever been but in Potentia, onely in such a condition, as D that he might have been, then this had not been an eternall generation, for if there were a time, when only he might have been, at that time he was not. He is not blessed then because he could, is he blessed (that is, to be blessed by us) because he would beget this Son? Non genera vit voluntate, sed natura: God did not beget this Son, then when he would, that is, had a will to doe so, for, if his will determined it, now I will doe it, then till that, there had been no Son, and so this generation had not been eternall neither. But when it was, or how it was, Tu ratiocinare, ego mirer, sayes S. Augustine, Let others discourse it, let me admire it; Tu disputa, ego credam, Let others dispute it, let me beleeve it. And when all is done, you have done disputing, and I have done wondring, that that brings it nearer then either, is this, That there is a Paternity, not by Creation, by which Christ and the Holy Ghost are Fathers too, nor by generation, by which God is, though inexpressibly, the Father even of our Lord Jesus Christ, but by Adoption, as in Christ Jesus, he is Father of us all, notified in the next appellation, Pater miserationum, The Father of mercies. E

Pater.

In this alone, we discerne the whole Trinity; here is the Father, and here is Mercy, which mercy is in the Son; And the effect of this mercy, is the Spirit of Adoption, by which also we cry, Abba, Father too. Rom. 8. 15. When Christ would pierce into his Father, and melt those bowels of compassion, he enters with that word, Abba, Father, All things are possible to thee; take away this Cup from me. Mark 14. 36. When Christ apprehended an absence, a dereliction on Gods part, he cals not upon him by this name, not My Father, but My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Mat. 27. 37. But when he would incline him to mercy, mercy to others, mercy

A mercy to enemies, he comes in that name, wherein he could be denied nothing, Father; Father forgive them, they know not what they doe. He is the Lord of Hosts; There hee ſcatters us in thunder, tranſports us in tempeſts, enwraps us in confuſion, aſtoniſhes us with ſtupefaction, and conſternation; The Lord of Hosts, but yet the Father of mercies, There he receives us into his own bowels, fills our emptineſſe, with the blood of his own Son, and incorporates us in him; The Lord of Hosts, but the Father of mercy. Sometimes our naturall Fathers die, before they can gather any ſtate to leave us, but he is the immortall Father, and all things that are, as ſoone as they were, were his. Sometimes our naturall Fathers live to waſte, and diſſipate that ſtate which was left them, to be left us: but this is the Father, out of whoſe hands, and poſſeſſion nothing can be removed, and who gives ineſtimably, and yet remaines inexhauſtible. Sometimes our naturall Fathers live to need us, and to live upon us: but this is that Father whom we need every minute, and
B requires nothing of us, but that poore rent of Benedictus ſit, Bleſſed, praiſed, glorified be this Father. Luke 23.24.

This Father of mercies, of mercies in the plurall; David calls God, Miſericordiam ſuam, His mercy; all at once: God is the God of my mercy: God is all ours, and all mercy. Pardon this people, ſayes Moſes, Secundùm magnitudinem miſericordiæ, According to the greatneſſe of thy mercy. Pardon me, ſayes David, Have mercy upon me, Secùndum multitudinem miſericordiarum, According to the multitude of thy mercies: His mercy, in largeneſſe, in number, extends over all; It was his mercy that we were made, and it is his mercy that we are not conſumed. David calls his mercy, Multiplicatam, and Mirificatam, It is manifold, and it is marvellous, miraculous: Shew thy marvellous loving kindneſſe; and therefore David in ſeverall places, carries it Super judicium, above his judgements, Super Cœlos, above the heavens, Super omnia opera, above all his works. And for the multitude
C of his mercies, (for we are now upon the conſideration of the plurality thereof, Pater miſerationum, Father of mercies) put together that which David ſayes, Vbi miſericordiæ tuæ antiquæ? Where are thy ancient mercies? His mercy is as Ancient, as the Ancient of dayes, who is God himſelfe, And that which another Prophet ſayes, Omni mane, His mercies are new every morning, And put betweene theſe two, betweene Gods former, and his future mercies, his preſent mercy, in bringing thee this minute to the conſideration of them, and thou haſt found Multiplicatam, and Mirificatam, manifold, and wondrous mercy. Miſerationum. Pſal. 59.17. Numb. 14.19. Pſal. 51.1. Pſal. 17.7. Pſal. 31.22. Pſal. 89.50.

But carry thy thoughts upon theſe three Branches of his mercy, and it will be enough. Firſt, that upon Adams fall, and all ours in him, he himſelfe would think of ſuch a way of mercy, as from Adam, to that man whom Chriſt ſhall finde alive at the laſt day, no man would ever have thought of, that is, that to ſhew mercy to his enemies, he would
D deliver his owne, his onely, his beloved Son, to ſhame, to torments, to death: That hee would plant Germen Iehovæ in ſemine mulieris, The bloſſome, the branch of God, in the ſeed of the woman: This mercy, in that firſt promiſe of that Meſſias, was ſuch a mercy, as not onely none could have undertaken, but none could have imagined but God himſelfe: And in this promiſe, we were conceived In viſceribus Patris, In the bowels of this Father of mercies. In theſe bowels, in the womb of this promiſe we lay foure thouſand yeares; The blood with which we were fed then, was the blood of the Sacrifices, and the quickning which we had there, was an inanimation, by the often refreſhing of this promiſe of that Meſſias in the Prophets. But in the fulneſſe of time, that infallible promiſe came to an actuall performance, Chriſt came in the fleſh, and ſo, Venimus ad partum, In his birth we were borne; and that was the ſecond mercy; in the promiſe, in the performance, he is Pater miſerationum, Father of mercies. And then there is a third
E mercy, as great; That he having ſent his Son, and having re-aſſumed him into heaven againe, he hath ſent his Holy Spirit to governe his Church, and ſo becomes a Father to us, in that Adoption, in the application of Chriſt to us, by the Holy Ghoſt; and this is that which is intended in the laſt word, Deus totius Conſolationis, The God of all Comfort.

I may know that there is a Meſſias promiſed, and yet be without comfort, in a fruitleſſe expectation; The Jews are ſo in their diſperſion. When the Jews will ſtill poſt-date the commings of Chriſt, when ſome of them ſay, There was no certaine time of his comming deſigned by the Prophets; And others, There was a time, but God for their ſins prorogued it; And others againe, God kept his word, the Meſſiah did come when it was promiſed Conſolatio.

promiſed he ſhould come, but for their ſins, he conceales himſelfe from Manifeſtation; when the Jews will poſtdate his firſt comming, and the Papiſts will antidate his ſecond comming, in a comming that cannot become him, That he comes, even to his Saints in torment, before he comes in glory, That when he comes to them at their diſſolution, at their death, he comes not to take them to Heaven, but to caſt them into one part of hell, That the beſt comfort which a good man can have at his death, is but Purgatory, Miſerable comforters are they all. How faire a beame of the joyes of Heaven is true comfort in this life? If I know the mercies of God exhibited to others, and feele them not in my ſelf, I am not of Davids Church, not of his Quire, I cannot ſing of the mercies of God: I may ſee them, and I may ſigh to ſee the mercies of God determined in others, and not extended to me; but I cannot ſing of the mercies of God, if I find no mercy. But when I come to that, Conſolationes tuæ lætificaverunt, In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my ſoule, then the true Comforter is deſcended upon me, and the Holy Ghoſt hath over-ſhadowed me, and all that ſhall be borne of me, and proceed from me, ſhall be holy. Bleſſed are they that mourne, ſayes Chriſt: But the bleſſedneſſe is not in the mourning, but becauſe they ſhall be comforted. Bleſſed am I in the ſenſe of my ſins, and in the ſorrow for them, but bleſſed therefore, becauſe this ſorrow leads me to my reconciliation to God, and the conſolation of his Spirit. Whereas, if I ſinke in this ſorrow, in this dejection of ſpirit, though it were Wine in the beginning, it is lees, and tartar in the end; Inordinate ſorrow growes into ſinfull melancholy, and that melancholy, into an irrecoverable deſperation. The Wiſe-men of the Eaſt, by a leſſe light, found a greater, by a Star, they found the Son of glory, Chriſt Jeſus: But by darkneſſe, nothing: By the beames of comfort in this life, we come to the body of the Sun, by the Rivers, to the Ocean, by the cheerefulneſſe of heart here, to the brightneſſe, to the fulneſſe of joy hereafter. For, beloved, Salvation it ſelfe being ſo often preſented to us in the names of Glory, and of Joy, we cannot thinke that the way to that glory is a ſordid life affected here, an obſcure, a beggarly, a negligent abandoning of all wayes of preferment, or riches, or eſtimation in this World, for the glory of Heaven ſhines downe in theſe beames hither; Neither can men thinke, that the way to the joyes of Heaven, is a joyleſſe ſevereneſſe, a rigid auſterity; for as God loves a cheerefull giver, ſo he loves a cheerefull taker, that takes hold of his mercies and his comforts with a cheerefull heart, not onely without grudging, that they are no more, but without jealouſie and ſuſpition that they are not ſo much, or not enough.

Deus. But they muſt be his comforts that we take in, Gods comforts. For, to this purpoſe, the Apoſtle varies the phraſe; It was The Father of mercies; To repreſent to us gentleneſſe, kindneſſe, favour, it was enough to bring it in the name of Father; But this Comfort, a power to erect and ſettle a tottering, a dejected ſoule, an overthrowne, a bruiſed, a broken, a troden, a ground, a battered, an evaporated, an annihilated ſpirit, this is an act of ſuch might, as requires the aſſurance, the preſence of God. God knows, all men receive not comforts, when other men think they do, nor are all things comforts to them, which we preſent, and meane ſhould be ſo. Your Father may leave you his inheritance, and little knowes he the little comfort you have in this, becauſe it is not left to you, but to thoſe Creditors to whom you have engaged it. Your Wife is officious to you in your ſickneſſe, and little knowes ſhe, that even that officiouſneſſe of hers then, and that kindneſſe, aggravates that diſcomfort, which lyes upon thy ſoul, for thoſe injuries which thou hadſt formerly multiplied againſt her, in the boſome of ſtrange women. Except the God of comfort give it, in that ſeale, in peace of conſcience, Nec intus, nec ſubtus, nec circa te occurrit conſolatio, ſayes S. Bernard; Non ſubtus, not from below thee, from the reverence and acclamation of thy inferiours; Non circa, not from about thee, when all places, all preferments are within thy reach, ſo that thou maiſt lay thy hand, and ſet thy foote where thou wilt; Non intus, not from within thee, though thou have an inward teſtimony of a morall conſtancy, in all afflictions that can fall, yet not from below thee, not from about thee, not from within thee, but from above muſt come thy comfort, or it is miſtaken. S. Chryſoſtome notes, and Areopagita had noted it before him, Ex beneficiis acceptis nomina Deo affingimus, We give God names according to the nature of the benefits which he hath given us: So when God had given David victory in the wars, by the exerciſe of his power, then Fortitudo mea, and firmamentum, The Lord is my Rock, and my Caſtle: When God diſcovered the plots and practiſes of his enemies to him, then Dominus illuminatio, The Lord

Totius. Bernard.

Precioſa divina conſolatio, nec omnino tribuitur admittentibus alienam: The comforts of God are of a precious nature, and they loſe their value, by being mingled with baſer comforts, as gold does with allay. Sometimes we make up a ſumme of gold, with ſilver, but does any man binde up farthing tokens, with a bag of gold? Spirituall comforts which have alwayes Gods ſtampe upon them, are his gold, and temporall comforts, when they have his ſtampe upon them, are his ſilver, but comforts of our owne coyning, are counterfait, are copper. Becauſe I am weary of ſolitarineſſe, I will ſeeke company, and my company ſhall be, to make my body the body of a harlot: Becauſe I am drouſie, I will be kept awake, with the obſcenities and ſcurrilities of a Comedy, or the drums and ejulations of a Tragedy: I will ſmother and ſuffocate ſorrow, with hill upon hill, courſe after B courſe at a voluptuous feaſt, and drown ſorrow in exceſſe of Wine, and call that ſickneſs, health; and all this is no comfort, for God is the God of all comfort, and this is not of God. We cannot ſay with any colour, as Eſau ſaid to Iacob, Haſt thou but one bleſſing, my Father? Gen. 17. 38. for he is the God of all bleſſings, and hath given every one of us, many more then one. But yet Chriſt hath given us an abridgement, Vnum eſt neceſſarium, there is but one onely Luke 10. 42. thing neceſſary, And David, in Chriſt, tooke knowledge of that before, when he ſaid, Vnum petii, One thing have I deſired of the Lord, What is that one thing? All in one; That Pſal. 27. 4. I may dwell in the houſe of the Lord (not be a ſtranger from his Covenant) all the dayes of my life, (not diſſeiſed, not excommunicate out of that houſe) To behold the beauty of the Lord, (not the beauty of the place only) but to inquire in his Temple, (by the advancement and advantage of outward things, to finde out him) And ſo I ſhall have true comforts, outward, and inward, becauſe in both, I ſhall finde him, who is the God of all comfort.

C Iacob thought he had loſt Ioſeph his Son, And all his Sons, and all his Daughters roſe Gen. 37. 35. up to comfort him, Et noluit conſolationem, ſayes the Text, He would not be comforted, becauſe he thought him dead. Rachel wept for her children and would not be comforted, becauſe Mat. 2. 18. they were not. But what ayleſt thou? Is there any thing of which thou canſt ſay, It is not? perchance it is, but thou haſt it not: If thou haſt him, that hath it, thou haſt it. Haſt thou not wealth, but poverty rather, not honour, but contempt rather, not health, but daily ſummons of Death rather yet? Non omnia poſſidet, cui omnia cooperantur in bonum, If thy Bernard. poverty, thy diſgrace, thy ſickneſſe have brought thee the nearer to God, thou haſt all thoſe things, which thou thinkeſt thou wanteſt, becauſe thou haſt the beſt uſe of them. All 1 Cor. 3. 23. things are yours, ſayes the Apoſtle; why? by what title? For you are Chriſts, and Chriſt is Gods. Carry back your comfort to the root, and bring that comfort to the fruit, and con-D feſſe, that God who is both, is the God of all comfort. Follow God in the execution of this good purpoſe upon thee, to thy Vocation, and heare him, who hath left Eaſt, and Weſt, and North, and South, in their dimneſſe, and dumneſſe, and deafneſſe, and hath called thee to a participation of himſelfe in his Church. Go on with him to thy juſtification, That when in the congregation one ſits at thy right hand, and beleeves but hiſtorically (It may be as true which is ſaid of Chriſt, as of William the Conquerour, and as of Iulius Caſar) and another at thy left hand, and beleeves Chriſt but civilly, (It was a Religion well invented, and keeps people well in order) and thou betweene them beleeveſt it to ſalvation in an applying faith; proceed a ſtep farther, to feele this fire burning out, thy faith declared in works, thy juſtification growne into ſanctification, And then thou wilt be upon the laſt ſtaire of all, That great day of thy glorification will breake out even in this life, and either in the poſſeſſing of the good things of this world, thou ſhalt ſee the glory, and in E poſſeſſing the comforts of this World, ſee the joy of Heaven, or elſe, (which is another of his wayes) in the want of all theſe, thou ſhalt have more comfort then others have, or perchance, then thou ſhouldeſt have in the poſſeſſing of them: for he is the God of all comfort, and of all the wayes of comfort; And therefore, Bleſſed be God, even the Father, &c.

1 PET. 1. 17.

And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every mans works, passe the time of your sojourning here in feare.

YOu may remember, that I proposed to exercise your devotions and religious meditations in these exercises, with words which might present to you, first the severall persons in the Trinity, and the benefits which we receive, in receiving God in those distinct notions of Father, Son, and holy Ghost; And then with other words which might present those sins, and the danger of those sins which are most particularly opposed against those severall persons. Of the first, concerning the person of the Father, we spoke last, and of the other, concerning sins against the Father, these words will occasion us to speak now.

Psal. 51. 1. It is well noted upon those words of David, Have mercy upon me, O God, that the word is Elohim, which is Gods in the plurall, Have mercy upon me, O Gods: for David, though he conceived not divers Gods, yet he knew three divers persons in that one God, and he knew that by that sin which he lamented in that Psalme, that peccatum complicatum, that manifold sin, that sin that enwrapped so many sins, he had offended all those three persons. For whereas we consider principally in the Father, Potestatem, Power, and in the Son Sapientiam, Wisdome, and in the holy Ghost Bonitatem, Goodnesse, David had sinned against the Father, in his notion, In potestate, in abusing his power, and kingly authority, to a mischievous and bloody end in the murder of Vriah: And he had sinned against the Son, in his notion, In sapientia, in depraving and detorting true wisdome into craft and treachery: And he had sinned against the holy Ghost in his notion, In bonitate, when he would not be content with the goodnesse and piety of Vriah, who refused to take the eases of his owne house, and the pleasure of his wifes bosome, as long as God himselfe in his army lodged in Tents, and stood in the face of the Enemy. Sins against the Father then, we consider especially to be such as are In potestate, Either in a neglect of Gods Power over us, or in an abuse of that power which we have from God over others; and of one branch of that power, particularly of Judgement, is this Text principally intended, If ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth, &c.

Divisio. In the words we shall insist but upon two parts, First, A Counsaile, which in the Apostles mouth is a commandement; And then a Reason, an inducement, which in the Apostles mouth is a forcible, an unresistible argument. The Counsell, that is, The commandement, is, If ye call on the Father, feare him, stand in feare of him; And the reason, that is, the Argument, is, The name of Father implyes a great power over you, therefore feare him; And amongst other powers, a power of judging you, of calling you to an account, therefore feare him: In which Judgement, this Judge accepts no persons, but judges his sons as his servants, and therefore feare him: And then, he judges, not upon words, outward professions, but upon works, actions, according to every mans works, and therefore feare him: And then as on his part he shall certainly call you to judgement when you goe hence, so on your part, certainly it cannot be long before you goe hence, for your time is but a sojourning here, it is not a dwelling, And yet it is a sojourning here, it is not a posting, a gliding through the world, but such a stay, as upon it our everlasting dwelling depends; And therefore that we may make up this circle, and end as we begun, with the feare of God, passe that time, that is, all that time, in fear; In fear of neglecting and undervaluing, or of over-tempting that great power which is in the Father, And in feare of abusing those limnes, and branches, and beames of that power which he hath communicated

A cated to thee, in giving thee power and authority any way over others; for theſe, To neglect the power of the Father, or To abuſe that power which the Father hath given thee over others, are ſinnes againſt the Father, who is power. If ye call on the Father, &c.

First then, for the first part, the Counſell, Si invocatis, If ye call on the Father, In timore, Doe it in feare, The Counſell hath not a voluntary Condition, and arbitrary in our ſelves annexed to it; If you call, then feare, does not import, If you doe not call, you need not feare; It does not import, That if you profeſſe a particular forme of Religion, you are bound to obey that Church, but if you doe not, but have fancied a religion to your ſelfe without precedent, Or a way to ſalvation without any particular religion, Or a way out of the world without any ſalvation or damnation, but a going out like a candle, if you can think thus you need not feare, This is not the meaning of this If in this place, If you call on B the Father, &c. But this If implyes a wonder, an impoſſibility, that any man ſhould deny God to be the Father: If the author, the inventer of any thing uſefull for this life be called the father of that invention, by the holy Ghoſt himſelfe, Iabal was the father of ſuch as dwell in Tents, and Tubal his brother the father of Muſique, And ſo Horace calls Ennius the father of one kind of Poeme: how abſolutely is God our Father, who (may I ſay?) invented us, made us, found us out in the depth, and darkneſſe of nothing at all? He is Pater, and Pater luminum, Father, and Father of lights, of all kinds of lights. Lux lucifica, as S. Auguſtine expreſſes it, The light from which all the lights which we have, whether of nature, or grace, or glory, have their emanation. Take theſe Lights of which God is ſaid to be the Father, to be the Angels, (ſo ſome of the Fathers take it, and ſo S. Paul calls them Angels of light; And ſo Nazianzen calls them Secundos ſplendores primi ſplendoris adminiſtros, ſecond lights that ſerve the firſt light) Or take theſe Lights of which God is C ſaid to be the Father to be the Miniſters of the Goſpel, the Angels of the Church, (ſo ſome Fathers take them too, and ſo Chriſt ſayes to them, in the Apoſtles, You are the light of the world) Or take theſe Lights to be thoſe faithfull ſervants of God, who have received an illuſtration in themſelves, and a coruſcation towards others, who by having lived in the preſence of God, in the houſhold of his faithfull, in the true Church, are become, as John Baptiſt was, burning and ſhining lamps, (as S. Paul ſayes of the faithfull, You ſhine as lights in this world, And as Moſes had contracted a glorious ſhining in his face, by his converſation with God) Or take this light to be a fainter light then that, (and yet that which S. Iames doth moſt literally intend in that place) The light of naturall underſtanding, That which Plinie calls ſerenitatem animi, when the mind of man, diſ-encumbred of all Eclipſes, and all clouds of paſſion, or inordinate love of earthly things, is enlightned ſo far, as to diſcerne God in nature; Or take this light to be but the light of a ſhadow, D (for umbræ non ſunt tenebræ, ſed denſior lux, ſhadows are not darkneſſes, ſhadows are but a groſſer kind of light) Take it to be that ſhadow, that deſigne, that delineation, that obumbration of God, which the creatures of God exhibit to us, that which Plinie calls Cæli latitiam, when the heavens, and all that they imbrace, in an openneſſe and cheerefulneſſe of countenance, manifeſt God unto us; Take theſe Lights of which S. Iames ſpeaks, in any apprehenſion, any way, Angels of heaven who are miniſtring ſpirits, Angels of the Church, who are ſpirituall Miniſters, Take it for the light of faith from hearing, the light of reaſon from diſcourſing, or the light flowing from the creature to us, by contemplation, and obſervation of nature, Every way, by every light we ſee, that he is Pater luminum, the Father of lights; all theſe lights are from him, and by all theſe lights we ſee that he is A Father, and Our Father.

So that as the Apoſtle uſes this phraſe in another place, Si opertum Euangelium, If the E Goſpel be hid, with wonder and admiration, Is it poſſible, can it be that this Goſpel ſhould be hid? So it is here, Si invocatis, If ye call God Father, that is, as it is certaine you doe, as it is impoſſible but you ſhould, becauſe you cannot aſcribe to any but him, your Being, your preſervation in that Being, your exaltation in that Being to a well-Being, in the poſſeſſion of all temporall, and ſpirituall conveniencies, And then there is thus much more force in this particle Si, If, which is (as you have ſeene) Si conceſſionis, non dubitationis, an If that implyes a confeſſion and acknowledgement, not a heſitation or a doubt, That it is alſo Si progreſſionis, Si concluſionis, an If that carryes you farther, and that concludes you at laſt, If you doe it, that is, Since you do it, Since you do call God Father, ſince you have paſſed that act of Recognition, ſince not onely by having been produced by

Timete. Now, for this feare of God, which is the beginning of wiſedome, and the end of wiſedome too, we are a little too wiſe, at leaſt, too ſubtile, ſometimes in diſtinguiſhing too narrowly between a filiall feare, and a ſervile feare, as though this filiall feare were nothing but a reverend love of God, as he is good, and not a doubt and ſuſpition of incur-

Eſay 66.12. look, even to him that is poore, and of a contrite ſpirit, and trembleth at my word. As there are both impreſſions in ſecurity, vitious and vertuous, good and bad, ſo there are both in feare alſo. There is a wicked ſecurity in the wicked, by which they make ſhift to put off all Providence in God, and to think God like themſelves, indifferent what becomes of this world; There is an ill ſecurity in the godly, when for the time, in their proſperity, they grow ill husbands of Gods graces, and negligent of his mercies; In my proſperity

Pſal.30.6. (ſayes David himſelf, of himſelf) I ſaid, I ſhall not be moved. And there is a ſecurity of the faithfull, a conſtant perſwaſion, grounded upon thoſe marks, which God, in his Word, hath ſet upon that ſtate, That neither height, nor depth, nor any creature ſhall ſeparate us from God: But yet this ſecurity is never diſcharged of that feare, which he that

As then there is a vitious, an evill ſecurity; and that holy ſecurity which is good, is not without feare: ſo there is no feare of God, though it have ſome ſervility, (ſo farre, as Auguſt. ſervility imports but a feare of puniſhment) but it is good. For, Timor eſt amor inchoativus, The love of God begins in feare, and then Amor eſt timor conſummatus, The feare

Pſal.2.11. of God ends in love; which David intends when he ſayes, Rejoyce with trembling; Conceive no ſuch feare as excludes ſpirituall joy, conceive no ſuch aſſurance, as excludes an humble and reverentiall feare. There is a feare of God too narrow, when we thinke every naturall croſſe, every worldly accident to be a judgement of God, and a teſtimony of his indignation, which the Poet (not altogether in an ill ſenſe) calls a diſeaſe of the ſoule, Quo morbo mentem concuſſe? timore deorum; He imagines a man may be ſick of the E feare of God, that is, not diſtinguiſh between naturall accidents, and immediate judgements of God; between ordinary declarations of his power, and extraordinary declarations of his anger. There is alſo a feare of God too large, too farre extended, when for a falſe feare of offending God, I dare not offend thoſe men, who pretend to come in his name, and ſo captivate my conſcience to the traditions and inventions of men, as to the word, and law of God. And there is a feare of God conceived, which never quickens, but putrifies in the womb before inanimation; the feare and trembling of the Devill, and men whom he poſſeſſes, deſperate of the mercies of God. But there is a feare acceptable to God, and yet hath in it, a trembling, a horrour, a conſternation, an aſtoniſhment, an

A an apprehenſion of Gods dereliction for a time. The Law was given in thundring, and lightning, and the people were afraid. How proceeds Moſes with them? Feare not, ſaies he, for God is come to prove you, that his feare might be before your faces. Here is a feare not, that is, feare not with deſpaire, nor with diffidence, but yet therefore, That you may feare the Law; for, in this place, the very Law it ſelfe (which is given to direct them) is called feare; As in another place, God himſelfe is called feare, (as he is in other places called love too) Iacob ſwore by the Feare of his Father Iſaac; that is, by him whom his Father Iſaac feared, as the Chalde Paraphraſe rightly expreſſes it. Exod. 20. 20. Gen. 31. 53.

Briefly, this is the difference between Fearfulneſſe, and Feare, (for ſo we are fain to call Timiditatem and Timorem) Timidity, Fearfulneſſe, is a fear, where no cauſe of fear is; and there is no cauſe of feare, where man and man onely threatens on one ſide, and God commands on the other: Feare not, thou worme of Iacob, I will help thee, ſaith the Lord thy redeemer, the Holy one of Iſrael. Moſes Parents had overcome this fearfulneſſe: They hid him, ſayes the Text, Et non metuerunt Edictum Regis, They feared not the Proclamation of the King, Becauſe it was directly, and evidently, and undiſputably againſt the manifeſt will of God. Queen Eſther had overcome this fearfulneſſe; ſhe had faſted, and prayed, and uſed all preſcribed and all poſſible meanes, and then ſhe entred the Kings Chamber, againſt the Proclamation, with that neceſſary reſolution, Si peream, peream, If I periſh, I periſh; Not upon a diſobedient, not upon a deſperate undertaking, but in a rectified conſcience, and well eſtabliſhed opinion, that either that Law was not intended to forbid her, who was his Wife, or that the King was not rightly informed, in that bloody command, which he had given for the execution of all her Countrymen. And for thoſe who doe not overcome this fearfulneſſe, that is, that feare where no cauſe of feare is, (and there is no cauſe of feare, where Gods cauſe is by godly wayes promoved, though we doe not alwayes diſcern the wayes, by which this is done) for thoſe men that frame imaginary feares to themſelves, to the with-drawing or diſcouraging of others in the ſervice of God, we ſee where ſuch men are ranked by the Holy Ghoſt, when S. Iohn ſayes, The unbeleeving, the murderer, the whore-monger, the ſorcerer, the idolater, ſhall have their portion in the lake of brimſtone, which is the ſecond death: We ſee who leads them all into this irrecoverable precipitation, The fearfull, that is, he that beleeves not God in his promiſes, that diſtruſts God in his owne cauſe, as ſoone as he ſeemes to open us to any danger; or diſtruſts Gods inſtruments, as ſoone as they goe another way, then he would have them goe. To end this, there is no love of God without feare, no Law of God, no God himſelfe without feare; And here, as in very many other places of Scripture, the feare of God is our whole Religion, the whole ſervice of God; for here, Feare him, includes Worſhip him, reverence him, obey him. Which Counſell or Commandement, D though it need no reaſon, no argument, yet the Apoſtle does purſue with an argument, and that conſtitutes our ſecond Part. Esther 4. 16. Apoc. 21. 8.

Now the Apoſtles arguments grow out of a double root; One argument is drawne from God, another from man. From God, thus implied, If God be a Father, feare him, for naturally we acknowledge the power of a Father to be great over his children, and conſequently the reverent feare of the children great towards him. The Father had Poteſtatem vitæ & necis, A power over the life of his child, he might have killed his childe; but that the child ſhould kill his Father, it never entred into the proviſion of any Law, and it was long before it fell into the ſuſpition of any Law-maker. Romulus in his Laws, called every man-ſlaughter Patricidium, becauſe it was Paris occiſio, He had killed a man, a Peere, a creature equall to himſelfe; but for Parricide in the later ſenſe, when Parricide is Patricide, the killing of a Father, it came not into the jealouſie of Romulus Law, nor E into the heart or hand of any man there, in ſixe hundred yeares after: Cum lege cæperunt, & facinus pœna monſtravit, ſayes their Morall man: That ſin began not, till the Law forbad it, and only the puniſhment ordained for it, ſhewed that there might be ſuch a thing. He that curſeth Father or Mother, ſhall ſurely dye, ſayes Moſes; And he that is but ſtubborne towards them, ſhall dye too. The dutifull love of children to Parents is ſo rooted in nature, that Demoſthenes ſayes, it is againſt the impreſſions and againſt the Law of nature, for any child ever to love that man, that hath done execution upon his Father, though by way of Juſtice: And this naturall Obligation is not conditioned with the limitations of a good or a bad Father, Natura te non bono patri, ſed patri conciliavit, ſayes that little great Philoſopher, Nature hath not bound thee to thy father, as hee is a Seneca. Exod. 21. 17. Deut. 21. 18. Epictetus.

good Father, but meerely as he is thy Father.

Now for the power of Fathers over their children, by the Law of Nations, that is, the generall practiſe of Civill States, the Father had power upon the life of his child; It fell away by diſcontinuance, in a great part, and after was abrogated by particular Laws, but yet, by a connivence admitted in ſome caſes too. For, as in Nature man is Microcoſmus, a little World, ſo in nature, a family is a little State, a little Commonwealth, and Ariſtot. what power the Magiſtrate hath in that, the Father hath in this. Ipſum regnũ ſuapte natura imperium eſt paternum, The power of a King, if it be kept within the bounds of the na-
Tertul. ture of that Office, is onely to be a Father to his people: And, Gratius eſt nomen pietatis, quam poteſtatis, Authority is preſented in a more acceptable name, when I am called a Father, then when I am called a Maſter; and therefore, ſayes Seneca, our Anceſtors mollified it thus, Vt invidiam Dominis, contumeliam ſervis detraherent, That there might accrue no envy to the Maſter for ſo great a title, nor contempt upon the ſervant for ſo low a title, they called the Maſter Patrem familias, The Father of a houſhould, and they called the ſervants, familiares, parts and pieces of the family. So that in the name of Father they underſtand all power; and the firſt Law that paſſed amongſt the Romans a-
L. Pompeia. gainſt Parricides, was Contra interfectores Patrum & Dominorum; They were made equall, Fathers and Soveraignes: And in the Law of God it ſelfe, Honour thy Father, wee ſee all the honour, and feare, and reverence that belongs to the Magiſtrate, is conveyed in that name, in that perſon, the Father is all; as in the State of that people, before they came to be ſettled, both the Civill part of the Government, and the Spirituall part, was all in the Father, that Father was King and Prieſt over all that family.

Preſent God to thy ſelf then as a Father, and thou wilt feare him; and take knowledg, that the Son might not ſue the Father; Enter no actiõ againſt God why he made thee not richer, nor wiſer, nor fairer; no nor why he elects, or refuſes, without reſpect of good or bad works; But take knowledge too, that when by the Law, the Father might puniſh the Son with death, he might not kill his Son before he was paſſed three yeares in age, before hee was come to ſome demonſtration of an ill, and rebellious nature, and diſpoſition: Whatſoever God may doe of his abſolute Power, beleeve that he will not execute that power upon thee to thy condemnation, till thine actuall ſins have made thee incapable of his love: What he may do, diſpute not, but be ſure he will do thee no harme if thou feare him, as a Father.

Sacerdotalis. Now to bring that nearer to you, which principally we intended, which is, the conſideration and precaution of thoſe ſins, which violate this Power of God, notified in this name of Father, we conſider a threefold emanation or exerciſe of Power in this Father, by occaſion of a threefold repeating of this part of the Text, in the Scripture. The words are waighty, alwayes at the bottome; for we have theſe words in the laſt of the Prophets, in Malachie, and in the laſt of the Euangeliſts, in Iohn, And here in this A-
Mal. 1.6. poſtle, we have them of the laſt Judgement. In Malachi he ſayes, A Son honoureth his Father, if then I be a Father, where is my honour? This God ſpeaks there to the Prieſt, to Exod. 32.29. the Levite; for, the Tribe of Levi, had before, (as Moſes bade them) conſecrated their hands to God, and puniſhed by a zealous execution, the Idolatry of the golden Calfe; and for this ſervice, God faſtned the Prieſthood upon them. But when they came in Malachies time, to connive at Idolatry it ſelfe, God, who was himſelfe the roote of the Prieſthood, and had truſted them with it, and they had abuſed that truſt, and the Prieſt-
Hoſe. 9.7. hood, Then when the Prophet was become a foole, and the ſpirituall Man, mad, or (as S. Hierom reads it) Arreptitius, that is, poſſeſſed by others, God firſt of all turnes upon the Prieſt himſelfe, rebukes the Prieſt, interminates his judgement upon the Prieſt, for God is our high Prieſt. And therefore feare this Father in that notion, in that apprehenſion, as a Prieſt, as thy high Prieſt, that refuſes or receives thy ſacrifices, as he finds them conditioned; and if he looke narrowly, is able to finde ſome ſpot in thy pureſt Lambe, ſome ſin in thy holieſt action, ſome deviation in thy prayer, ſome oſtentation in thine almes, ſome vaine glory in thy Preaching, ſome hypocriſie in thy hearing, ſome concealing in thy confeſſions, ſome reſervation in thy reſtitutions, ſome relapſes in thy reconci-liations: ſince thou calleſt him Father, feare him as thy high Prieſt: So the words have their force in Malachie, and they appertaine Ad poteſtatem Sacerdotalem, To the power of the Prieſt, deſpiſe not that.

Civilis. And then, in the ſecond place, which is in S. Iohn, Chriſt ſayes, If God were your Fa- Iohn 8.42. ther,

ther, you would love me: And this Christ speakes to the Pharisees, and to them, not as Sectaries in Religion, but as to persons in Authority, and command in the State, as to Rulers, to Governours, to Magistrates: So Christ sayes to Pilate, Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: And so S. Paul, There is no power but of God, The powers that be, be ordained of God. Christ then charges the Pharisees, that they having the secular Power in their hands, they went about to kill him, when he was doing the will of his Father, who is the roote, as of Priesthood, so of all Civill power, and Magistracy also. Feare this Father then, as the Civill Sword, the Sword of Justice is in his hand. He can open thee to the malicious prosecutions of adversaries, and submit thee to the penalties of those Lawes, which, in truth, thou hast never transgressed: Thy Fathers, thy Grandfathers have sinned against him, and thou hast been but reprieved for two sessions, for two generations, and now maiest come to execution. Thou hast sinned thy selfe, and hast repented, and hast had thy pardon sealed in the Sacrament; but thy pardon was clogged with an Ita quòd se bene gerat, Thou wast bound to the peace by that pardon, and hast broken that peace since, in a relapse, and so fallest under execution for thine old sins: God cuts off men by unsearchable wayes and meanes; and therefore feare this Father as a Soveraigne, as a Magistrate, for that use this word in S. Iohn may have. John 19. 11. Rom. 13. 1.

In Malachie we consider him in his supreme spirituall power, and in S Iohn in his supreme temporall power; And in this Text, this Father is presented in a power, which includes both, in a judiciary power, as a Judge, as our Judge, our Judge at the last day, beyond all Appeale; And (as this Apostle S. Peter, is said by Clement, who is said to have beene his successor at Rome, to have said) Quis peccare poterit, &c. Who could commit any sin at any time, if at all times he had his eye fixed upon this last Judgement? We have seene purses cut at the Sessions, and at Executions, but the Cutpurse did not see the Judge looke upon him: we see men sin over those sins to day, for which Judgement was inflicted but yesterday, but surely they doe not see then that the Judge sees them. Thou treasurest up wrath, sayes the Apostle, against the day of wrath, and revelation of the judgement of God: There is no Revelation of the day of Judgement, no sense of any such day, till the very day it selfe overtake him, and swallow him. Represent God to thy selfe as such a Judge, as S. Chrysostome sayes, That whosoever considers him so, as that Judge, and that day, as a day of irrevocable judgement, Gehennæ pœnam tolerare malit, quàm adverso Deo stare, He will even think it an ease to be thrown down into hell out of the presence of God, rather then to stand long in the presence, and stand under the indignation of that incensed Judge: The Ite maledicti will be lesse then the Surgite qui dormitis. And there is the miserable perplexity, Latere impossibile, Apparere intolerabile, To be hid from this Judge is impossible, and to appeare before him, intolerable: for he comes invested with those two flames of confusion, (which are our two next branches in the Text) first, He respects no persons, Then, He judges according to workes: Without respect of persons, &c. Iudiciaria. Rom. 2. 5. Bernard.

Nine or ten severall times it is repeated in the Scriptures, and, I thinke, no one intire proposition so often, That God is no accepter of persons. It is spoken by Moses, that they who are conversant in the Law might see it, and spoken in the Chronicles, that they might see it who are conversant in State-affaires, and spoken in Iob, that men in afflictions might not mis-imagine a partiality in God: It is spoken to the Gentiles, by the Apostle of the Gentiles, S. Paul, severally; To the Romanes, to the Galatians, to the Ephesians, to the Colossians: And spoken by the chiefe Apostle, S. Peter, both in a private Sermon in Cornelius his house, and now in this Catholique Epistle written to all the world, that all the world, and all the inhabitants thereof might know, That God is no accepter of persons: And lest all this should not be all, it is spoken twice in the Apocryphall books; and though we know not assuredly by whom, yet we know to whom, To all that exercise any judiciary power under God, it belongs to know, That God is no accepter of persons. In divers of those places, this also is added, Nor receiver of Rewards; whether that be added as an equall thing, That it is as great a sin to accept persons, as to accept rewards, Or as a concomitancy, they goe together, He that will accept persons, will accept rewards, Or as an Identity, It is the same thing to accept persons, and to accept rewards, because the preferment which I looke for from a person in place, is as much a reward, as money from a person rich in treasure; whether of these it be, I dispute not: Clearly Acceptor personarum.

there

there is a Bribery in my love to another, and in my feare of another there is a Bribery too: There is a bribery in a poore mans teares, if that decline me from juſtice, as well as in the rich mans Plate, and Hangings, and Coach, and Horſes. A

Let no man therefore think to preſent his complexion to God for an excuſe, and ſay, My choler with which my conſtitution abounded, and which I could not remedy, enclined me to wrath, and ſo to bloud; My Melancholy enclined me to ſadneſſe, and ſo to Deſperation, as though thy ſins were medicinall ſins, ſins to vent humors. Let no man ſay, I am continent enough all the yeare, but the ſpring works upon me, and inflames my concupiſcencies, as though thy ſins were ſeaſonable and anniverſary ſins. Make not thy Calling the occaſion of thy ſin, as though thy ſin were a Myſterie, and an Occupation; Nor thy place, thy ſtation, thy office the occaſion of thy ſin, as though thy ſin were an Heir-loome, or furniture, or fixed to the freehold of that place: for this one propoſition, God is no accepter of perſons, is ſo often repeated, that all circumſtances of Diſpoſitions, and B
Ambroſ. Callings, and time, and place might be involved in it. Nulla deſcretio perſonarum, ſed morum; God diſcernes not, that is, diſtinguiſhes not Perſons, but Actions, for, He judgeth according to every mans works, which is our next Branch.

Opera. Now this judging according to works, excludes not the heart, nor the heart of the heart, the ſoule of the ſoule, Faith. God requires the heart, My ſonne give me thy heart; He will have it, but he will have it by gift; and thoſe Deeds of Gift muſt be teſtified; and the teſtimony of the heart is in the hand, the teſtimony of faith is in works. If one give me a timber tree for my houſe, I know not whether the root be mine or no, whether I may ſtub it by that gift: but if he give me a fruit tree for mine Orchard, he intends me the root too; for elſe I cannot tranſplant it, nor receive fruit by it: God judges according to the worke, that is, Root and fruit, faith and worke; That is the worke; And then he judges according unto Thy worke; The works of Other men, the Actions and C the Paſſions of the bleſſed Martyrs, and Saints in the Primitive Church, works of Supererogation are not thy works. It were a ſtrange pretence to health, that when thy Phyſitian had preſcribed thee a bitter potion, and came for an account how it had wrought upon thee, thou ſhouldſt ſay, My brother hath taken twice as much as you preſcribed for me, but I tooke none, Or if he ordained ſixe ounces of bloud to be taken from thee, to ſay, My Grandfather bled twelve. God ſhall judge according to The worke, that is, The nature of the worke, and according to Thy worke, The propriety of the worke: Thee, who art a Proteſtant, he ſhall judge by thine owne worke, and not by S. Stephens, or S. Peters; and thee, who art a Papiſt, he ſhall judge by thine owne worke, and not by S. Campians, or S. Garnets, as meritorious as thou thinkeſt them. And therefore if God be thy Father, and in that title have ſoveraigne power over thee, A power ſpirituall, as High-prieſt of thy ſoule, that diſcernes thy ſacrifices; A power Civill, and drawes the ſword of Juſtice D againſt thee, when he will; A power judiciary, and judges without accepting perſons, and without error in apprehending thy works, If he be a Father thus, feare him, for theſe are the reaſons of feare, on his part, and then feare him, for this reaſon on thy part, That this time which thou art to ſtay here, firſt, is But a ſojourning, it is no more, but yet it is a ſojourning, it is no leſſe, Paſſe the time of your ſojourning here, &c.

Incolatus. When there is a long time to the Aſſiſes, there may be ſome hope of taking off, or of ſmothering Evidence, or working upon the Judge, or preparing for a pardon: Or if it were a great booty, a great poſſeſſion which we had gotten, even that might buy out our peace. But this world is no ſuch thing, neither for the extent that we have in it, It is but little that the greateſt hath, nor for the time that we have in it; In both reſpects it is but a
Gen. 47. 6. ſojourning, it is but a pilgrimage, ſayes Iacob, And But the dayes of my pilgrimage; Every
Heb. 13. 14. one of them quickly at an end, and all of them quickly reckoned. Here we have no continuing City; firſt, no City, no ſuch large being, and then no continuing at all, it is but a E ſojourning. The word in the Text is παροικίας, we have but a pariſh, we are but pariſhioners in this world, and they that labour to purchaſe whole ſhires, uſurp more then their portion; and yet what is a great Shire in a little Map? Here we are but Viatores, Paſſengers, way-faring men; This life is but the high-way, and thou canſt not build thy hopes here; Nay, to be buried in the high way is no good marke; and therefore bury not thy ſelfe, thy labours, thy affections upon this world. What the Prophet ſayes to thy Saviour,
Ier. 14. 7. (O the hope of Iſrael, the Saviour thereof in time of trouble, why ſhouldeſt thou be a ſtranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man, that turnes aſide to tarry for a night?) ſay thou to thy ſoule,

A ſoule, Since thou art a ſtranger in the land, a wayfaring man, turned aſide to tarry for a night, ſince the night is paſt, Ariſe and depart, for here is not thy reſt; prepare for another place, and feare him whom thou calleſt Father, and who is ſhortly to be thy Iudge; for here thou art no more then a ſojourner; but yet remember withall that thou art ſo much, Thou art a ſojourner. Mic. 2. 10.

This life is not a Parentheſis, a Parentheſis that belongs not to the ſenſe, a Parentheſis that might be left out, as well as put in. More depends upon this life then ſo: upon every minute of this life, depend millions of yeares in the next, and I ſhall be glorified eternally, or eternally loſt, for my good or ill uſe of Gods grace offered to me this houre. Therefore where the Apoſtle ſayes of this life, Peregrinamur à Domino, We are abſent from the Lord, yet he ſayes, We are at home in the body: This world is ſo much our home, as that he that is not at home now, he that hath not his converſation in heaven here, ſhall B never get home. And therefore even in this Text, our former Tranſlation calls it Dwelling; That which we reade now, paſſe the time of your ſojourning, we did reade then, paſſe the time of your dwelling; for this, where we are now, is the ſuburb of the great City, the porch of the triumphant Church, and the Grange, or Country houſe of the ſame Landlord, belonging to his heavenly Palace, in the heavenly Jeruſalem. Be it but a ſojourning, yet thou muſt pay God ſomething for thy ſojourning, pay God his rent of praiſe and prayer; And be it but a ſojourning, yet thou art bound to it for a time; Though thou ſigh with David, Heu mihi, quia prolongatus incolatus, woe is me that I ſojourne ſo long here, Though the miſeries of thy life make thy life ſeeme long, yet thou muſt ſtay out that time, which he, who tooke thee in, appointed, and by no practice, no not ſo much as by a deliberate wiſh, or unconditioned prayer, ſeeke to be delivered of it: Becauſe thy time here is ſuch a ſojourning as is quickly at an end, and yet ſuch a ſojourning as is never at an end, (for our endleſſe ſtate depends upon this) fear him, who ſhall ſo certainly, and ſo ſoone be a juſt Judge of it; feare him, in abſtaining from thoſe ſinnes which are directed upon his power; which are, principally, (as we intimated at the beginning, and with which we ſhall make an end) firſt, The negligence of his power upon thee, And then, the abuſe of his power communicated to thee over others. Incolatus. Pſal. 120. 5.

Firſt then, the ſin directed againſt the Father, whom wee conſider to be the roote and center of all power, is, when as ſome men have thought the ſoule of man to be nothing but a reſultance of the temperament and conſtitution of the body of man, and no infuſion from God, ſo they thinke that power, by which the world is governed, is but a reſultance of the conſent, and the tacite voice of the people, who are content, for their eaſe to bee ſo governed, and no particular Ordinance of God: It is an undervaluing, a falſe conception, a miſ-apprehenſion of thoſe beames of power, which God from himſelf ſheds upon D thoſe, whom himſelfe cals Gods in this World. We ſin then againſt the Father, when we undervalue God in his Prieſt. God hath made no ſtep in that perverſe way of the Roman Church, to prefer, ſo as they doe, the Prieſt before the King; yet, ſpeaking in two ſeverall places, of the dignity of his people, firſt, as Jews, then as Chriſtians, he ſayes in one place, They ſhall be a Kingdome, and a Kingdome of Prieſts; and he ſayes in the other, They ſhall be Sacerdotium, and Regale Sacerdotium, Prieſts, and royall Prieſts: In one place, the King, in the other, the Prieſt mentioned firſt, and in both places, both involved in one another: The bleſſings from both are ſo great, as that the Holy Ghoſt expreſſes them by one another mutually. When God commands his people to bee numbred in every Tribe, one moves this queſtion, Why in all other Tribes he numbred but from twenty yeares upward, and in the Tribe of Levi from a moneth upward? Agnoſce ſacerdos, ſayes he, quanti te Deus tuus fecerit, Take knowledge, thou who art the Prieſt of the E high God, what a value God hath ſet upon thee, that whereas he takes other ſervants for other affaires, when they are men, fit to doe him ſervice, he took thee to the Prieſthood in thy cradle, in thine infancie. How much more then, when the Prieſt is not Sacerdos infans, A Prieſt that cannot or does not ſpeake; but continues watchfull in meditating, and aſſiduous in uttering, powerfully, and yet modeſtly, the things that concerne your ſalvation, ought you to abſtaine from violating the power of God the Father, in diſ-eſteeming his power thus planted in the Prieſt? Negligentia. Eſay 19. 6. 1 Pet. 2. 9. Num. 1. Okaſter.

So alſo doe we ſin againſt the Father, the roote of power, in conceiving amiſſe of the power of the Civill Magiſtrate: Whether where God is pleaſed to repreſent his unity, in one Perſon, in a King; or to expreſſe it in a plurality of perſons, in divers Governours, Civilis.

When

When God ſayes, Per me Reges regnant, By me Kings raigne; There the Per, is not a Permiſſion, but a Commiſſion, It is not, That they raigne by my Sufferance, but they raigne by mine Ordinance. A King is not a King, becauſe he is a good King, nor leaves being a King, as ſoone as he leaves being good. All is well ſummed by the Apoſtle, You muſt needs be ſubject, not only for wrath, but alſo for conſcience ſake. Rom. 13. 5. A

Iudiciaria. But then the greateſt danger of ſinning againſt the Father, in this notion of power, is, if you conceive not aright of his Judiciary power, of that judgement, which he executes, not by Prieſts, nor by Kings upon earth, but by his owne Son Chriſt Jeſus in heaven. For, not to be aſtoniſhed at the Contemplation of that judgement, where there ſhall be Information, Examination, Publication, Hearing, Judgement, and Execution in a minute; where they that never beleeved, till they heard me, may be taken in, and I that Preached and wrought their ſalvation, may be left out; where thoſe wounds which my Saviour received upon earth, for me, ſhall be ſhut up againſt me, and thoſe wounds which my blaſphemies have made in his glorified body, ſhall bleed out indignation, upon ſight of me, the murtherer, not to think upon, not to tremble at this judgement, is the higheſt ſin againſt the Father, and his power, in the undervaluing of it. B

Abuſus. But there is a ſin againſt this power too, in abuſing that portion of that power, which God hath depoſited in thee. Art thou a Prieſt, and expecteſt the reverence due to that holy calling? Be holy in in that calling. Quomodo poteſt obſervari à populo, qui nihil habet ſecretum à populo? How can the people reverence him, whom they ſee to be but juſt one of them? Quid in te miretur, ſi ſua in te recognoſcit? If they finde no more in thee, then in one another, what ſhould they admire in thee? Si quæ in ſe erubeſcit, in te, quem reverendum arbitratur, offendit? If they diſcerne thoſe infirmities in thee, which they are aſhamed of in themſelves, where is there any object, any ſubject, any exerciſe of their reverence? Art thou great in Civill Power? Quid gloriaris in malo, quia potens es? Why boaſteſt thou thy ſelfe in miſchiefe, O mighty man? Haſt thou a great body therefore, becauſe thou ſhouldeſt ſtand heavy upon thine own feet, and make them ake? Or a great power therefore, becauſe thou ſhouldeſt oppreſſe them that are under thee? uſe thy power juſtly, and call it the voyce of allegeance when the people ſay to thee, as to Ioſua, All that thou commandeſt us, we will doe, and whither ſoever thou ſendeſt us, we will goe: Abuſe that power to oppreſſion, and thou canſt not call that the voyce of ſedition, in which, Peter and the other Apoſtles joyned together, We ought to obey God rather then man. Haſt thou any judiciall place in this world? here there belongs more feare then in the reſt: Some things God hath done in Chriſt as a Prieſt in this world, ſome things as a King, But when Chriſt ſhould have been a Judge in civill cauſes, he declined that, he would not divide the Inheritance, and in criminall cauſes he did ſo too, he would not condemne the Adultereſſe. So that for thy example in judgement, thou art referred to that which is not come yet, to that, to which thou muſt come, The laſt, the everlaſting judgement. Waigh thine affections there, and then, and think there ſtands before thee now, a priſoner ſo affected, as thou ſhalt be then. Waigh the mercy of thy Judge then, and think there is ſuch mercy required in thy judgement now. Be but able to ſay, God be ſuch to me at the laſt day, as I am to his people this day, and for that dayes juſtice in thy publique calling, God may be pleaſed to cover many ſins of infirmity. And ſo you have all that we intended in this exerciſe to preſent unto you, The firſt perſon of the Trinity, God the Father, in his Attribute of power, Almighty, and thoſe ſins, which, as farre as this Text leads us, are directed upon him in that notion of Father. The next day the Son will riſe. C D

SERM. XL.

Preached upon Trinity-Sunday.

1 COR. 16. 22.

If any man love not the Lord Iesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha.

CHrist is not defined, not designed by any name, by any word so often, as by that very word, The Word, Sermo, Speech. In man there are three kinds of speech; Sermo innatus, That inward speech, which the thought of man reflecting upon it selfe produces within, He thinks something; And then Sermo illatus, A speech of inference, that speech which is occasioned in him by outward things, from which he drawes conclusions, and determins; And lastly, Sermo prolatus, That speech by which he manifests himselfe to other men. We consider also three kindes of speech in God; and Christ is all three. There is Sermo innatus, His eternall, his naturall word, which God produced out of himselfe, which is the generation of the second Person in the Trinity; And then there is Sermo illatus, His word occasioned by the fall of Adam, which is his Decree of sending Christ, as a Redeemer; And there is also Sermo prolatus, His speech of manifestation and application of Christ, which are his Scriptures. The first word is Christ, the second, the Decree, is for Christ, the third, the Scripture, is of Christ. Let the word be Christ, so he is God; Let the word be for Christ, for his comming hither, so he is man; Let the word be of Christ, so the Scriptures make this God and man ours. Now If in all these, if in any of these apprehensions, any man love not the Lord Iesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha.

Diuisio.

By most of those, who, from the perverseneſſe of Heretiques, have taken occasion to prove the Deity of Christ, this text hath been cited; and therefore I take it now, when in my course proposed, I am to speak of the second Person in the Trinity; but, (as I said of the first Person, the Father) not as in the Schoole, but in the Church, not in a Chaire, but in a Pulpit, not to a Congregation that required proofe, in a thing doubted, but edification, upon a foundation received; not as though any of us would dispute, whether Jesus Christ were the Lord, but that all of us would joyne in that Excommunication, If any man love not the Lord Iesus Christ, let him be, &c. Let this then be the frame that this exercise shall stand upon. We have three parts; The person upon whom our Religious worship is to be directed, The Lord Iesus Christ: And secondly, we have the expression and the limitation of that worship, as farre as it is expressed here, Love the Lord Iesus Christ: And lastly, we have the imprecation upon them that doe not, If any man doe not, let him be Anathema, Maranatha. In the first we have Verbum naturale, verbum innatum, As he is the essentiall word, The Lord, a name proper only to God; And then Verbum conceptum, verbum illatum, Gods Decree upon consideration of mans misery, that Christ should be a Redeemer, for to that intent he is Christus, Anointed to that purpose; And lastly, Verbum prolatum, verbum manifestatum, That this Christ becomes Iesus, That this Decree is executed, that this person thus anointed for this office, is become an actuall Saviour; So the Lord is made Christ, and Christ is made Iesus. In the second Part we shall finde another argument for his Deity, for there is such a love required towards the Lord Iesus Christ, as appertaines to God onely; And lastly, we shall have the indeterminable, and indispensable excommunication of them, who though they pretend to love the Lord, (God in an universall notion) yet doe not love the Lord Iesus Christ, God, in this apprehension of a Saviour; and, If any man love not, &c.

1 Part: Dominus.

First then, in the first branch of the first part, in that name of our Saviour, The Lord, we apprehend the eternall Word of God, the Son of God, the second Person in the Trinity: for, He is Persona producta, Begotten by another, and therefore cannot be the first; And

And he is Perſona ſpirans, a Perſon out of whom, with the Father, another Perſon, that is, the Holy Ghoſt proceeds, and therefore cannot be the laſt Perſon, and there are but three, and ſo he neceſſarily the ſecond. Shall we hope to comprehend this by reaſon? Nazian. Quid magni haberet Dei generatio, ſi angustiis intellectus tui comprehenderetur? How ſmall a thing were this myſtery of Heaven, if it could be ſhut in, in ſo narrow a piece of the earth, as thy heart? Idem. Qui tuam ipſius generationē vel in totum neſcis, vel dicere ſit pudor, Thou that knoweſt nothing of thine owne begetting, or art aſhamed to ſpeake that little that thou doeſt know of it, wilt not thou be aſhamed to offer to expreſſe the eternall generation of the Son of God? It is true, De modo, How it was done, our reaſon cannot, but De facto, that it was done, our reaſon may be ſatisfied. We beleeve nothing with a morall faith, till ſomething have wrought upon our reaſon, and vanquiſhed that, and made it aſſent and ſubſcribe. Our divine faith requires evidence too, and hath it abundantly; for, the works of God are not ſo good evidence to my reaſon, as the Word of God is to my faith; The Sun ſhining is not ſo good a proofe that it is day, as the Word of God, the Scripture is, that that which is commanded there, is a duty. The roote of our beliefe that Chriſt is God, is in the Scriptures, but wee conſider it ſpread into three branches, [1] The evident Word it ſelfe, that Chriſt is God; [2] The reall declaration thereof in his manifold Miracles; [3] The concluſions that ariſe to our underſtanding, thus illumined by the Scriptures, thus eſtabliſhed by his miracles.

Ex Scripturis. In every mouth, in every pen of the Scriptures, that delivers any truth, the Holy Ghoſt ſpeaks, and therefore whatſoever is ſaid by any there, is the teſtimony of the Holy Ghoſt, for the Deity of Chriſt. And from the Father we have this teſtimony, that he is his Son, Mat. 3. ult. This is my beloved Son, And this teſtimony that his Son is God, Heb. 1. 8. Vnto his Son he ſaith, Thy Throne, O God, is for ever and ever. The Holy Ghoſt teſtifies, and his Father, and himſelfe; and his teſtimony is true, Apoc. 1. 8. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning, and the ending, ſaith the Lord, which is, which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. Hee teſtifies with his Father; and then, their Angels and his Apoſtles teſtifie with him, 22. 16. I Ieſus have ſent mine Angels, to teſtifie unto you theſe things in the Church, That I am the Roote, and the Off-ſpring of David, not the off-ſpring onely, but the roote too, and therefore was before David. God and his Angels in Heaven teſtifie it, And viſible Angels upon earth, his Apoſtles, Acts 20. 28. God hath purchaſed his Church, with his owne blood, ſayes S. Paul; He who ſhed his blood for his Church, was God; and no falſe God, no mortall God, as the gods of the Nations were, but, 1 Iohn 5. 20. This is the true God, and eternall life; and then, no ſmall God, no particular God, as the Gods of the Nations were too, but, Tit. 2. 13. We looke for the glorious appearing of our great God, our Saviour Chriſt Ieſus: God, that is, God in all the Perſons, Angels, that is, Angels in all their acceptations, Angels of Heaven, Angels of the Church, Angels excommunicate from both, the fallen Angels, Devils themſelves, teſtifie his Godhead, Mar. 3. 11. Vncleane Spirits fell downe before him, and cryed, Thou art the Sonne of God.

Miracula. This is the teſtimony of his Word; the teſtimony of his Works, are his Miracles. That his Apoſtles did Miracles in his name, was a teſtimony of his Deity. Acts 3. 16. His name, through faith in his Name, hath made this man ſtrong, ſayes S. Peter, at the rayſing of the Creeple. But that he did Miracles in his own Name, by his own Power, is a nearer teſtimony; Pſal. 72. 18. Bleſſed be the Lord God of Iſrael, ſayes David, Qui facit Mirabilia ſolus, Which doth his Miracles alone, without deriving power from any other, or without uſing an other inſtrument for his Power. For, Epipha. Mutare naturam, niſi qui Dominus naturæ eſt, non poteſt: Whoſoever is able to change the courſe of nature, is the Lord of nature; And he that is ſo, made it; & he that made it, that created it, is God. Nay, Tertul. Plus eſt, it is more to change the courſe of Nature, then to make it; for, in the Creation, there was no reluctation of the Creature, for there was no Creature, but to divert Nature out of her ſetled courſe, is a conqueſt upon a reſiſting adverſary, and powerfull in a preſcription. The Recedat Mare, Let the Sea go back, and the Siſtat Sol, Let the Sun ſtand ſtill, met with ſome kinde of oppoſition in Nature, but in the Fiat Mare, and Fiat Sol, Let there be a Sea, and a Sun, God met with no oppoſition, no Nature, he met with nothing. And therefore, Auguſt. Interrogemus Miracula, quid nobis de Chriſto loquantur, Let us aske his Miracles, and they will make us underſtand Chriſt; Habent enim ſi intelligantur, linguam ſuam, If wee underſtand them, that is, If wee would underſtand them, they ſpeake loud enough, and plaine enough. In his Miraculous birth of a Virgin, In his Miraculous diſputation with Doctors at twelve yeares of age, in his faſting,

A fasting, in his invisibility, in his walking upon the Sea, in his re-assuming his body in the Resurrection, Christ spoke, in himselfe, in the language of Miracles. So also had they a loud and a plaine voyce, in other men; In his Miraculous curing the sick, raising the dead, dispossessing the Devill, Christ spoke, in other men, in the language of Miracles. And he did so also, as in himselfe, and in other men, so in other things; In the miraculous change of Water into Wine, in the drying up of the Fig-tree, In feeding five thousand with five loaves, in shutting up the Sun in darkenesse, and opening the graves of the Dead to light, in bringing plenty of Fish to the Net, and in putting money into the mouth of a Fish at the Angle, Christ spoke in all these Creatures, in the language of Miracles. So the Scriptures testifie of his Deity, and so doe his Miracles, and so doe those Conclusions which arise from thence, though we consider but that one, which is expressed in this part of the Text, that he is the Lord, If any love not the Lord, &c.

B We reason thus, God gives not his glory to others, and his glory is in his Essentiall Name, and in his Attributes; and to whomsoever he gives them, because they cannot be given from God, he who hath them, is God. Of these, none is so peculiar to him, as the name of Iehova; the name, which for reverence, the Jews forbore to sound, and in the room therof ever founded, Adonai, and Adonai, is Dominus, the name of this Text, The Lord; Christ by being the Lord thus, is Jehovah, and if Jehovah, God. It is Tertullians observation, Et si Pater sit, & dicatur Dominus; & Filius sit, & dicatur Deus, That though the Father be the Lord, and be called the Lord, and though the Son be God, and be called God, yet, sayes he, the manner of the Holy Ghost in the New Testament, is, to call the Father God, and the Son the Lord. He is Lord with the Father, as he was Con-creator, his Collegue in the Creation; But for that Dominion and Lordship which he hath by his Purchase, by his Passion, Calcavit solus, He trod the Wine-presse alone, not onely no C man, but no Person of the Trinity, redeemed us, by suffering for us, but he. For the ordinary appellation of Lord in the New Testament, which is κύριος, it is but a name of Civility, not onely no name implying Divine worship, but not implying any distinction of ranke or degree amongst men. Mary Magdalen speaks of Christ, and speakes to the Gardiner, (as she thought) and both in one and the same word; it is κύριος, Dominus, Lord, to both: when she sayes, They have taken away my Lord, meaning Christ, and when she saies to the Gardiner, Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, it is the same word too. But all that reaches not to the style of this Text, The Lord, for here The Lord, is God; And no man can say, that Iesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. All that was written in the Scriptures, all that was established by Miracles, all that is deduced by reason, conduces to this, determines in this, That every tongue should confesse, that Iesus Christ is the Lord; in which essentiall name, the name of his nature, he is first proposed, as the object of our D love.

Now this Lord, Lord for ever, is become that which he was not for ever, (otherwise then in a secondary consideration) that is, Christ, which implies a person prepared, and fitted, and anointed to a peculiar Office in this World. And can the Lord, the ever-living Lord, the Son of God, the onely Son of God, God himselfe have any preferment? preferment by an Office in this World? Was it a preferment to Dionysius, who was before in that height over men, to become a schoole-master over boyes? Were it a preferment to the Kings Son, to be made governour over a Bee-hive, or over-seer over an Ant-hill? And men, nay Mankinde is no more, not that, not a Bee-hive, not an Ant-hill, compared to this Person, who being the Lord, would become Christ. As he was the Lord, we considered him as God, and that there is a God, naturall reason can comprehend; As he is Christ, we consider him God and Man, and such a Person, naturall reason (not rooted E in the Scriptures, not illustrated by the Scriptures) cannot comprehend; Man will much easilier beleeve the Lord, that is, God, then Christ, that is, God and Man in one Person.

Christ then is the style, the title of his Office; Non Nomen, sed Appellatio, Christ is not his Name, but his Addition. Unctus significatur, sayes he, & unctus non magis nomen, quam vestitus, calceatus; Christ signifies but anointed, and anointed is no more a Name, then apparelled, or shod, is a name: So, as hee was apparelled in our flesh, and his apparell dyed red in his owne blood, so as he was shod to tread the Wine-presse for us, So he was Christ. That it is Nomen Sacramenti, as S. Aug. cals it, A mystery, is easily agreed to: for all the mysteries of all the Religions in the World, are but Milke in respect of this Bone, but Catechismes in respect of this Schoole-point, but Alphabets in respect respect of this hard Style, God and Man in one person. That it is Nomen Sacramenti, as Augustine says, is easie; but that it is Nuncupatio potestatis, as Lactantius cals it, is somewhat strange, that it is an office of power, a title of honour: for the Creator to become a Creature, and the Lord of life the object of death, nay the seat of death, in whom death did sojourn three dayes, can Lactantius call this a declaration of power? is this Nuncupatio potestatis, a title of honour? Beloved, he does, and he may; for it was so: for, it was Exod. 29. 7. an Annointing; Christus is unctus; and unction was the Consecration of Priests, Thou shalt take the annointing Oyle, and powre it upon his head. The Mitre (as you may see there) was upon his head then; but then there was a Crowne upon the Mitre; There is a power above the Priest, the regall power; not above the function of the Priest, but a-

1 Sam. 10. 1. & 24. bove the person of the Priest; But Unction was the Consecration of Kings too; Samuel saluted Saul with a kisse, and all the people shouted, and sayd, God save the King; but, Is it not, sayes Samuel, because the Lord hath annointed thee, to be captaine over his inheritance? Kings were above Priests; and in extraordinary cases, God raysed Prophets a-
1 Reg. 19. 16, 17. bove Kings; for there is no ordinary power above them: But Unction was the Consecration of these Prophets too; Elisha was annointed to be Prophet in Elias roome; and such a Prophet as should have use of the Sword: Him that scapes the Sword of Hazael, (Hazael was King of Syria) shall the Sword of Iehu slay, and him that scapes the Sword of Iehu (Iehu was King of Israel) shall the Sword of Elisha slay. In all these, in Priests who were above the people, in Kings, who (in matter of Government) were above the Priests, in Prophets, who (in those limited cases expressed by God, and for that time, wherein God gave them that extraordinary employment) were above Kings, The Unction imprinted their Consecration, they were all Christs, and in them all, thereby, was that Nuncupatio potestatis, which Lactantius mentions; Unction, Annointing was an addition and title of honour: Much more in our Christ, who alone was all three;
Psal. 109. Psal. 2. 6. Deut. 18. A Priest after the Order of Melchizedek; A King set upon the holy hill of Sion; And a Prophet, The Lord thy God will raise up a Prophet, unto him shall yee harken: And besides all this threefold Unction, Humanitas uncta Divinitate; He had all the unctions that all the other had, and this, which none other had; In him the Humanity was Consecrated, anointed with the Divinity it selfe.

Nazian: Cyrill. So then, unio unctio, The hypostaticall union of the Godhead to the humane nature, is his Conception, made him Christ: for, oleo latitiæ perfusus in unione, Then, in that union of the two natures, did God annoint him with the oyle of gladnes above his fellows. There was an addition, something gained, something to be glad of; and, to him, as he was God, The Lord, so nothing could be added; If he were glad above his fellows, it was in that respect wherein he had fellows, and as God, as The Lord, he had none; so that still, as he was made Man, he became this Christ. In which his being made Man, if we should not consider the last and principall purpose, which was to redeem man; if we leave out his part, yet it were object inough for our wonder, and subject inough for our praise and thankesgiving, to consider the dignity, that the nature of man received in that union, wherin this Lord was thus made this Christ, for, the Godhead did not swallow up the manhood; but man, that nature remained still; The greater kingdom did not swallow the lesse, but the lesse had that great addition, which it had not before, and retained the dig-
Damasc. nities and priviledges which it had before too. Christus est nomen personæ, non naturæ, The name of Christ denotes one person, but not one nature: neither is Christ so composed of those two natures, as a man is composed of Elements; for man is thereby made a third thing, and is not now any of those Elements; you cannot call mans body fire or ayre, or earth or water, though all foure be in his composition: But Christ is so made of God and Man, as that he is Man still, for all the glory of the Deity, and God still, for all the infir-
Idem. mity of the manhood: Divinum miraculis lucet, humanum contumeliis afficitur: In this one Christ, both appear; The Godhead bursts out, as the Sun out of a cloud, and shines forth gloriously in miracles, even the raysing of the dead, and the humane nature is submitted to contempt and to torment, even to the admitting of death in his own bosome;
Idem. sed tamen ipsius sunt tum miracula, tum supplicia, but still, both he that rayses the dead, and he that dyes himself, is one Christ, his is the glory of the Miracles, and the contempt and torment is his too. This is that mysterious person, who is singularis, and yet not individuus; singularis, There never was, never shall be any such, but we cannot call him
Idem. Individuall, as every other particular man is, because Christi tatis non est Genus, there is no

genus

genus nor ſpecies of Chriſts; it is not a name, which, ſo (as the name belongs to our Chriſt, that is, by being annointed with the divine nature) can be communicated to any other, as the name of Man, may to every Individuall Man. Chriſt is not that Spectrum, that Damaſcene ſpeaks of, nor that Electrum that Tertullian ſpeakes of; not Spectrum, ſo as that the two natures ſhould but imaginarily be united, and only to amaze and aſtoniſh us, that we could not tell what to call it, what to make of it, a ſpectre, an apparition, a phantaſma, for he was a Reall perſon. Neither was he Tertullians Electrum, a third metall made of two other metals, but a perſon ſo made of God and Man, as that, in that perſon, God and Man, are in their natures ſtill diſtinguiſhed. He is Germen Davidis, in one Prophet, The branch, the Off-ſpring of David; And he is Germen Iehovæ, The Branch, the Off-ſpring of God, of the Lord, in another: When this Germen Davidis, the Sonne of Man would do miracles, then he was Germen Iehovæ, he reflected to that ſtock into which the Humanity was engrafted, to his Godhead; And when this Germen Iehovæ, the Son of God, would indure humane miſeries, he reflected to that ſtock, to that humanity, in which he had inveſted, and incorporated himſelf. This perſon, this Chriſt dyed for our ſins, ſays S. Paul; but ſays he, He dyed according to the Scriptures; Non ſine onere pronunciat Chriſtum mortuum; The Apoſtle thought it a hard, a heavy, an incredible thing to ſay that this perſon, this Chriſt, this Man and God, was dead, And therefore, Vt duritiam molliret, & ſcandalum auditoris everteret, That he might mollifie the hardnes of that ſaying, and defend the hearer from being ſcandalized with that ſaying, Adjecit, ſecundùm ſcripturas, He adds this, Chriſt is dead, according to the Scriptures: If the Scriptures had not told us that Chriſt ſhould die, and told us againe, that Chriſt did die, it were hard to conceive, how this perſon, in whom the Godhead dwelt bodily, ſhould be ſubmitted to death. But therein principally is he Chriſtus, as he was capable of dying. As he was Verbum naturale, and innatum, The naturall and eſſentiall word of God, He hath his firſt name in the text, He is the Lord: As he is verbum illatum, and Conceptum, A perſon upon whom there is a Decree and a Commiſſion, that he ſhall be a perſon capable to redeem Man by death, he hath this ſecond name in the text, He is Chriſt; As he is The Lord, he cannot die; As he is Chriſt (under the Decree) he cannot chuſe but die; But as he is Ieſus, He is dead already, and that is his other, his third, his laſt name in this Text, If any man love not &c.

Iere. 23. 5. Iſa. 4. 2. 1 Cor. 15. 3. Tertul.

We have inverted a little, the order of theſe names, or titles in the Text; becauſe the Name of Chriſt, is in the order of nature, before the name of Ieſus, as the Commiſſion is before the Execution of the Commiſſion. And, in other places of Scripture, to let us ſee, how both the capacity of doing it, and the actuall doing of it, belongs onely to this perſon, the Holy Ghoſt ſeems to convey a ſpirituall delight to us, in turning and tranſpoſing the Names every way; ſometimes Ieſus alone, and Chriſt alone, ſometimes Ieſus Chriſt, and ſometimes Chriſt Ieſus, that every way we might be ſure of him. Now we conſider him, as Ieſus, a reall, an actuall Saviour. And this was his Name; The Angel ſaid to his Mother, Thou ſhalt call his name Ieſus, for he ſhall ſave his people; And we ſay to you, Call upon this name Ieſus, for he hath ſaved his people; for, Now there is no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Ieſus: As he was verbum conceptum, and illatum, The word which the Trinity uttered amongſt themſelves, ſo he was decreed to come in that place, The Lord of the vineyard (that is, Almighty God ſeeing the miſery of Man, to be otherwiſe irremediable) The Lord of the vineyard ſaid, what ſhall I doe? I will ſend my beloved Sonne; it may be, they will reverence him when they ſee him. But did they reverence him, when they ſaw him? This ſending made him Chriſt, a perſon, whom, though the Sonne of God, they might ſee: They did ſee him; but then, ſays that Goſpell, they drew him out and killed him. And this he knew before he came, and yet came, and herein was Ieſus, a reall, an actuall, a zealous Saviour, even of them that ſlew him: And in this (with piety and reverence) we may be bold to ſay, that even the Son of God, was filius prodigus, that powred out his blood even for his Enemies; but rather in that acclamation of the prodigall childs Father, This my ſonne was dead, and is alive againe, he was loſt, and is found. For, but for this deſire of our ſalvation, why ſhould he who was the Lord, be ambitious of that Name, the name of Ieſus, which was not Tam expectabile apud Iudæos nomen, no ſuch name as was in any eſpeciall eſtimation amongſt the Iews: for, we ſee in Ioſephus, divers men of that name, of no great honour, of no good converſation. But becauſe the name implyes ſalvation, Ioſua, who had another name before, Cum in hujus ſacramenti imagine parabatur, Ieſus. Rom. 8. 1. Luk. 20. 13. Tertull. Idem.

parabatur, when he was prepared as a Type of this Iesus, to be a Saviour, a Deliverer of the people, Etiam nominis Dominici inauguratus est figura, & Iesus cognominatus, then he was canonized with that name of ſalvation, and called Iaſua, which is Iesus. A

The Lord then, the Son of God, had a Sitio in heaven, as well as upon the Croſſe; He thirſted our ſalvation there; and in the midſt of the fellowſhip of the Father from whom he came, and of the Holy Ghoſt, who came from him and the Father, and all the Angels, who came (by a lower way) from them all, he deſired the converſation of Man, for Mans ſake; He that was God The Lord, became Chriſt, a man, and he that was Chriſt, became Ieſus, no man, a dead man, to ſave man: To ſave man, all wayes, in all his parts, And to ſave all men, in all parts of the world: To ſave his ſoule from hell, where we ſhould have felt pains, and yet been dead, then when we felt them; and ſeen horrid ſpectacles, and yet been in darknes and blindnes, then when we ſaw them; And ſuffered unſufferable torments, & yet have told over innumerable ages in ſuffering them: To ſave this ſoule from that hell, and to fill that capacity which it hath, and give it a capacity which it hath not, to comprehend the joyes and glory of Heaven, this Chriſt became Ieſus. To ſave this body from the condemnation of everlaſting corruption, where the wormes that we breed are our betters, becauſe they have a life, where the duſt of dead Kings is blowne into the ſtreet, and the duſt of the ſtreet blowne into the River, and the muddy River tumbled into the Sea, and the Sea remaunded into all the veynes and channels of the earth; to ſave this body from everlaſting diſſolution, diſperſion, diſſipation, and to make it in a glorious Reſurrection, not onely a Temple of the holy Ghoſt, but a Companion of the holy Ghoſt in the kingdome of heaven, This Chriſt became this Ieſus. To ſave this man, body and ſoule together, from the puniſhments due to his former ſinnes, and to ſave him from falling into future ſinnes by the aſſiſtance of his Word preached, and his Sacrrments adminiſtred in the Church, which he purchaſed by his bloud, is this perſon, The Lord, the Chriſt, become this Ieſus, this Saviour. To ſave ſo, All wayes, In ſoule, in body, in both; And alſo to ſave all men. For, to exclude others from that Kingdome, is a tyrannie, an uſurpation; and to exclude thy ſelfe, is a ſinfull, and a rebellious melancholy. But as melancholy in the body is the hardeſt humour to be purged, ſo is the melancholy in the ſoule, the diſtruſt of thy ſalvation too. Flaſhes of preſumption a calamity will quench, but clouds of deſperation calamities thicken upon us; But even in this inordinate dejection thou exalteſt thy ſelf above God, and makeſt thy worſt better then his beſt, thy ſins larger then his mercy. Chriſt hath a Greek name, and an Hebrew name; Chriſt is Greeke, Ieſus is Hebrew; He had commiſſion to ſave all nations, and he hath ſaved all; Thou giveſt him another Hebrew name, and another Greek, when thou makeſt his name Abaddon, and Apollyon, a Deſtroyer; when thou wilt not apprehend him as a Saviour, and love him ſo; which is our ſecond Part, in our order propoſed at firſt, If any man love not, &c. B C Apoc. 9. 11. D

2 Part.

In the former part, we found it to be one argument for the Deitie of Chriſt, That he was Iehovah, The Lord; we have another here, That this great branch, nay this very root of all divine worſhip due to God, is required to be exhibited to this perſon, That is, Love, If any man love not, &c. If any man could ſee Vertue with his eye, he would be in love with her: Chriſt Jeſus hath beene ſeen ſo: Quod vidimus, ſayes the Apoſtle, That which we have ſeene with our eyes, we preach to you, and therefore If any man love not, &c. If he love him not with that love which implyes a Confeſſion, that the Lord Jeſus is God, That is, if he love him not with all his heart, and all his power: What doth the Lord thy God require of thee? To love him with all thy heart, and all thy ſoule. God forbids us not a love of the Creature, proportionable to the good that that creature can doe us: To love fire as it warms me, and meat as it feeds me, and a wife as ſhe helps me; But becauſe God does all this, in all theſe ſeverall inſtruments, God alone is centrically, radically, directly to be loved, and the creature with a love reflected, and derived from him; And Chriſt to be loved with the love due to God himſelfe: He that loveth father or mother, ſon or daughter more then me, is not worthy of me, ſayes Chriſt himſelfe. If then we love him ſo, as we love God, intirely, we confeſſe him to be the Lord; And if we love him ſo, as he hath loved us, we confeſſe him to be Chriſt Ieſus: And we conſider his love to us (for the preſent) in theſe two demonſtrations of it, firſt Dilexit in finem, As he loved, ſo he loved to the end; And then Poſuit animam, Greater love there is not, then to die for one, and he did that. Cicero. Levit. 10. 11. Mat. 10. 37. E

Our

A Our Saviour Christ forsooke not Peter, when Peter forsooke him: because he loved him, he loved him to the end. Love thou Christ to the end; To His end, and to Thy end. Finem Domini vidistis, sayes S. Iames, You have seene the end of the Lord; That is, sayes August. to what end the Lord came; His way was contempt and misery, and his end was shame and death: Love him there. Thy love is not required onely in the Hosanna's of Christ, when Christ is magnified, and his Gospel advanced, and men preferred for loving it: No, nor onely in the Transfiguration of Christ, when Christ appeares to thee in some particular beames, and manifestation of his glory; but love him in his Crucifigatur, then when it is a scornfull thing to love him, And love him in the Nunquid & tu? when thou must passe that examination, Wert not thou one of them? And in the Nonne ego te vidi? if witnesses come in against thee for the love of Christ, love him when it is a suspicious thing, a dangerous thing to love him; And love him not onely in spirituall B transfigurations, when he visits thy soule with glorious consolations, but even in his inward eclipses, when he withholds his comforts, and withdrawes his cheerfulnesse, even when he makes as though he loved not thee, love him. Love him, all the way, to his end, and to thy end too, to the laying downe of thy life for him.

In finem.

Iames 5.11.

Iohn 18.25,26.

Love him then in the laying downe of the pleasures of this life for him, and love him in the laying downe of the life it selfe, if his love need that testimony. Of the first case, of crucifying himselfe to the world, S. Augustine had occasion to say much to a young Gentleman, young, and noble, and rich, and (which is not, in such persons, an ordinary tentation, but where it is, it is a shrewd one) as he was young, and noble, and rich, so he was learned in other learnings, and upon that strength withdrew, and kept off from Christ. It was Licentius, to whom S. Augustine writes his 39. Epistle. He had sent to S. Augustine a handsome Elegie of his making, in which Poeme he had said as much of C the vanity and deceivablenesse of this world, as S. Augustine could have looked for, or, perchance, have said in a Homily; And he ends his Elegy thus, Hoc opus, ut jubeas, All this concerning this world I know already, Do you but tell me, doe you command me, what I shall doe. Iubebit Augustinus conservo suo? sayes that sensible and blessed Father: Shall I, shall Augustine command his fellow-servant? Et non plangat potius frustra jubere Dominum? Must not Augustine rather lament that the Lord hath commanded thee, and is not obeyed? Wouldst thou heare me? Canst thou pretend that? Exaudi teipsum, Durissime, Immanissime, Surdissime; Thou that art inoxorable against the perswasions of thine owne soule, Hard against the tendernesse of thine owne heart, Deafe against the charmes of thine owne Verses, canst thou pretend a willingnesse to be led by me? Quam animam, quod ingenium non licet immolare Deo nostro? How well disposed a soule, how high pitched a wit is taken out of my hands, that I may not sacrifice that soule, that I D may not direct that wit upon our God, because, with all these good parts, thou turnest upon the pleasures of this world? Mentiuntur, moriuntur, in mortem trahunt: Doe not speake out of wit, nor out of a love to elegant expressions, nor doe not speake in jest of the dangerous vanities of this world; Mentiuntur, they are false, they performe not their promises; Moriuntur, they are transitory, they stay not with thee; and In mortem trahunt, they dye, and they dye of the infection, and they transfuse the venome into thee, and thou dyest with them: Non dicit verum, nisi veritas, & Christus veritas, Nothing will deale truely with thee but the Truth it selfe, and onely Christ Jesus is this Truth. He followes it thus much farther, Si calicem aureum invenisses in terra, If thou foundest a chalice of gold in the earth, so good a heart as thine would say, Surely this belongs to the Church, and surely thou wouldst give it to the Church: Accepisti à Deo ingenium spiritualiter aureum, God hath given thee a wit, an understanding, not of the gold E of Ophir, but of the gold of the heavenly Jerusalem, Et in illo, Satanæ propinas teipsum? In that chalice once consecrated to God, wilt thou drink a health to the devill, and drink a health to him in thine owne blood, in making thy wit, thy learning, thy good parts advance his kingdome? He ends all thus, Miserearis jam mei, si tibi viluisti, If thou undervalue thy selfe, if thou thinke not thy selfe worth hearing, if thou follow not thine owne counsels, yet miserearis mei, Have mercy upon me, me, whose charge it is to bring others to heaven, me, who shall not bee received there, if I bring no body with mee; bee content to goe with me, that way, which by the inspiration of the holy Ghost I do shew, and that way, which by the conduct of the holy Ghost I would fain goe. All bends to this, First, love Christ so far as to lay down the pleasures of this life for him, and so far, as to lay down the life it self for him.

Mortificatio.

Martyrium. Christ did so for thee: and his blessed Servants the Martyrs, in the Primitive Church, did so for him, and thee; for his glory, for thy example. Can there be any ill, any losse, in giving thy life for him? Is it not a part of the reward it selfe, the honour to suffer for him? When Christ sayes, Whosoever loses any thing for my sake, and the Gospels, he shall have a hundred fold in houses, and lands, with persecutions, wee need not limit that clause of the Promise, (with persecutions) to be, That in the midst of persecutions, God will give us temporall blessings, but that in the midst of temporall blessings, God will give us persecutions; that it shall be a part of his mercy, to be delivered from the danger of being puffed up by those temporall abundances, by having a mixture of adversity and persecutions; and then, what ill, what losse, is there in laying downe this life for him? Quid hoc mali est, quod martyrialis mali, non habet timorem, pudorem, tergiversationem, pœnitentiam, deplorationem? What kinde of evill is this, which when it came to the highest, Ad malum martyriale, to martyrdome, to death, did neither imprint in our holy predecessors in the Primitive Church, Timorem, any feare that it would come; nor Tergiversationem, any recanting lest it should come; nor Pudorem, any shame when it was come; nor Pœnitentiam, any repentance that they would suffer it to come; nor Deplorationem, any lamentation by their heires, and Executors, because they lost all, when it was come? Quid mali? What kinde of evill can I call this, in laying down my life, for this Lord of life, Cujus reus gaudet, when those Martyrs called that guiltinesse a joy, Cujus accusatio votum, and the accusation a satisfaction, Cujus pœna fælicitas, and the suffering perfect happinesse? Love thy neighbour as thy selfe, is the farthest of that Commandement; but love God above thy selfe; for, indeed, in doing so thou dost but love thy selfe still: Remember that thy soule is thy selfe; and as if that be lost, nothing is gained, so if that be gained, nothing is lost, whatsoever become of this life.

Tertul. Idem.

Dominus. Love him then, as he is presented to thee here; Love the Lord, love Christ, love Iesus. If when thou lookest upon him as the Lord, thou findest frowns and wrinkles in his face, apprehensions of him, as of a Judge, and occasions of feare, doe not run away from him, in that apprehension; look upon him in that angle, in that line awhile, and that feare shall bring thee to love; and as he is Lord, thou shalt see him in the beauty and lovelinesse of his creatures, in the order and succession of causes, and effects, and in that harmony and musique of the peace between him, and thy soule: As he is the Lord, thou wilt feare him, but no man feares God truly, but that that feare ends in love.

Christus. Love him as he is the Lord, that would have nothing perish, that he hath made; And love him as he is Christ, that hath made himselfe man too, that thou mightest not perish: Love him as the Lord that could shew mercy; and love him as Christ, who is that way of mercy, which the Lord hath chosen. Returne againe, and againe to that mysterious person, Christ; And let me tell you, that though the Fathers never forbore to call the blessed Virgin Mary, Deiparam, the Mother of God, yet in Damascens time, they would not admit that name, Christiparam, that she was the Mother of Christ: Not that there is any reason to deny her that name now; but because then, that great Heretique, Nestorius, to avoid that name, in which the rest agreed, Deiparam, (for he thought not Christ to be God) invented a new name, Christiparam: Though it be true in it self, that that blessed Virgin is Christipara, yet because it was the invention of an Heretique, and a fundamentall Heretique, who though he thought Christ to be anointed by the Holy Ghost above his fellowes, yet did not beleeve him to be God, Damascen, and his Age, refused that addition to the blessed Virgin; So reverently were they affected, so jealously were they enamoured of that name, Christ, the name which implyed his Unction, his Commission, the Decree, by which he was made a Person, able to redeeme thy soule: And in that contemplation, say with Andrew, to his brother Peter, Invenimus Messiam, I have found the Messias; I could finde no meanes of salvation in my selfe, nay, no such meanes to direct God upon, by my prayer, or by a wish, as hee hath taken; but God himselfe hath found a way, a Messias; His Son shall bee made man; And Inveni Messiam, I have found him, and found, that he, who by his Incarnation, was made able to save me, (so he was Christ) by his actuall passion, hath saved me, and so I love him as Iesus.

Iesus. Christ loved Stephen all the way, for all the way Stephen was disposed to Christs glory, but in the agony of death (death suffered for him) Christ expressed his love most, in opening the windowes, the curtaines of heaven it selfe, to see Stephen dye, and to shew himselfe to Stephen. I love my Saviour as he is The Lord, He that studies my salvation;

Acts 7. 56.

And

A And as Christ, made a perſon able to work my ſalvation; but when I ſee him in the third notion, Ieſus, accompliſhing my ſalvation, by an actuall death, I ſee thoſe hands ſtretched out, that ſtretched out the heavens, and thoſe feet racked, to which they that racked them are foot-ſtooles; I heare him, from whom his neareſt friends fled, pray for his enemies, and him, whom his Father forſooke, not forſake his brethren; I ſee him that cloathes this body with his creatures, or elſe it would wither, and cloathes this ſoule with his Righteouſneſſe, or elſe it would periſh, hang naked upon the Croſſe; And him that hath, him that is, the Fountaine of the water of life, cry out, He thirſts, when that voyce overtakes me, in my croſſe wayes in the world, Is it nothing to you, all you that paſſe by? Behold, and ſee, if there be any ſorrow, like unto my ſorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger; When I conceit, when I contemplate my Saviour thus, I love the Lord, and there is a reverent adoration in that love, I love B Chriſt, and there is a myſterious admiration in that love, but I love Ieſus, and there is a tender compaſſion in that love, and I am content to ſuffer with him, and to ſuffer for him, rather then ſee any diminution of his glory, by my prevarication. And he that loves not thus, that loves not the Lord God, and God manifeſted in Chriſt, Anathema, Maranatha, which is our next, and our laſt Part. Lament. 1. 12.

Whether this Anathema be denounced by the Apoſtle, by way of Imprecation, that he wiſhed it ſo, or pronounced by way of excommunication, That others ſhould eſteem them ſo, and avoid them, as ſuch perſons, is ſometimes debated amongſt us in our books. If the Apoſtle ſay it by way of Imprecation, if it ſound ſo, you are to remember firſt, That many things are ſpoken by the Prophets in the Scriptures, which ſound as imprecations, as execrations, which are indeed but propheſies; They ſeeme to be ſpoken in the ſpirit of anger, when they are in truth, but in the ſpirit of propheſie. So, in very C many places of the Pſalmes, David ſeemes to wiſh heavy calamities upon his and Gods enemies, when it is but a declaration of thoſe judgements of God, which hee propheticall foreſees to be imminent upon them: They ſeeme Imprecations, and are but Propheſies; and ſuch, wee, who have not this Spirit of Propheſie, nor foreſight of Gods wayes, may not venture upon. If they be truly Imprecations, you are to remember alſo, that the Prophets and Apoſtles had in them a power extraordinary, and in execution of that power, might doe that, which every private man may not doe: So the Prophets rebuked, ſo they puniſhed Kings. So [a] Elizeus called in the Beares to devoure the boyes; And ſo [b] Elias called downe fire to devoure the Captaines; So S. Peter killed [c] Ananias, and Sapphira with his word; And [d] ſo S. Paul ſtroke Elymas the Sorcerer with blindneſſe. But upon Imprecations of this kinde, wee as private men, or as publique perſons, but limited by our Commiſſion, may not adventure neither. But take the Prophets or the A- D poſtles in their higheſt Authority, yet in an over-vehement zeale, they may have done ſome things ſome times not warrantable in themſelves, many times many things, not to be imitated by us. In Moſes his paſſionate vehemency, Dele me, If thou wilt not forgive them, blot me out of thy booke, And in the Apoſtles inconſiderate zeale to his brethren, Optabam Anathema eſſe, I could wiſh that my ſelfe were accurſed from Chriſt; In Iames and Johns impatience of their Maſters being neglected by the Samaritans, when they drew from Chriſt that rebuke, You know not of what ſpirit you are; In theſe, and ſuch as theſe, there may be ſomething, wherein even theſe men cannot be excuſed, but very much wherein we may not follow them, nor doe as they did, nor ſay as they ſaid. Since there is a poſſibility, a facility, a proclivity of erring herein, and ſo many conditions and circumſtances required, to make an Imprecation juſt and lawfull, the beſt way is to forbeare them, or to be very ſparing in them.

Rom. 9. 3.

Luke 9. 55.

E But we rather take this in the Text, to be an Excommunication denounced by the Apoſtle, then an Imprecation: So Chriſt himſelfe, If he will not heare the Church, let him be to thee as a Heathen, or a Publican; That is, Have no converſation with him. So ſayes the Apoſtle, ſpeaking of an Angel, Anathema, If any man, if we our ſelves, if an Angel from heaven, preach any other Goſpel, let him be accurſed. Now the Excommunication is in the Anathema, and the aggravating thereof in the other words, Maranatha. The word Anathema had two ſignifications; They are expreſſed thus, Quod Deo dicatum, Quod à Deo per vitium alienatum; That which for ſome excellency in it, was ſeparated from the uſe of man, to the ſervice of God, or that which for ſome great fault in it, was ſeparated from God and man too. Ab illo abſtinebant tanquam Deo dicatum, Ab hoc recedebant, tanquam

Gal. 1. 9.

Juſt. Mart.

quam à Deo abalienatum: From the firſt kinde, men abſtained, becauſe they were conſecrated to God, and from the other, becauſe they were aliened from God; and in that laſt ſenſe, irreligious men, ſuch as love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, are Anathema, aliened from God. Amongſt the Druides, with the Heathen, they excommunicated Malefactors, and no man might relieve him in any neceſſity, no man might anſwer him in any action: And ſo amongſt the Jews, the Eſſeni, who were in ſpeciall eſtimation for ſanctity, excommunicated irreligious perſons, and the perſons ſo excommunicated ſtarved in the ſtreets and fields. By the light of nature, by the light of grace, we ſhould ſeparate our ſelves from irreligious, and from idolatrous perſons; and that with that earneſtneſſe, which the Apoſtle expreſſes in the laſt words, Maran Atha. A

Maran Atha. In the practiſe of the Primitive Church, by thoſe Canons, which we call The Apoſtles Canons, and thoſe which we call The penitentiall Canons, we ſee there were different penances inflicted upon different faults, and there were, very early, relaxations of penances, Indulgences; and there were reſervations of caſes; in ſome any Prieſt, in ſome a Biſhop onely might diſpenſe. It is ſo in our Church ſtill; Impugners of the Supremacy are excommunicated, and not reſtored but by the Archbiſhop: Impugners of the Common prayer Booke excommunicated too, but may bee reſtored by the Biſhop of the place: Impugners of our Religion declared in the Articles, reſerved to the Archbiſhop: Impugners of Ceremonies reſtored when they repent, and no Biſhop named: Authors of Schiſme reſerved to the Archbiſhop; maintainers of Schiſmatiques, referred but to repentance; And ſo maintainers of Conventicles, to the Archbiſhop; maintainers of Conſtitutions made in Conventicles, to their repentance. There was ever, there is yet a reſerving of certaine caſes, and a relaxation or aggravating of Eccleſiaſticall cenſures, for their waight, and for their time: and, becauſe Not to love the Lord Ieſus Chriſt was the greateſt, the Apoſtle inflicts this heavieſt Excommunication, Maran Atha. B C

The word ſeemes to be a Proverbiall word amongſt the Jews after their returne, and vulgarly ſpoken by them, and ſo the Apoſtle takes it, out of common uſe of ſpeech: Maran, is Dominus, The Lord, and Athan is Venit, He comes: Not ſo truly, in the very exactneſſe of Hebrew rules, and terminations, but ſo amongſt them then, when their language was much depraved: but, in ancienter times, we have the word Mara for Dominus, and the word Atha for Venit; And ſo Anathema, Maran Atha will be, Let him that loveth not the Lord Ieſus Chriſt, be as an accurſed perſon to you, even till the Lord come. S. Hierom ſeems to underſtand this, Dominus venit, That the Lord is come, come already, come in the fleſh; Superfluum, ſayes he, odiis pertinacibus contendere adverſus eum, qui jam venit; It is ſuperabundant perverſneſſe, to reſiſt Chriſt now; Now that he hath appeared already, and eſtabliſhed to himſelfe a Kingdome in this world. And ſo S. Chryſoſtome ſeemes to take it too; Chriſt is come already, ſayes he, Et jam nulla poteſt excuſatio non diligentibus eum; If any excuſe could be pretended before, yet ſince Chriſt is come, none can be: Si opertum, ſayes the Apoſtle, If our Goſpel be hid now, it is hid from them who are loſt; that is, they are loſt from whom it is hid. But that is not all, that is intended by the Apoſtle, in this place. It is not onely a cenſorious ſpeech, It is a ſhame for them, and an inexcuſable thing in them, if they doe not love the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but it is a judiciary ſpeech, thus much more, ſince they doe not love the Lord, The Lord judge them when he comes; I, ſayes the Apoſtle, take away none of his mercy, when he comes, but I will have nothing to doe with them, till he comes; to me, he ſhall be Anathema, Maran Atha, ſeparated from me, till then; then, the Lord who ſhews mercy in minutes, do his will upon him. Our former Tranſlation had it thus, Let him be had in execration, and excommunicated till death; In death, Lord have mercy upon him; till death, I will not live with him. D E

Dan. 4. 16. Deut. 33. 2.

To end all, If a man love not the Lord, if he love not God, which is, which was, and which is to come, what will pleaſe him? whom will he love? If hee love the Lord, and love not Chriſt, and ſo love a God in generall, but lay no hold upon a particular way of his ſalvation, Sine Chriſto, ſine Deo, ſayes the Apoſtle to the Epheſians, when ye were without Chriſt, ye were without God; A non-Chriſtian, is an Atheiſt in that ſenſe of the Apoſtle. If any man finde a Chriſt, a Saviour of the World, but finde not a Ieſus, an actuall Saviour, that this Jeſus hath ſaved him, Who is a lyar, ſayes another Apoſtle, but he that denieth that Ieſus is the Chriſt? And (as he ſayes after) Whoſoever believeth that Ieſus is the Chriſt, is borne of God. From the preſumptuous Atheiſt, that beleeves no God, from the reſerved reserved Atheist, that beleeves no God manifested in Christ, from the melancholique Atheist that beleeves no Jesus applied to him, from him of no Religion, from him of no Christian Religion; from him that erres fundamentally in the Christian Religion, the Apostle enjoynes a separation, not till clouds of persecution come, and then joyne, not till beames of preferment come, and then joyne, not till Lawes may have beene slumbred some yeares, and then joyne, not till the parties grow somewhat neare an equality, and then joyne, but Maran Atha, donec Dominus venit, till the Lord come to his declaration in judgement, *If any man love not the Lord Iesus Christ, let him be accursed. PSAL. 2. 12.

Kisse the Son, lest he be angry.

WHether we shall call it a repeating againe in us, of that which God had done before to Israel, or call it a performing of that in us, which God promised by way of Prophesie to Israel, that is certainely afforded to us by God, which is spoken by the Prophet of Israel, God doth draw us with the cords of a man, and with bands of love: with the cords of a man, the man Christ Jesus, the Son of God, and with the bands of love, the band and seale of love, a holy kisse, Kisse the Son, lest he be angry. No man comes to God, except the Father draw him; The Father draws no man, but by the Son; and the Son receives none, but by love, and this cement and glue, of a zealous and a reverentiall love, a holy kisse; Kisse the Son, &c. Hos. 11. 4.

Divisio. The parts upon which, for the enlightning of your understandings, and assistance of your memories, we shall insist, are two: first our duty, then our danger; The first is an expression of love, Kisse the Son; the second is an impression of feare, lest he be angry. In the first we shall proceed thus: we shall consider first The object of this love, the Person, the second Person in the Trinity, The Son; The rather, because that consideration will cleare the Translation; for, in no one place of Scripture, do Translations differ more, then in this Text; and the Roman Translation and ours differ so much, as that they have but Apprehendite disciplinam, Embrace knowledge, where we have, (as you heard) Kisse the Son. From the Person, The Son, we shall passe to the act, Osculamini, Kisse the Son; In which we shall see, That since this is an act, which licentious men have depraved, (carnal men doe it, and treacherous men doe it, Iudas (and not onely Iudas) have betrayed by a kisse) and yet God commands this, and expresses love in this, Every thing that hath, or may be abused, must not therefore be abandoned; the turning of a thing out of the way, is not a taking of that thing away, but good things deflected to ill uses, by some, may be by others reduced to their first goodnesse. And then in a third branch of this first part, we shall consider, and magnifie the goodnesse of God, that hath brought us into this distance, that we may Kisse the Son, that the expressing of this love lies in our hands, and that, whereas the love of the Church, in the Old Testament, even in the Canticle, went no farther but to the Osculetur me, O that he would kisse me with the kisses of his mouth now, in the Christian Church, and in the visitation of a Christian soule, he hath invited us, enabled us to kisse him, for he is presentially amongst us: And this will lead us to conclude that first part, with an earnest perswasion, and exhortation to kisse the Son, with all those affections, which we shall there finde to be expressed in the Scriptures, in that testimony of true love, a holy kisse. But then, lest that perswasion by love should not be effectuall, and powerfull enough to us, we shall descend from that duty, to the danger, from love, to feare, Lest he be angry; And therein see first, that God, who is love, can be angry; And then, that this God who is angry here, is the Son of God, He that hath done Cant. 1. 1.

ſo much for us, and therefore in Juſtice may be angry; He that is our Judge, and therefore in reaſon, we are to feare his anger: And then, in a third branch, we ſhall ſee, how eaſily this anger departs, a kiſſe removes it, Do it, leſt he be angry; And then laſtly, we ſhall inquire, what does anger him; and there conſider, That as we attribute power to the Father, and ſo, ſins againſt power (the undervaluing of Gods power in the Magiſtrate over us, or the abuſing of Gods power, in our ſelves, over others) were ſins againſt the Father; ſo wiſedome being the attribute of the Sonne, ignorance, which is ſo far under wiſedome, and curioſity, which carries us beyond wiſedome, will be ſinnes againſt the Sonne. A

1 Part. Perſona, Filius.

Our firſt branch in our firſt part, directs us upon him, who is firſt and laſt, and yeſterday and to day, and the ſame for ever; The Son of God, Oſculamini filium, Kiſſe the Sonne. Where the Tranſlations differ as much, as in any one paſſage. The Chalde paraphraſe (which is, for the moſt part, good evidence) and the tranſlation of the Septuagint, (which adds much weight) and the currant of the Fathers (which is of importance too) doe all reade this place, Apprehendite diſciplinam, Embrace knowledge, and not Oſculamini filium, Kiſſe the ſonne. Of the later men in the Roman Church, divers read it as we do, Oſculamini, and ſome farther, Amplectimini, Embrace the ſonne. Amongſt the Jews, Rab. Solomon reads it, Armamini diſciplina, Arme your ſelves with knowledge; And another moderne man, reads it, Oſculamini pactum, Kiſſe the Covenant; And, Adorate frumentum, Adore the Corne, and thereby carries it from the pacification of Chriſt in heaven, to the adoration of the bread in the Sacrament. Clearly, and without exception, even from Bellarmine himſelfe, according to the Originall Hebrew, it ought to be read, as we reade it, Kiſſe the Sonne. Now very many, very learned, and very zealous men of our times, have been very vehement againſt that Tranſlation of the Roman Church, though it be ſtrengthned, by the Chalde, by the Septuagint, and by the Fathers, in this place. The reaſon of the vehemence in this place, is not becauſe that ſenſe, which that tranſlation preſents, may not be admitted; no, nor that it does not reach home, to that which is intended in ours, Kiſſe the Sonne: for, ſince the doctrine of the Sonne of God, had been eſtabliſhed in the verſes before, to ſay now, Apprehendite diſciplinam, lay hold upon that Doctrine; That doctrine which was delivered before, is, in effect the ſame thing, as, Kiſſe the Sonne. So Luther, when he takes, and follows that tranſlation of that Church, ſayes, Noſtra tranſlatio, ad verbum, nihil eſt, ad ſenſum propriiſsima; That tranſlation, if we conſider the very words only, is far from the Originall, but if we regard the ſenſe, it is moſt proper. And ſo alſo Calvin admits; Take it which way you will, Idem manet ſenſus, the ſenſe is all one. And therefore another Author in the Reformation ſays, In re dubia, malim vetuſtiſsimo interpreti credere, ſince upon the whole matter it is doubtfull, or indifferent, I would not depart, ſayes he, from that Tranſlation, which is moſt ancient. B C Pellican. D

The caſe then being thus, that that ſenſe may be admitted, and admitted ſo as that it eſtabliſh the ſame doctrine that ours does, why are our late men ſo very vehement againſt it? Truly, upon very juſt reaſon: for, when thoſe former reverent men were ſo moderate as to admit that tranſlation in this place; The Church of Rome, had not then put ſuch a ſanctity, ſuch a reverence, ſuch a ſingularity, and preheminence, and ſupremacy, ſuch a Noli me tangere, upon that Tranſlation; It had the eſtimation then of a very reverend Tranſlation, and compared with any other Tranſlations, then the beſt. But when in the Councell of Trent they came to make it as Authenticall, to prefer it before the Originals themſelves, to decide all matters of Controverſie by it alone, and to make the doing ſo, matter of faith, and hereſie, in any thing to depart from that Tranſlation, then came theſe later men juſtly to charge it with thoſe errors, wherein, by their own confeſſions, it hath departed from the Originall; Not that theſe men meant to diſcredit that Tranſlation ſo, as that it ſhould not ſtill retain the eſtimation of a good and uſefull Tranſlation, but to avoyd that danger, that it ſhould be made matter of faith, to be bound to one Tranſlation; or that any Tranſlation ſhould be preferred before the Originall. And ſo truly it is, in many other things, beſides the tranſlation. They ſay S. Peter was at Rome; and all moderate men went along with them; S. Peter was at Rome. But when upon S. Peters perſonall being at Rome, they came to build their univerſall ſupremacy over all the Church, and ſo to erect matter of faith upon matter of fact, then later men came to deny, that it could be proved out of Scripture, that Peter was at Rome; So the Ancients E

A ſpoke of many Sacraments, ſo they did of Purgatory, ſo they did of many things controverted now; when as they, then, never ſuſpected that ſo impious a ſenſe would have been put upon their words, nor thoſe opinions and doctrines ſo miſchievouſly advanced, as they have been ſince. If they would have let their tranſlation have remained ſuch a tranſlation, we would not have declined it; ſince they will have all tryals made by it, we rather accept the Originall, and that is in this place, Oſculamini filium, Kiſſe the Son.

The perſon then (which was our firſt Conſideration) is the Sonne; The teſtimony of our love to this perſon, is this kiſſe, Oſculamini: where we ſee, that God cals upon us, and enjoyns unto us, ſuch an outward act, as hath been diverſly depraved, and vitiated before amongſt men. God gives no countenance to that diſtempered humor, to that diſtorted rule; It hath been ill uſed, and therefore it may not be uſed. Sacred and ſecular Stories abound with examples of the treacherous kiſſe; Let the Scriptures be our limits. B Ioabs complement with Amaſa; Art thou in health, my brother? ended in this; He took him with the right hand, as to kiſſe him, and killed him. Enlarge your thoughts a little upon Iudas caſe; Iudas was of thoſe, who had taſted of the word of God, and the powers of the world to come; He had lived in the Converſation, in the Pædagogy, in the Diſcipline of Chriſt; yet he ſold Chriſt, and ſold him at a low price, as every man that is ſo unprovident, as to offer a thing to ſale, ſhall do; and he ſtayed not till they came to him, with, What will you take for your Maſter? but he went to them, with, What will you give me for Chriſt? yet Chriſt admits him, admits him to ſupper, and after all this, cals him friend; for, after all this, Chriſt had done two, perchance three offices of a friend to Iudas; He waſhed his feet; and, perchance, he gave him the Sacrament with the reſt; and by aſſigning the ſop for a particular mark, he let him ſee, that he knew he was a traytor, which might have been inough to have reclaimed him: It did not; but he proceeded in C his treaſon, and in the moſt miſchievous and treacherous performing of it, to betray him with a kiſſe; He gave them a ſigne, whomſoever I ſhall kiſſe, the ſame is he: Dat ſignum oſculi, cum veneno Diaboli, ſayes Hierome, He kiſſes with a biting kiſſe, and conveys treaſon in a teſtimony of love. It is an Apophthegme of Luthers, Mali tyranni, hæretici pejores, falſi fratres peſſimi: A perſecutor is ill, but he that perſwades me to any thing, which might ſubmit me to the perſecutors rage, is worſe; but he that hath perſwaded me, and then betrays me, is worſt of all. When all that happens, when a mans enemies are the men of his own houſe, when amongſt our ſelves men ariſe, and draw away the Diſciples, remember that Iudas defamed this kiſſe before, he kiſſed his Maſter, and ſo betrayed him. Homo ſum, & inter homines vivo, ſayes S. Auguſtine, I am but a man my ſelfe, and I look but for men to live amongſt; Nec mihi arrogare audeo, meliorem domum meam, quam Arca Noah, I cannot hope to have my houſe clearer than Noahs Arke, and there, in eight, there D was one ill; nor then Iacobs houſe, and there the Sonne went up to the Fathers bed; nor then Davids, and there the brother forced the ſiſter; nor then Chriſts, and there Iudas betrayed his Maſter, and with a kiſſe: which alone does ſo aggravate the fact, as that for the atrocity and hainouſneſſe thereof, three of the Evangeliſts remember that circumſtance, That he betrayed him with a kiſſe; and as though it might ſeeme impoſſible, incredible to man, that it could be ſo, S. Iohn pretermits that circumſtance, That it was done with a kiſſe.

In Ioabs treachery, in Iudas treaſon, is the kiſſe defamed, and in the carnall and licentious abuſe of it, it is every day depraved. They miſtake the matter much, that thinke all adultery is below the girdle: A man darts out an adultery with his eye, in a wanton look; and he wraps up adultery with his fingers, in a wanton letter; and he breaths in an adultery with his lips, in a wanton kiſſe. But though this act of love, be ſo defamed both E wayes, by treachery, by licentiouſnes, yet God chooſes this Metaphore, he bids us kiſſe the Sonne. It is a true, and an uſefull Rule, That ill men have been Types of Chriſt, and ill actions figures of good: Much more, may things not ill in themſelves, though deflected and detorted to ill, be reſtored to good againe; and therfore doth God, in more then this one place, expect our love in a kiſſe; for, if we be truly in love with him, it will be a holy and an acceptable Metaphore unto us, els it will have a carnall and a faſtidious taſte. Fruſtra ad legendum amoris carmen, qui non amat, accedit: He that comes to read Solomons Love-ſong, and loves not him upon whom that Song is directed, will rather endanger, then profit himſelfe by that reading: Non capit ignitum eloquium frigidum pectus: A heart frozen and congealed with the love of this world, is not capable, not ſenſible of the fires of
